ISTER. The old Greek name for the Danube (q.v.), especially the part near the mouth of the r., which was all that they knew definitely. In T. Heywood's B. Age iv., Phœbus says, "We will decline our chariot towards the west Till we have washed our coach-steeds and ourself In I.'s icy streams." Spenser, in the list of rivers in F. Q. iv. 11, 20, mentions "Fair I., flowing from the mtns. high."

ISTRIA. The triangular peninsula at the head of the Adriatic Sea, between the Gulf of Trieste and the Gulf of Quarnero. Until 1919 it was part of Austria-Hungary. It now belongs to Italy. In Middleton's Widow iii. 1, Ansaldo says, "I should have been at I. by daybreak." Probably Capo d'I. is meant (q.v.).

ITACUS. In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, Compass thinks if Blackwall were left uninhabited "our neighbours from Bow might come further from the I. and inhabit here." This is a hitherto unsolved puzzle. Unless it is a punning reference to Ulysses, the Ithacan bowman, I. is probably a misprint.

ITALY (Id. = Italianated, In. = Italian). The peninsula in S. Europe, E. of Spain and W. of Greece. It was the central province of the Roman Empire, and many plays, a list of which will be found under Rome, deal with episodes in the history of I. during the Roman Empire and later Republic. After the fall of Rome it came successively—at least so far as the northern part is concerned—under the sway of the Ostrogoths, the Lombards, and the Franks: the German emperors, too, had vague rights which they asserted at intervals, whilst all the time the Popes at Rome exercised more or less temporal power. By degrees the great cities of the North gained in influence, and became practically independent states, constantly at war with the Popes, the Emperors, and one another. Chief amongst these were Florence, Venice, Milan, Cremona, Pavia, Genoa, Mantua, Ferrara, Bologna, and Pisa. In the S., Naples was the predominant city. In the 12th cent. the Normans established the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, with Naples as its capital. In 1194 it fell to the Emperor Henry VI, but in 1265 the Pope conferred it on Charles of Anjou. A few years after Sicily was divided from Naples, the Angevins ruling at Naples and the House of Aragon in Sicily until 1442, when Alphonso V of Aragon reunited the 2 kingdoms. After his death they were again divided till the end of the cent., when Ferdinand of Spain possessed himself of them both. They continued under Spanish rule till 1707, when they were formed into an independent kingdom under a branch of the Spanish Bourbons. So they remained (except in Napoleon's time, when Naples was made into a nominally independent kingdom, first under Joseph Bonaparte, then under Murat) until they were liberated by Garibaldi in 1860. Thus, during our period there were the free cities in the N., the Papal States in the centre, and the kingdom of the two Sicilies in the S. under the Spanish Kings. Details of the historical allusions in the plays will be found under the headings of the various cities above mentioned. About one-fourth of the plays of our period have their scene in Italy during the 16th and 17th cents. All travelled Englishmen visited Italy, and the plays are full of references to the manners, customs, dress, and character of the Italians.

General references. In Kirke's Champions ii. 1, Antony speaks of I. as "Mother of arts and nurse of noble spirits." In Lucr. 106, Tarquin speaks of "the fields of fruitful I." In Shrew i. 1, 4, Lucentio calls Lombardy "The pleasant garden of great I." In All's ii. 1, 12, the K. says to Bertram, who is going to Florence, "Let high I. . . see that you come Not to woo honour but to wed it." The Ff. read "higher," but the sense is the same, viz. N., or Upper, I.

Historical references. In J. C. i. 3, 88, Casca believes that Cæsar intends to be k. "and wear his crown . . . In every place save here in I." In iii. 1, 264, Antony predicts that "Domestic fury and fierce civil strife Shall cumber all the parts of I.": which was grievously fulfilled in the civil wars that followed Cæsar's death. In A. & C. i. 2, 97, the Messenger tells how Cæsar has driven Antony's wife and brother from I.: this was in 41 B.C. In i. 4, 51, mention is made of the pirates: "many hot inroads They make in I."—this was in the winter of 40 B.C. In R2 iv. 1, 97, Carlisle tells that Norfolk "retired himself to I." and died at Venice. He died there on Sept. 20th, 1399; Richard's deposition took place the next day, so that Carlisle could not have known of Norfolk's death at that time. In All's ii. 3, 307, Bertram says, "His present gift Shall furnish me to those In. fields Where noble fellows strike." The reference is to the constant wars between the great cities of N. I. In Davenant's Rhodes B. v., Roxolana speaks of "In. courts Where little princes are but civil hosts," i.e. the numerous small courts of N. I. The most popular Saint of I. (hence her "champion" in the quotation which follows) was Antony of Padua, who died there in 1231. In Kirke's Champions i. 1, Antony says, "The rear is brought up by Antony, Who goes a champion forth for I."

Ecclesiastical Pretensions of Italy, as the seat of the Pope of Rome. In K. J. iii. 1, 153, John says: "No In. priest Shall tithe or toll in our dominions." So, in Trouble. Reign, Haz., p. 255, John says, "Never an In. priest of them all shall either have tythe, toll, or polling penny out of England." Milton, in Sonn. on Massacre in Piedmont 11, says, "Their martyred blood and ashes sow O'er all the In. fields, where still doth sway The triple tyrant," i.e. the Pope. See also under ROME and BABYLON.

National Characteristics. Heylyn (s.v. ITALIE) says, "The people are for the most part grave, respective, and ingenious; excellent men, but for 3 things: (1) in their lusts they are unnatural; (2) in their malice unappeasable; (3) in their actions deceitful. They will blaspheme sooner than swear, and murder a man rather than slander him. They are exceeding jealous over their wives. The women are generally witty in speech, modest in outward carriage, and bountiful where they bear affection; and it is proverbially said that they are magpies at the door, saints in the church, goats in the garden, divels in the house, angels in the street, and syrens in the windows." In Haughton's Englishmen i. 1, Frisco says he can tell an In. "by these 3 points: a wanton eye, pride in his apparel, and the devil in his countenance." Nash, in Wilton K. 1, 146, says, "I, the paradise of the earth and the Epicure's heaven. It makes him to kiss his hand like an ape, cringe his neck like a starveling, and play at heypass, repass, come aloft when he salutes a man. From thence he brings the art of atheism, the art of epicurizing, the art of whoring, the art of poisoning, the art of Sodomitry. It maketh a man an excellent courtier, a curious carpet-knight, which is by interpretation a fine close latcher, a glorious hypocrite." The standard of courtly manners was set in I., and the recognized authority on the subject was Baldassare Castiglione's Cortigiano. In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Birdlime says "The young gentlewoman . . . hath read in the 'In. Courtier' that it is a special ornament to gentlewomen to have skill in painting." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 565, Staines says, "The most exact-nation in the world, the In.; whose language is sweetest, clothes neatest, and behaviour most accomplished." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 1, Calippo says of the French: "Their free breeding knows not the Spanish and In. preciseness practised among us." In B. & F. Wild Goose i. 2, Mirabel says, "I. for my money! Their policies, their customs, their frugalities, Their courtesies so open, yet so reserved too, Their very pick-teeth speak more man than we do And season of more salt." In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Henry speaks of the English, "whose grave natures scorn The empty compliments of I." In Middleton's Gallants iv. 6, Pürsenet asks: "Where's comely nurture? the In. kiss, or the French cringe?" Coryat, in Crudities (1611), mentions as a quite unique custom that "the Ins. do always at their meals use a little fork when they cut their meat." In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick instructs Peregrine, who has just come to I., "You must learn the use And handling of your silver fork at meals." In his Devil v. 4, Meercraft proposes to bring into fashion in England "The laudable use of forks . . . as they are in I." In his Epicoene ii. 1, Morose bids Mute, "Shake your head or shrug. Your In. and Spaniard are wise in these; and it is a frugal and comely gravity." In B. & F. Elder B. i. 2, Eustace says, "I'll vouchsafe him the new In. shrug. [He bows.]" In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 3, Fastidius says, "Oh, your wits of I. are nothing comparable to her; her brain's a very quiver of jests." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. ii. 2, Forobosco says, "These Ins. are most nimblepleated."

In subtlety and craft was crystallized, in English opinion, in Macchiavelli, whose work, The Prince, was well known and cordially disliked. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iii. 1, Byron says, "There are schools Now broken ope in all parts of the world, First founded in ingenious I., Where some conclusions of estate are held That for a day preserve a prince, and ever Destroy him after." In M. W. W. iii. 1, 104, the Host cries: "Am I politic? Am I subtle? Am I a Machiavel?" Nash, in Pierce 68, says, "I comprehend . . . under hypocrisy all Machiavilism." Greene, in Groats Worth of Wit (1592) 35, asks: "Is it pestilent Machivilian policy that thou hast studied?" The prologue to Marlowe's Jew is spoken by Machiavel: "Who now the Guise is dead, is come from France:" he says, "Though some speak openly against my books, Yet will they read me, and thereby attain To Peter's chair." In Shrew ii. 1, 405, Gremio says, "An old In. fox is not so kind" as to give all his property to his son before he dies. In Cym. v. 5, 196, Iachimo says, "Mine In. brain 'Gan in your duller Britain operate Most vilely": on which Posthumus addresses him as "In. fiend!" In Noble Soldier iii. 1, the Q. says, "A true In. spirit is a ball Of wildfire hurting most when it seems spent." In iii. 3, Baltasar says, "I have a private coat for In. stilettons." Dekker, in Last Will, says of Hypocrisy: "After this he travelled into I., and there learned to embrace with one arm and stab with another." In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Contarino says, "I have not ta'en the way, like an In., To cut your throat by practice," i.e. by treachery. In Jonson's Cynthia i. 4, Asotus says, "I do not offer it you after the In. manner," i.e. hoping that you will not accept it. In Ford's 'Tis Pity iv. 4, when Sorranzo says, "I burn; and blood shall quench that flame," Vasques rejoins, "Now you begin to turn In." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 3, Camillo says to Adorni, "Show yourself an In., and, having received one injury, do not put off your hat for a second." In Marmion's Antiquary v. 1, Lorenzo says, "I hate to differ so much from the nature of an In. as not to be revengeful." Nash, in Wilton M. 3, says, "All true Ins. imitate me in revenging constantly and dying valiantly." In Shirley's Gent. Ven. v. 2, Florelli says, "The innocence of a saint Would not secure his life from an In. When his revenge is fixed." In Noble Soldier v. 3, the Q. speaks of "the In.'s second bliss, revenge."

In Cym. iii. 2, 4, Pisanio asks: "What false In., As poison-tongued as handed, hath prevailed On thy too ready hearing?" In iii. 4, 15, Imogen says, "That drug-damned I. hath out-crafted him And he's at some hard point." In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Barabas says, "I studied physic and began To practise first upon the In.; There I enriched the priests with burials." Nash, in Pierce C. 4, apostrophizes I.: "O Italie, the academy of man-slaughter; the sporting-place of murder; the apothecary-shop of poison for all nations!" In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 2, Bobadil, praising tobacco, says, "Had you taken the most deadly poisonous plant in all I, it should expel it." In Sharpham's Fleire i. 481, Fleire says to Sparke, an Englishman, "You cannot poison so well as we Ins." Hence an In. salad means a poisoned salad. In Webster's Devil iv. 1, Flamineo says, "I do look now for a Spanish fig or an In. salad daily." In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, the Parson asks the Capt., "Can any of you digest sponge and arsenick?" The Capt. exclaims: "Arsenick? What's that?" and the Parson explains: "An In. salad which I'll dress for you." In Shirley's Maid's Rev. iii. 2, Sharkino says, "I have probatums of In. salads," i.e. approved prescriptions for their making. In Cromwell iii. 3, Cromwell says, "Lust dwells in France, in Italie, and Spain." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Geraldine says, "The French is of one humour, Spain another; The hot In. has a strain from both," i.e. is both amorous and jealous. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Laxton says of the heroine: "Such a Moll were a marrow-bone before an In.; he would cry buona roba till his ribs were nothing but bone." In his Mad World iii., Mawworm says, "There is the key given after the In. fashion backward; she closely conveyed into his closet." In his Gipsy i. 1, Roderigo says, "It's as rare to see a Spaniard a drunkard as a German sober, an In. no whoremonger." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 2, Ferentes says, "A chaste wife or a mother that never stepped awry are wonders, wonders in I." In Davenant's Albino i. 1, Valdaura's mother tells her "The curled youth of I. Were prompt in wanton stealths and sinful arts." In Brome's Covent G. iii. 1, Mihil calls Nick's paramour "your Italic mistress." In B. & F. Custom iv. 1, Duarte says, "He was of I., and that country breeds not Precisians that way, but hot libertines." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, says: "An English wolf, an Irish toad to see, Were as a chaste man nursed in I." There were no wolves in England nor toads in Ireland.

Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, says, "Germany hath not so many drunkards, England tobacconists, France dancers, Holland mariners, as I. alone hath jealous husbands." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 3, Corvino says to his wife, "If you thought me an In., You would be damned ere you did this, you whore." In Massinger's Milan iv. 3, Mariana, telling Sforza of his wife's behaviour, says, "To a Dutchman This were enough, but to a right In. A hundred thousand witnesses." In his Great Duke ii. 1, Giovanni says, "I was allowed (Against the form followed by jealous parents In Italy) full liberty to partake His daughter's sweet society." In B. & F. French Law iii. 1, Champennell says, "I am no In. To lock her up; nor would I be a Dutchman To have my wife my sovereign." In Massinger's Emperor v. 2, Theodosius says, "The wise In. . . . For a kiss, nay, wanton look, will plough up mischief And sow the seeds of his revenge in blood." In Machin's Dumb Knight iv. 1, Epire says, "I see That lean In. devil, jealousy, Dance in his eyes." In Webster's Cuckold v. 1, Clare says, "Are you returned with the In. plague upon you, jealousy?" In Shirley's Gent. Ven. i. 1, Cornari says, "Our nice Ins. Impose severely on their wives." In T. D.'s Banquet i. 4, Tymethes says, "Hunger and lust blows ope castle doors, In. padlocks." In T. Heywood's Maid of West B. iv., Goodlack says, "Beware of these Ins., They are by nature jealous and revengeful." In Nabbes' Unfort. Mother iii. 1, Fidelio says, "My In. nature Begins to break her prison and grow violent." In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano says, "You Ins.

are so sun-burnt with these dog-days that your great lady there thinks her husband loves her not if he be not jealous." Middleton, in Mad World i. 1, says, "There's a gem, Kept by the Ins. under lock and key." In Day's Gulls iii. 2, Violetta complains that she and her sister are kept in servitude "as Englishmen keep their felons, and Ins. their wives; we never stir abroad without our jailors." Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, quotes a proverb: "I. [is] a paradise for horses, hell for women."

In All's ii. 1, 19, the K. advises Bertram: "Those girls of I., take heed of them . . . beware of being captives Before you serve." In Cym. i. 3, 29, Imogen tells how she intended to make Posthumus swear, "The shes of I. should not betray Mine interest and his honour." In i. 4, 71, Iachimo objects to Posthumus preferring Imogen to the ladies of I. In iii. 4, 51, Imogen says, "Some jay of I. . . . hath betrayed him." In v. 5, 161, Iachimo tells how he and his friends praised "our loves of I. For beauty that made barren the swelled boast Of him that best could speak, for feature laming The shrine of Venus or straight-pight Minerva, Postures beyond brief nature, for condition A shop of all the qualities that man Loves woman for." In Day's Humour iii. 1, Florimel speaks of "our In. dames who cause their friends to clap their jealous husbands in prison that they may surely know where to find them." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Frangipan says, "Our In. courtesans excel all other nations." In Chapman's Usher iii. 2, Bassiolo says his friendship will last "while In. dames Be called the bona-robas of the world."

Englishmen who imitated In. manners and vices were called Id. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 565, Bubble asks: "What's the lowest price of being Id.?" Ascham, in The Scholemaster (1570), defines "an Englishman Id." thus: "He bringeth home into England out of I. the religion, the learning, the policy, the experience, the manners of I. That is to say, for religion papistry or worse; for learning, less commonly than they carried out with them; for policy, a factious heart, a discoursing head, a mind to meddle in all men's matters; for experience, plenty of new mischiefs never known in England before; for manners, variety of vanities and change of filthy living." Hall, in Virgide-miarium i. 3, satirizes the playwright who "with terms Italianate, Big-sounding sentences and words of state" patches up his pure iambic verse. In Goosecap iv. 1, Fowlwether tells of "an Italianate Frenchman" he had met. In Val. Welsh i. 4, Cadigune says, "My brain Italianates my barren faculties To Machivilian blackness." Nash, in Pierce B. 2, says of the would-be traveller: "Al Italionato is his talk." In Webster's Law Case iii. 2, Romelio, disguised as a Jew, says, "I could be a rare Id. Jew." In Cuckqueans ii. 7, when Floradin proposes to journey into I., Rafe says, "Having already horns, as you have [i.e. being a cuckold], then likewise being Italionate so might you become devil incarnate." Buckley, in Felic. Man. (1603) iv. 317, quotes a proverb "An Englishman Id. is a devil incarnated." The Ins. had a similar saying: "Tudesco Italionato è un Diavolo incarnato." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 295, says, "If any Englishman be infected with any misdemeanour, they say with one mouth, 'He is Id.'" Similarly, Italionism is used for an In. practice. Nash, in Wilton M. 3, speaks of "some new Italionism whose murderous platform might not only extend on his body, but his soul also."

Italian Dress and Personal Appearance. In Cym. v. 1, 23, Posthumus says, "I'll disrobe me Of these In. weeds and suit myself As does a Briton peasant."

Strictly, Posthumus should appear in the armour of a Roman soldier, but he was probably dressed like a contemporary In. gentleman. In R2 ii. 1, 21, York blames the K. for following "Report of fashions in proud I. Whose manners still our tardy, apish nation Limpers after in base imitation." In Jonson's Staple i. 1, Pennyboy asks Fashioner, the tailor, "Tell me what authors thou readst to help thy invention; In. prints? or Arras hangings? They are tailors' libraries." In his Cynthia ii. 1, Philautia says of a headdress: "'Tis after the In. print we looked on t'other night." Print is used in these passages in the sense of the goffering or pleating of a ruff: with a pun in the first passage on the other meaning of "a printed book." In Field's Weathercock i. 2, Pout says of Strange: "He looks like an In. tailor out of the laced wheel that wears a bucket on his head." The laced wheel is a wide ruff; the bucket a tall hat without a brim. In Shirley's Fair One ii. 1, the Tutor says, "Are not In. heads, Spanish shoulders, Dutch bellies, and French legs the only notions of your reformed English gentleman?" In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "She's in that In. head-tire you sent her." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 565, Staines says, "It has been the fashion in England to wear your hat thus, in your eyes; your In. is contrary, he doth advance his hat, and sets it thus." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Fastidius tells how in a duel his opponent cut off "6 purls of an In. cut-work band I wore, cost me £3 in the Exchange." Cut-work is a kind of deeply scalloped embroidery. In Webster's White Devil i. 1, Lodovico says, "I'll make In. cut-works in their guts." In T. Heywood's F. M. Exch. 42, Phillis offers for sale "Fine falling-bands [i.e. flat collars] of the In. cut-work." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 4, Mortimer says of Gaveston: "He wears a short In. hooded cloke Larded with pearls." In Cromwell iii. 3, Hales says, "They that are rich in Spain spare belly-food To deck their backs with an In. hood And silks of Seville." In Shirley's Love Maze v. 5, Thorney describes his master as wearing "a long In. cloak, coming down to his elbows." In Trag. Richd. II ii. 3, 91, "In. cloaks" are mentioned among the foreign fashions affected by the K. and his favourites. The English Lord in Merch. i. 2, 80, "bought his doublet in I." In Dekker's Hornbook i., the author says that in the golden age there was "no In.'s close strosser," i.e. tight-fitting breeches. In Webster's Malfi ii. 1, Bosola says, "The Duchess, contrary to our In. fashion, Wears a loose-bodied gown." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings of "The In. in her high chapine." Coryat, in Crudities (1611) 261, says, "There is one thing used of the Venetian women that is not to be observed amongst any other women in Christendom. It is called a Chapiney, which they wear under their shoes. By how much the nobler a woman is, by so much the higher are her Chapineys." Puttenham, in Art of Poesie (1589) i. 15, 49, says, "The actors did walk upon those high corked shoes which now they call in Spain and I. Shoppini." Fynes Morison, in Itin. (1617) iv. 1, 172, says, "The women of Venice wear choppines or shoes 3 or 4 hand-breadths high." In Ham. ii. 2, 445, Hamlet says to the actor who plays the women's parts, "Your Ladyship is nearer heaven than when I saw you last by the altitude of a Choppine." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit., p. 140, mentions "the In. hilt" as part of a fashionable man's equipment. In Greene's Quip, p. 230, the Barber asks: "Will you have your Worship's hair cut after the In. manner, short and round, and then frounced with the curling-irons, to make it look like a half-moon in a mist?" In Alimony ii. 2, Hoy says, "Art has taught her to repair a decayed complexion with an In. fucus," i.e. a cosmetic. In Brome's City Wit ii. 2, Crasy professes to supply "mineral fucuses, pomatums, fumes, Italian masks to sleep in."

Food and Cookery. In Massinger's Great Duke ii. 2, Petruccio says, "Ins. . . . think, when they have supped upon an olive, A root, or bunch of raisins, 'tis a feast." Fynes Morison, in Itin. iii. 2, 113, says, "The Ins. generally, compared with the English or French, are most sparing in their diet." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 3, Carlo speaks of "our In. delicate, oiled mushrooms." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 214, the Parisian speaks of the Londoner's "opinion of his beef before the veal of I." In Ford's Fancies iv. 2, Romano disclaims "In. collations, rich Persian surfeits." In Massinger's Madam i. 1, Lady Frugal says, "I'll have none touch what I shall eat. . . . But Frenchmen and Ins.; they wear satin, And dish no meat but in silver." Certain Ins. set up eating-houses in Lond., which from the delicacy of their cookery and the refinement of their service became fashionable. In Shirley's Pleasure v. 1, Bornwell says, "I have invited A covey of ladies and as many gentlemen Tomorrow to the In. ordinary; I shall have rarities and regalias To pay for, madam; music, wanton songs, And tunes of silken petticoats to dance to."

Music and Dancing. In Day's Humour ii. 2, Octavio says, "Love's nothing but an In. dump or a French brawl," i.e. is either doleful or quarrelsome. In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Signor Lavolta, an In. dancer, says, "Me tesha all de bella corantes, gagliardas, pianettas, etc."

Painting and Statuary. In W. T. v. 2, 105, it is stated that the supposed statue of Hermione was "Newly performed by that rare In. master, Julio Romano." This was Giulio Pippi, a disciple of Raphael's—a painter, not a sculptor—who flourished 1492–1546. In Shirley's Pleasure i. 1, Bornwell mentions, among the extravagances of a fashionable lady, "Pictures of this In. master and that Dutchman." Jonson, in Discoveries, p. 707, says, "There lived in this latter age six famous painters in I., who were excellent and emulous of the ancients: Raphael de Urbino, Michel Angelo Buonarota, Titian, Antony of Corregio, Sebastian of Venice, Julio Romano, and Andrea Sartorio."

Horticulture. The In. terraced or hanging gardens gave the model to Europe. A good example is the Vatican Garden, begun in the early 14th cent. by Nicholas V. In B. & F. Prize iii. 2, Maria says, "Take in a garden of some 20 acres And cast it of the In. fashion, hanging." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 2, Trifle speaks of "A stately edifice, For orchards, curious gardens, private walks, Like an In. palace."

The Drama and Literature. Whatever the influence of the In. drama upon the English, a point much disputed, In. stories were very extensively used for the plots of our comedies and tragedies. About one-fourth of the plays of this period have their scene in I., though hardly any local colour is used. The In. actors were famous for their improvisations; and the Masque, so popular in the reign of James I., was of In. origin. The In. stage was much more elaborately arranged and decorated than the English. In Hercules Prol. 45, the speaker excuses Plautus for modifying his Greek originals by saying: "Besides, French and Ins. do the same." In Kyd's Span. Trag. v. 1, Hieronimo says, "The In. tragedians were so sharp of wit that in one hour's meditation they would perform anything in action." In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 4, Fernando says, "There is a way Which the Ins. and the Frenchmen use, That is, on a word given or some slight plot, The actors will extempore fashion out Scenes neat and witty." Whetstone mentions in 1582 the visit to England of certain "comedians of Ravenna [who] were not tied to any written device [but who had] certain grounds or principles of their own." Hall, in Characters (1608), p. 139, says that the Vain-glorious man is "a Spanish souldier on an In. Theater; a bladder full of wind." Gascoigne, in Steel Glas, p. 59 (Arber), speaks of "These Enterludes, these new In. sports." In prologue to Government, he says, "An Enterlude may make you laugh your fill; In. toys are full of pleasant sport." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Gaveston says of the K.: "Music and poetry is his delight, Therefore I'll have In. masks by night." In Histrio. ii. 322, Landolpho, an In., says of the play: "I blush in your behalfe at this base trash. In honour of our I. we sport As if a synod of the holy gods Came to triumph within our theatres." The Harlequin (In. "Arlecchino") was a stock character in the old In. comedies, and originally represented a simple Bergamese manservant. In Day's Gulls iii. 1, the Page says, "I, like a harlequin in an In. comedy, stand making faces at both their follies." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage i., Bartley says, "The knight would have made an excellent zany in an In. comedy." In Day's Travails 56, one says, "Here's an In. Harlaken come to offer a play to your Lordship." Heywood, in Apol. for Actors ii. 43, speaks of "the Doctors, Zawayes, Pantaloones, Harlakeenes in which the French, but especially the Ins., have been excellent." The sonnet-form was perfected—it may almost be said, created—by the In. poet Petrarch, who found many imitators in the Elizabethan age from the Earl of Surrey onward. In Ret. Pernass. i. 3, Judicio says, "Sweet honey-dropping Daniell doth wage War with the proudest big In. That melts his heart in sugred sonnetting." Samuel Daniel's sonnet-sequence To Delia was published in 1592.

Professions and Occupations. The country districts of I. were infested with banditti: a band of them appear in Two Gent. v. 3, 4. In Massinger's Guardian v. 3, Alphonso says, "Since Severino commanded these banditti (though it be unusual in I.) they have not done one murder." The Mountebank, or travelling quack, is a familiar figure on the Elizabethan stage. He sold his medicines from a public stage and was usually accompanied by a zany, who enlivened the proceedings and drew the crowd by his jokes and antics. In Bristowe B. 3, Challenger disguises himself as "an In. doctor." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Volpone disguises himself as a mountebank, with Nano as his zany. Peregrine, observing him, says, "They are most lewd impostors; Made all of terms and shreds; no less beliers Of great men's favours than their own vile medicines; Which they utter upon monstrous oaths, Selling that drug for ad., ere they part, Which they have valued at 12 crowns before." Dekker, in Hornbook ii., says, "Send [the doctors] packing, to walk like In. mountebanks." In Shirley's Bird ii. 1, Bonamico says, "I. is full of juggling mountebanks that show tricks with oils and powders." In Triumphs Love iv., Bomelio, disguised as a mountebank, says, "I am Italiane, Neopolitane." These fellows performed all sorts of juggling tricks. King James, in Demonology i. 105, says that the devil teaches men tricks with cards, dice, etc., "as they who are acquainted with that In. called Scoto, yet living, can report." Jonson, in Epigram cxv., says that the Town's Honest Man "doth play more parts Than the In. could do, with his dore": where his "dore," or "dor," may mean his familiar spirit, in the form of a beetle, or possibly his fool, or zany. Probably Jonson is thinking of Scoto, for in Volpone ii. 1, Volpone, in his mountebank's disguise, calls himself "Scoto Mantuano."

The glass-workers at Murano, near Venice, led the way in this industry in modern Europe, and it was by them that the art was introduced into England in the 16th cent. In Sharpham's Fleire i. 445, when Fleire says that he is an In., the Knight replies, "O then thou canst make glasses." Travellers found that bugs were common in the In. inns. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 225, the Londoner speaks of them as "those other slow enemies which were bred in I."

The In. language, like French and Spanish, is an outgrowth from Latin. Dante exalted it to the dignity of a literary language, and in the 16th cent. it was the mark of a travelled and educated gentleman to speak In., or, at least, to know a few sentences and phrases in that tongue. Heylyn (s.v. ITALIE) says, "The language is very courtly and fluent; the best whereof is about Florence and Siena." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 565, Staines says, "Your In. is smooth and lofty and his language is cousin-german to the Latin." In Merch. i. 2, 75, Portia complains that the English lord "hath neither Latin, French, nor In." In Ham. iii. 2, 274, Hamlet says that the story of the play within the play is "extant in choice In." In Jonson's Cynthia iii. 3, Amorphus says, "Your pedant should provide you some parcels of French or some pretty commodity of In., if you would be exotic and exquisite." In Chapman's D'Olive ii. 2, D'Olive says that "to make a few graceful legs and speak a little In." is all that is necessary to cut a figure at Court. In Randolph's Muses iii. 4, Alazon asks Eiron, "You understand the In.?" and he replies, "A little, Sir; I have read Tasso."

Italic type, or Italica, was the type used by Aldus Manutius of Venice: it slopes from right to left, whilst the roman type was erect. In B. & F. Valour iv. 1, Lapet, intending to print the story of his misfortunes, bids the printer "put all the thumps in Pica Roman" and the kicks "in Italica; your backward blows all in Italica." The In., or Roman, hand in writing was the most fashionable for ladies, and was taught by the professors of the art. In Cowley's Cutter iii. 4, Aurelia says, "My hand, I'm sure, is as like hers as the left is to the right; we were taught by the same master, pure In." See also under ROME.

ITHACA (now THIAKI). The smallest island but one of the Ionian group, in the Adriatic, or Ionian, Sea, off the coast of Acarnania. It is famous as the home of Odysseus, or Ulysses, and the scene of Penelope's patience and constancy. In Troil. i. 3, 70, Agamemnon addresses Ulysses: "Speak, prince of I." In Cor. i. 3, 94, Valeria says to Virginia, "You would be another Penelope; yet they say all the yarn she spun in Ulysses' absence did but fill I. full of moths." In Marston's Malcontent iii. 2, Malevole says, "Ulysses absent, O In., the chastest Penelope cannot hold out." In Massinger's Great Duke i. 2, Contarino says of Lidia: "Had Circe or Calypso her sweet graces, Wandering Ulysses never had remembered Penelope or I." Ulysses spent some time with these ladies on his way home from Troy, but ultimately broke away from them. In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 470, Sacrepant asks: "Shall such a syren offer me more wrong Than they did to the Prince of I.?" Ulysses escaped the Syrens by stuffing his comrades' ears with wool, and having himself tied to the mast of his ship whilst he sailed past them. In T. Heywood's Iron Age A. iv., Ajax addresses Ulysses as "king of I." In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 1, the Pandar says of his establishment: "'Tis an island which, had Ulysses seen,

He would prefer before his I." Herrick, in Welcome to Sack (1647), speaks of the joy of the returning merchant "when fires betray The smoky chimneys of his I." In his Parting Verse, he calls Penelope "that chaste queen of I." In Beguiled, Dods. ix. 267, Fortunatus says, "Thus have I passed The beating billows of the sea By I.'s rocks."

ITHALIA, i.e. ÆTHALIA, another name for Lemnos, q.v.; and for Ilva, q.v.

IVEL (YEovil). A town in Somersetsh. on the Yeo, 33 m. S.W. of Bath. In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough, the Cornish bumpkin, boasts, "I could have had a whore at Plymouth." And Trimtram adds: "Or as you came at I." [quasi, evil].

IVY BRIDGE. An arch under which ran a road to the Thames, at the end of I. B. Lane, which used to run from the Strand to the river, between Bedford House and Durham House, nearly opposite Exeter Hall. Stow, in 1603, says that the bidge. had been taken down, but the lane still continued to mark the boundary between the Duchy of Lancaster and the City of Westminster. In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, when Delion, trying to find his way to Crutched Friars in the dark, runs into a post and asks what it is, Frisco tells him, mockingly, "'Tis the May-pole on I. B., going to Westminster."

The next minute he informs the unhappy Frenchman that they have reached the furthest end of Shoreditch! In Deloney's Newberie ix., Jack says, "I would have this trunk borne to the Spread Eagle at Iviebridge."

IVY LANE. A st. in Lond., running N. from Paternoster Row to Newgate St. It is mentioned by name as early as 1312 in a writ of 5 Edward II. Stow says that it was so called from the ivy which grew on the Prebend houses. Possibly it was named after St. Ive, who preached in England in the 7th cent. and died at St. Ives in Huntingdonshire; St. Ives in Cornwall is named after him too. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 5, Firk remembers that he has to attend a meeting of "a mess of shoemakers at the Woolsack in I. L." In Jonson's Owls, Capt. Cox introduces the 1st owl: "This bird is Lond.-bred As you may see by his horned head, And had like to have been ta'en At his shop in I. L. Where he sold by the penny Tobacco as good as any." Armin, in Ninnies, tells how John was robbed of a pair of boots that he was taking home from a cobbler's in Newgate Market, "as he was going through I. L." Brome's Five New Plays were "Printed for H. Brome at the Gunn in I. L. 1659." T. Heywood's Maid of West was "Printed for Richard Royston and are to be sold at his shop in Ivie L. 1631."

JACAKTRES. An old kingdom in the island of Java, in the E. Indies. It included the present provinces of Batavia, Buitenzorg, Krawang, and Pranger. Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 2, 3, says of a woman: "If he be rich, he is the man; she will go to J. or Tidore with him."

JACOBINS. A monastery of Jacobin monks in Seville. In Tuke's Five Hours ii. 1, Don Antonio says, "Is not this the market-place, behind the J.?"

JACOB'S STONE. A block of reddish-gray sandstone 26 inches long, 16 wide, and 11 thick fixed under the seat of the Coronation Chair in the Chapel of Edward the Confessor at Westminster Abbey. It was brought from Scotland by Edward I in 1297, where it had been used for centuries at the Abbey of Scone in the coronation of the Kings of Scotland. It was believed to be the stone on which Jacob slept at Bethel, and which he subsequently set up as a sacred pillar (see Gen. xxviii. 18). In T. Heywood's Royal King i. 1, the Prince says, "If I ever live to sit on Jacob's stone thy love shall with my crown be hereditary."

JAERTIS (= the ancient JAXARTES, now SYR-DARIA, or YELLOW RIVER). A river flowing through N. Turkestan into the Sea of Aral. Samarcand is not actually on the Syr-Daria, but is not far from its head-waters. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 2, Tamburlaine upbraids Samarcand with the cowardice of his son Calyphas, and speaks of him as a "shame of nature which J. streams, Embracing thee with deepest of his love, Can never wash from thy distained brows."

JAGO'S (ST.) CHURCH. A ch. in Cordova. In Davenant's Distresses iv., Orgemon says, "The house which fronts upon J. Ch. is the only place to which he doth design his visits."

JAMANY (i.e. GERMANY). In M. W. W. iv. 5, 89, Caius says, "It is tell-a me dat you make grand preparation for a D. de J."

JAMES (ST.), or SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELLA. A city in Galicia in N.W. Spain, 300 m. N.W. of Madrid, near the coast. It contained the shrine of the apostle J. the Great, the brother of John, who was put to death by Herod (Acts xii. 2). The legend, confusing him with J., the brother of our Lord and 1st Bp. of Jerusalem, related that he visited Spain, then returned to Jerusalem, and was thrown from the battlements of the Temple by the Jews. His body was conveyed to Spain, and was discovered at Santiago by the indication of a star. Hence the name Compostella, plain of the Star. A shrine was forthwith built in 835, but was destroyed in 997 by the Moors. The saint's body was, however, respected, and the present cathedral was erected to contain it 1078-1188. It became one of the most popular places of pilgrimage in the Middle Ages, the pilgrim's sign being a scallop shell, and St. J. was recognized as the Patron Saint of Spain. Langland, in Piers B. Prol. 47, tells of palmers and pilgrims who plighted them together to "seke seynt James"; and Chaucer's Wife of Bath had been "in Galice at Seint Jame" (C. T. A. 466). In Elynour Running, we are told of drunken Ales who "was full of tales Of tidings in Wales And St. James in Gales." The Milky Way was called "the Way to St. J.": the numerous stars representing the pilgrims. Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603) ii. 15, says that "Those of Marea d'Ancona . . . go on pilgrimage rather unto J. in Galicia" than to their own Lady of Loreto. See SANTIAGO and COMPOSTELLA.

JAMES (Sr.), CHURCH OF. There were churches dedicated to St. J. in Lond. during our period, in Clerkenwell, N. of the Green, originally the choir of a Benedictine nunnery founded about 1100—the present building dates from 1788; in Garlick-hithe, built in 1606, destroyed in the Fire, and rebuilt by Wren; and in Duke's Place, Aldgate, built on the site of the conventual ch. of the Holy Trinity in 1622 and pulled down in 1874. In Reasons in a Hollow Tree, we are told of "an old man that died in the parish of St. J., near Duke's Pl., within Aldgate," whose funeral sermon was of commendable brevity: "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust; Here's the hole and in thou must." St. J. Clerkenwell had a lofty spire, which fell down in 1623 after having stood for 500 years. In Pasquil's Palinodia (1619), it is said of the Strand Maypole: "It No city, town, nor street can parallel, Nor can the lofty spire of Clerkenwell."

JAMES (SAINT) FAIR. Was held annually in Westminster on St. J.'s Day, 25th July. In Deloney's Craft, it is said of the Green King of St. Martin's: "St. J. his day at last being come, he called up his wife betimes, and bad her make ready, if she would to the Fair," but he dragged her all the way to Bristol, where there was also a Fair on St. J.'s day. In Cowley's Cutter v. 1, Will says that the cook "looked like the ox that's roasted whole in St. J.'s Fair."

JAMES (SAINT) PALACE. A royal palace in Lond., at the W. end of the Mall, facing St. J.'s Park. It was originally a hospital for lepers dedicated to St. J. It was taken possession of by Henry VIII in 1528 and turned into a Palace. The brick gate-house facing St. J.'s St. and part of the Chapel date from this time. It was improved and fitted up in 1620 for the Infanta of Spain, who was to have married Prince Charles. Here Q. Mary died and Charles II was born. Charles I walked from St. J.'s to Whitehall on the morning of his execution. Though it is no longer a royal residence, the official title of the English Court is "our Court of St. J.'s." The mustering of the Guards in the Colour Court at 11 every morning is still one of the minor sights of Lond. In Middleton's Tennis, the characters in the Induction are the palaces of Richmond, St. J.'s, and Denmark House. St. J. speaks of "my new gallery and tennis-court": which Richmond depreciates as being built of brick. The reference is to the improvements made in 1619-20 for the Infanta. In St. Hilary's Tears (1642), we read: "If the Prince were but at St. J.'s, there would be something done." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 343, the Q. says, "Dismiss our camp, and tread a royal march Toward St. J.'s."

JAMES'S (ST.) PARK. A park in Lond., of abt. 60 acres, lying opposite St. J. Palace, between The Mall and Birdcage Walk. Facing the W. end of it is Buckingham Palace; on the E. are the Horse Guards, the Admiralty, and the Treasury. It was formed and walled in by Henry VIII, and greatly improved by Charles II. In Jonson's Gipsies, one of them speaks of "The parks and chases And the finer walled places, As St. J., Greenwich, Theobalds." In Dekker's Babylon, p. 260, Paridel says of Titania (Elizabeth): "Not an arrow be shot at her until we take our aim in S. Iagoes Park." Paridel is William Parry, who was believed to have plotted the assassination of Elizabeth in 1584: S. Iago's Park is obviously St. J. Park. Deloney, in Newberie vi., tells how the clothiers presented their petition to Henry VIII, "His Majesty walking in St. James, his Park." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the Sights of Lond. "St. James his Ginney Hens, the Cassawarway moreover." These birds were kept in the aviary, which gave its name to Birdcage Walk. He goes on: "The Beaver i' the Park (strange beast as e'er any man saw)": these beavers were kept in the ornamental water of the Park.

JAMESTOWN. A town in Virginia, U.S.A., on the James River, 8 m. S.W. of Williamsburg. Here in 1608 the first English settlement in N. America was made, and it remained the seat of government until 1798. It has now altogether disappeared, save for a few ruined buildings. In Cockayne's Obstinate ii. 1, Lorece, in his ridiculous story of his alleged travel, says, "I came at last to Virginia. In conclusion, at James Town Port I took horse and the next morning arrived in Wales."

JANUS, TEMPLE OF. At Rome, on the N.E. side of the Forum Romanum, in front of the Curia Hostilia. It was said to have been built by Numa. The gates of the Temple were opened when war was declared, and continued open as long as it lasted. They were only 4 times closed from the time of Numa to the birth of Christ, 2 of these dates being in the reign of Augustus. J. was the God of beginnings, or openings: his festival was on 1st January, which bears his name. He was represented with 2 faces, one looking backward and the other forward. Chaucer, in C. T. F. 1252, describing the winter, says, "J. sit by the fyr with double berd And drinketh of his bugle horn the wyn." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 4, Tamburlaine says, "Behold me . . . Breaking my steeled lance with which I burst The rusty beams of J.' temple-doors, Letting out Death, and tyrannizing War To march with me." In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Adorni says of Bertoldo: "In his looks he seems To break ope J.' Temple." In Webster's A. & Virginia i. 4, Virginius cries: "Let J.' temple be devolved," i.e. thrown open. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, Crispinus says that Rhadamanthus "dwells at the Three Furies, by J.' temple." To which Horace replies, "Your pothecary does, Sir."

JAPAN. The large group of islands off the E. coast of Asia. They became known to Europe about the middle of the 16th cent. through the voyages of the Portuguese, one of whom, Antonio Mota, landed there in 1542. Xavier visited J. in 1549, and inaugurated a Christian Mission. Heylyn, in 1621, says that there were 200 Jesuit missionaries there. There were many collisions between the Government and the native Christians, which culminated in the great persecution 1614-1637. This may be the point of the following passage, written in 1607. In Barnes' Charter v. 1, Baglioni says, "This basilisk hath been often mounted where there hath been hot and dangerous service in the Ile of J." The remaining references show that J. was regarded as a very remote place. In Davenant's Love ii. 3, Frivolo says, "We are forgot, like creatures of J., Things hardly to be searched for in the map." In Davenport's Nightcap iv. 2, Lodovico, being asked what sort of a wife he would choose, if he were still unmarried, says, "Were I to choose then, as I would I were, So this [my present wife] were at J., I would wish a wife": of whom the description follows. In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 5, Albumazar has, amongst other marvellous things, made an almanack "for the meridian and height of J." In Millmaids i. 3, Ranoff says, "I would your Lordship had been with me at Japon; I protest they are the best riders." Burton, A. M. i. 2, 4, 6, says, "in Japonia it is a common thing to stifle their children, if they be poor."

In iii. 2, 3, he says of lovers: "Another will take a journey to J. . . if she say it." In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, one of the Customers inquires, "Ha' you . . . any miracle Done in J. by the Jesuits, or in China?" In Marston's Mountebanks, the Mountebank says, "If any be troubled with the Tentigo, let him travel to J."

JAQUES, SAINT (or St. JAQUES LE GRAND, i.e. JAMES THE APOSTLE, the brother of John, as distinguished from James the Less). In the following passage the ch. referred to is probably San Jacopo Soprano, in Florence. It stands on the W. side of the Arno, in the Borgo San Jacopo, between the Ponte Vecchio and the Ponte San Trinita. The ch. dates from the 11th cent. There is another San Jacopo in Florence, on the W. side of the Via Faenza, between Via San Antonio and Via Nazionale, of the 12th cent. In All's iii. 4, 4; iii. 5, 37, 98; iv. 3, 58, we learn that Helena has come to Florence on a pilgrimage to St. J. le Grand, or great St. J.

JAQUES, SAINT. A nunnery in Malta. In Marlowe's Jew iii. 3, Abigail sends Ithamore to "the new-made nunnery," and bids him "inquire For any of the Friars of St. Jaques."

JAQUES PORT. One of the gates of Cordova. In Davenant's Distresses iii. 1, Androlio asks: "Which way went he?" And the servant replies, "Through Jaques Port."

JARRATS HALL. See GERARD'S HALL.

JAVAN. According to Gen. x. 2, 4, J. was the son of Japhet and father of Elisha, Tarshish, Kittim, and Rodanim, i.e. of the Æolians († Spaniards, Cyprians, and Rhodians. It is the same word as Ionian, and was used by the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Hebrews for the peoples of the western Mediterranean coasts, including the Ægean Islands. Milton, P. L. i. 508, speaks of Saturn and Jove as "The Ionian gods—of J.'s issue held Gods." In S. A. 716, the Chorus says that Dalila "comes this way sailing Like a stately ship Of Tarsus, bound for the isles Of J. or Gadire."

JEBUSITES. The original inhabitants of Jerusalem, from whom David took the city (II Samuel v. 6). Hence the word was used to signify an enemy of the people of God. The Jews called the Gentiles J.; the Protestants conferred the same name on the Romanists, especially the Jesuits; and it was used generally as a term of abuse. In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Barabas calls Lodowick, who has fallen in love with his daughter, "This offspring of Cain, this Jebusite, That never tasted of the Passover." Purchas, in his Pilgrimage (1614) 18, calls the Jesuits "that Jebusitical society." In Jack Drum i. 156, Drum says of Mammon, the usurer: "Let the Jebusite depart in peace." In Chivalry C. 1, Bowyer says, "And I lie, call me Jebusite." Latimer, in sermon on Lord's Prayer vii., says, "We should fight against the Js. that are within us," i.e. our sins.

JANEVA. See GENEVA.

JERICHO. A town in Palestine, near the Jordan, some 18 m. E. of Jerusalem. It was taken and destroyed by Joshua, but rebuilt in the time of Ahab. In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass v. 1, 1878, when Jonah preaches in Nineveh, Adam says, "'Tis one goodman Jonas that is come from J." In Milton, P. R. ii. 20, the disciples go to seek for Jesus "in J., The city of palms." In II Sam. x. 5, we are told that David sent his messengers, who had been maltreated by the Ammonites, to J., to tarry there till their beards were grown. Hence came the phrase to go to J., meaning to go into retirement for a time. T. Heywood, in Hierarchie B. iv, says, "Bid such young boys to stay in J. Until their beards were grown, their wits more staid." In Look about xiii., when the porter asks Gloster, who has been sent to prison, "Whither must you now?" he replies, with a stammer, "To je-je-richo, I think; 'tis such a h-h-humorous Earl." In Jonson's Tub ii. 1, Hilt, ordered to go to St. Pancras, says, "An you say the word, send me to J." In Apus 788, Haphazard says, "Well, sith here is no company, have with ye to Jerico." In J. Heywood's Four PP., p. 8, the Pardoner says to the Palmer, "At your door myself doth dwell Who could have saved your soul as well As all your wide wandering shall do Though ye went thrice to J." In Thracian ii. 2, Palemon says, "Come, we'll embark us in this hollow tree, And sail to J., Music! shall we dance?" "Ay, ay," says the Clown, "we'll dance to J." The Rose of J. is not a true rose, but a cruciferous plant (Anastatica Hierochuntina), also called the resurrection flower, because it revives under the influence of moisture. It is often called the Rose of the Virgin, or Mary's Flower. In Three Kings of Cologne (1400) 90, it is related that "dry roses which be cleped the roses of Jerico" grow on the road by which the Virgin Mary went to Egypt. Lydgate, in Min. Poems 96, calls the Virgin "This Rose of J., freshest on live." In Candlemas 13, she is styled "Of Jerico the sote rose flower." Herrick, in Good wishes for the Duke of York, prays: "May his pretty Dukeship grow Like t' a rose of J."

JERSEY. The largest of the Channel Islands, abt. 15 m. off the N.W. coast of France. The knitting of stockings and other worsted articles was long a staple industry in the island. In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, the younger Loveless says, "If I be not found in carnation J. stockings, I'll ne'er look you in the face again." Middleton, in Hubburt, p. 84, says, "All his stock [is] not worth a J. stocking." Harrison, in his England ii. 7, satirizes "the women's diversely coloured stocks of silk jersie." In B. & F. Woman Hater iv. 2, the Mercer says his stockings "are of the best of wool and they are cyleped J."; and he informs us they cost 9s. In Armin's Moreclacke G. 1, the Governor of Scilly points out, "On this side Brittain and on that side Garsie." Drayton, in Polyolb. i. 49, apostrophizes, "Fair J. . . . Peculiarly that boast'st thy double-horned sheep." See also under GUERNSEY.

JERUSALEM. A city in S. Palestine, 17 m. due W. of the N. extremity of the Dead Sea and 37 m. from the Mediterranean. The original name appears to have been Yeru-shalem, probably meaning "Hearth of Peace." This became in Greek Ierusalem or Hierousalem, and later Ierosolyma, or Hierosolyma; sometimes abbreviated to Solyma. The city was originally in the hands of the Jebusites, but was taken by David at the beginning of his reign and made the capital of his kingdom. The city of David was probably on the S. part of the E. hill, on the N. plateau of which Solomon built the Temple where the Mosque of Omar now stands. The buildings of the growing city gradually extended over the W. hill, now known as Mt. Zion. Destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar in 588 B.C., it was rebuilt after the return of the exiles in 538, and remained the capital of Judæa till its destruction by Titus A.D. 70. It fell into the hands of the Mohammedans in 637, when the Caliph Omar erected a mosque on the Temple Hill, afterwards reconstructed on a magnificent scale by Abd-el-Melik. The recovery of the Holy Sepulchre from the Mohammedans was the object of the Crusades of the 11th cent.: the Crusaders took the city in 1099, and the Christian kingdom of J. was founded under Godfrey of Bouillon, which lasted till 1187, when Saladin took the city and restored the Mohammedan power. The Crusades that followed had no permanent success, and J. remained under the rule of the Arabs until, in 1517, it was added by Selim to the Ottoman Empire.

References to Scripture History. In Bale's Promises vi., Esaias says, "The K. of Judah in J. did dwell." In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass i. 2, the Angel promises Jonah, when he has done his work at Nineveh, "I'll carry thee to Jewry back again, And seat thee in the great J." In Hester (A. P. ii. 279), Hester says, quite unhistorically, "I was born and eke bred in J." The Monk, in Chaucer's C. T. B. 3337, says that Nabugodonosor "Twyes wan J. the citee" (see II Kings xxv. 1 and 8). In Candlemas, p. 9, Herod says, "I be here in my chief city Called J." In Everyman, p. 53, Gooddeeds speaks of "Myssias of Jherusalem King." In Milton, P. R. iii. 234, the Tempter reminds our Lord that he has only been once a year in "J. few days' Short sojourn." In 283, he recalls how the Babylonians "J. laid waste, Till Cyrus set them free." In iv. 544, he bears our Lord through the air, "Till underneath them fair J., The Holy City, lifted high her towers." The scene of Heming's Jewes Trag. is laid partly at J., and describes the destruction of the city by Titus A.D. 70. In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Pacheco says, "One pease was a soldier's provant a whole day at the destruction of J." In Darius, p. 89, Zorobabell reminds Darius, "J. thou didst promise To build up every whit." Darius is confused with Cyrus, who allowed the Jews to return to J. after the captivity in Babylon. The destruction of J. was the subject of puppet plays, though it was not apparently as popular as the destruction of Nineveh. In Marston's Courtesan iii. 1, 4 "motions" are mentioned: "Nineveh, Julius Cæsar, Jonas, or the destruction of J." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 1, Leatherhead says of his puppet-plays: "J. was a stately thing and so was Nineveh." In Henslowe's Diary, mention is made of a play called J., acted in 1591.

References to subsequent History, including the Crusades. In Massinger's Actor iii. 1, Julia says of Domitian: "The legions that sacked J. under my father Titus are sworn his." In K. J. ii. 1, 378, the Bastard advises John and Philip, "Do like the mutines of J., Be friends awhile and both conjointly bend Your sharpest deeds of malice on this town." At the siege of J. by Titus A.D. 70, the 3 parties amongst the Jews sank their mutual animosities. Shakespeare may have got his information from Morwyn's translation of Ben Gorion's History (1575). In Davenant's Plymouth i. 1, Cable complains: "This town is dearer than J. after a year's siege." The sufferings of the Jews from famine towards the close of the siege were frightful. In T. Heywood's Prentices, the siege of 1099 is described, and the coats-of-arms of the Lond. City Companies are said to have been emblazoned on the shields of the Crusaders. In Massinger's Renegado v. 1, Francisco speaks of the "knights that in the Holy Land Fought for the freedom of J." In Peele's Ed. I. i. 1, the Queen-mother says, "Now comes lovely Edward from J." Prince Edward went crusading in 1271. In H4 A. i. 1, 102, Henry says, "We must awhile neglect Our holy purpose to J." His pious intention was never fulfilled. Though Saladin took J. in 1187, the Kings of J. still maintained some show of authority in Palestine: the daughter of the last of them, John di Brenn, married Frederick of Naples, and he and his successors assumed the title. So, in H6 A. v. 5, 40, Reignier, the father of Margaret of Anjou, is entitled "K. of Naples and J."; and in H6 C. v. 7, 39, Clarence says that "Reignier to the K. of France hath pawned The Sicils and J." for the ransom of Margaret. He sold Naples, the two Sicilies, and Provence to Louis XI for 50,000 crowns for this purpose: no doubt his titular claim to J. was included, but it was not worth much. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, Frederic speaks of Orcanes of Natolia having gone to help "the Kings of Soria [i.e. Tyre] and J." against Tamburlaine: there was no king at this time.

The Order of the Knights of St. John of J. began with a small hospital dedicated to John the Baptist and erected in J. in 1048 for poor pilgrims. In 1113 the Order received the sanction of the Pope, Pascal II, and rapidly grew in power and influence, adding to its ministrations to the sick the duty of fighting against the Infidel. Being expelled from Palestine, they first went to Cyprus in 1291; and in 1310 conquered Rhodes, which they held till 1523, when Solymán drove them out. They then went to Malta, which was granted to them by Charles V in 1530. The badge of the Order was a white Maltese cross, and it has received a new interest from its adoption by the modern St. John Ambulance societies. In B. & F. Malta i. 3, Gomera addresses Valeta: "Great-Master of J.'s Hospital From whence to Rhodes this blest fraternity Was driven, but now among the Maltese stands"; and in iii. 3, he calls it an order "Which princes through all dangers have been proud To fetch as far as from J."

Pilgrimages to J. were frequent all through the Middle Ages, and the pilgrims received in many cases a J. mark, consisting of a cross tattooed on their arms or bodies. Chaucer's Wife of Bath had been thrice at J. (C. T. A. 463). The Palmer, in J. Heywood's Four PP. i, boasts, "At Hierusalem have I been Before Christ's blessed sepulchre." In Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, Barabas professes to the Friars his willingness "To fast, to pray, and wear a shirt of hair, And on my knees creep to J.," as penance for his sins. In Massinger's Guardian iv. 1, when Calista protests against her abduction, Durazzo says, "There are a shoal of young wenches would vow a pilgrimage beyond J. to be so cheated." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Geraldine says, "I have seen J. and Rome, have brought Mark from the one, from the other Testimony." In The Gamester i. 1, Wilding says he "would undertake to go a pilgrimage to J., and return, sooner" than ask his wife's consent to his intrigue with Penelope. In Dekker's If It Be 285, the Pilgrim says, "We pilgrims to J. bound this night desire repose." In B. & F. Malta v. 2, Gomera vows "to tread a pilgrimage To fair J. for my lady's soul." Travellers without the motive of a pilgrimage visited J. In Middleton's No Wit iii. 1, Pickadill says, "There's a brave travelling scholar, one that has been all the world over, and some part of J." In Jonson's Case i. 1, Valentine, returning from his travels, admits to having seen "J. and the Indies and Goodwin Sands, and the tower of Babylon and Venice." It was a long journey: hence when, in Juggler 36, Dame Coy says "A more fool is not from hence to J.," she means in the whole world. In Trag. Richd. II iii. 3, 80, the Butcher, terrified by the K.'s exactions, says, "I would my wife and children were at J. with all the wealth."

The Mt. of Olives stands E. of the city. In Dekker's Babylon i. 1, the Empress speaks of "sons and daughters that Like olives nursed up by J. Heightened our glories." There is probably a reminiscence of Psalms cxxviii. 3: "Thy children [shall be] like olive plants round about thy table." Owing to the Jewish idea that the kingdom of the Messiah was to be marked by the descent of a new

J. from heaven, and the adoption of this idea by the author of the book of Revelation (c. xxi), J. came to be used for Heaven. In H6 C. v. 5, 7, when Somerset is ordered off to execution, Margaret says, "So part we sadly in this troublous world, To meet with joy in sweet J." The parson in Chaucer's C. T. I. 51, undertakes to show his hearers the way "Of thilke parfit, glorious pilgrymage that highte J. celestial." In Yarrington's Two Trag. i. 2, Pandino says, "We do await The blessed hour when it shall please the Lord To take us to the just J." In Devonshire iv. 2, the Friar says to Dick, who has been condemned to death, "We come to set your feet on the right way To Palestine, the New J."

Drayton, in Eng. Helicon (1614), p. 44, says, "Bedeck our Beta . . . With couslips of J." This flower is the Lungwort (Pulmonaria Officinalis). T. Robinson, in Mary Magdalene (1620), 324, commends "coulsips of Hierusalem so nice."

J. Artichoke has really nothing to do with J., but is a corruption of the Italian "Girasole Articiocco," or Sunflower Artichoke. It was introduced into Europe in 1617. In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier v. 1, the Clown says, "These Christians are like artichokes of J.: they overrun any ground they grow in." In Mayne's Match ii. 1, Dorcas says, "The price of sprats, J. artichokes, and Holland cheese is very much increased, so that the brethren can't live in their vocation."

JERUSALEM CHAMBER. A hall at the W. front of Westminster Abbey, leading S. to the Deanery. It was built by Abbot Littlington towards the end of the 14th cent., and was probably the Hall of the Deanery. Three inscriptions run round the fireplace: "O pray for the peace of J.," "Build thou the walls of J.," and "J. which is above is free." Hence the name. It is used as the Chapter House of the Abbey, and the Revision of the Bible in 1870 was made within its walls. Henry IV died there. In H4 B. iv. 5, 234, the K. is told that the room where he swooned is called J., and says, "Laud be to God! even there my life must end. It hath been prophesied to me many years I should not die but in J.; Which vainly I supposed the Holy Land; But bear me to that chamber; there I'll lie; In that J. shall Harry die."

JESSEN. See GOSHEN.

JESUS COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE. University of Cambridge, originally a Priory of Nuns of the Benedictine Order. It was dissolved by Henry VII in 1496 and handed over to John Alcock, Bp. of Ely, to be converted into a College. It got its name from the chapel of the Priory, which was dedicated to the name of J. It stands in J. Close, between J. Lane and the Cam. A J. College MS. mentions the production of "Club Law fabula festivissima" at Clare Hall in 1599-1600.

JESUS COLLEGE, OXFORD. University of Oxford, situated at the corner of Turl St. and Market St., opposite Exeter College. It was founded by Hugh ap Rice in 1571, and refounded by Sir Leoline Jenkins, another Welshman, in 1660. Most of the Principals have been Welsh, and so have many of the students. In The Puritan i. 2, Pyeboard gives an account of his career at Oxford: "I have been matriculated in the University, wore out 6 gowns there, seen some fools and some scholars, some of the city and some of the country, kept order, went bare-headed over the quadrangle, eat my commons with a good stomach, and battled with discretion; at last I was expelled the University only for stealing a cheese out of J. College." The Welsh fondness for cheese is a common jest with our dramatists (see under WALES). In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, Capt. Jenkin, a Welshman, says, "I ha' picked up my cromes in Sesus [sic] College."

JESUS GATE and STREET. In Whetstone's Promos B. i. 4, Phallax, arranging for a City Pageant in the town of Julio, says, "On J. G. the 4 virtues I trow Appointed are to stand." In scene 6, one of the men, "apparelled like green men at the Mayor feast," says that they are waiting "In J. st. to keep a passage clear That the K. and his train may pass with ease." The whole scene is a Lond. one, and as the K. would come to the City from Westminster, Ludgate is probably meant by J. G., and Ludgate Hill or Cheapside by J. St. See ST. ANNE'S CROSS.

JEW (Jh. = Jewish), Lat. Judæus. Properly a member of the tribe of Judah, but since after the Babylonish Exile Judah was the only tribe that returned to Palestine in any large numbers, J. came to be synonymous with Hebrew. During the 1st cent. A.D. Christian writers used J. for an opponent of Christ, as, for example, in St. John's Gospel, and so the word took on an opprobrious connotation. During the Middle Ages the Js. were largely engaged in money-lending, and J. came to mean a money-lender, a usurer, with the added suggestion of craft and unscrupulousness. From the 11th to the 15th cents. the Js. were treated with abominable cruelty in all parts of Europe. They were subject to violent extortion by the Kings; they were tortured and burnt by the Ch., especially in France and Spain; in the Anglican Liturgy (Collect for Good Friday) they are classed with Turks, Infidels, and Heretics; they were charged with unnatural crimes, especially with the ritual murder of children, as in Chaucer's story told by the Prioress and the popular legend of Hugh of Lincoln; they were expelled from England in 1290, from France in 1307, from Spain in 1492. In Germany and Italy they were confined to certain quarters of the cities, called Ghettos, and were compelled to wear the distinctive yellow gaberdine. It was not till the reign of Charles II that they obtained legal recognition in England, and only in 1858 was the last disability removed and Js. permitted to sit in Parliament.

The word used as a National Name without any Offensive Connotation. The Pardoner, in Chaucer's C. T. C. 351, says that he has among his relics "a sholder boon Which that was of an hooly Jewes sheep": probably he means a J. before the time of Christ. So the Merchant (E. 2277) calls Solomon "this J." In Merch. ii. 3, 11, Launcelot calls Jessica "Most beautiful pagan, most sweet J." In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Barabas says, "As sure as heaven rained manna for the js., So sure . . . shall he die." In Merch. iii. 1, 61, Shylock says, "I am a J. Hath not a J. eyes? Hath not a J. hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is?" Heming's Jewes Trag. relates the story of the taking of Jerusalem by Titus in A.D. 70. Milton, P. R. iii: 358, speaks of "Samaritan or J."

Jew as opposed to Gentile. In Merch. ii. 6, 51, Gratiano says of Jessica: "She is a Gentile and no J." In Jerónimo, the Epilogue says, "Good night, kind gentles, for I hope there's never a J. among you all." The same pun is intended in Merch. i. 3, 178, where Antonio says to Shylock, "Hie thee, gentle J." Milton, P. R. iii. 118, says that God demands glory "Promiscuous from all nations, J., or Greek, Or Barbarous." In Sharpham's

Fleire ii. 331, when Sparke enteres with "Save ye, Gentles," Ruffel says, "Then we are enemies to the Jewes."

Jewish Abstinence from Pork. In Merch. i. 3, 34, Shylock, asked to dinner by Bassanio, says, "Yes, to smell pork; to eat of the habitation which your prophet the Nazarite conjured the devil into" (see Matthew viii. 28). In iii. 5, 39, Jessica says, "In converting Js. to Christians you raise the price of pork." In Day's Parl. Bees x., Impotens says, "This J., though he will eat no pork, eats bees." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Carlo says of pork: "No marvel though that saucy, stubborn generation, the Js., were forbidden it; for what would they ha' done, well pampered with fat pork, that durst murmur at their Maker out of garlic and onions?" In Davenant's Wits i. 2, the elder Palatine will not give the younger "so much as will find a J. bacon to his eggs," i.e. nothing at all. In Webster's Malfi iii. 2, an officer says, "He could not abide to see a pig's head gaping; I thought your Grace would find him a J." In B. & F. Prophetess i. 3, Geta, who is carrying the body of a huge boar, says, "I shall turn J. if I carry many such burdens." In their Prize i. 2, Livia, when Rowland says "If wealth may win you," replies scornfully, "If a hog may be High-priest among the Js."

Jewish Distinctive Dress. In Merch. i. 3, 113, Shylock says, "You spit upon my Jh. gaberdine." The Gaberdine was a loose upper garment. In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "Some like breechless women go—The Russ, Turk, J., and Grecian." In B. & F. Custom ii. 3, Rutilio, seeing 2 men approaching, says, "One, by his habit, is a J." In Glaphorne's Hollander iii. 1, Sconce says, "The Js. at Rome Wear party-coloured garments, to be known From Christians."

Jew used with a general Opprobrious Connotation. In Chaucer, C. T. B. 1749, the Prioress says that Satan "hath in Jewes herte his waspes nest," and throughout the tale they are called "cursed Jewes." In Two Gent. ii. 5, 58, Launce says to Speed, "Go with me to the alehouse; if not, thou art an Hebrew, a J., and not worth the name of a Christian." In Merch. ii. 2, 119, Launcelot says, "I am a J. if I serve the J. any longer." In ii. 8, 4, Salanio calls Shylock "the villain J." and in 14, "the dog J." In Ado ii. 3, 272, Benedick says, "If I do not love her, I am a J." In Merch. ii. 2, 112, Launcelot says, "My master's a very J."; in 34, "The J. is the very devil incarnal." In H4 A. ii. 4, 198, Falstaff says, "They were bound, every man of them, or I am a J. else, an Ebrew J." Barabas, the hero of Marlowe's Jew, is an example of every kind of enormity. In Ford's 'Tis Pity iv. 3, Putana says, "Dost think I am a Turk or a J.?" In Middleton's Phenix iii. 1, Falso says, "If men be Js., Justices must be cruel." In Day's B. Beggar ii., Strowd says, "I'll meet thee, else call me J." In Massinger's Madam v. 2, Luke says, "I am styled a cormorant, a cut-throat J." In Brome's Moor iii. 3, Arnold brings word "the old J. Quicksands Has lost his wife." Campion, in Book of Airs (1617) iii., says, "Safer may we credit give To a faithless wandering J."

Jew as an Unbeliever. In Piers C. xx. 96, Faith "gan foully the false lewes to despisen." In C. xxii. 34, he says, "The luwes that weren gentel-men, Iesu thei dispisen, Both hus lore and hus lawe, now aren thei lowe cheorles." "Liver of blaspheming J." is one of the ingredients of the witches' cauldron in Macbeth iv. 1, 26. In Fulwell's Like iii. 336, Virtuous Living says, "O gracious God, how highly art Thou of all men to be praised, of Christians, Saracens, Js., and also Turks." In Ingelond's Disobedient 82, the devil says, "O all the

Js. and all the Turks, in the end they fly hither [i.e. to hell] all and some." In Goosecap v. 1, Rudesby says to Hippolita, "If the sun of thy beauty do not white me like a shippard's holland, I am a J. to my Creator." In Wapull Tarrieth G. 4, Faithful Few says, "The Jh. infidel to God doth more agree Than such a Christianity do so misuse": a rare sentiment in those days. It was believed that a Jew who mocked at our Lord on His way to the Cross was condemned to live until His Second Coming, and meanwhile to wander through the world. Taylor, in Life of Parr (1635), p. 214, says, "John Buttadeus, if report be true, Is his name that is styled the Wand'ring J."

Jews as Moneylenders and Usurers. In Piers C. v. 194, Reason speaks of "Lumbardes of Lukes that lyven by lone as Iewes." Shylock, in Merch., is a typical moneylender, and in i. 3, 70, defends his taking of interest by the example of Jacob's dealings with Laban. In Marmion's Companion ii. 4, Careless says to Æmilia, "Thy father is an usurer, a J." Nash, in Wilton K. 2, says, "All Js. are covetous." In Wise Men iii. 3, Hermito says, "Usury was wont to be a thing odious among Christians and used by none but Js." Jh. moneylenders occur in Wilson's Three Ladies, Daborne's Christian Turned Turk, and Rowley's Three English Brothers. Dekker, in Seven Sins vi. 40, speaks of "brokers that shave poor men by most Jh. interest." In Brome's Antipodes iii. 4, Lefoy says, "Usury goes round the world, and will do till the general conversion of the Js." In Shirley's Bird ii. 2, Rolliardo says, "I heard a pound of flesh, a J's demand once": the reference being to Shylock's bond in Merch. In Middleton's R. G. iii. 3, Curtlax says that Dapper is "as damned a usurer as ever was among Js." Heylyn (s.v. PALESTINE) says of the Js.: "They are now accounted a perjurious vagabond nation, and great usurers."

Jews as Implacable and Cruel. In Merch. iv. 1, 80, Antonio says, "You may as well do anything most hard As seek to soften that—than which what's harder?—His Jh. heart." In Two Gent. ii. 3, 12, Launce says, "A J. would have wept to see our parting." In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Barabas says, "We Js. can fawn like spaniels when we please; And when we grin we bite." In iii. 3, Abigail says, "I perceive there is no pity in Js." In B. & F. Custom ii. 3, Rutilio says to Zabulon, "That you'll help us We dare not hope, because you are a J.; And courtesies come sooner from the devil Than any of your nation." In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 55), Zariph says, "Zariph is a J., A crucifying hangman, trained in sin, One that would hang his brother for his skin."

Jews as Experts in the use of Poisonous Drugs. In Marston's Malcontent v. 3, when Mendoza asks Malevole, "Canst thou empoison?" he replies, "Excellently; no J., 'pothecary, or politician better." In Massinger's Milan v. 2, Francisco, disguised as "a J. doctor," poisons the lips of the dead Marcelia, and so kills Sforza when he kisses her. In B. & F. Wife iv. 1, Sorano says he got the drug with which he intends to poison Alphonso from "A J., an honest and a rare physician." In Selinus 1684, Selinus says, "Baiazet hath with him a cunning J., Professing physic, and so skilled therein As if he had power over life and death; Withal a man so stout and resolute That he will venture any thing for gold." This J. poisons Baiazet and himself at the same time. In Webster's Law Case iii. 2, Romelio appears disguised as a J., in order to murder Contarion, and he swears to give the surgeons 10,000 ducats "by my Jewism."

Jews as Old Clothes Dealers. In Ev. Wom. I. iv. 1, the City Wife says, "You may hire a good suit at a J.'s or at a broker's."

Jew's Ear. Properly Judas's Ear, "auricula Judæ," a fungus growing on the trunk of trees, especially on the elder, on which Judas is said to have hanged himself. In T. Heywood's Witches iii., it is said, "All the sallets are turned to Jewes-ears." In Nabbes' Totenham iii. 6, Slip says, "If I find them not, count me no wiser than an apothecary that looked for Jewes ears on an old pillory."

Jew's Eye. Used proverbially for anything very precious. Probably there is a kind of pun on jewel. In Merch. ii. 5, 43, Launcelot says to Jessica, "There will come a Christian by, will be worth a Jewes eye." Jewes is the gen. sing., not = Jewess.

Jewish care about Genealogies, as Evidenced in Bk. of Chronicles, etc. In Davenant's Italian iii. 2, Florello says, "I'm an old J. at genealogies."

Jew as a term of endearment: probably with a sort of punning reference to Jewel. In L. L. L. iii. 1, 136, Costard calls Moth "My sweet ounce of man's flesh! My inconvy J.!" In M. N. D. iii. 1, 97, Flute, as Thisbe, calls Pyramus, "Most brisky Juvenal and eke most lovely J."

Wealth of the Jews. In Marlowe's Jew i. 1, Barabas tells of his great wealth, and adds: "Rather had I, a J., be hated thus Than pitied in a Christian poverty."

Persecution of the Jews. In Chapman's Alphonsus v. 1, 471, Edward says, "I would adjudge the villain to be hanged As here the Js. are hanged in Germany." The custom was to hang Js. up by the feet between 2 savage dogs. In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iv. 3, the Clown says "a J. burns pretty well; but he burns upward: the fire takes him by the nose first."

Jews as Murderers of Children. See Chaucer's Prioress' Tale. In Marlowe's Jew iii. 6, Jacomo asks of Barabas: "Has he crucified a child?" And Barnadine answers, "No, but a worse thing."

Jews as Sweaters of the Currency. In 1230 Js. had to pay $\frac{1}{4}$ of their movable property for their alleged clipping of the coin of the realm. In Piers C. vii. 241, Avarice confesses, "Ich lerned of Jewes To weie pans with a peis, and pared the hevyste."

Jews as Magicians, Fortune-tellers, and Astrologers. In Marston's Malcontent v. 1, Maquerelle says, "A Chaldean or an Assyrian, I am sure 'twas a most sweet J. told me 'court any woman in the right sign, you shall not miss.'"

Jew's Harp, or Jew's Trump. A musical instrument consisting of a flexible metal tongue in a lyre-shaped frame. It is held between the teeth, and the note is produced by striking the tongue with the finger and varying the size of the resonant cavity of the mouth. It is not clear why it was so called. The suggestion that it is a corruption of Jaws' Harp cannot be sustained. In Lyly's Campaspe ii. 1, Psyllus, listening to the quarrel between Diogenes and Manes, says, "O sweet consent between a crowd [i.e. hurdy-gurdy] and a J.'s harp!" In B. & F. Span. Cur. iv. 5, Diego, mocking his expectant heirs, says, "I do bequeathe ye commodities of pins . . . ginger-bread, and Js.-trumps." In their Hum. Lieut. v. 2, the Lieut. "has made a thousand rhymes and plays the burden to 'em on a J.'s-trump." In their Captain ii. 2, Jacomo says, "I had rather hear a J.'s-trump than these lutes." In Shirley's Opportunity iv. 1, Ascanio says, "Pimpinio has a great ambition to challenge Orpheus to play with him on any instrument from the organ to the J.'s trump." In B. & F. Lover's Prog. i. 1,

Leon mentions among Malfort's qualities for charming a lady, "playing on a gittern or a J.'s trump." In Eastward ii. 2, Quicksilver says of Security, the usurer: "'O 'tis a notable Jews-trump! I hope to live to see dog's meat made of the old usurer's flesh." In Dekker's If it be 288, Brisco has collected a band including "whole swarms of Welsh harps, Irish bagpipes, J.'s trumps, and French kitts."

JEWIN STREET. Lond., running E. from Aldersgate St. to the junction of Red Cross St. and Gore St. It has its name from its being the only place of interment allowed to be used by the Jews in Lond. for a considerable time. Stow describes it as full of "fair garden plots and summer-houses for pleasure"; and Howell, in 1657, says it was "a handsome new st., fairly built by the Company of Goldsmiths." Here John Milton lived from 1660 to 1664.

JEWRY (= JUDÆA). The land of the Jews; sometimes, as in the first 2 quotations, used for Palestine as a whole. In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, 24, Rasni boasts, "Great J.'s God that foiled stout Benhadad, Could not rebate the strength that Rasni brought." In v. 4, 2120, Adam, who is annoyed at having to fast, says, "Well, Goodman Jonas, I would you had never come from J. to this country." In Candlemas, p. 10, Herod is called, "My Lord of all Jurye." In M. W. W. ii. 1, 20, Mrs. Page exclaims, after reading Falstaff's letter, "What a Herod of J. is this!" Herod was the villain of the Mystery Plays. In H5 iii. 3, 40, Henry says, "The mad mothers with their howls confused Do break the clouds, as did the wives of J. At Herod's bloody-hunting slaughtermen." This again is a reminiscence of the Mystery Plays. In Ant. i. 2, 28, Charmian says, "Let me have a child to whom Herod of J. may do homage." In iii. 3, 3, Alexas says to Cleopatra, "Herod of J. dare not look upon you But when you are well pleased." In iii. 6, 73, Cæsar mentions "Herod of J." amongst Antony's allies. In iv. 6, 12, Enobarbus says, "Alexas did revolt; and went to J. in Affairs of Antony." In R2 ii. 1, 55, Gaunt speaks of "The sepulchre in stubborn J. Of the world's ransom, blessed Mary's son." In Three Ladies i., Love says, "For lucre men come from Italy, Barbary, Turkey, from J." In Mariam iv. 3, Herod says to Mariam, "Art thou not Juries Queen?" In True Trag., p. 128, it is said of Q. Elizabeth: "Babies in Jury sound her princely name." In Tiberius 151, Asinius speaks of "The palms of Jury." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, says, "The palm doth rifely rise in Jury field." J. is also used as a name for the Gheftos, or Jews' quarters, in the various cities of Europe. Nash, in Wilton, says, "All, whether male or female, belonging to the old J. [at Rome] should depart." See for the London Jews' quarters under OLD JEWRY.

JERUSALEM (see JERUSALEM). The spelling is due to an attempt to combine the normal spelling with Hierosolima.

JOAN'S (ST.). See JOHN'S (ST.), PRIORY OF.

JOHN (ST.) EVANGELIST. A bookseller's sign in Fleet St., Lond., opposite the Conduit. John Butler, assistant to Wynkyn de Worde, set up a printing office here. Here Thomas Colwell printed at this sign Phillips' Grissil, Darius (1565), and Gurton (1575). Wapull's Tarrieth was "Imprinted in Fleete-streate beneath the Conduite at the sign of Saynt J. E. by Hugh Jackson. 1576."

JOHN (ST.) LATERAN (SAN GIOVANNI IN LATERANO). The famous ch. in Rome, at the S.E. corner of the city, in the Piazza di Porta San Giovanni at the E. end of the

Via di San Giovanni in Laterano. It occupies the site of the house of Plautius Lateranus, who was put to death by Nero. Constantine gave it to the Pope as his episcopal residence, and founded the ch., helping to dig the foundations with his own hands. The Lateran Palace remained the residence of the Popes until the Babylonian Captivity (1309). An inscription on the entrance styles it "Omnium Urbis et Orbis Ecclesiarum Mater et Caput." Its chapter still takes precedence of that of St. Peter, and here the Pope is crowned. In Barnes' Charter iii. 1, Astor says, "I was now going to our Lady's Mass in St. J. L." In Tarilton's News, we read: "It was Pope Joan, that honest woman, that as she went in procession through the Lateran was brought to bed in the streets."

JOHN (ST.) STREET. Lond., running N. from W. Smithfield to Clerkenwell Rd., and continuing thence as St. J. Street Rd. to the Angel at Islington. It was the main road from the City for travellers to the north. At No. 16 is still to be found the Cross Keys Tavern, on the E. side of the st.; further on is Red Bull Yard, which marks the site of the Red Bull Playhouse, q.v. Hicks' Hall, the sessions house of the County of Middlesex, from which the milestones on the Gt. North Rd. were measured, was near the entrance of St. J.'s Lane: it was built in 1612 and pulled down in 1782; the site is marked by a mural tablet. The name of the street was derived from the neighbouring Priory of St. J. In Barry's Ram iv., Beard says, "I now will trudge to St. J.-st. to inform the Lady Sommerfield where thou art." Taylor, in Carrier's Cosmographie, says, "The carrier of Daintree doth lodge every Friday night at the Cross Keys in St. J.'s st." Webster, in Monuments, speaks of "the now demolished house" of the Knights of St. J. of Jerusalem "in St. J.'s St."

JOHN'S (ST.) CATHEDRAL. The cathedral ch. of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem at Malta. It was built in 1580 by John de la Cassiere, the Grand Master. It contains many tombs of the Grand Masters and Knights of the Order. In B. & F. Malta iv. 1, Oriana, having received a sleeping potion, like Juliet, "is buried in her family's monument in the temple of St. John."

JOHN'S, ST., CHESTER. An ancient ch. in the S.E. corner of the city, near the Dee. It is Norman in style, and was for a time used as the cathedral during the 11th cent. In Munday's John Kent i., Chester says, "At St. J. shall be solemnized the nuptials of your Honors and these virgins; for to that ch. Edgar, once England's k., was by 8 kings rowed royally on St. John Baptist day."

JOHN'S (ST.) COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE. Founded by the Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, in 1511, on the site of a priory of St. John the Evangelist dissolved in the 2nd year of Henry VIII. The 2nd court was built mainly by Mary, Countess of Shrewsbury, 1599-1602. The College stands between St. J. St. and the river, next to Trinity. St. J. plays a distinguished part in the history of the English drama. John Bale was one of its earliest students. Robert Greene took his degree there in 1578. Thomas Nash graduated there in 1585, but was sent down for some act of insubordination: it is said for refusing to act in a play Terminus et non Terminus. He bore no malice, however, for in his Lenten, p. 308, he says of Roger Ascham: "He was a St. J. man in Cambridge, in which house I once took up my inn for 7 years together lacking a quarter, and yet love it still, for it is, and ever was, the sweetest nurse of knowledge in all that University." Ben Jonson is said to have been at St. J., but the evidence is far from conclusive.

Amongst plays produced at St. John's are Thomas Legge's Ricardus Tertius (1573, etc.); the Plutus of Anstophanes, in Greek (1536)—(the earliest definite record of a performance in Cambridge); Thomas Watson's Absolom (circ. 1545); Abraham Fraunce's Victoria (1575); Hymenæus (1578-9); Silvanus (1597); Machiavellus (1597); Terminus et non Terminus (1586); Edward Cecil's Emilia (1615); and, most noteworthy of all, the Pernassus Trilogy (1598-1601). In Cowley's Cutter iv. 4, Truman says, "I'll send for my son Tom from St. J. Cambridge; he's a pretty scholar." As this play was first performed at Cambridge, under the name of The Guardian, no doubt it is the Cambridge St. J. that is meant.

JOHN'S (St.) COLLEGE, OXFORD. Founded by Sir Thomas White in 1557, on the site of the older St. Bernard's College, a Cistercian foundation which was dissolved as a monastic establishment by Henry VIII. The tower and gateway and the 1st quadrangle date from this time. The College stands in St. Giles St., next above Trinity, on the E. side of the street. James Shirley was a student at St. J., though he graduated later at Cambridge. St. J. took a leading part in the dramatic activities of the University. Here were produced Narcissus (1602-3), and, in conjunction with Christ Ch., a series of plays on the occasion of the visit of James I in 1605. Amongst them were Alba, Ajax, Flaggellifer, Matthew Gwinne's Vertumnus, Daniel's Queen's Arcadia, and an open-air interlude on the lines of the witches' prophecy in Macbeth, which may have suggested the treatment of the subject by Shakespeare the next year. The MS. of Griffin Higg's True Relation, etc., of Thomas Tucker is preserved in the College Library, and gives an account of the plays produced in 1607-8, amongst which were Philomela, Time's Complaint, Seven Days of the Week, Philomathes, and Ira seu Tumulus Fortunæ. George Wilde's Love's Hospital was produced at Laud's expense on the visit of Charles I in 1636.

JOHN'S (St.) HEAD. Sign of a tavern in Lond. in St. Martyn's Lane, Aldersgate. In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, Busie says, "You shall with me to the St. J. H.; there is a cup of pure Canary."

JOHN'S (St.) PRIORY OF. The Priory of St. John of Jerusalem in Clerkenwell, founded in 1100 by Jordan Briset for the Knights Hospitallers, and endowed with the revenues of the Knights Templars when that Order was dissolved in 1324. It stood on what is now St. J. Square, and St. J. Gate was the gate-house of the Priory. The Order was very wealthy, and its Prior was Primus Baro Angliæ. It was suppressed in 1541, and the buildings passed to the Crown. They were bequeathed by Henry VIII to the Lady Mary, afterwards Q., but in the reign of Edward VI Somerset got hold of them and blew a large part up with gunpowder in order to use the stones for his new mansion in the Strand. The Gatehouse has now returned to its original owners, and is the head office of the St. John Ambulance Association. In Bale's Laws iv., Infidelity has a pardon in his sleeve "from St. J. Friary." In Straw iii., the Mayor says, "The rebels are defacing houses of hostelry, St. J. in Smithfield, the Savoy, and such like." The reference is to the preceptory of the Priory, which was burnt by the rabble of Wat Tyler and Jack Straw. The ch. of St. John Clerkenwell, in St. J. Square, occupies its site, and in the foundations are some of the stones of the original ch. It is not exactly in Smithfield, but a little way North. In Day's B. Beggar i., Cardinal Beaufort says, "Gloster, thou wrong'st me, withhold'st St. Johnnes; Look to 't; for fear when I get entry I pull not down the Castle o'er thine ears." Gloster replies, "Cardinal, to spite thee I'll keep Elinor, And wed her in St. Johnnes." Later the Cardinal threatens, "I'll rouse you and your minions Out of St. Johnnes ere a week be spent." The reference appears to be to the Priory. The dist. round the Priory was called St. J. In Look about v., Skink, who is wanted by the police, complains, "There's a rogue in a red cap, he's run from St. J. after me." In Middleton's Mad World iii. 2, the Courtezan, supposed to be dying, sends her commendations "to all my good cousins in Clerkenwell and St. J." The neighbourhood had a bad reputation. In Randolph's Muses iv. 3, Plus brings before the magistrate "a gentlewoman of St. Joans, is charged with dishonesty."

JOHN'S (St.) WOOD (formerly GREAT St. J. Wood). A wood lying W. of Regent's Park, Lond., belonging to the Priors of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem. On the suppression of the Priory in 1541 it fell into the possession of the Crown, and was used as a hunting-ground. During the last 100 years it has become a populous residential suburb, specially affected by artists. In Jonson's Tub ii. 1, Hiltz says, "My capt. and myself . . . at the corner of St. J. Wood, Some mile W. o' this town [i.e. Pancras] were set upon By a sort of country fellows that not only Beat us, but robbed us most sufficiently." In Jonson's Magnetic v. 5, Sir Moth tells of a poor squire that would walk in his sleep "to St. J. Wood And Waltham Forest, scape by all the ponds And ditches in the way."

JOPPA (now JAFFA). A spt. on the coast of Palestine, 30 m. N.W. of Jerusalem, of which it is the port. The harbour is little more than an open roadstead, but as there is no other S. of the Bay of Acre it has always been the usual outlet from S. Palestine. In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass iii. 1, 956, Jonas says, "My mind misgives; to J. will I fly, And for a while to Tharsus shape my course" (see Jonah i. 3). In Downfall Huntington ii. 1, Prince John says, "Here are letters from His Majesty Sent out of J. in the Holy Land." Richd. I recovered J. from Saladin in 1191. In Bacchus, the 11th guest was "a Jew born in J.; he had to name Christopher Crab-face, a man famous in astrology."

JORDAN. R. in Palestine running S. from Lake Huleh, through the Sea of Galilee, into the Dead Sea. In it our Lord was baptised. In Bale's Promises vii., Pater Cælestis says to John the Baptist, "Thou shalt wash him [Jesus] among them in J., a flood not far from Jerusalem." In Peele's Bethsabe iii. 3, Cusay advises Davip "To pass the river J. presently." In Harrowing of Hell 106, John says, "Ich am Johan that these followed in flum J." In York M. P. xxi. 54, the Angel says, "My lord Jesus shall come this day Fro Galylee unto this flood Ye Jourdan call." In Spenser, F. Q. i. 2, 30, the Well of Life "Both Silo . . . and J. did excel." Milton, P. L. xii. 145, mentions "the double-founted stream J. [as] the true limit eastward" of the land of Promise. The allusion is to the idea that the J. was formed by the confluence of 2 streams, the Jor and the Dan! In iii. 535, more correctly, Paneas is spoken of as "the fount of J.'s flood." In P. R. i. 24, it is related how Jesus came from Nazareth "to the flood J." to be baptised. In 119, Satan, in quest of our Lord, "to the coast of J. . . . directs his easy steps." In 329 the scene of the Baptism is described as "the ford Of J." In ii. 25, the disciples consult "on the bank of J., by a creek, Where winds with reeds and osiers whispering play." In iii. 438, our Lord recalls how "the Red Sea and J. once he [God] cleft, When to the Promised Land their fathers passed" (see Joshua iii.). The use of J. for a chamber-pot may be derived from its being employed as the name of the bottles in which pilgrims brought water from the river J., but it is not at all certain. In H4 A. ii. 1, 22, the carrier complains that the Rochester innkeepers "will allow us ne'er a j." In H4 B. ii. 4, 37, Falstaff orders, "Empty the j." In Thracian iv. 2, the Clown says, "Behold your sweet phisnomy in the clear streams of the river J.": with an obvious double entendre. In a song in Jonson's Augurs, we have, "My lady will come with a bowl and a broom And her handmaid with a jorden." Earle, in Microcosmography xiii., describing a tavern scene, says, "The Js., like swelling rivers, overflow their banks." J. Almond is probably a corruption of Jardin (Garden) Almond. In Field's Amends iii. 3, Bold mentions amongst the ingredients of a night-mask, "J. almonds, blanched and ground, a quartern."

JORPATA (i.e. JOTAPATA; now KHURBET JEFAT). A city of Galilee, taken by Vespasian A.D. 67 after a fine defence. It lies abt. 20 m. due E. of the promontory of Carmel. In Heming's Jewes Trag. 821, Vespasian asks: "How far are we now from J.?"

JOSAPHAT, VALLEY OF. The ravine between Jerusalem and the Mt. of Olives, on the E. and S. sides of the city. It is often called the Valley of the Kedron, from the brook that runs down it. From Joel iii. 2, 12, 13, it was inferred that the Last Judgment would take place there. It contained several places of interest to pilgrims, such as the place of the stoning of Stephen, the Garden of Gethsemane, the pool of Siloam, and the so-called tomb of Absalom. The ch. of the tomb of the Virgin marks the traditional site of her assumption, and is just N. of Gethsemane. In Piers C. xxi. 413, our Lord says that he will drink no more wine "til the vendage [i.e. vintage] valle in the vale of Iosaphat, And drynke ryght rype most [must] resurreccio mortuorum." The Palmer, in J. Heywood's Four PP. i., says, "To J. and Olyvete On foot, God wot, I went right bare." In York M. P. xli. 97, which describes the appearance of the Virgin to St. Thomas and her assumption, Thomas says, "This is the Vale of J. in Jury so gent."

JOIRDANE. See JORDAN.

JUBALTER (= GIBALTAR, q.v.). In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine has a vision of reigning from Mexico "unto the straits of J." In Tamb. B. i. 3, Usumcasanes reports, "We kept the narrow strait of J."

JUDEA. The S. of the 3 divisions of Palestine in the 1st cent., lying W. of the Dead Sea. It corresponded roughly to the territory of the tribes of Judah and Simeon. In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, Rasni, K. of Assyria, says, "I have made J.'s monarch flee the field." This was not true: in the time of Jonah (i.e. the reign of Jeroboam II in Israel) the Assyrians had not yet attacked Judah. In Greene's Friar ix., Bacon promises Frederick a rich feast, including "cates of J." The passage is corrupt: nothing was imported from J. except balm, and it has been suggested that we should read: "balm of J." In Nabbes' Bride iv. 1, Horten says, "Yet we must from Memphis and J. Fetch balsam, though sophisticate." In Mariam i. 1, Mariam says, "Yet had I rather much a milkmaid be Than be the monarch of J.'s queen." In Candemas, p. 18, Miles says to Herod, "Through Jerusalem and Jude your will we have wrought." In York M. P. xvii. 120, the 1st K. says of our Lord, "He shall be k. Of Jewes and of Jude." Milton, P. R. iii. 157, speaks of J. as being reduced under Roman yoke. In S. A. 252, Samson relates how "the Philistines . . . Entered J., seeking me." See Judges xv. 9.

JUDAH. The 4th son of Jacob and Leah, and the ancestor of the tribe of that name. It had assigned to it on the conquest of Canaan the dist. in S. Syria between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean, though it never succeeded in occupying the coastal dist., which was held firmly by the Philistines. After the Babylonish captivity, the great majority of the returning exiles belonged to the tribe of J., and the name Jew came to be equivalent to Hebrew. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 1, Nathan says to David, "Thus saith the Lord thy God [I gave thee], J. and Jerusalem withal." In his Alcazar iii. 1, 26, the Legate says, "His Majesty [the K. of Spain] doth promise to resign The titles of the Islands of Moloccus That by his royalty in J. he commands." But we should certainly read India for J. In King Leir, Haz., p. 376, Leir says to Cordella, "The blessing which the God of Abraham gave Unto the tribe of J. light on thee" (see Gen. xlix. 9-12). In York M. P. xii. 114, the Prologue says, "He [i.e. Jacob] says the sceptre shall not pass Fro Juda land of Israell Or he come that God ordained has." In Milton, P. L. i. 457, it is related how "Ezekiel . . . surveyed the dark idolatries Of alienated J." (Ezekiel viii. 14). In P. R. ii. 440, David is called "the shepherd lad Whose offspring on the throne of J. sat So many ages." In 424, it is related how Antipater "his son Herod placed on J.'s throne." This was Herod the Gt., who was made K. of J. 40 B.C. In iii. 282, it is recalled how the Babylonians led captive "J. and all thy father David's house." In S. A. 256, Samson relates how "the men of J." betrayed him (Judges xv. 9); and adds: "Had J. that day joined, or one whole tribe, They had by this possessed the towers of Gath." In 976, Dalila expects that her name will be detested "In Dan, in J., and the bordering tribes." In Nativity Ode 221, it is said that Osiris "feels from Juda's land The dreaded infant's hand." Bethlehem was in J. Juda is one of the characters in Darius.

JUDE. See JUDEA.

JUDITH. A bookseller's sign in Lond., showing J. with the head of Holofernes in her hand. Skelton's Elynour Runnyng was "Printed at London by Richard Lant, for Henry Tab, dwelling in Paul's Churchyard at the sign of J." (n.d.).

JULIO (= GYULA). A town in Hungary, 120 m. S.E. of Buda-Pesth. Heylyn tells how it was betrayed to the Turks by its governor, Nicolas Keretsken, who was punished for his perfidy by Selimus by being put in a barrel stuck full of nails and rolled up and down till he died. The scene of Whetstone's Promos is laid "in the city of J., sometimes under the dominion of Corvinus, k. of Hungary and Bœmia." Corvinus reigned 1458-1491. Shakespeare, in Meas., transfers the scene to Vienna.

JULIUS, TEMPLE OF. Probably the Temple of Venus Genetrix, erected by Julius Cæsar in the Forum Julium, is intended. It lay N.E. of the Forum Romanum, in the angle formed by the present Via de Marforio and Via del Ghetarello. It was begun in 48 B.C. and dedicated in 46 B.C. In May's Agrippina i. 1, 338, amongst the great buildings of Rome are mentioned "Julius' temple, Claudius' aquæducts."

JUPITER STATOR, TEMPLE OF. At Rome, built by Romulus at the spot where the Romans rallied when on the point of defeat by the Sabines. It stood by the Porta Mugionis, at the junction of the Via Sacra with the Nova Via. It was destroyed in Nero's Fire, but was rebuilt. In Jonson's Catiline, the scene of iv. 2 and v. 6 is "the T. of J. S." In iv. 2, the Prætor says, "Fathers, take your places Here in the house of J. the Stayer."

JURY. See JEWRY.

KATHARINE WHEEL. See CATHARINE WHEEL.

KATHERINE'S (SAINT) (Ks. = Katherines, K's. = Katherine's). A hospital founded in 1148 by Matilda, wife of King Stephen. It stood immediately E. of the Tower of Lond., on the bank of the Thames. It received much help from Q. Eleanor and Q. Philippa, and the patronage still remains in the hands of the Q. Consort. It was suppressed by Henry VIII, but reconstituted by Elizabeth in 1556 for the maintenance of a master, 3 brethren, 3 sisters, and 10 bedeswomen. The ch. was a fine Gothic building, but it was pulled down with the rest of the hospital in 1825-7 to make room for St. K's. Docks which now occupy the site. The hospital was removed to the N.E. corner of Regent's Park. There was, however, before the building of the present docks, a landing-place at the E. end of the precinct, known as St. K's. Dock, and it would appear to have been used specially by the Dutch mariners. The Precinct, or Liberty, extended from the Tower to Radcliffe, and had the usual reputation of a waterside dist. In Jonson's Alchemist v. 1, Face says, "These are all broke loose Out of St. Ks., where they use to keep The better sort of mad folks": an unkind reference to the bedesmen and women of the hospital. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 326, the Q. says to Dr. Parry, "Though at our Court of Greenwich thou wert crost In suing to be Master of St. Ks. To do thee good seek out a better place." In Dekker's Babylon 260, Paridel, who stands for Dr. William Parry, says, "I did but beg of her [the Q.] the mastership Of Santa Cataryna, 'twas denied me." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. v., the Master of S. Ks. appears and brings to the King "Of poor St. Ks., £500" as a benevolence. In Webster's Weakest iii. 4, Bunch exclaims, "For England, for Lond.! O St. Kathern's Dock!" In W. Rowley's New Wonder iii., Richd. says, "This tide should bring them Into St. Catherine's Pool." In Dekker's Edmonton iii. 1, Cuddy, going to woo Katherine, says to the Witch's dog, "Land me but at K's. Dock, my sweet K's. Dock." Then, when he has been ducked by the spirits, he says, "Thinking to land at K's. Dock, I was almost at Gravesend"; i.e. I was almost killed. In Jonson's Magnetic ii. 1, Polish says, "How now, goody Nurse, Dame Keep of Katerns? What! have you an oar in the cockboat, 'cause you are a sailor's wife, and come from Shadwell?": which is just beyond St. K's. In Eastward iv. 1, Slitgut, at Cuckold's Haven, sees Winifred in the Thames, and says, "A woman, i' faith, a woman! though it be almost at St. Ks., I discern it to be a woman." Later in the scene the Drawer rescues Winifred and says, "I am glad it was my good hap to come down thus far after you to a house of my friend's here in St. K's."

In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity suggests to Pug to go "to St. Kathern's, To drink with the Dutch there, and take forth their patterns": which indicates that it was pronounced Katterns. In Wealth 288, Hance the Fleming says, "Gut naught ic mot waft to sent Cafrin to mi lanman store"; and in 299, he says, "Ic myself cumt from sent Katryns." Cafrin and Katryn are modifications of Katharine. In Jonson's Staple iii. 1, Thomas announces as an interesting news item: "The perpetual motion is here found out by an ale-wife in St. K's. at the sign of the Dancing Bears." In Jonson's Augurs, Notch and Slug, the masquers, say, "We do come from among the brew-houses in St. K's."; and later, "Our project is that we should all come from the Three Dancing Bears in St. K's." Then John Urson comes in with the 3 bears and sings while they dance, "Then to put you out of fear or doubt, We come from St. Katherine-a; These dancing 3, by the help of me, Who am the post of the sign-a." He goes on: "To a stranger there, If any appear, Where never before he has been, We shew the iron gate, The wheel of St. Kate, And the place where the priest fell in." The Iron Gate is one of the gates of the Tower, also called St. K's. Gate, just above the hospital. The wheel of St. Kate is the Katherine wheel, the symbol of the martyrdom of the saint, who was put to death on a jagged wheel; there was a Catharine Wheel Tavern at the W. end of Little Tower Hill, close to the hospital. In Wager's The Longer, B. 1, Moros says, "At St. Katherine there be good puddings at the sign of the Plough, you never did eat better sauserlings." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Moll sings, "She says she went to the Burse for patterns; You shall find her at St. Kathern's": i.e. in a place of bad repute. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i., Smoke says to the rebels advancing on the E. of Lond., "See how St. Ks. smokes; wipe, slaves, your eyes, And whet your stomachs for the good malt-pies." Dekker, in News from Hell, says of Hell: "It stands farther off than the Indies; yet if you have but a side wind, you may sail sooner thither than a married man can upon St. Luke's day to Cuckolds Haven from St. Ks.," i.e. just across the Thames. See Cuckold's Haven. Deloney, in Craft i. 14, tells how John the Frenchman's wife was "going toward St. Ks. to see if she could meet with some of her countryfolks that could tell her any tidings of her husband."

KATHARINE'S (SAINT). A ch. at Fierbois in Touraine, where Joan of Arc found her sword. In H6 A. i. 2, 100, Joan of Arc says, "Here is my keen-edged sword. . . The which at Touraine, in St. K's. churchyard, Out of a great deal of old iron I chose forth."

KATHERINE'S (SAINT) FORT. A fort on St. K. Mt., an eminence 380 ft. high, E. of Rouen, between the Seine and the Aubette. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, one of the charges laid against Byron is "You would have brought the king before St. K. fort, to be there slain." This was at the siege of Rouen in 1593. The whole story is related in Florio's Montaigne i. 23.

KATHERINE'S (SAINT) NUNNERY. Probably the Priory of the Holy Trinity is meant. St. Katherine Cree, or Christchurch, was built on its site on the N. side of Leadenhall St., Lond. The old ch. was taken down in 1628, and the present one built. It is here that the famous "Lion" sermon is preached every 16th October, to commemorate the deliverance of Lord Mayor John Gayer from the paws of a lion in Africa in 1648. In B. & F. Thomas iv. 1, Michael says "This morning a man of mine at St. K. N. told me he met your mistress." The Aunt of Mons. Thomas is the Abbess of St. K. Scenes 4 and 8, Act V. take place in the Abbey of St. K.

KEGYLLEK. A farm in the parish of St. Budock, close to the boundary of the parish of Falmouth, in S. Cornwall. In Cornish M. P. i. 2593, Solomon gives to the Carpenter "Tregenver ha K.," i.e. Tregenver and K.

KENDAL (more fully, KIRKBY-IN-K.). The largest town in Westmoreland, on the E. bank of the Ken or Kent, 241 m. N.W. of Lond. It was the head of a Barony conferred by William the Conqueror on Ivo de Talbois, and on a hill E. of the town are the ruins of the castle of the old Barons. The title Earl of K. has been held by royal and other persons. Henry Momford, Earl of K., is one of the characters in George-a-Greene, but he is a mythical personage. The earldom only dates from 1414, whereas the play takes place in the reign of Edward III. In the 14th cent. Edward III established a number of Flemings in the town, who founded the cloth-weaving industry which has been ever since the staple industry of the place. Specially well known was the coarse green cloth called K. green. It was used for the dress of foresters, archers, etc. In Nobody 378, Nobody says, "If my breeches had as much cloth in them as ever was drawn betwixt K. and Canning St. they were scarce great enough to hold all the wrongs that I must pocket." The Lond. clothiers were chiefly found in Canning, or Canwick, St., and nearly 200 pack-horses were employed in bringing to Lond. the cloth made in K. In H4 A ii. 4, 246, Falstaff tells how "3 misbegotten knaves in K. green" came at his back and let drive at him. "Why," says Prince Hal, "how couldst thou know these men in K. green, when it was so dark thou couldst not see thy hand?" In Death Huntington we are told "all the woods are full of outlaws that in K. green Followed the outlawed Earl of Huntington," i.e. Robin Hood. In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Robin Hood says, "Bateman of K. gave us K. green." In Jonson's Love's Welcome, six Hoods appear who "tell of ancient Robin Hood": the 1st, Green-hood, is "in K. green, As in the forest-colour seen." Laneham, in his Letter 47, tells of a minstrel at the Kenilworth pageant who wore "a side-gown of K. green." In Middleton's Black Book p. 25, the Devil says of a poor wretch: "His hose and doublet being of old K. green, fitly represented a pitched field," the vermin being the corporals! Hall in Satires iv. 6, says of the discontented countryman: "Now doth he only scorn his K. green." One of the clothiers in Deloney's Reading is "Cuthbert of K." Corpus Christi plays were kept up at K. until the reign of James I.

KENILWORTH. See KILLINGWORTH.

KENNINGTON. Dist. in Lond., on the Surrey side of the Thames, opposite the Vauxhall Bridge, and S. of Lambeth. There was a royal palace there up till the time of Henry VII. One of the oldest Masques in England was celebrated at K. in honour of the accession of Richd. II in 1377. 130 men on horseback rode from Newgate through Cheap, then over Lond. Bdge. to K., where they entertained the young King with games and dances. Alleyn, the actor, bought the manorial rights of K. in 1604, and held them for 5 years, when he sold them for nearly twice what he gave for them.

KENSINGTON. Formerly a vill. to the W. of Hyde Park; now a populous suburb of Lond. It was a favourite resort of the citizens who wanted a day's outing in the country. In Oldcastle iii. 2, Acton reports that the rebels are quartered in a dozen villages round Lond., one of which is "Kenzington." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Careless expresses his willingness to escort his aunt to "Paddington, K., or any of the city out-leaps, for a spirit and back again." In his Academy ii. 1, Valentine asks Hannah, "When shall we take coach to K. or Padington, or to some one or other o' the city outleaps, for an afternoon, and hear the cuckoo sing?" In Deloney's Craft ii. 11, we are told of a certain merry company: "They went to K., where they brake their fast and had good sport by tumbling on the green grass."

KENT (Kh. = Kentish, Kn. = Kentishmen). The county in the S.E. of England. It is the natural landing-place for visitors from the Continent, friendly or otherwise. Here disembarked Julius Cæsar between Walmer and Thanet 55 B.C.; here Hengist and Horsa founded the 1st Saxon kingdom in England A.D. 457; here Lewis the Dauphin of France landed in 1216. Augustine and his monks began their missionary campaign in Kent in 597, and Canterbury became the seat of the 1st English Bp.; and the murder there of Thomas à Becket in 1170 gave England her most popular saint, and indirectly one of her greatest poems, the Canterbury Tales. Wat Tyler's insurrection in 1381, and Jack Cade's in 1450, testify to the independence and initiative of the Kh. men; and Sir T. Wyatt began his attack on Q. Mary from Maidstone in 1554. In Middleton's Queenborough ii. 3, Hengist says he will make choice of his ground "About the fruitful flanks of uberous K., A fat and olive soil; there we came in." In K. J. iv. 2, 200, Hubert announces to John the arrival of "a many thousand warlike French That were embattailed and ranked in K.," and in v. 1, 30, the Bastard tells "All K. hath yielded [to the Dauphin]; nothing there holds out But Dover Castle." In Trouble. Reign, Haz., p. 293, a Messenger announces: "There is descried on the coast of K. an hundred sail of ships, which of all men is thought to be the French fleet." In H6 B. iii. 1, 356, York reflects: "I have seduced A headstrong Kh. man, John Cade of Ashford, To make commotion." In iv. 1, 100, the Capt. takes Suffolk prisoner "off the coast of K." and informs him "The commons here in K. are up in arms." In iv. 2, 130, Stafford addresses the rebels as "Rebellious hinds, the filth and scum of K., Marked for the gallows." In iv. 4, 57, the King exhorts Lord Say, "Trust not the Kh. rebels." In iv. 7, 60, Dick asks Lord Say, "What say you of K.?" and Say answers, "Nothing but this; 'tis bona terra mala gens"; and goes on: "K., in the Commentaries Cæsar writ, Is termed the civilest place of all this isle; Sweet is the country because full of riches; The people liberal, valiant, active, wealthy." See Cæsar, De Bello Gallico v. 4. Alexander Iden, "an esquire of K.," kills Cade; and in iv. 10, 78, the dying Cade says, "Tell K. from me, she hath lost her best man." In H6 C. i. 1, 156, Northumberland speaks of the strength of Warwick and the Yorkists in "Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and K.," and in i. 2, 41, York says, "You, Edward, shall unto my lord Cobham, With whom the Kn. will willingly rise. In them I trust; for they are soldiers, Witty, courteous, liberal, full of spirit." In iv. 8, 12, Warwick, who has gone over to the side of the Lancastrians, says, "Thou, son Clarence, Shalt stir up in Suffolk, Norfolk, and in K. The knights and gentlemen to come with thee." In R3 iv. 4, 505, a messenger informs Richd., "In K. the Guildfords are in arms." According to Hall, Chron. 393, "In K. Richd. Guildford and other gentlemen collected a great company of soldiers and openly began war." In Straw i., the Archbp. reports: "The commons now are up in K." The reference is to Wat Tyler's rebellion. In Trag. Richd. II. i. 3, 235, Cheney reports: "The men of K. and Essex do rebel"; and in iv. 3, the High Sheriff of K. appears to protest against the King's exactions. In Wyat, sc. xi, p. 44, Brett says, "Wyat, for rising thus in arms with the Kh. men dangling thus at his tail, is worthy to be hanged." In World Child 168, Manhood swears by "St. Thomas of K.," i.e. Thomas à Becket. In 170 he boasts, "Calais, K., and Cornwall have I conquered clean." The reference is to the victory of Henry VII over the Cornish insurgents on Blackheath in K. in 1497. In Bale's Laws ii., Infidelity swears "by the blessed rood of K." This was the famous rood at Bexley Abbey, called the Rood of Grace. In Phantasie of Idolatries, the author says of it:

"He was made to juggle, His eyes would goggle, He would bend his brows and frown; With his head he would nod Like a proper young god, His shafts would go up and down." It was publicly exposed by Henry VIII's Commissioners in the market-place of Maidstone, and the trick by which it was worked explained. Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchet (Eliz. Pamph., p. 77), tells of "one that had learned of the holy maid of K. to lie in a trance, before he had brought forth his lie." This was Elizabeth Barton, a servant-maid, who became a nun, and uttered revelations when in trances and epileptic convulsions. She was hanged at Tyburn, poor wretch, in 1534.

K. has been a territorial title in the English peerage since 1067. In Lear, Shakespeare introduces an Earl of K. In Span. Trag. i., Hieronimo tells how in the reign of English Richd., Edmund, Earl of K., "came and razed Lisbon walls and took The King of Portingale in fight; for which He after was created D. of York." This is a glorious muddle. In the reign of Richd. II, Edmund, Earl of Cambridge, led an expedition into Portugal in 1381, and was created D. of York in 1385 for his successes in Scotland. The Earl of K. at that time was Thomas Holland. In R2 v. 6, 8, Northumberland says, "I have to Lond. sent The heads of Oxford, Salisbury, Blunt, and K." The Earl of K. was taken at Cirencester, which he was holding for Richard. This was Thomas Holland, who held the title 1397-1400: the son of the last-named Thomas Holland. Edmund, Earl of K., the son of Edward I, is one of the characters in Marlowe's Ed. II. He was executed in 1330 for an alleged plot to restore Edward II, whom Mortimer represented to him as still alive, in order to trap him. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 12, says, "Canute had his portion from the rest, The which he called Canutium, for his hire, Now Cantium, which K. we commonly inquire." Canute was one of the captains in the service of the legendary King Brute.

It was a boast of the Kn. that K. had never been conquered. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Moll says, "The purity of your wench I would fain try, she seems like K. unconquered, And, I believe, as many wiles are in her." Peele, in his Jests, speaks of "the fruitful county of K." as "a climate as yet unconquered." K. is indeed equated to the whole of Christendom beside; and "all K. and Christendom" is a common phrase for all Europe. In Wise Men v. 4, Proberio says to the Usurer, "Is there any man in Christendom or K. that you will trust?" Spenser, in Shep. Calen., September, says, "Sith the Saxon king Never was wolf seen . . . Nor in all K., nor in Christendom." In Jonson's Tub ii. 1, Turfe says, "I love no trains of K. or Christendom, as they say." In Old Meg p. 1, we are told Herefordshire for a morris dance puts down "not only all K., but very near . . . three quarters of Christendom." In Thersites 314, the Hero says, "I will have battle in Wales or in K." In Jonson's Tub i. 3, Pan commends K. above Middlesex, "for there they landed All gentlemen and came in with the Conqueror." Nash, in Lenten, p. 300, says, "William the Conqueror, having heard the proverb of K. and Christendom, thought he had won a country as good as all Christendom when he was enfeoffed of K." In Middleton's Hubbard p. 83, he addresses his visitors, "My honest nest of ploughmen! the only Kings of K." In Respublica v. 6, Avarice says, "I would have brought half K. into Northumberland, and Somersetshire should have raught to Cumberland." Fuller, Church Hist. iii. 11, 14, calls K. "The English land of Goshen."

The great number of travellers through K. from and to Lond. made it notorious for highway robberies. In Hycke, p. 104, Frewyll says, "That rock of Tyborne is so perilous a place, Young gallants dare not venture into Kente": i.e. to repair their fortunes by robbery. In H4 A. ii. 1, 59, the Chamberlain tells Gadshill, "There's a franklin in the wild of K. hath brought 300 marks with him in gold": the idea being that he will be a good subject for Gadshill's operations. The wild of K. means the Weald of K., the dist., formerly covered with forest, between the chalk hills and the border of Sussex. In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 3, one of the parties to a deed is "Master John Blastfield, Esq., of the Wold of K." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i., Falconbridge says, "We do not rise like Tyler, Cade, and Straw, For some common in the wild of K. That's by some greedy cormorant enclosed." Later in the Play, it is predicted that "Chains of gold and plate shall be as plenty As wooden dishes in the wild of K."

The custom of Gavelkind, by which all the male children of the deceased inherited equally, prevailed in K. only. Harrison, in Descript. of England ii. 9, says, "Gavell kind is all the male children equally to inherit, and is continued to this day in K., where it is only to my knowledge retained, and no where else in England." Earle, in Microcos. viii., says of the Younger Brother: "He loves not his country for this unnatural custom [i.e. primogeniture], and would have long since revolted to the Spaniard but for K. only, which he holds in admiration."

K., being a maritime county, had considerable fishing industries. In Locrine ii. 5, Trumpart calls on "the Colliers of Croydon, and rusticks of Royden, and fishers of K." to lament the death of Strumbo. Kh. oysters were specially esteemed. The chief beds are at Queenborough, Rochester, Milton, Faversham, and Whitstable. In Cooke's Greene's Quoique, p. 571, Bubble says that his eyes are closed "as fast as a Kh. oyster." Nash, in Wilton E. 1, tells of one who had "eyes like two Kh. oysters." The Kh. orchards were famous. In Sampson's Vow iv. 2, 163, Mother Prattle says, "I dreamed my husband when he first came a wooing, came i' the likeness of a Kh. twindle pippin." K. supplied a good part of the firewood of Lond. In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 2, Allwit congratulates himself that he has in his backyard "a steeple made up with Kh. faggots." The Kh. girls were famous for their beauty. Drayton, in Dowdabel, says, "Her features all as fresh As is the grass that grows by Dove, And lithe as lass of K." In Dekker's Northward i. 3, Philip says, "The Kh. man loves a wagtail," i.e. a light woman. In Spenser's Shep. Cal., February 74, Cuddie says that the dewlap of his bullock is "as lythe as lass of K."

KENTCHURCH (or KENDER CHURCH). Vill. in Herefordsh., 12 m. S.W. of Hereford, from which John a Kent, the hero of Munday's John Kent, appears to have taken his name. John a Kent's barn and John a Kent's oak are still shown in the neighbourhood. John himself was a sort of Welsh Faust, who lived in the early part of the 15th cent.

KENTISH TOWN. One of the N. suburbs of Lond., lying between Camden Rd. and Haverstock Hill. In the 16th cent. it was a rustic village. In Jonson's Tub, the heroine is the daughter of Tobias Turfe, the High Constable of K. T., and several of the scenes are laid at his house there. Jonson makes him talk a kind of country dialect of the Somerset type. In his Devil i. 1, Satan, mocking the petty exploits of Pug, says, "Some good ribibe [old woman] about K. T. or Hogsdon you would hang now for a witch." Dekker, in Road for Runaways (1613), speaks of K. T. as a vill. by Pancridge (i.e. St. Pancras), and tells a story of some Londoners who took a Sunday walk out there.

KENT STREET. The present Tabard St., the name having been changed in 1877. It runs from St. George's Ch. in the Borough, Southwark, to the Old K. Rd., and until the formation of Gt. Dover St. was the main road from the S. into Lond. "It was ill-built," says Strype (B. iv. 31), "chiefly inhabited by Broom Men and Mumpers." It was an extremely disreputable slum throughout its history. In Greene's Quip, p. 226, he says, "When velvet was worn but in kings' caps, then Conscience was not a broom man in K.-St., but a Courtier." In News from Hell, the Cardinal speaks of "all the whores and thieves that live in Southwark, Bankside, and K.-St." When Harman (Caveat ii.) had his copper stolen, he "gave warning in Southwark, K. St., and Barmesey st., to all the tinkers there dwelling." In Three Lords, Dods., vi. 422, Simplicity asks: "Ladies, which of ye dwelt in K. St.?" In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 1, one of the citizens' wives that come to the Wisewoman to have their fortunes told dwells in K.-st. In Davenant's Plymouth iv. 1, Topsail cries: "What's here? K. st., or Bedlam broke loose?"

KERNESDALE. An invented name for an imaginary place in Ireland, the dale of the Kerns. In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, Knavesby, suggesting to Water-Camlet that he should go to Ireland to escape his wife's tongue, points out on a map "K., admirable feed for cattle."

KEW. A vill. on the Thames in Surrey, 9 m. W. of St. Paul's, Lond., opposite to Brentford. The Palace and Botanical Gardens date only from the time of George III. In Middleton's Mad World iii. 3, Folly-wit says, "You shall go nigh to have a dozen blyth fellows carry me away with a pair of oars, and put in at Putney or shoot in upon the coast of Cue."

KIBDORP PORT. One of the gates of Antwerp on the S.E. of the city. In Larum B. 4, Champaigne says, "Your army is at K. P. you say?" And later (D. 2), Alva says, "Kibdorpe we assign to Lord Romero." The Rue Kipdorp still preserves the name.

KIDCOCKS. A very curious attempt at spelling Chef de Caux, a point 3 m. below Havre, at the mouth of the Seine in France. Henry V dropped anchor off this point in 1415, and immediately proceeded to invest Harfleur. In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 357, the Archbp. of Bruges announces to the King of France that Henry "is already landed at K. in Normandie upon the river of Seine."

KILBORN (or KILBURN). Formerly a vill. in S.W. Hampstead, but now a large suburb of Lond. stretching from Kensal Green to St. John's Wood. In Jonson's Tub i. 1, the self-styled Council of Finsbury has determined to marry Awdry Turfe to "Clay of K., a tough young fellow and a tile-maker."

KILDARE. A county in Leinster, Ireland. In 1316 John FitzGerald was created Earl of K. Gerald, the 8th Earl, was Lord Deputy of Ireland for 33 years, and died in 1513. This is the Earl of K. mentioned in Ford's Warbeck i. 1, as a supporter of Lambert Simnel. He was deprived for a time of his office, but was reappointed in 1495. His son Gerald succeeded him, but was committed to the Tower by Henry VIII and died a prisoner there in 1534. In H8 ii. 1, 41, one of the gentlemen speaks of "K.'s attainder, Then Deputy of Ireland, who removed, Earl Surrey was sent thither." In S. Rowley's

When You C. 2, Brandon states: "Stout Pearce . . . Was by the Earl of K. late put to death." This refers to the 10th Earl, Thomas, who openly revolted on hearing of his father's committal to the Tower, and besieged Dublin. He was subsequently taken by treachery, and he and his 5 uncles were executed at Tyburn in 1537. The 20th Earl was created Marquess of K. and Duke of Leinster in 1761 and 1766; and the titles still remain in the Fitzgerald family.

KILKENNY. A town in Ireland, capital of Co. Kilkenny, 61 m. S.W. of Dublin. In B. & F. Coxcomb ii. 3, Antonio comes in disguised as an Irish footman, and the servant introduces him as "a K. ring." Nobody seems to have found any meaning for this phrase. I would suggest that it is a misprint for "K. rug." Shirley, in Mart. Soldier ii. 3, speaks of "larrones, rugs, and vagabonds": where it seems to mean a fellow in a rough frieze cloak. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 43, tells of the "stubborn Newre whose waters gray By fair K. and Rosseponde board." Bale's Baptyste and Temptation were acted at K. on August 20th, 1553, the day on which Q. Mary was proclaimed.

KILLINGWORTH (now spelt KENILWORTH). A vill. in Warwicksh., between Warwick and Coventry, 5 m. S. of the latter and abt. 15 m. from Stratford-on-Avon. The castle was a residence of the Anglo-Saxon kings, but was destroyed in the Danish wars. It was rebuilt in the reign of Henry I by Geoffrey de Clinton, and was given by his grandson to King John. Simon de Montfort had it for a time, and his forces rallied there after the battle of Evesham, when it was besieged and taken by Henry III. He gave it to his son Edmund. Edward II was imprisoned there before his removal to Berkeley. In Marlowe's Ed. II iv. 6, Leicester says, "Your Majesty must go to K."; and Act V, Sc. 1 takes place there. Leicester tries to comfort the King: "Imagine K. Castle were your court And that you lay for pleasure here a space." Next it came into the hands of John of Gaunt, and Henry IV made it a royal residence, which it continued to be till 1562, when Elizabeth granted it to Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester. In H6 B. iv. 4, 39, on the news of Cade's rebellion Buckingham advises the King to "retire to K. Until a power be raised to put them down." Leicester entertained Elizabeth here with a series of magnificent pageants in 1575. The description of them may be read in Laneham's Letter, or in Scott's Kenilworth. There is little doubt that Shakespeare, then a lad of 11, would be taken by his father, who had recently been Chief Alderman of Stratford, and as a prominent local personage would be likely to receive an invitation to be present, to see this great show; and Oberon's description of the place whence Puck is to fetch the "little western flower" is a reminiscence of one of the pageants (M. N. D. ii. 2, 148-168). Elizabeth is "the fair vestal throned by the west" at whom Cupid shot his darts in vain; and the little western flower on which the bolt of Cupid fell is poor Amy Robsart. Jonson's Owls was presented at K. in 1626; and he says that Capt. Cox, who acts as prelocutor, "was foaled in Q. Elizabeth's time, When the great Earl of Lester In this castle did feast her." He would seem to have taken part in the Hox Tuesday Play which the Q. saw at Coventry at the time of this visit to K.; for Jonson goes on: "Being a little man When the skirmish began 'Twixt the Saxon and the Dane, For thence the story was ta'en, He was not so well seen As he would have been of the Q." The gatehouse of the castle is in perfect condition, and is used as a dwelling house; Caesar's Tower is also well preserved, and there are extensive ruins of the other portions of the Castle.

KIMBOLTON. A town in Hunts., 11 m. W. of Huntingdon and 63 N. of Lond. Its ancient castle, now the seat of the D. of Manchester, was the residence of Catharine of Aragon after her divorce from Henry VIII, and she died there on 8th January, 1536. In H8 iv. 1, 34, one of the gentlemen says of Catharine: "Since [the divorce] she was removed to K., Where she remains now sick." The scene of iv. 2 is laid at K. The Ff. spell it Kymmalton.

KING STREET. Originally ran from Charing Cross, Lond., to the Palace of Westminster: all that is now left of it is a small fragment at the S. end, from Charles St. to St. George St. Though it was the main thoroughfare from the Court of St. James's to Westminster, it was narrow and ill-paved. Here lived Lord Howard of Effingham and the mother of Oliver Cromwell, and according to Jonson, Conversations with Drummond, the poet Spenser died "for lack of bread in K. St." Donne, Satire iv. (1597) 80, says of Westminster Abbey: "The way to it is K.'s st." In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Mrs. Tattle boasts that she has all the news from "the conduits in Westminster; long and round Wool-staple, with K.'s-st. and Canon-Row to boot." Middleton, in his Black Book, p. 25, tells of "black cloth snatched off the rails in K.'s St. at the Q.'s funeral." Glapthorne's Wit was "Printed by Io. Okes for F. C. and are to be sold at his shops in Kings-st. at the sign of the Goat, and in Westminster Hall. 1640." So was Brome's Sparagus in the same year. In Cowley's Cutter i. 6, Worm says that Cutter was "Cromwell's agent for all the taverns between K.'s-st. and the Devil at Temple Bar." In B. & F. Hum. Lieut. iv. 4, Leonatus mentions a K.-st. in the Capital of Greece, in which the scene is laid.

KING'S ARMS. A bookseller's sign in Lond. T. Heywood's Maidenhead was "Printed by Nicholas Okes for John Jackson and Francis Church, and are to be sold at the K. A. in Cheapside. 1634."

KING'S BENCH. An ancient Lond. prison, on the E. side of Borough High St., Southwark, immediately N. of the White Lion prison and some 20 houses S. of the Marshalsea. Layton's Buildings now occupy the site. It was removed in 1755 to the junction of Blackman St. and Newington Causeway. In 1879 it was sold and the site cleared. During the Commonwealth it was known as the Upper Bench Prison. In Skelton's Colin Clout, the judges of the preacher against the prelates cry: "The K. B. or Marshalsea, Have him thither by-and-by." In Hycke, p. 94, Frewyll says, "At the K. b., Sirs, I have you sought." In Straw ii., Newton reports: "They [the rebels] have spoiled all Southwark, broke up the Marshalsea and the K. B." In Eastward ii. 2, Quicksilver advises Sir Petronel, whose creditors have laid to arrest him, "Let 'em take their choice; either the K. B. or the Fleet, or which of the 2 Counters they like best." Taylor, in Works i. 91, says, "The Ocean that Suretyship sails in is the spacious Marshalsea; sometimes she anchors at the K. B., sometimes at the gulph of the Gate-house." In Middleton's Inner Temp. 70, Christmas bequeaths to "my and son, In-and-In, his perpetual lodging in the K. B." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 120, Jane Shore asks: "Have you bestowed our benevolence on the poor prisoners in the common gaol of the White Lion and the King's B.?" In Middleton's Hubbard, p. 79, we are told of "decayed gentlemen's wives whose husbands lie for debt in the K. B." In B. & F. Wit Money, i. 1, Lance, warning his young master against wasting his estate, says, "The K. B. is enclosed, there's no good riding."

KING'S BRIDGE. The gangway leading to the stairs just E. of Westminster Hall from the Palace Yard. There were several of these so-called bridges, which did not cross the river, but were merely approaches to the various landing-stages. In Look about v., Skink, who is being pursued by the watch, says, "At K. B. I durst not enter a boat."

KING'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE. Founded by Henry VI in 1441 under the title of "The Kyng's C. of our Lady and Seynt Nicholas." It stands on the W. side of Trumpington St., between Caius and St. Catherine's. The chapel, the finest example of perpendicular Gothic in the world, was completed in the early part of the reign of Henry VIII, the late King having left a large sum of money for that purpose. The original design of the C. was on a magnificent scale, but it was never fully carried out. Nash, in Lenten, p. 299, speaks of "the imperfect works of K. C. in Cambridge, which have too costly large foundations to be ever finished." Thomas Preston, the author of Cambises, was fellow of K. in 1556. Elizabeth visited Cambridge in 1564, and various entertainments were given. The 1st was a performance of the Aulularia of Plautus on Sunday, August 6th, in K.'s C. Chapel; on Monday a tragedy, Diado, by Edward Halliwell, a Fellow of K., was played in the C.; and on Tuesday Udall's Ezechias in English. In 1608 the performance of a lost play by Phineas Fletcher in K. was the occasion of "foul and great disorder": probably the students disapproved of the play and expressed their feeling with emphasis.

KING'S HEAD. A common tavern sign in Lond. (1) There was a K. H. in New Fish St., the site of which is marked by K. H. Court, Fish St. Hill. In News Barthol. Fair, in the list of Lond. taverns, we have "K. H. in New Fish-st., where roysters do range." In Prodigal ii. 4, Lancelot says to Oliver, "Let's meet at the K. H. in Fish st."

(2) Another K. H. was in Fleet St., near Temple Bar. It used to be identified with the house at the W. corner of Chancery Lane, destroyed in 1799. This, however, was known as the Harrow, and in Hogarth's Burning of the Rumps, the sign of Henry VIII's Head is shown on the S. side of Fleet St., close to Temple Bar, with a Puritan hanging in effigy from it. It was certainly on the N. side of the st., for it was opposite the Queen's Head, which was between the Temple Gates, but probably close to Temple Bar. In Barry's Ram v. 1, Smallshanks says that Throate "hath not a member in his palsy body but is more limber than a K. H. pudding took from the pot half sod." Ram Alley is off Fleet St., so that the Fleet St. K. H. is probably intended. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius' list of taverns begins: "The gentry to the K. H." In Jonson's Magnetic iii. 4, Rut advises Sir Moth, "Have your diet-drink Ever in bottles ready, which must come From the K. H." Probably the Fleet St. tavern is meant in both passages, but it is impossible to be certain. In Middleton's Hubbard, p. 79, we read of "decayed gentlemen's wives whose husbands lying for debt in the K. Bench they go about to make monsters in the K. H. Tavern," i.e. to make cuckolds of their husbands.

(3) In Killigrew's Parson ii. 3, Wanton speaks of "the sign of the K. H. in the butchery." There was a K. H. on the W. side of W. Smithfield.

KINGSTON-ON-HULL. The full name of Hull (q.v.) given to it by Edward I.

KINGSTON-ON-THAMES. A town in Surrey, on the S. bank of the Thames, 12 m. W. of Lond. It is a very ancient town, and many Roman remains have been found there. It is held by many that Cæsar crossed the Thames at this point. From 901 to 978 the English Kings were crowned here on the stone which now stands in the market-place, whither it was removed in 1850 from the Chapel of St. Mary. There was a castle which was taken by Henry III, but has now entirely disappeared. Throughout our period Kingston Bdge. was the first bdge. over the Thames above Lond. In Peele's Ed. I, p. 71, Elinor, after sinking at Charing Cross and coming up at Potter's Hive, says, "I will straight To Kings-town to the Court And there repose me." In Jonson's Tub i. 2, Pan tells how Julius Cæsar crossed the Thames at Hammersmith, "vore either Lond., ay, or K. bdge., I doubt, were kursined." The present stone bdge. was erected in 1827 to replace a wooden one which had been there since at least the 14th cent. In Middleton's Five Gallants iii. 2, Tailby goes to K. to see his mistress and is robbed in Coombe Park on the way. In B. & F. Prize i. 3, Petronius says to Petruchio, who proposes to tame his shrewish daughter, "To-morrow we shall have you look like St. George at K., running a-foot back from the furious dragon." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i., Randall sees Carvegut and Bottom "come prancing down the hill from K." Later Bottom laments that they have missed the man whom they meant to rob: "This was staying in K. with our unlucky hostess that must be dandled and made drunk next her heart." This was probably the hostess of the George. Herrick, in Tears to Thamesis (1647), recalls his pleasant trips up the Thames, "To Richmond, K., and to Hampton Court."

KIRIATHAIM (now KUREIYAT). An ancient town in Moab, on the E. of the Dead Sea, 12 m. N.E. of the mouth of the Arnon. According to Gen. xiv. 5, it was originally a town of the Emims, a legendary giant race. In Milton, S. A. 1081, Harapha draws his descent from a stock of giants "renowned As Og, or Anak, or the Emims old That K. held."

KIRSENDOM. See CHRISTENDOM.

KISHON (now EL-MUKATTA). A river in Palestine, rising in the mtns. of Gilboa, and flowing in a N.W. direction through the plain of Esdraelon, until it reaches the Mediterranean just N. of Mt. Carmel. After rain the fords are difficult and the plain is reduced quickly to a quagmire. Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 37, says, "Do to them . . . as is told Thou didst to Jabin's host, When at the brook of K. old They were repulsed and slain." See Judges v. 19-22.

KNAVES ACRE (otherwise PULTENEY ST.). Lond., a little N. of Piccadilly Circus, and S. of Golden Sq., running from Glasshouse St. to Wardour St. The W. end of it is now Brewer St. Strype describes it as "but narrow, and chiefly inhabited by those that deal in old goods and glass bottles." In Marlowe's Faustus iv. 18, the Clown says, "How, how, knaves-acre! Ay, I thought that was all the land his father left him."

KNIGHTRIDER STREET. Lond., running E. from Addle Hill to Q. Victoria St. The present st. includes Gt. and Little K. Sts. and Old Fish St. Stow derives the name from the knights who rode along it from the Tower to the jousts in Smithfield. In the Stone House in this st. lived the famous Linacre, court physician to Henry VII, and founder of the Royal College of Physicians.

KNIGHTSBRIDGE. A rural dist. near Hyde Park Corner, so called from the stone bdge. which crossed the Westbourn at what is now the Albert Gate of Hyde Park. It was notorious for highway robberies, and its loneliness made it a favourite resort of duellists. The Chapel of the Holy Trinity E. of the Albert Gate marks the site of an old lazar house or hospital. In Shirley's Hyde Park iv. 3, when Lord Bonville insults Venture, Rider says, "Come to K.," sc. to fight it out. In Long Meg ix., we are told how "Harry the ostler . . . would needs to K. a shroving, where they had good cheer and payed frankly."

KNIGHTS' WARD. In the Counters and the Fleet prison, q.v. In Middleton's Chaste Maid v. 4, Yellowhammer says of Sir Walter: "He lies i' th' K.' w." In T. Heywood's F. M. Exch. 24, the Cripple asks: "Didst thou lie in the K. W. or on the Master's side?" In Chapman's Bussy i. 2, 135, Barrisor says jestingly, "Here's a sudden transmigration with D'Ambois—out of the k. w. into the duchess' bed." See also under COUNTER, HOLE, TWOPENNY WARD.

KNOCKERS-HOLE. Vill. in Cornwall. In Brome's City Wit iii. 1, Jane Tryman leaves in her will to the poor of the parish of K.-H. "£10, and £40 towards the reparation of their ch."

KULLAINE. See COLOGNE.

KYMMALTON. See KIMBOLTON.

LABYRINTH. A building said to have been constructed with many winding passages by Dædalus near Gnoosus in Crete for the safe confinement of the Minotaur. Theseus penetrated the L. by the aid of a clue supplied to him by Ariadne and killed the monster. The word came to be applied to any tortuous maze. In H6 A. v. 3, 188, Suffolk soliloquizes: "Suffolk, stay! Thou mayst not wander in that l.; There Minotaurs and ugly treasons lurk." In Venus and Adonis 684, the windings of a hare "Are like a l. to amaze his foes." In Troil. ii. 3, 2, Thersites exclaims, "How now, Thersites! What, lost in the l. of thy fury?" In Milton's Comus 277, when Comus asks, "What chance, good Lady, hath bereft you thus?" she replies, "Dim darkness and this leafy L." In Dekker's Westward iv. 2, Justiniano says, "You swore you would keep me in a l. as Harry kept Rosamond, where the Minotaur, my husband, should not enter." Henry II was said to have kept Rosamund Clifford in a maze or l. at Woodstock, to protect her from the jealousy of his Queen. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B., the Q. says, "There was once a K., Henry the Second, who did keep his Q. Caged up at Woodstock in a l." Spenser, in Ruines Rome ii., says, "Crete will boast the L. now rased." In Webster's Cuckold v. 1, Clare says, "I'll be the clue: To lead you forth this l."

LACEDÆMON (Lian. = Lacedæmonian). Either (1) Sparta itself, or (2) the territory (Laconia) of which Sparta was the capital, i.e. the S.E. province of the Peloponnesus. It was inhabited by the Dorians, who in the 7th cent. B.C. subjugated the neighbouring dist. of Messene. The constitution was fixed by Lycurgus in the 9th cent. B.C., and continued with little change down to the close of its history. In Homer, Menelaus is the King of L., and it was from his Court there that Paris ran away with Helen.

In Ford's Heart, the scene of which is laid at Sparta (i. 2), Amyclas says, "Messene bows her neck To L.'s royalty." This fixes the supposed date of the play to 668 B.C., the year when the 2nd Messenian war came to an end. In iv. 1, Tecnicus exclaims, "O Sparta, O L., double-named, but one In fate!" In Marmion's Companion iii. 5, Dotario says to Emilia, "Bright Helen, I will be thy Paris, And fetch thee, though thou wert at L." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 34, says, "Sir Paris . . . From L. fetched the fairest dame That ever Greece did boast." In Tim. ii. 2, 160, Timon says, "To L. did my land extend." In iii. 5, 60, Alcibiades, pleading for his old friend, says, "His service done At L. and Byzantium Were a sufficient briber for his life." Alcibiades marched into L. at the head of an Athenian force in 419 B.C. In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus relates how Lycurgus went to Delphi, "requiring of the Lacedæmonians that they would observe those laws until his return." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 330, Sacrepant says, "Saluting me by that which I am not, he presageth what I shall be; for so did the Lians, by Agathocles, who of a base potter wore the kingly diadem." Agathocles was a potter who became Tyrant of Syracuse about 317 B.C., but he had nothing to do with the Lians., except in so far as Syracuse was a Dorian colony; and the story seems to be Greene's own invention. In Edwards' Damon x., Eubulus says, "Upon what fickle ground all tyrants do stand Athens and L. can teach you." Lian. is used in the sense of a complaisant woman, with reference to Helen's readiness to desert her husband for Paris. In Middleton's Changeling iii. 3, Lollio says to Isabella, "Come, sweet rogue; kiss me, my little Lian." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. iii. 1, when Fustigo asks Viola, "When shall'st laugh again?" and she replies, "When you will, cousin," he says, "Spoke like a kind Lian." In Marston's Malcontent iii. 3, Mendoza says, "My project is to banish the Duchess, that I might be rid of a cunning Lian." The Lian. boys were taught to steal without being caught, but if caught they were severely punished. In Marmion's Leaguer i. 5, Agurtes says, "Steal like a Lian." See also LACONIA, SPARTA.

LACONIA (= LACEDÆMON, q.v.). In Ford's Heart i. 2, Amyclas, after the conquest of Messene, says, "L. is a monarchy at length." This was in 668 B.C., at the end of the 2nd Messenian war. In Glapthorne's Argalus i. 1, Demagoras boasts, "I, to whose very name Ln. matrons have paid tributary vows." In Chapman's Cæsar iii. 1, 123, Pompey says that the Genius of Rome is not "by land great only, like Lns." The terse method of speech affected by the Spartans gave rise to the word laconic, meaning terse, brief. In B. & F. French Law. v. 1, Cleremont says, "If thou wilt needs know How we are freed, I will discover it, And with laconic brevity." Davenant, in Man's Master ii. 1, says, "This laconic fool makes brevity ridiculous."

LADAMA. See under SAMARIA.

LADON. R. in N. Arcadia, flowing S. into the Alpheius. In Glapthorne's Argalus i. 2, Clitophon says, "Virgin, Pleasing as L. that does coolly flow Through our green meadows." In Milton's Arcades 97, the song begins: "Nymphs and shepherds, dance no more By sandy L.'s lilyed banks." Barnfield, in Affectionate Shepherd (1594) 131, says, "We'll go to L., whose still trickling noise Will lull thee fast asleep amidst thy joys."

LÆTHE. See LETHE.

LAHORE. The capital of the Punjab, in N.W. India, 280 m. N.W. of Delhi, on the Ravi. Its history goes back to the most ancient times, but it came to the zenith of its glory in the 16th cent. under Akhbar (1556-1605), who rebuilt the walls and erected many of its most famous mosques and other buildings. Milton, P. L. xi. 391, mentions amongst the great capitals of the world, "Agra and L. of Great Mogul."

LAMB. A London sign. Used by Veale's bookshop in St. Paul's Churchyard. New Custom was "Imprinted for Abraham Veale dwelling in Paul's Churchyard at the sign of the L. 1573." An edition of Colin Clout was also printed here. "The L. in Lombard St." was the sign of Water-Camlet, the mercer's shop, in Middleton's Quiet Life ii. 2.

LAMBECHIA. See LAMBETH.

LAMBERT HILL. St. in Lond. running N. from Thames St. to the W. end of Old Fish St. It was also called Lambeth H., by which name it is now known. In Yarrington's Two Trag. i. 4, a neighbour says, "Bring the body unto L. H. Where Beech did dwell."

LAMBETH. Dist. on the S. side of the Thames, between Battersea and Southwark. Now densely populated, but in the 16th and 17th cents. it was a low swampy tract of open country, and was known as L. Marsh. The only buildings of any importance were the palaces of the Archbp. of Canterbury and the Bp. of Rochester. The former, L. Palace, stands a little S. of St. Thomas's Hospital, just below L. Bdge. It became the residence of the Archbps. at the beginning of the 13th cent., but nothing of the original building remains. The Chapel, the oldest of the present buildings, was erected by Boniface about 1250. The so-called Lollards Tower was built by Chicheley 1434-1445, and had an image of Thomas à Becket in a niche facing the Thames. The fine Gate-house dates from about 1500. The Hall is due to Juxon, and bears the date 1663. The residential portion was built by Howley 1829-1834. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, the Archbp. of Canterbury entreats the company "To cross to L. and there stay with me." L. Place, the residence of the Bps. of Rochester, stood in what is now Carlisle St. It was built about 1200: one of its last occupants was Bp. Fisher. Henry VIII gave it to the Bps. of Carlisle, and it was thenceforward known as Carlisle House, though none of them ever resided there. It was pulled down in 1827.

The streets known as L. Upper and Lower Marsh preserve the name of L. Marsh and indicate its central point. It was notorious as a haunt of thieves, prostitutes, and other bad characters. Jonson, in Epigram xii., calls Shift "not meanest among squires That haunt Pickthatch, Marsh-L., and Whitefriars." In Fortun. Isles, Westminster Meg "goes to the stew, And turns home merry By L. Ferry." In Alchemist i. 1, Doll mentions the "bawd of L." as one of Subtle's clients. In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Bagnoli says of certain disreputable characters: "They, transported from Lambechia land, Fall anchor at the Stilliard tavern." In Middleton's R. G. v. 2, Greene says, "That L. Joins more mad matches than your 6 wet towns 'Twixt that and Windsor Bdge." In Dekker's Westward iv. 1, Birdlime says, "I'll down to Queenhive, and the watermen which were wont to carry you to L. Marsh shall carry me thither [to Brentford]." In Massinger's Madam v. 2, Luke says of the gentlemen's sons who have turned prentices: "When we look To have our business done at home, they are Abroad in the tennis court, or in Partridge Alley, In L. Marsh, or a cheating ordinary." In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Poppingate says to Artless, the brothel-keeper, "L. Marsh is held a nunnery to your college"; and in iii. 1, Sconce speaks of prostitutes as "maids of L. Marsh." In Field's Weathercock, iv. 2 is laid in L. Fields. It was customary to fire a salute on the L. bank of the river when the Lord Mayor came to Westminster on the day after SS. Simon and Jude to pay his respects to the K. In Sharpam's Fleire iii. 350, Fleire speaks of "the gunners that make 'em fly off with a train at L. when the Mayor and aldermen land at Westminster."

LAMBETH HOUSE. The palace of the Archbp. of Canterbury at Lambeth, q.v. Puritans were often imprisoned there. In Cowley's Cutter iii. 6, Cutter tells of a fifth-Monarchy man, Mr. Feak, who "was prisoner in L.-H."

LANCASHIRE. A county on the N.W. coast of England. In Oldcastle v. 1, Sir John, the highwayman-priest, finding Kent too hot for him, says, "Farewell, Kent; come, for L.": where he would be out of the way. In v. 8, Lord Cobham comes in disguised as a carrier, and the Mayor of St. Albans says, "O, 'tis L. carrier; let them pass." In B. & F. Prize i. 3, Maria vows she would marry Petruccio "Before the best man living or the ablest That e'er leaped out of L.; and they Are right ones." In Dekker's Northward i. 3, Philip says, "The L. man [loves] an egg-pie," i.e. a light woman. Drayton, in Polyolb. xxvii. 68, mentions the L. egg-pie. Markham, in Country Gentleman (1611), says that "your W.-country, Cheshire, and L. dogs" have the greatest mouths and deepest flews. Drayton, in Polyolb. iii. 37, says that the western dogs are "Not heavy as that hound which L. doth breed." L. bagpipes and hornpipes (pipes with a horn bell and mouthpiece) were famous. T. Heywood, in Witches iii. 1, says, "No witchcraft can take hold of a L. bag-pipe." In Dekker's Witch iv. 1, Ann says, "There's a L. hornpipe in my throat; hark, how it tickles it, with doodle, doodle, doodle, doodle." Hornpipe comes to be used of a kind of dance. In his News from Hell, Dekker says, "Lucifer himself danced a L. horn-pipe." In Northward i. 3, Bellamont says, "O Master Mayberry! before your servant to dance a L. horn-pipe!" i.e. to play the fool. Drayton, in Polyolb. xxvii. 22, says that the L. nymphs "For the horn-pipe round do bear away the bell." In Old Meg, p. 1, L. is said to be famous "for Horne-pypes." After the Reformation L. remained a stronghold of Roman Catholicism. In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, Monopoly says, "Catchpoles are as necessary in a city as sumners [i.e. officers of the ecclesiastical courts whose duty was to detect Roman Catholics] in L." In Middleton's Inner Temp. 129, Dr. Almanac says that Fasting Day "would try awhile how well he should be used in L." King James, in Book of Sports (1618), says, "Our County of L. abounded more in Popish Recusants than any county in England."

T. Heywood's Witches was based on an account of the trial and execution of 12 witches in L. in 1612. There was another prosecution of L. witches in 1634, the year in which the play was published. The play was popular, and there are several references to it. In Kirke's Champions i. 1, the Clown says, "Mother, were you not one of the cats that drank up the miller's ale in L. windmills?" In Field's Weathercock v. 2, Nevil says to Sir Abraham, "O thou beyond Lawrence of L.!" He was a noisy clown in the play, which must therefore have been performed before it was printed. In Puritan iii. 5, the Capt. says, "I sent a spirit into Lankshire t'other day to fetch back a knave drover." In Nabbes' Totenham i. 2, one of the tenants says, "He thought it in his conscience she was a L. witch." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Satan, twitting Pug, says, "You would make, I think, An agent to be sent for L. Proper enough." In v. 3, Meercraft asks: "Did you ne'er read, Sir, little Darrel's tricks With the boy of Burton, and the seven in L.?" These were 7 members of the family of one Starkey, for bewitching whom Edmund Hartley was executed at Lancaster in 1597. In Cowley's Cutter iii. 5, Puny asks, "How came you to know all this, my little pretty witch of L.?"

LANCASTER. The county town of Lancashire, on the left bank of the Lune, 7 m. from its mouth, 240 m. N.W. of Lond. The castle dates from Roman days, and the S.W. tower is said to have been built in the reign of Hadrian. It was much damaged in 1322 by Robert Bruce, but was restored by John of Gaunt, who erected the Gateway Tower, and added to the Lungess Tower the turrets which have caused it to be called John of Gaunt's Chair. It is now used as the county gaol. It gave its title to the House of L., which has played such an important part in English history.

The 1st Earl of L. was Edmund Crouchback (i.e. the Crusader), the 2nd son of Henry III, who received the title in 1267. He appears in Peele's Ed. I as the D. of L.; and in i. 1, contributes "Out of the dutchy of rich L. £3000" for Edward's proposed hospital for old soldiers. In x., "Mary, duchess of L.," is mentioned as one of those attending on Q. Elinor, but the context shows that "Mary, Mayoress of Lond." is meant. Edmund of L.'s wives were (1) Aveline; (2) Blanche. His son Thomas succeeded to the title, and was one of the leading opponents of Gaveston in the reign of Edward II. He is one of the characters in Marlowe's Ed. II; in i. 1, Gaveston says, "That Earl of L. do I abhor." In ii. 2, he announces as his device a flying fish with the motto "Undique Mors Est": the allusion being to Gaveston, whose death he has determined on "whether he rise or fall." In ii. 5, he takes part in the arrest of Gaveston. In iii. 3, he is himself captured by the K. and executed at Pontefract. His brother Henry was restored to the earldom at the beginning of the reign of Edward III, and, dying in 1345, was succeeded by his son Henry Wryneck, who served valiantly in the French wars and was made D. of L., the only previous D. in England having been Edward the Black Prince, who was created D. of Cornwall some 14 years before. His 2nd daughter, Blanche, married John of Gaunt, 4th son of Edward III, who was created D. of L. in 1362. In Span. Trag. i., Hieronimo says, "Brave John of Gaunt, the D. of L., With a puissant army came to Spain, And took our K. of Castile prisoner." The 2nd wife of John of Gaunt was Constance, the widow of Pedro the Cruel, and in her right he took the title of K. of Castile, but his attempts to eject Henry of Etramadura from the throne were futile, and he never took him prisoner. He did, however, go to Spain early in the reign of Richd. II, and made a treaty with Henry's son John, by virtue of which his daughter Catherine became Q. of Castile and the ancestress of Isabella of Castile and the succeeding Spanish monarchs until 1700. Through his eldest daughter, Philippa, who married John I of Portugal, he became the ancestor of all the subsequent kings of that country. In 1396 he married his mistress, Catherine Swynford, and his children by her were legitimized under the name of Beaufort, q.v. He was the patron of Wyclif and of Chaucer, whose wife was a sister of Catherine Swynford's. He is one of the characters in R2. In i. 1, the K. addresses him, "Old John of Gaunt, time-honoured L." He is present at Coventry in i. 3, and hears the sentence of banishment pronounced on his son Henry Bolingbroke. In ii. 1, the K. visits him on his death-bed in Ely House, where he died in 1399. He plays a prominent part in Trag. Richd. II. In R2 ii. 3, Henry Bolingbroke returns to claim his father's title: "If that my cousin king be King of England," he says (ii. 3, 124), "It must be granted I am D. of L.," and in 70, he refuses to answer to any other name. In iv. 1, Richd. abdicates and L. is made K. In v. 5, Richard is murdered, exclaiming, "The devil take Henry of L.!" In H4 A. iv. 2, 61, Hotspur recalls "He came but to be D. of L.," and in v. 1, Worcester reminds him, "You swore That you did nothing purpose 'gainst the State, Nor claim no further than your new-fall'n right, The seat of Gaunt, dukedom of L." In H6 B. ii. 2, York claims the throne on the ground that John of Gaunt was the 4th son of Edward III, whereas his ancestor Lionel, D. of Clarence, was the 3rd, and vows that his sword shall be stained "With heart-blood of the house of L." The Prince John of L. whose name occurs frequently in H4 A. & B. was the 3rd son of Henry IV, and was created Earl of Bedford at the accession of Henry V. With the death of Henry VI the male line of L. became extinct. In R3 i. 2, 6, Anne addresses his corpse, "Pale ashes of the house of L.!" In R3 v. 5, 27, Richmond says, "All this divided York and L., O now let Richmond and Elizabeth, The true successors of each royal house, By God's fair ordinance conjoin together!" Henry VII was the great-great-grandson of John of Gaunt through John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset; Elizabeth was the daughter of Edward IV. Jonson, in Ev. Man I., prol., speaks of the Wars of the Roses as "York and L.'s long jars." In T. Heywood's Witches ii. 1, Generous orders Robert, "Take the grey nag and those bottles fill at L. there where you use to fetch it."

LANDAFFE. See LLANDAFF.

LANDERSEY. Town in France in the department of Le Nord, 110 m. N.E. of Paris. In S. Rowley's When you G. 1, Brandon reports: "The Emperor is marching now to L. There to invade the towns of Burgundy." The reference appears to be to the invasion of Burgundy by Charles V in 1544.

LANE, THE. See CHANCERY LANE.

LANERCHY, or LANERGH (now LANER). A vill. in the parish of St. Allen in S. Cornwall. In Cornish M. P. i. 2400, K. Solomon says to the Messenger, "My a re thyugh Bosuene, Lostuthyel, ha L.," i.e. "I will give you Bosuene, Lostwithail, and L."

LANGLEY (now KING'S LANGLEY). A vill. in W. Hertfordshire, abt. 20 m. from Lond., on the Birmingham road. The scene of R2 iii. 4 is laid at the D. of York's palace at L. In Trag. Richd. II ii. 3, 109, the Duchess of Ireland says, "I'll home to Langly with my uncle York."

LANGTON, or LANGDON. A vill. in Essex, 20 m. E. of Lond. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Canby says to young Strowd, "Haste away with the reprieve, take horse at L., and make speed." Strowd objects: "Why, I was robbed too last night myself at L."

LANGUEDOC. A large province in S.E. France, on the Gulf of Lyons, W. of the Rhone. It was so called from the fact that the people used "Oc" as the affirmative, whereas further north they used "Oui," or "Ouil": hence the language was called "Langue d'Oc," and the name was later transferred to the province. In Brome's Sparagus iii. 4, Wat speaks of the wonders which the precious plant Asparagus "hath wrought In Burgundy, Almaïne, Italy, and L., Before the herborists had found the skill To plant it here."

LANKISHIRE. See LANCASHIRE.

LANTCHIDOL. The part of the Indian Ocean between Java and New Guinea. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes speaks of "the oriental plage Of India where raging L. Beats on the regions with his boisterous blows."

LAODICEA. A city in S.W. Phrygia, near the r. Lycus, 100 m. E. of Ephesus. One of the most important cities in Asia Minor in the 1st cents. B.C. and A.D., it is now a heap of ruins. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius says, "L., whose high-reared walls Fair Lyeas washeth with her silver wave, With Tursos, vailed to us her vaunting pride." This was in 42 B.C., when Cassius captured these cities. Lyeas is a misprint for Lycus. In Mason's Mulleasses 1701, Mulleasses asks: "Do you Christians . . . like the Lns. unto Pallas, offer The blood of virgins?" Suidas records that virgins were annually offered in sacrifice to Pallas in Ilion. In Revelation iii. 15, the Lns. are said to be "lukewarm and neither cold nor hot": hence Ln. was used to mean a person who is indifferent in matters of religion. Bacon, in Essay iii., says, "Certain Lns. and lukewarm persons think they may accommodate points of religion by middle ways." Fuller, Church History (1656) i. 3, 2, says, "That the first professors in Christianity were but lukewarm in religion will . . . be easily believed by such who have felt the temper of the English Lns. now-a-days."

LAPANTHÆ (possibly LAPATHUS, spt. on N. coast of Cyprus, is intended; or more likely it is a variant for LEPANTO: certainly "the Lapanthean battle" appears for the battle of Lepanto in Swetnam i. 1). In Thracian i. 2, Tityrus says, "Lovers are like the winds Upon L.'s shore that still are changing." The passage is copied from Greene's Menaphon, where Menaphon says, "As upon the shores of Lapanthe the winds continue never one day in one quarter, so the thoughts of a lover never continue scarce a minute in one passion." Brereton, in article in Mod. Lang. Review Oct. 1906, has given several other similar examples, which prove the dependence of Thracian on Menaphon.

LAPLAND (or LAPPPIA, as Heylyn calls it). The country of the Lapps, in N.W. Europe: the W. portion belonging to Norway and Sweden and the E. to Russia. The Lapps are short of stature, the average height of the men being 5 ft. Their speech is akin to the Finnish. They had a great reputation for skill in magic, especially in the raising of winds. Eden, in Hist. of Travayle (1577), says, "They tie 3 knots on a string hanging at a whip. When they loose one of these they raise tolerable winds; when they loose another the wind is more vehement; but, by loosing the 3rd they raise plain tempests." The men were really the sorcerers, but in England L. witches are more commonly spoken of, and they are described as preternaturally ugly. In Err. iv. 3, 11, Antipholus of Syracuse, bewildered by his adventures in Ephesus, says, "Sure L. sorcerers inhabit here." In Look about xxvii., John says, "3 times, like the northern Laplanders, He backward circled the sacred font, And 9 times backwards said his orisons." In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Sconce says of the inventor of an ointment: "He's reported to have achieved the salve in L. among the witches." In Shirley's Admiral iv. 1, Didimo addresses a supposed witch as "Great Lady of the Laplanders." In his Duke's Mist. ii., Horatio says, "I dare encounter with an army [of witches] out of L." In Habington's Arragon i. 1, we have: "Your Lordship Shall walk as safe as if a L. witch Preserved you shot-free." In T. Heywood's Witches v., we have: "Then to work, my pretty Ls.; pinch here, scratch." In Webster's Cuckold iv. 2, Lessingham says, "I will rather trust The winds which L. witches sell to men." In B. & F. Fair Maid i. iv. 2, the Clown says of Forobosco: "Now for his conjuring, the witches of L. are the devil's chair-women to him, for they will sell a man a wind to some purpose; he sells wind and tells you 40 lies over and over." In T. Heywood's Witches v., after the discovery of the Witches, Bantam says, "I'll out of the country and as soon live in L. as Lancashire hereafter." Dekker, in his Dream (1620), speaks of "The Laplandian witch." Giles Fletcher, in his treatise Of the Russe Commonwealth (1591), says of the Laplanders that "for practice of witchcraft and sorcery they pass all nations in the world." Milton, P. L. ii. 665, compares Sin to "the night hag . . . riding through the air . . . to dance With L. witches." Burton, A. M. i. 2, 1, 2, says, "Nothing so familiar as for witches and sorcerers in L. . . . to sell winds to mariners and cause tempests." In B. & F. Chances v. 3, John says, "Sure his devil Comes out of L., where they sell men wind For dead drink and old doublets." In Middleton's Gypsy iv. 3, Roderigo, looking at the picture of the woman they want him to marry, cries: "Marry a witch! have you fetched a wife for me out of L.?" In Davenant's U. Lovers iv. 1, Heildebrand says, "The nicest maid in Lombardy, strictly compared [with Arthiopa] Looks like a withered L. nurse." W. Rowley, in Search 13, calls the keeper of a bawdy house "an old Laplander." There were also supposed to be giants in L., which is curious, considering the diminutive size of the Lapps. In Marlowe's Faustus i. 125, Valdes promises Faust that the spirits "shall guard us, Like L. giants, trotting by our sides." In Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes speaks of "Giants as big as hugy Polypheme" in Grantland, i.e. Greenland. In Underwoods xvi., Jonson says of Drayton's Mooncalf: "Give me leave to wonder, as to us Thou hadst brought L. or . . . some monster more Than Afric knew."

LARASSA (= EL-ARASCH, or LARASHE). A city on the W. coast of Morocco, near the mouth of the Wad-al-Khos, some 40 m. W. of Alcazar. It was a flourishing port, and was strongly fortified. In Stucley 2506, Stucley says, "We have L. and Morocco, both Strong towns of succour, to retire unto."

LARISSA. An important town in Thessaly, on the S. bank of the Peneius, some 25 m. N. of Pharsalus. It is still a considerable place under the name of Yeniseher. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar says, "The flying Pompey to L. hastes And to Thessalian Tempe shapes his course, Where fair Peneus tumbles up his waves." This was after the battle of Pharsalia. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Tamburlaine says to Zenocrate, "Now rest thee here on fair L. plains."

LATARAN. See JOHN (Saint) LATERAN.

LATIN. Properly an inhabitant of Latium (q.v.), but used as a synonym for Roman. In Fisher's Futinus iii. 5, Belinus says, "Thick lay the Ls., scattered on the shore." The word is used in its proper sense in Kyd's Cornelia iii., where Cicero speaks of "This stately town, so often hazarded Against the Samnites, Sabins, and fierce Ls."

LATIN. Properly the language of Latium (q.v.), but used for the language spoken in ancient Rome, and embodied in its literature. After the break-up of the Empire of the West it formed the basis from which were developed the vernacular languages of Italy, Spain, Portugal, and France. Roumansch (spoken in parts of the Grisons) and, in the main, Roumanian are also based upon it. The classical L., however, continued to be used as the common language of learned men in all the countries of Europe, and it was the chief subject of instruction in the grammar schools. It still remains the language of the services of the Roman Ch., and was employed in diplomacy till the end of the 17th cent. Every educated man in England in the 16th cent. knew some L., and the L. phrases which are frequently introduced into the plays of this period show that at any rate a large part of the audience knew enough of the language to appreciate their meaning. Jonson, in the verses prefixed to the 1st folio of Shakespeare, says that Shakespeare had "small L. and less Greek," but he certainly learned his L. grammar at the Stratford Grammar School, and could probably read Ovid and Vergil, Plautus and Terence for himself. In M. W. W. iv. 1, the catechism on his L. declensions to which little William Page is subjected is doubtless a transcript from little William Shakespeare's experience. Slender knew little L., for in the same play (i. 1, 185), when Bardolph says, "Conclusions passed the careires," he says, "Ay, you spake in L. then." Quickly, of course, knew nothing of it: in iv. 1, 51, she suggests that "Hang-hog [i.e. hunc, hoc] is L. for bacon." But there were no grammar schools for girls, and only a few ladies, like Lady Jane Grey, were in any sense scholars. In L. L. L., Costard has evidently got some smattering of L. at the school of Holofernes; in iii. 1, 140, he reflects:

"Remuneration! O, that's the L. word for 3 farthings"; and in v. i. 83, he says, "Thou hast it ad dunghill, at the fingers' ends, as they say": to which the schoolmaster, "I smell false L.: dunghill for unguem." In Merch. i. 2, 75, Portia, who could evidently talk L. herself, complains that the young English lord "hath neither L., French, nor Italian." In Shrew i. 2, 29, when Hortensio uses an Italian sentence, Grumio says, "Nay, 'tis no matter, Sir, what he 'leges in L." In ii. 1, 81, Lucentio is presented as a student from Rheims, "cunning in Greek, L., and other languages." In H6 B. iv. 7, 63, when Lord Say speaks of Kent as "bona terra, mala gens," Cade shouts, "Away with him! he speaks L." Even Cade knew L. when he heard it. In H8 iii. 1, 42, Q. Katharine protests against Wolsey's using L. in his address to her: "O good my lord, no L.": not that she did not understand it, but that her poor friends and attendants may hear her wrongs. In Killigrew's Parson iii. 2, Careless says that "they say there are other gentlemen poets without land or L.; this was not ordinary." In iv. 2, the Capt. says, "I be take me to my constable's staff, till you subscribe, 'Cedunt arma togæ'; and if it be false L., parson, you must pardon that too." In Goosecap i. 4, Fowlwether says that women are as subtle "as the L. dialect, where the nominative case and the verb, the substantive and the adjective, the verb and the adverb, stand as far asunder as if they were perfect strangers one to another." In i. 4, Momford says, "There is not one woman amongst one thousand but will speak false L. and break Priscian's head." In Alimony ii. 2, Hoy says of the lady: "For the L., she makes herself as familiar with the breach of Priscian's head as if it were her husband's." In Mankind, p. 8, New Guise says, "Ay, ay; your body is full of English-L.," i.e. dog-L. In Fulwell's Like, Dods., iii. 328, Hance the Dutchman says, "Ich le-learned some La-la-latin when Ich was a la-la-lad." In Chapman's Hum. Day ii., Lernet says, "Now must I say, 'Lupus est in fabula,' for these L. ends are part of a gentleman and a good scholar." In Preface to Tarlton's Purgatory, the author says of Tarlton: "He was only superficially seen in learning, having no more but a bare insight into the L. tongue." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Mrs. Openwork says, "I had my L. tongue and a spice of the French before I came to him." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 548, Bubble says, "It is needful a gentleman should speak L. sometimes, is it not, Gervase?" "O, very graceful, Sir," is the reply. On p. 565, Staines says, "I can speak Greek and L. as promptly as my own natural language." In Randolph's Muses iii. 4, Eiron, whilst denying any knowledge of other languages, says, "Indeed the L. I was whipt into." In W. Rowley's Match. Mid. i. 1, we find young Tim, an ignorant fellow, acquainted with several L. words. In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bilioso says to the fool, "I'll salute her in L.," Passarello retorts, "O, your fool can understand no L.," to which Bilioso replies, "Aye, but your lady can."

One of the objects of the Reformers was to substitute English for L. in the services of the Roman Church. In Bale's Laws iii., Avarice says, "Let them have their creed and service all in L. that a L. belief may make a L. soul." There is probably a pun here on the word latten, which means a base metal like brass. The same pun occurs in Goosecap v., where Sir Gyles says, "There was a l. candlestick here, and that had the languages, I am sure." In Wit Woman 1550, the Priest says, "A Priest without L. may turn him to the belfry and make him a sexton." In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Monsieur says, "Illiterate men say L. prayers by rote, Not knowing what they say." In As iii. 2, 337, Rosalind says that Time ambles "with a priest that lacks L.; for he sleeps easily because he cannot study." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 1, Trapolin says, "I'd to Rome and turn friar if I had any L. in me." In B. & F. Elder B. ii. 1, Miramont scoffs at "Thy dapper clerk, larded with ends of L., And he no more than custom of his office." From its ecclesiastical use L. was supposed to be specially efficacious in dealing with the devil and other spirits. In Webster's White Devil ii. 3, the Conjuror says that certain impostors in his profession would "make men think the devil were fast and loose, With speaking fustian L." The conjuration in Marlowe's Faustus iii. is in L. In Ham. i. 1, 42, when the Ghost appears, Marcellus says, "Thou art a scholar; speak to it, Horatio," i.e. in L. In B. & F. Nightwalker ii. 1, Toby says, "Let's call the butler up, for he speaks L., and that will daunt the devil." In Ret. Pernass. ii. 4, Academico says, "This honest man could never abide this popish tongue of Latine." L. was used in legal documents. In H5 v. 2, 369, Exeter quotes from the treaty: "Thus in L., 'Præclarissimus filius noster Henricus, rex Angliæ, et hæres Franciæ.'" In Tourneur's Revenger iv. 2, Vendice says, "There are old men that are so poisoned with the affectation of law-words that their common talk is nothing but Barbary-L.," i.e. the barbarous L. of the Law. In B. & F. Philaster v. 3, Dion says of the merchants: "They know no language but that gibberish they prattle to their parcels, unless it be the goatish L. they write in their bonds": where goatish means Gothic, barbarous. When Chaucer's Somnour was drunk, "Than wolde he speke no word but Latyn" (C. T. Prol. 638). In T. Heywood's Witches i. 1, Whetstone quotes a few L. tags and Shakstone thinks "he's piece of a scholar."—"What," says Arthur, "because he hath read a little scrivener's L.?" In Cowley's Riddle i. 1, Callidora says that Law is of no use "but to undo men and the L. tongue." Good wine was said to make a man talk L., i.e. gabble unintelligibly. In Nabbes' Bride i. 4, Rhenish says of his wine: "There's that will make the crookedest hornier in the lane speak L. with the Beadle of Vinmers hall." Medical men use L. in their prescriptions to-day. In Ibid. v. 4, the Servant introduces "Mr. Plaster, the learned surgeon, that speaks nothing but L., because either he would not be understood or not contradicted." In Cowley's Cutter i. 4, Jolly says, "He . . . spoke false L., which becomes a Doctor worse than a beating." In Prologue to Tomkis' Albumazar, written to be played at Cambridge, we have "L. is our mother-tongue," i.e. in the University. L. is used as a general term for language. In Kirke's Champions i. 1, the Clown says, "A soldier's L. for the lie is the stab."

LATIUM. A dist. in ancient Italy, stretching along the coast of the Tyrrhenian Sea from the Tiber to Campania, and from the sea to the Apennines. Here Æneas was said to have landed and founded Alba Longa, the mother city of Rome. L. was naturally the 1st part of Italy to become subject to Rome; and it is hence used as equivalent to the imperial city. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Antony swears "by the gods that brought the brave Trojan to old L." In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Cæsar says, "Had Britain nursed but such another champion [as Nennius] L. might have trembled with contrary fates." In Kyd's Cornelia i., Chor., the song ends: "If Peace descend not soon, L. will be destroyed." In May's Agrippina iii. 209, Seneca says, "Now armies are afoot To stain with Latian blood Phillipi plains." The reference is to the battle of Philippi in which Octavian defeated Brutus and Cassius. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 42, says of Æneas: "At last in L. he did arrive."

LATMOS (generally in the Latin form, LATMUS). A mtn. near the W. coast of Asia Minor in Caria, at the head of the Latmic Gulf, near Miletus. It is noted in mythology as the place where the Moon came down to meet her lover Endymion. In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 6, Hylacus says, "So may Endymion snort on Latmian bed." In Thracian i. 2, Palæmon speaks of "jolly swains Such as was Luna's love on Latmus Hill." In Shirley's Riches ii., the Courtier says, "Thus looked the Moon when she went to the mountain L. to visit her Endymion." In B. & F. Valentinian iv. 4, Maximus will erect a pyre for Æcius "which will be more and greater Than green Olympus, Ida, or old Latmus Can feed with cedar." In Massinger's Actor ii. 1, Cæsar says, "On L. Hill Fair-haired Calliope on her ivory lute Sung Ceres' praises." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 2, Frederick, in his mad fit, says, "Set me upon Mt. Lathmos, where I may see and contemplate the beauty of my adored Diana." In B. & F. Maid's Trag. i. 2, Night says to Cynthia, "Or, if thou woo't, then call thine own Endymion From the sweet flowery bed he lies upon On Latmus' top." Weelkes, in Morley's Triumphs of Oriana (1601), begins his madrigal, "As Vesta was from L. hill descending." E.D., in trans. of Theocritus' Idyl xxi., says, "The Moon . . . came to L. grove, where with the dainty lad she lay." In B. & F. Shepherdess i. 3, Cloe tells how Phœbe conveyed Endymion "to the steep head of old Latmus."

LAURENCE (SAINT) PORT. Spoken of as one of the gates of Verona. I have not been able to find any such gate. In Davenant's U. Lovers i. 1, Brusco says, "Away! Let's to St. Laurence Port." The scene of the play is Verona.

LAURENTUM. An ancient town in Latium, near the coast, between Ostia and Lavinium, 16m. S.W. of Rome. It was represented as the ancient capital of Latium and the residence of K. Latinus. In Richards' Misogonus, the Prologue states, "Whilom there in L. dwelt a gentleman."

LAURETTA. See LORETTO.

LAVINIA (either a misprint for LAVINIAN or a mistake for LAVINIUM). An ancient town in Latium, 1 m. from the sea-coast and 17 m. S. of Rome. It was said to have been founded by Æneas on his arrival in Italy, and named by him after his wife L., daughter of K. Latinus. To the last its Penates were regarded with peculiar reverence by the Romans as those of their mother-city. In Marlowe's Dido iii., Venus says of Æneas: "His armed soul, already on the sea, Darts forth her light to L.'s shore." Probably we should read "unto" and "Ln." In Act v. 1, Æneas says, "Now will I haste unto Ln. shore."

LAWER COUNTRIES. See LOW COUNTRIES. In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, the Capt. says he was never so cozened "since I came out of the L. C."

LAWRENCE LANE. A narrow st. in Lond. running N. from Cheapside, W. of King St., to Gresham St., formerly Cateaton St. It was named from the Ch. of St. L. Jewry at its N. end. Here was the well-known Bosom's, or Blossom's, Inn, q.v. It was the way from Cheapside to the Guildhall before King St. was opened out in 1667. In Middleton's Triumphs of Truth, the direction for the procession is: "It goes on from the Standard till it comes to St. L. L. end." In the Triumph of King Charles (1641), "They all entered the city at Moorgate; from which place to Bishopsgate, and so through Cornhill, to St. L.'s L. end in Cheapside."

LAWRENCE (SAINT) JEWRY. A ch. in Lond. at the corner of Gresham St. and King St. It was so called from the number of Jews that lived in the neighbourhood. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and rebuilt by Wren in the Corinthian style with a tower and short spire. It was the most costly of his city churches. Sir T. More delivered a series of lectures in the old ch., to which "resorted all the chief learned of the City of Lond." Here Sir Rd. Gresham was buried. "Robert Wombewell, vicar of St. Laurence in the J.," was one of the Commissioners who tried Sir John Oldcastle. In More v. 4, Sir Thomas, at his execution, reminds the Sheriff, "You were a patient auditor of mine when I read the Divinity Lecture at St. Laurances."

LAWRENCE (SAINT) POULTNEY (now POUNTNEY). A ch. in Lond. at the corner of Candlewick St. and L. P. Lane. It was called after Sir John P., Mayor of Lond. in the reign of Edward III, who built a chantry chapel in the ch., and in his mansion adjoining founded the College of Corpus Christi. Latimer was at one time priest of St. L. P. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, the flames bursting out first in the steeple, and was not rebuilt. In H8 i. 2, 153, the Surveyor says, "The D. [of Suffolk] being at the Rose within the parish St. L. P., did of me demand What was the speech among the Londoners Concerning the French journey." The Crypt of the Rose still remains between Duck's Foot Lane and St. L. P. Hill. In Middleton's Aries, it is stated, "Sir J. P. founded a College in the parish of St. L. P. by Candlewick St."

LAXFIELD. A vill. in Suffolk, near the source of the Blythe, 6 m. N. of Framlingham. In Greene's Friar x. 7, Lambert, one of the suitors for Margaret's hand, says, "In L. here my land and living lies"; and in 41, Serlsby, another of her suitors, says, "L. here is mine, Of ancient rent £700 a year."

LAYTON BUSSARD. See LEIGHTON-BUZZARD.

LAZARETTO. The quarantine station at Venice, on a small island near the city, founded in 1403. It was the first quarantine station in Europe. In Fynes Moryson's Map, the old L. is shown on an island S.E. of San Giorgio, and the new one on an island N.E. of the city. In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick has a scheme for ascertaining by present demonstration whether any ship from Soria or the Levant is guilty of the plague; "and where they use To lie out 40, 50 days sometimes, About the L. for their trial, I'll save that charge . . . and in an hour clear the doubt." According to Fynes Moryson i. 1, 74, all travellers from the East had to present a Bolletion della Sanita, or be shut up in the L. 40 days.

LEADENHALL. Originally a mansion belonging to Sir Hugh Nevill, standing at the intersection of Gracechurch St. and Cornhill at the S.E. corner. It came into the possession of the City of Lond. during the 14th cent. It was used sometimes as a Court of Justice, and once, in 1326, the Commons met there. The wholesale poultry market was held in the Carfax, or meeting of the 4 sts., just opposite, where stood a conduit with 4 spouts. In 1445 Simon Eyres erected on its site a hall for a granary, with a chapel on the E. dedicated to the Holy Trinity: it was taken down in 1822. It was roofed with lead, which according to one legend was dug up in making the foundations. During the 16th cent. it became a market for meat, poultry, wool, vegetables, leather, cutlery, and other commodities. It was burnt down in the Gt. Fire, but speedily rebuilt. In 1730 it was largely rebuilt again, and in 1812 many of the older parts, including the chapel, were removed. The present market was commenced in 1881. In Three Lords, Dods., vi. 412, Dissimulation says, "Once in a month I stole in o' th' market-day to L. and about." Greene, in Quip (Harl. Misc. v. 411), says, "Did you not grease the sealers of L. thoroughly in the fiste [i.e. bribe them] they would never be sealed but turned away." The sealers were the inspectors who certified to the quality of hides and leather by affixing a seal to them. In Dekker's Shoemaker's v. 5, the King says to Simon Eyre, "That new building Which at thy cost in Cornhill is erected, Shall take a name from us; we'll have it called The L., because, in digging, You found the lead that covereth the same." In More iii. 1, Doll says that but for Master More "We would have locked us up in L. And there been burnt to ashes with the roof." In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, when Alvaro asks, "What do ye call dis street?" Heigham informs him, "Why, L., Could you not see the 4 spouts as you came along?" The st. from the corner, running E. to Aldgate, was, and is, called L. St., and originally L. had an opening into it, though it now opens into Gracechurch St. only. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv. 2, Sim arranges with Randall to meet Moll "just at the great crossway, by the Nag's Head Tavern at L.," and Randall interrupts: "Was high, high pump there as hur turn into Grace's St.?"—"There's the very place," says Sim. In Shirley's Honor ii. 1, Phantasm promises to transmute "dull L. to gold." Greene, in Quip, speaks of leather being sold there; and Gosson, in Players confuted (1581), says, "This argument cuts like a L. knife, where, if one pour on steel with a ladle, another comes and wipes it off with a feather." The Groundwork of Cony-catching was "Printed at Lond. by John Danter for William Barley, and are to be sold at his shop at the upper end of Gracious st. over against L. 1592." Straw was published at the same place in 1593. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i. 1, Falconbridge, the rebel, says, "At L. we'll sell pearls by the peck As now the mealmen use to sell their meal."

LEATHERHEAD. Vill. in Surrey on the Mole, 18 m. S.W. of London. Elynour Rummyn, the heroine of Skelton's poem, "dwelt in Sothray, In a certain stead, Beside Lederhede." It is stated by Dalloway that the house still exists near the bridge.

LEBANON. Mtn. range in N. Syria. It has been famous from the earliest times for its noble cedars and pines. The cedars were used in the building of the temple of Solomon, and are often referred to in the O.T. In Locrine i. 1, the dying Brutus compares himself to "a lusty cedar worn with years That far abroad her dainty odour throws 'Mongst all the daughters of proud L." In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, Byron says of his trial: "Like a cedar on Mount L. I grew and made my judges show like box-trees." In Greene's Friar viii., Prince Edward promises Margaret that she shall wanton on the waves "in frigates Topt with the lofty firs of L." In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, Remilia speaks of "the mustering breath of Æolus That overturns the pines of Libanon." In Dekker's Babylon i. 1, the Empress speaks of "cedars Uprising from the breast of Lybanus." In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 1, David, being told that his son must die, exclaims: "Wither, ye cedar trees of L." In Mason's Mulleasses 1734, the hero speaks of "curled cedars . . . on Syrian Lybanus." Milton, P.L. i.

447, says, "Thammuz came next behind, Whose annual wound in L. allured The Syrian damsels to lament his fate." Thammuz, the Greek Adonis, was said to have been killed by a boar in L., and annual festivals were held in his honour at Antioch.

LEE, or LEA. River in England, rising in Beds. and flowing S. between Middlesex and Essex into the Thames at Blackwall. In Locrine iv. 3, Locrine tells of a secret chamber he has built for Estrild "Nigh Deurolitum by the pleasant L. Where brackish Thamiz slides with silver streams." Deurolitum is Romford, which is not actually on the L., but a few miles E. of it. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 29, speaks of "The wanton L., that oft doth lose his way." In his Ruines of Time 135, he speaks of the Thames sliding "in silver channel, down along the L." Milton, in Vac. Ex. 97, calls it "sedgy L." Drayton, in Odes (1594) xxxii. 12, says, "The old L. brags of the Danish blood." The reference is to Alfred's defeat of the Danes on the L. A.D. 896.

LEE (probably LEIGH is intended). A town in Essex on the N. bank of the Thames estuary, near its mouth. In Webster's Cuckold ii. 4, Woodroff says, "I should by promise see the sea to-morrow As low [i.e. as far south] as L. or Margate."

LEEDS. City in Yorks., on the Aire, 185 m. N. of Lond. It was a Roman settlement, and formerly possessed a castle on Mill Hill, built by Ilbert de Laci in the reign of William I. In Downfall Huntingdon iii. 2, Robin Hood says, "Sharpe of L. sharp arrows for us made"; and later the Prior says, "We'll frolic with the nuns of L."

LEENE. A tributary of the Trent, flowing into it about 1 m. beyond Nottingham. In Sampson's Vow iii. 2, 55, we are told how Cratch was condemned by Abolt Cabbidge to "cool his proud flesh in the L. for making insurrection on the High-day," i.e. Sunday. In v. i. 71, Ball says, "See, Joshua is entered; one cup of brisk Orleance Makes him i' th' temper he was when he leaped into L."

LEG. A common hosiers' and bootsellers' sign in Lond. There was also a Leg Tavern in King St., Westminster. In H4 B. ii. 4, 271, Falstaff says that the Prince loves Poin because "he wears his boots very smooth like unto the sign of the Leg." We find the same sign at Foy. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. ii. 1, Clem says, "My father was a baker; [he dwelt] in the next crooked st. at the sign of the Leg."

LEGHORN, or LIVORNO. A port on the Ligurian Sea, on the W. coast of Italy, 160 m. N.W. of Rome. In 1421 it came under the dominion of Florence, and by the encouragement of the Medici rose to be one of the most important mercantile cities of Italy. Its original name was Ligorno, whence the Hobson-Jobson Leghorn. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, the elder Palatine says sarcastically to the younger, "Why, sure you have no factors, Sir, in Delph, L., Aleppo, or the Venetian isles." In T. Heywood's Captives v. 1, Thomas says, "His last letters were dated from Leagahorne." In Ford's 'Tis Pity ii. 2, Hippolita charges Soranzo with having caused her to counsel her husband "To undertake a voyage to Ligorine," on which he died. In his Fancies i. 1, Troilo says, "Well he merited The intendments o'er the gallies at L." In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 40), the Chorus informs us "Sir Thomas is come unto the Streights of Gibraltar, then to Legorne." In Day's Law Tricks i. 1, Polymetis speaks of a temple "decked With all the relics and the choicest gems Marcellis, Pisa, or Ligorine could yield." In Cockayne's Trapolin iv. 1, Mattemores says,

"The butcher doth very well deserve to be sent into the galleys at Ligorn," i.e. as a prisoner.

LEICESTER (pronounced and often spelt LESTER). The county-town of Leicestersh., on the Soar, 97 m. N.W. of Lond. It was a British town and the site of a Roman station called Ratae, or Ratiscon. Two of the gateways and part of the Hall of the old castle are still standing. The earldom was at first in the Beaumont family; it then passed to the Montforts, and Simon, the Great Earl, conferred lustre on the title. Robert Dudley was created Earl of L. by Elizabeth in 1563. The present Earl holds the title in descent from Thomas William Coke, created 1837. In the Abbey adjacent to the old ch. of St. Margaret, Wolsey died and was buried. Richard III passed a night here (at the Blue Boar Inn in High-cross St.) on his way to Bosworth, and was buried in the Franciscan convent near the present St. Martin's Ch., though the local legend maintains that his body was thrown off Bow Bridge into the Soar. In Bristowe, one of the Lords who return with Richd. from the Crusades is the Earl of L.: this was the gallant Robert of L., who took the command in Rouen in the absence of the K. and drove back the forces of Philip of France, who had treacherously invaded Normandy. There is an Earl of L. in Davenport's Matilda; he is opposed to the K., and in i. 1, is branded by Oxford as "imperious Leister." This was Simon de Montfort, the father of the Gt. Earl. The great Simon is mentioned in Chapman's Alphonsus i. 2, 204, where Bohemia suggests that Richd. of Cornwall should "hie him home to help the k. his brother Against the Earl of L. and the barons." The date of the scene is 1257, before the struggle between Henry III and the Barons had begun. In Peele's Ed. I, p. 31, David of Wales says, "Might I see the star of L.'s loins, It were enough to darken and obscure This Edward's glory." This was the Lady Elinor, daughter of Simon de Montfort, who on her way from France to marry Llewellyn of Wales was captured by Edward and detained at the English Court. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Lancaster says, "4 Earldoms have I besides Lancaster: Derby, Salisbury, Lincoln, L." This was Thomas of Lancaster, who was created Earl of L. in 1301. His brother Henry succeeded him in 1324, and perpetuated his memory by founding in L. a hospital for old men in 1330. It was called Trinity Hospital, and still remains. In Jonson's Owls, presented at Kenilworth, Capt. Cox says of his hobby-horse: "He was foaled in Q. Elizabeth's time When the great Earl of Lester In this castle did feast her." This was Robert Dudley (see KILLINGWORTH). In R3 v. 2, 12, Richmond says of Richd.: "This foul swine Lies now even in the centre of this isle Near to the town of L." In v. 5, 10, Derby announces that young George Stanley is "safe in L. town." In True Trag., p. 116, Stanley tells Richmond, "The K. is now come to Lester, and means to-morrow to bid thee battle in Bosworth." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the curiosities of England "K. Richd.'s bed-sted i' Leyster." In H8 iv. 2, 16, Griffith relates to the Q., of Wolsey: "At last, with easy roads he came to L., Lodged in the Abbey," and there died.

LEICESTERSHIRE. A county in the centre of England. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 234, "Lester-shere" is one of the counties granted by the K. to Greene. In H6 C. iv. 8, 15, Warwick sends Montagu to Buckingham, Northampton, and L., where "thou shalt find Men well inclined to hear what thou commandest." In Middleton's Trick to Catch ii. 1, when Lucre hears that Wit-good is "a L. gentleman," he says, "A simple country fellow, I'll work it out of him."

LEIGHTON-BUZZARD. A town in Bedfordsh., 18 m. S.W. of Bedford, and 5 W. of Hockliffe. It has a fine old market-cross. In Trag. Richd. II iii. 3, 53, the Bailiff of Dunstable informs Nimble, "His name is Cowetayle, a rich grazier, and dwells here hard by, at Layton-Bussard." In Merlin iii. 4, 127, the Clown says, "Our standing-house is at Hocklye i' th' Hole and Layton-b." A buzzard is often used for a foolish person, and the Clown means that his ancestors were thieves and block-heads.

LEIPSIC. The most important commercial city in Saxony, 65 m. N.W. of Dresden and 90 m. S.W. of Berlin. The University was founded in 1409, and was the largest in Germany until quite recent years, when Berlin outstripped it in numbers. It is a centre of the book-trade. In Jonson's Staple iii. 1, one of the items of sensational intelligence is "They write from Libtzig The art of drawing farts out of dead bodies Is by the brotherhood of the Rosie Cross Produced unto perfection." In 1614, 11 years before the production of this play, the fabulous Society of the Rosy Cross was introduced to the world in a pamphlet published at Cassel; it was really an elaborate joke, but it was taken seriously, and a great controversy raged on the subject for many years. Cassel is 120 m. W. of L., and the L. scholars were involved in the discussion of the alleged powers of the Rosicrucians. Dallington, in Method of Travel (1598), says that for those who wish to learn German "Lipsick is the best" place to visit.

LEITH (since 1920 a part of the city of Edinburgh). Formerly an independent burgh on the Firth of Forth, it was besieged by the English in 1560, and recovered from the French, who had held it since 1549 in the interest of Mary of Guise. The siege of L. forms the historical background of Sampson's Vow.

LEMNOS (Ln. = Lemnian), now STALIMENE. An island in the N. of the Ægean, abt. 40 m. W. of the mouth of the Hellespont. Its volcanic character is perhaps the origin of the legend that when Hephaestus (Vulcan), the god of fire, was thrown from heaven by Zeus he fell on the island of L. and was picked up and cared for by its inhabitants. In Thersites 196, when the hero wants a suit of armour made for him by Vulcan he says, "I would have some help Of L. and Ithalia": Ithalia being another name for L., or more probably here for Elba, q.v. In Alimony ii. 5, Tilly-vally speaks of "Vulcan's smutted look, Blackened with Ln. sea-coal." Jonson says, in his Execration upon Vulcan, "No marle the clowns of L. took thee up; For none but smiths would have made thee a god." In Massinger's Virgin iii. 1, Dorothea, deriding the ancient gods, says, "The Ln. smith sweats at the forge for hire." Hence Ln. is used of alchemists. In Jonson's Mercury, Mercury says, "I will stand close up, anywhere, to escape this polt-footed philosopher, old Smug here of L., and his smoky family." Vulcan was lamed by his fall: hence polt-footed. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 1, Caesar asks, "What Ln. chain shackles our mounting eagle?" i.e. forged of iron, as by Vulcan. In Lyly's Sapho iv. 4, Vulcan sings, "My shag-haired Cyclops, come, Let's ply our Ln. hammers lustily." In T. Heywood's S. Age ii., Hercules speaks of "The best Vulcanian armour L. yields." In his B. Age v., Vulcan says, "I fell down from the moon into L. isle, where I still live." In Middleton's Tennis 227, Pallas says, "'Tis Pallas calls, thy daughter, Jupiter, Ta'en from thee by the Ln. Mulciber." Mulciber, or Vulcan, broke open the head of Jupiter with his sledgehammer, when Pallas sprang forth from it in full armour. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 5, 4, says that the girdle of Florimell was made by Vulcan for Venus, "And wrought in Lemno with unquenched fire." Milton, P. L. i. 746, tells how Mulciber (Vulcan) "Dropt from the zenith, like a falling star, On L., the Ægean isle." Barnes, in Parthenophil, Canzon xv. 1, says, "Vulcan in L. isle Did golden shafts compile For Cupid's bow." Vulcan made an invisible net in which he caught his wife, Venus, along with Mars, and so exposed them to the mockery of the gods. Zouche, in his Dove (1613), speaks of Mars and Venus hanging "in Ln. net."

LEMSTER, LEMPSTER, or LEMNSTER (now spelt LEOMINSTER). A town in Herefordsh. on the Lugg, 12 m. N. of Hereford. It was famous for the quality of its wool. Drayton, in Polyolb. vii. 145, says that the L. wool "seems to overmatch The golden Phrygian fell," and adds: "Where lives the man so dull . . . To whom did never sound the name of L. ore?" L. ore is the usual name for L. wool: the origin of the word is doubtful, but it seems to have left a trace of itself in Orleton, a vill. 8 m. N. of L. In Greene's Friar x. 61, Serlsby says his flocks yield forth "fleeces stapled with such wool As L. cannot yield more finer stuff." In Skelton's Elynour Rumming iii., we read that some of the ale-wife's customers pay her with "a bag full Of good L. wool." In Jonson's Wales, the Chorus sings: "But then the ore of L., By Got, is never a sempster, That, when he is spun, e'er did Yet match him with her thrif." Herrick, in Oberon's Palace (1647), speaks of a bank of moss "far more Soft than the finest L. ore." In Drayton's Dowsabel, the skin of that maiden is "as soft as L. wool." Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 3, 142, says, "L. justly boasteth of the sheep's wool . . . with which no part of Europe can compare, excepting Apulia and Tarentum." He also praises "the bread of L."

LENINGBERGE. See LUNINGBERGE.

LEO, CASTEL DI SAN. A fortress in Italy, near the coast of the Adriatic, 18 m. S.W. of Rimini and 120 m. S.E. of Mantua. In Massinger's Lover ii. 4, Gonzaga, D. of Mantua, finding that Mantua is going to be taken by the Florentines, says to Uberti, "Raise new forces And meet me at St. L.'s fort."

LEON. A dist. in N.W. Spain. It was one of the kingdoms which sprang up in the 10th cent. after the withdrawal of the Saracens, the 1st K. being Ordoño (1013). It was ultimately united to Castile in 1230. In Devonshire v. 1, Henrico says, "The K. of Spain's 7 kingdoms, Galicia, Navarre, the 2 Castiles, L., Aragon, Valentia, Granada, and Portugal to make up 8." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. A. 202, Philip and Mary are proclaimed "K. and Q. of Naples, Cicilia, L., and Aragon."

LEONARD, SAINT, CHAPEL OF. The shrine and tomb of St. L. were at Corbigny, near Autun, to which his body was removed from its original tomb at St. L.-des-bois in 887. He died during the last quarter of the 6th cent. In J. Heywood's Pardoner 206, the Pardoner appeals for money for "the holy chapel of sweet St. Leonarde Which late by fire was destroyed and marred."

LEONARD'S (SAINT). The parish ch. of Shoreditch at the corner of High St. and Hackney Rd. The old ch., with its square tower and fine peal of bells, was taken down in 1736, and the present one built on its site. The Theatre and Curtain were in the neighbourhood, and many actors were buried at the ch., amongst them Will Somers, the fool of Henry VIII; Richard Tarleton; James Burbage and his son Richard Burbage; Gabriel Spencer, who was killed in a duel by Ben Jonson; William Sly; and Richard Cowley. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii. 1, the Clown says, when he starts from Lond. for Yorkshire, "I will cry, and every town between Shoreditch ch. and York bidge. shall bear me witness."

LEPANTO (the ancient NAUPACTUS). A port on the N. shore of the Gulf of Corinth, some 20 m. from its entrance, at the head of the Bay of Lepanto. It belonged to the Venetians in the Middle Ages, but was taken by Bajazet II in 1499. The bay was the scene of one of the most famous seafights in the 16th cent., when the united Papal, Spanish, and Venetian forces destroyed the naval power of the Turks on 7th Oct., 1571. In Jonson's Cynthia iv. 1, Philautia says that Amorphus "looks like the Venetian trumpeter in the battle of L. in the gallery yonder": a painting or tapestry of the battle is meant. In Randolph's Muses iii. 4, Eiron says, "The last valour shewn in Christendom was in L." Alazon mistakes L. for the name of a man, and Eiron explains, "L. was no man, Sir, but the place made famous by the so-much mentioned battle betwixt the Turks and Christians." In Alimony iii. 1, the Citizen says, "Never was fleet better prepared since the battle of L." In Davenant's Siege i. 1, Ariotto says, "I saw Piracdo do good service at the battle of L." In his Courtier iv. 1, Giotto says, "Perhaps in a skirmish at L. some Turk circumcised you with his scimitar." In Swetnam i. 1, the Capt. tells of the death of Lorenzo "In the Lepanthean battle not long since"; and in i. 3, Iago speaks of "That still memorable battle of L." In Nabbes' Unfort. Mother ii. 1, Amanda says that "on my maiden-head [is] an oath of great antiquity; the cavaliers used it before the battle of L." In Glapthorne's Privilege i. 1, Trivulci says to Doria, "Thy father returned from the slaughter of Haly Bassa at L." In Webster's Law Case iv. 2, when Contilupo says that Romelio was born "in anno '71, my Lord"; Crispiano says, "Very well, '71; the battle of L. was fought in it." Lodge, in Wits Miserie (1596), makes Lying say that "in the battle of L. he only gave Don John de Austria encouragement to charge afresh after the wind turned." Nash, in Lenten, p. 310, describes the scene at the herring-fair at Yarmouth as "a confused stirring to and fro of a L.-like host of unfatigable flood-bickerers and foam-curbbers."

LEPHER. See SEPPER.

LERMA. City in Spain in Old Castile, on the S. bank of the Arlanza, 25 m. due S. of Burgos. It possesses a fine old palace built by the Cardinal-D. of Lerma, one of the leading figures in Gil Blas. A lost play of Henry Shirley's, registered in 1653, was entitled The Spanish Duke of Lerma.

LERNA. A marshy dist. at the head of the Argolic Gulf in the Peloponnesus, about 5 m. S. of Argos. It was the haunt of the many-headed Hydra slain by Herakles, the blood of which was a deadly poison. In Yarrington's Two Trag., Truth, as Epilogue, says, "Our play . . . must encounter with a greater foe Than great Alcides [i.e. Herakles] slew in L. lake." In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 3, Cassius says, "Their envy, Like the Lernæan adder, faster grows The more 'tis pruned." The legend told that for every head that Herakles cut off 2 sprouted from the Hydra's neck. In the old Timon v. 2, Timon says to Laches, "If thou wilt follow me, then change thy shape Into a Hydra that's in L. bred." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 4, Bajazeth prays: "Winged snakes of L., cast your stings, And leave your venoms in this tyrant's dish." In Chapman's Bussy iii. 1, Bussy says to the D. of Anjou, "Your foul body is a Lernæan fen Of all the maladies breeding in all men." In B. & F. Friends iv. 1, M. Tullius says of Armanus: "O see the spring from whence comes all my woe, Whose flattering bubbles show like crystal streams, But I have found 'em full of Lernæan poison." In Richards' Messallina v. 2604, Messallina, dying, says, "A dim black fog raised from the Lernæan fen Obscures my sight." In Kyd's Cornelia ii., Cornelia says, "Would Death had steeped his dart in L.'s blood!" Note that Lernæan is pronounced with the accent on the 1st syllable. In Tiberius 1696, Julia asks, of the orchard of Tiberius: "What, doth the smoke of L. lurk thereby?" where smoke is an obvious misprint for snake. In B. & F. Maid's Trag. iv. 1, Evadne says, "I do present myself the foulest creature, Most poisonous, dangerous, and despised of men L. e'er bred, or Nilus." Spenser, F. Q. i. 7, 17, speaks of "That renowned snake Which great Alcides in Stremona slew Long fostered in the filth of L. lake." But the Strymon, if that is what he means by Stremona, is nowhere near L. In Mason's Mulleasses 2329, Borgias cries: "Up from the dark, earth's exhalations, Thicker than L.'s foggy mists, and hide me."

LERNESUS, or LYRNESUS. A town in Mysia, some 10 m. S.E. of Adramyttium. One of the 12 Trojan towns taken by Achilles. In T. Heywood's Iron Age A. v., Ulysses claims all the conquests of Achilles as virtually his own: "'Twas I sacked Thebes, Chriscis, and Scylla, with L. walls."

LESBONA. See LISBON.

LESBOS (Ln. = Lesbian). Island off the N. W. coast of Asia Minor, just opposite to the Gulf of Adramyttium, abt. 7 m. from the mainland. Its chief town was Mytilene. It is chiefly famous for its school of Lyric Poetry, adorned by the names of Leches, Arion of Methymna, Alcaeus, and, above all, Sappho. The dist. around Methymna produced the highly esteemed wine which Horace, Od. i. 17, 21, describes as "innocens," i.e. wholesome. In Lyly's Maid's Meta. iv. 1, 7, Aramantus says, "Sometime I was a prince of L. Isle." Chapman's Cæsar v. takes place partly at L., "compassed in with the Ægean Sea That doth divide Europe from Asia." In B. & F. False One i. 1, Labienus tells how, after Pharsalia, Pompey, "taking horse with some few of his friends, he came to L." Of course, he went to L. by sea, taking ship at the mouth of the Peneus. Milton, Lyc. 63, tells of Orpheus: "His gory visage down the stream was sent, Down the swift Hebrus to the Ln. shore." This was after the Thracian women had torn him to pieces. His head drifted over the sea to L. and was buried there.

In Nero iv. 7, Petronius says, "The old Anacreon crowned with smiling flowers, And amorous Sappho on her Ln. lute, Beauty's sweet scars and Cupid's godhead sing." In B. & F. Corinth ii. 4, when Crates calls for wine, the vintner asks, "Chios or L., Greek?" In their Bonduca i. 2, Petillius complains that the soldiers will be satisfied with nothing but "wine from L." In Cartwright's Slave iii. 1, a song occurs about "This Ln. wine which, with its sparkling streams, Casts glories round our faces." In Davenant's Rutland (Works iii. 205), Diogenes speaks of "pleasant vapours of Ln. wine." In Histrio iv. 107, Vourcher says, "The law shall stand like to a waxen nose Or Ln. rule, on whose uncertainty Our certain ground shall stand invincible." The Ln. rule was a carpenter's rule made of lead, which could be bent round an angle (see Aristotle Eth. Nic. v. 10, 7). In Greville's Mustapha, Chor. i., the Bashas call laws

"These Ln. rules . . . Giving Right narrow, Will transcendent bounds." According to Lyly's Midas, Midas tried to annex it to his kingdom, but in vain. In iv. 2, Coryn says, "He that fishes for L. must have such a wooden net as all the trees in Phrygia will not serve to make," i.e. a powerful fleet. In v. 3, Mydas says, "I perceive that L. Will not be touched by gold, by force it cannot." L. here stands for England, and Midas for Philip II of Spain. In Randolph's Muses iii. 3, Colax says, "The Ln. lions in their noble rage Will prey on bulls or mate the unicorn." I suspect Ln. is a misprint for Libyan. There are no lions in L. Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit. p. 74, refers to "the widow of L. which changed all her old gold for new glass." No source has been found for this story.

LESTER-SHIRE. See LEICESTERSHIRE.

LESTRIGON. The country of the Læstrygonians, a fabulous race of giants mentioned in Homer, Od. x. 80. Their supposed abode was in Sicily, and later writers fixed it as near Leontini. In Lochrine i. 1, 105, Brutus says, "From Græcia through the boisterous Hellespont We came unto the fields of L. Whereas our brother Corineus was." The route from Greece to Sicily by way of the Hellespont is amusing.

LETHE (more properly the river of L., i.e. forgetfulness). A mythical river in the infernal regions, the drinking of the water of which produced forgetfulness. In Ham. i. 5, 33, the Ghost says to Hamlet, "Duller shouldst thou be than the fat weed That roots itself in ease on L. wharf, Wouldst thou not stir in this." In Wilson's Cobler 677, Charon says that to accommodate the crowds that are now coming to hell, "Cocytus, L., Phlegeton, shall all be digged into Styx." In T. Heywood's Gold. Age v., Epil., it is announced: "Pluto's made Emperor of the ghosts below, Commanding hell, where Styx and L. flow." In Lochrine iii. 6, 15, Humber invokes "You fearful dogs that in black Læthe howl": where Læthe means simply Hell. Milton, P. L. ii. 583, makes "L., the river of oblivion," one of the rivers of Hell, but separate altogether from the 4 rivers, Styx, Acheron, Cocytus, and Phlegiton. In 604, he makes it the boundary between the hot and the cold regions of Hell; the spirits of the damned "ferry over this Lan. sound" to get from one to the other. W. Smith, in Chloris (1596) xxxvii. 12, says, "My sad soul . . . seems as a ghost to Styx and L. flying." In Mason's Mulleasses 1933, Ferrara says, "Drink L. freely, for thou art revenged." In Philotus 123, Flavius conjures the spirits "By L., Stix, and Acherone."

Hence it is used for oblivion. In Tw. N. iv. 1, 66, Sebastian, after his interview with Olivia, says, "Let fancy still my sense in L. steep." In H4 B. v. 2, 72, Henry V, referring to his committal to prison by the Chief Justice, says, "May this be washed in L. and forgotten?" In R3 iv. 4, 250, Richd. says he will give all he has to Elizabeth's children, "So in the L. of thy angry soul Thou drown the sad remembrance of those wrongs Which thou supposest I have done to thee." In Ant. ii. 7, 114, Antony says, "Come, let's all take hands, Till that the conquering wine hath steeped our sense In soft and delicate L." In Selinus 1810, Baiazet, invoking Night, says, "Henceforth thy mantle in black L. steep And clothe the world in darkness infernal." In B. & F. Sea Voyage ii. 1, Aminta says, "Your goodness is the L. In which I drown your injuries." In T. Heywood's Iron Age ii., we have "The proudest nation that great Asia nursed Is now extinct in L."

In Gismond of Salerno ii., the Chorus says, "The flood of L. cannot wash out thy fame." From L. is formed an adjective: lethied, or leathy. In Ant. ii. 1, 27, Pompey prays that "sleep and feeding may prorogue his [Antony's] honour Even till a Lethied dullness." Marston, in Insatiate iv., says, "A devil has drowned thy soul In leathy faculties." L. is also used as a translation of the Lat. letum = death. In J. C. iii. 1, 206, Antony says to the corpse of Caesar, "Here thy hunters stand, Signed in thy spoil and crimsoned in thy L." Lodge, in Phyllis (1593) x. 3, says of Swans: "When they feel themselves near L.'s brim They sing their fatal dirge." Wilson apparently thought that Lethæ, as he spells it, was the plural of Letha, for in his Inconstant i. 2, Aramant says, "She's a sea of nectar To which the Lethæ of my cares do run And lose themselves for ever."

LEUCADIA. An island, about the same size and shape as the Isle of Man, lying off the coast of Acarnania in the Adriatic Sea. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1933, Lucretia says, "Who shall the Ln. sisters' beauty cite?" The note explains that the Leucades, who were ravished by Castor and Pollux, are intended. They were Phœbe and Hylæira, and were the daughters of Leucippus. But they had nothing to do with L.: apparently the name Leucippus suggested the epithet Ln. Barnes, in Parthenophil, Elegy ix., says, "Let me . . . fling myself . . . Into the deep waves of the Ln. god," i.e. into the sea near L.

LEVANT. Originally used for the East in general: then specifically for the E. of the Mediterranean and the countries and islands there. In Fisher's Fuimus v. 6, Cæsar speaks of "Rome's empire whose command encloses The whole L." In Selimus 46, Baiazet says, "The Persian Sophi, mighty Ismael, Took the L. clean away from me," where it is spelt and pronounced Levan-te. This was Ismail I (1499-1524). In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 4, Valentine says, "Fright me the kingdom with a sharp prognostication that shall scour them like L. taffaties," i.e. silk fabrics from the East, which were very thin and glossy. Dekker, in Wonderful Year (1603), says, "Tailors with their shears would have cut the seas, like L. taffaty, and sailed to the W. Indies for no worse stuff to make hose and doublets of than beaten gold." In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick has a scheme for determining whether there is plague on any ship "newly arrived from any suspected part of all the L."

LEVITE. A member of the Israelitish tribe of Levi, which was set apart for priestly functions. Langland, in Piers B. xii. 115, says, "Archa Dei, in the old lawe Ls. it kepten." In Scot. Presb. i. 2, Dipwell says, "Like to that river through which once Ls. did bear the holy ark, New River flows" (see Joshua iii. 8). Hence it is used for a clergyman, and particularly for a private chaplain. Glapthorne, in Wit iv., says, "There shall a little L. meet you, and give you to the lawful bed," i.e. marry you to your lover. In B. & F. Scornful iv. 1, Abigail says of Sir Roger, the Chaplain: "My little L. hath forsaken me." Hall, in Phariseism (1608), p. 42, says, "They [the Jews] paid to their Ls., your Ls. must pay to you; your cures must be purchased, your tithes abated or compounded for."

LEWSOME (= LEWISHAM). A vill. in Kent, 6 m. S.E. of Lond., of which it is now a suburb. Here lived Sir L. Spurcock, one of the characters in the Prodigal. In i. 2, he says to Cyvet, "Please you come to L. To my poor house, you shall be kindly welcome." Many of the following scenes are laid there.

LEYDEN, or LEYTE. A city in Holland 20 m. S.W. of Amsterdam. It took a prominent part in the War of Liberation in the 16th and 17th cents. Its famous university was founded in 1575. In Shirley's Fair One iii. 4, Aimwell says to Manly, who is disguised as a physician, "Doctor! Art a Parisian, a Paduan, or a L. doctor?" In Larum A. 3, Danila announces, "From Leyte doth Julian de Romero bring 500 foot." In Barnavelt iii. 5, Grotius says to Hogerbeets, "Back you then to L." In v. 2, the hangmen of Harlem, L., and Utrecht throw dice to decide which of them shall behead Barnavelt.

LEYMSTER (= LEINSTER). The S.E. province of Ireland. In Jonson's Irish, the Masquers say, "We be Irish men of Connough, L., Ulster, Munster."

LIBANON. See LEBANON.

LIBBARD'S HEAD (i.e. LEOPARD'S HEAD). A sign in Lombard St., Lond. In H4 B. ii. 1, 30, Quickly says of Falstaff: "He is indited to dinner to the Lubber's H. in Lumbert St., to Master Smooth's the silkman." Lubber's is Quickly's mistake for L.

LIBURNIA. A dist. on the E. coast of the Adriatic, N. of Illyricum: now Croatia. The Ln. galleys with their one large lateen sail were adopted by the Romans for naval war, and supplanted the galleys with high bulwarks which they had previously used. Ln. slaves were specially valued for their size and strength, and were used as Lecticarii, or litter-bearers, at Rome in the early Empire. In Jonson's Sejanus v. 8, Arruntius apostrophises Sanquinius, "Get thee Ln. porters, thou gross fool, To bear thy obsequious fatness." In Massinger's Actor i. 1, Latinus speaks of "A litter borne by 8 Ln. slaves" at Rome.

LIBYA. The general name among the ancients for N. Africa from Egypt to the Atlantic. In Marlowe's Dido i., Carthage is called "The kingly seat of S. L.," i.e. L. S. of Europe. In iii., Dido asks: "Am not I Q. of L.?" In Chettle's Hoffman, l. 1, Martha says, "Dido, being driven into a Libyan cave, was there enticed by Æneas." In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Vergil reads from his Æneid: "Meanwhile, the bruit and fame [of Dido's love for Æneas] Through all the greatest Ln. towns is gone." Cf. Æn. iv. 173: "Extemplo Libyæ magnas it fama per urbes." The garden of the Hesperides was supposed to be in the west of L., and Hercules, who brought away the golden apples thence, is called the Ln. Hercules. In Greene's Friar ix. 95, Bungay conjures up the tree of the Hesperides, and then says, "Jove's bastard son, thou Ln. Hercules, Pull off the sprigs from off the Hesperian tree." In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5558, Argus says, "Methinks I look like Ln. Hercules Leading the dog of Hell." In Sampson's Vow iv. 1, 34, Clifton speaks of "the Libian Hercules." In B. & F. Hum. Lieut. iv. 3, the lines occur in a song: "Omphale this spell put in When she made the Ln. spin," i.e. Hercules. The shrine of Jupiter Ammon, or Amun, was in the Ln. desert, 12 days' journey from Memphis. In May's Agrippina iv. 474, Petronius speaks of "Ln. Ammon's farthest woods." Milton, in P. L. iv. 277, identifies Jupiter Ammon with "Ln. Jove," and both with "old Cham," the son of Noah. In Nativity Ode 203, he says that at the birth of our Lord "The Libyc Hammon shrinks his horn." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 1, Discord says, "Coal-black Libians shall manure the ground In thy defence," i.e. Pompey's. After the death of Pompeius, his sons went to Africa and were defeated there at Thapsus by Cæsar. In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 2, Laberius says,

"A Roman never daunted was with looks, Else had not Samartanes and Ln. bugbears Been captive led in chains." In Ant. iii. 6, 69, Cæsar mentions "Bocchus, k. of L." amongst the allies of Antony. In this Shakespeare follows Plutarch, but Bocchus, who was K. of Mauritania, was faithful to Octavian, whilst Bogud, his brother, went over to Antony. Milton, P. L. i. 355, referring to the conquest of N. Africa by the Vandals, says that they "spread Beneath Gibraltar to the Ln. sands." In W. T. v. 1, 157, Florizel pretends that Perdita "came from L.," and was daughter of the warlike Smalus, K. of L.

L. was hot and sandy, and the Syrtes, or quicksands, of the coast were a well-known terror to sailors. In Troil. i. 3, 328, Nestor speaks of the brains of Achilles being "as barren as banks of L." In the old Shrew, Haz., p. 534, the D. says, "This angry sword [should] hew thee smaller than the Libian sands." Milton, P. L. xii. 635, speaks of "vapour as the Ln. air adust." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 5, Cornelia says, "Not Libian quicksands shall this union part." In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Monsieur says, "Not so the sea raves on the Ln. sands As Fortune swings about the restless state Of virtue." L. was famous for its lions: the lions of the Atlas ranges are the fiercest of their kind. In the old Timon iv. 2, Timon prays: "Thou, Nature . . . me transform into a dire serpent Or griesly lion, such a one as yet Ne'er L. or Africa hath seen." In Massinger's New Way v. 1, Overreach exclaims, "Like a Ln. lion in the toils, My fury cannot reach the coward hunters." In Jonson's Catiline v. 6, Petreius reports that Catiline "ran . . . Into our battle, like a Ln. lion upon his hunters, scornful of our weapons." In his Epigram on Inigo Jones, he says, "The Ln. lion hunts no butterflies." In Val. Welsh iv. 7, Caradoc says of himself: "Caradoc fought like a Ln. lion." In Davenant's Plymouth ii. 1, Seawit says, sarcastically, "Who hath chased my little Ln. lion thus into a foam?" In T. Heywood's Gold. Age iii., Saturn, exhorted to be patient, cries: "Command the Libian lions abstinence!" In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 2, 20, the Nuntius says of Pompey: "as in L. an aged lion, Urged from his peaceful covert, fears the light . . . so Pompey." Linche, in Diella (1596) xxi. 11, says, "So fierce a lion L. never bred." In Brandon's Octavia 1032, Octavia says, "No fierce Hyrcanian forest doth possess So wild a tiger, nor no Ln. coast": which is quite true, as there are no tigers in Africa. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 2, 22, speaks of "a bear and tiger being met In cruel fight on Lybicke ocean wide," i.e. on the shores of the Ln. Ocean. In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cassius says, "The Ln. bears Devour the bodies of our citizens." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 8, 17, describes a knight riding "a Ln. steed," i.e. an Arab horse or Barbary. In May's Agrippina iii. 333, Montanus asks, "Will it be lawful to eat Ln. mushrooms And British oysters without being cited Before the censor?" In iv. 368, Petronius mentions "Ln. purple-wings" amongst Roman table luxuries. The bird called Porphyrio, or the Purple Gallinule, is meant.

LICHFIELD. Episcopal city in Staffs., 115 m. N.W. of Lond. Its cathedral, dating from the 12th and 13th cents., is of extreme beauty. In True Trag., Haz., p. 113, Richmond says, "Therefore let us towards Aderstoe amain . . . From thence towards L. we will march next day." Atherstone and L. are both on Old Watling St. L. is about 20 m. W. of Bosworth, where Richmond defeated Richd. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 49, the Tanner of Tamworth tells us that he gave his daughter Nell "a half year's schooling at L.;" and later he suggests to the disguised K. that he should bind himself "to a shoemaker in Liechfield." L. is abt. 5 m. from Tamworth.

LICORIS. Another name for Mt. Parnassus, the highest peak of which is still called Lykeri by the inhabitants. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iv. 214, Timon recalls how, at the flood of Deucalion, "Scarce was one skiff saved on L. mt."

LIDIA. See LYDIA.

LIECHENSTEIN. The smallest of the old German principalities, abt. 15 m. long and on an average 5 broad: on the right bank of the Rhine, abt. 20 m. S. of the E. end of Lake Constance, between Switzerland and the Tyrol. The Princes belong to the Este family. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Fitton tells of a letter from D. Maximilian of Bavaria to the Baron "of L., Lord Paul, I think."

LIGORNE. See LEGHORN.

LIGURIA. The dist. in N.W. Italy N. of the Gulf of Genoa, and extending thence to the Alps. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar boasts: "Proud Tiber and Ln. Poe, Bear my name's glory to the Ocean main." The headwaters of the Po are in L. Amber was found in L., to which Lyly refers in Euphues. Anat. Wit. p. 109: "The firestone in L., though it be quenched with milk, yet again it is kindled with water." Cf. Erasmus, Similia 600 B.

LILIBY (= LILYBÆUM). The promontory, now Cape Boco, at the extreme W. point of Sicily. Near it was the famous city of Lilybæum, now Marsala, which played an important part in the Punic wars, and continued all through the Middle Ages to be one of the most prominent cities of the island. In T. Heywood's S. Age iii., Pluto directs that Typhon should be buried under Sicily: "Upon his left spacious Pachinne lies, And on his legs the land of L."

LILLE. The former capital of Flanders, now capital of the French Department of Le Nord, 125 m. N. of Paris. It was chiefly engaged in the spinning of flax and the manufacture of various textile fabrics. In Lodge's Wits Miserie (1596), the Usurer is described as wearing a jacket of "Lisle program of the worst."

LIMBO. Properly the ablative of Limbus, generally used in the phrase "in limbo," but used also as a nominative. It means a region on the outskirts of Hell, divided into 2 parts: "Limbus patrum," where the saints of the O.T. were detained till our Lord descended into Hades to release them, and "limbus infantum," where unbaptized infants were bestowed. In York M. P. xxxvii. 198, when our Lord has "harrowed Hell," it is said: "What thanne, is lymbus lorne, allas!" The same phrase occurs in the Towneley M. P. xxv. 213. T. Heywood, in I. K. M. (Works i. 221), says, "I am freed from l., to be sent to hell." It is commonly used as a synonym for hell. In All's v. 3, 261, Parolles reports of Bertram: "He was mad for her [Diana] and talked of Satan and of L. and of Furies, and I know not what." In Tit. iii. 1, 149, Titus says, "O what a sympathy of woe is this, As far from help as L. is from bliss." In Hughes's Misfort. Arth. i. 1, Gorois speaks of "channels black of L. lake." In Brome's Covent G. v. 1, Crossewill says, "My daughter is resolutely bent to be an ape-leader in L.," i.e. to die unmarried. To lead apes in hell was the proverbial doom of old maids. In Trag. Richd. II i. 2, 8, Tressilian says of the Carmelite Friar, who has failed to poison the King's Uncles: "A deeper hell than l. patrum hold him!" In Greene's

Alphonsus ii. 2, 594, Lælius says, "This same martial knight . . . lent our k. then such a friendly blow As that his gasping soul to Lyombo went." In Locrine iii. 6, 51, Humber rants about "burning sulphur of the L-lake." In Kirke's Champions i. 1, Tarpax, the devil, calls his mistress Calib "Q. of Limbony." In Beguiled 1992, Dis is called "The Prince of L. lake."

It is also used for prison. In Err. iv. 2, 32, Dromio says his master "is in Tartar l., worse than hell." In H8 v. 4, 67, the porter says of the unruly crowd: "I'll have some of 'em in L. Patrum." In Never too Late (1590), 56, Greene says, "If coin want, then either to L. or else clap up a commodity." In Day's Gulls i. 3, Dametus says, "Such another word and I'll send you to l. instantly." Milton, P. L. iii. 495, invents a new L., "The Paradise of Fools," which he places on the outer shell of the stellar universe, beyond the Primum Mobile "o'er the backside of the World far off." To be in "l. patrum" is used in the sense of to be drunk. In B. & F. Captain iv. 2, the boy says, "All the rest . . . are in l. patrum Where they lie sod in sack."

LIMBOURG. A province in N.E. Belgium. In Tuke's Five Hours ii. 1, Don Antonio tells, "Some horse were sent from the army, under my command, to cover the L. frontiers, much exposed to the enemies' inroads." The date appears to be about 1572. L. was one of the Spanish provinces.

LIMEHOUSE. A dist. on the N. of the Thames, between Wapping and Poplar, opposite to Cuckold's Haven. It got its name from the Lime-kilns, which have been there for the last 6 cents. at least. In Dekker's Edmonton iii. 1, Cuddy threatens the dog, "I'll throw you in at L. in some tanner's pit or other." It was, and is, the theatre of a large shipping trade, and riverside industries are extensively carried on. In Tarlton's Jests, it is said that "at low fall, the watermen get afraid of the cross-cables by the L." In Launching, it is said: "The E. Indian gates stand open wide to entertain the needy and the poor; Lyme house speaks their liberality." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, when Sir Gosling proposes to go on an excursion to Blackwall or L., Judith declines: "every room there," she says, "smells too much of tar." Like all waterside places, its morality was of a low order. In Middleton's Quiet Life ii. 1, Knavesby says, "We will be married again, wife; which some say is the only supersedeas about L. to remove cuckoldry." In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, Compass, talking of the birth of children, says, "It varies again by that time you come at Wapping, Radcliff, L., and here with us at Blackwall, our children come uncertainly": the reason being the absence of the husbands on voyages. In ii. 3, he mentions L. and Shadwell as amongst "the suburbs of Lond.": where suburb is used in its common sense of a haunt of immoral women. In H8 v. 4, 63, the porter says of the young fellows who had been throwing stones at his man: "These are the youths that thunder at a playhouse and fight for bitten apples; that no audience, but the tribulation of Tower Hill, or the limbs of L., their dear brothers, are able to endure." The words "tribulation" and "dear brothers" suggest a hit at the Puritans, but it is hard to see the relevance of such names to a Puritan meeting. I am rather disposed to think that these were 2 gangs of young hooligans which infested Tower Hill and L. respectively, and were known by these titles, just as in Melbourne we have "pushes" of larrikins, called after the localities they infest—the Bourke St. push, the Collingwood push, etc. An audience composed of these fellows would welcome a disturbance.

LIME STREET. In Lond., running at the back of Leadenhall market from Fenchurch St. to Leadenhall St. It escaped the Gt. Fire, and the house numbered 46 had a pair of folding doors dated 1631. It was pulled down in 1875. In S. Rowley's When You D. 2, the Cobler speaks of himself as "the merry cobler of Limestreete." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iii., Alexander says to Moll, "Meet this gentleman at the Nag's Head corner, just against Leadenhall; we lie in L.-St., thither he shall carry thee." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 12, says, "I told her that I had a warrant to search from the sheriff of Limbo."—"How? from the sheriff of L. st.?" replies Mrs. Wimblechin, for so she understood the word Limbo, as if Limbo had been Latin for L. St. Dekker, in Jests, speaks of "Milk st., Bread st., L. st., and S. Mary Axe" as the residential quarters of the merchants of Lond.

LIMNASPHALTIS. See ASPHALTIS.

LINCOLN. County-town of Lincs., on the N. bank of the Witham, 132 m. N.W. of Lond. It is one of the most ancient cities in England. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 51, says that "Fair L." like Troynovant (Lond.), was the work of Brute, and he reckons these 2 the fairest cities in the world. The old British town was on the top of the hill beyond the N. gate. The Roman town corresponded with the "above hill" portion of the city. The castle was built by William the Conqueror in 1086, and the Minster, most of which is of a much later date, was founded at the same time by the Bp. Remigius and consecrated in 1092. Other interesting buildings are the Newport or N. Gate, of Roman origin; the Exchequer Gate, Pottergate and Stonebow; the old episcopal palace; and the Jews House, near which little St. Hugh of L. was said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1255. This is the "yonge Hugh of Lyncoln, slayn with cursed Jewes," of whom Chaucer's Prioress tells (C. T. B. 1874). The city played a great part in earlier English history. The castle was often besieged in the various civil wars: kings were crowned here and parliaments held in the Chapter House. Hence the proverb, quoted by Greenshield in Dekker's Northward i. 1, "L. was, Lond. is, and York shall be." An Earl of L. is one of the characters in Dekker's Fortunatus, which is dated in the reign of Athelstane. Henry de Lacy, Earl of L., is one of the characters in Greene's Friar, in the latter part of the reign of Henry III. He was a trusted counsellor of Edward I and one of the Ordainers in the reign of his successor. By marriage with his daughter, Thomas of Lancaster became Earl of L. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, he says, "4 Earldoms have I besides Lancaster: Derby, Salisbury, L., Leicester." The title, however, returned to the Lacy family, and we find Sir Hugh Lacy, Earl of L., as one of the characters in Dekker's Shoemaker's, the date being 1445. In True Trag., p. 92, Morton says, "Who but K. Richd. bears sway, and hath proclaimed John Earl of Linclone [misprint for L.] heir apparent to the Crown." He was the son of John de la Pole, D. of Suffolk, and Elizabeth, sister of Edward IV. He was killed in the battle of Stoke in 1487. In Ford's Warbeck i. 1, he is spoken of as "The high-born L., son to de la Pole." The title is now held by the D. of Newcastle, whose ancestor, Edward Clinton, was created Earl of L. in 1572. The Bp. of L. who appears in H8 was John Longland, the King's confessor: he designed the Longland Chapel in L. Cathedral. He died in 1547.

In K. J. v. 6, 41, the Bastard says, "Half my power, Passing these flats, are taken by the tide; These L.

Washes have devoured them." The Wash is the bay S.E. of L. It is full of dangerous sandbanks. In Three Lords, the Three Lords of L. are Desire, Delight, and Devotion. In K.K.K., Dods. vi. 533, Honesty says to Coney-catcher, "We are as near kin together as the cates of Banbury be to the bells of L.": Banbury was notorious for its Puritanism, with its opposition to bells, organs, etc.: hence the phrase means "we are as far apart as possible." The bell in the central tower of the Minster is known as "Great Tom." The original bell was cast in 1610, but was recast in 1834. It weighs 5 tons 8 cwt. In B. & F. Prize iii. 2, Petruchio complains: "Had I not every morning a rare breakfast, Mix'd with a learned lecture of ill language Louder than Tom o' L." In B. & F. Nightwalker iii. 4, Toby says of the women: "I have heard some of their tongues, like Tom-a-L., 3 m. off." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the sights of England "the skirts of old Tom a L." The proverb "Like as the Devil looked over L." seems to refer to one of the grotesque gargoyles on the Cathedral. It is quoted in J. Heywood's Proverbs (1562). In Shirley's Sisters, the Prologue says, "Pox of him, say I, That looked o'er L." L. had a reputation for the green dye used in the cloth made there, which was only rivalled by Kendal. In Robin Hood's Garland, we are told "He clothed his men in L. green." Skelton tells us that Elynour Rummyn's huke, i.e. hood, was "of Lyncolne green." Spenser, F. Q. vi. 2, 5, says of Sir Tristram: "All in a woodman's jacket was he clad Of L. green." Drayton, in Polyolb. xxvi. 319, describes Robin Hood's men as "all clad in L. green." Processional Plays were performed in L. on July 26th in honour of St. Anne. They were suppressed in the 1st year of Elizabeth's reign.

LINCOLN COLLEGE. Oxford, founded in 1427 by Richard Flemmyng, Bp. of L. It stands on the E. side of Turl St., just S. of Exeter College. Sir William Davenant, the dramatist, was entered at L. C.

LINCOLNSHIRE. The county on the E. coast of England, S. of the Humber. About a third of it is occupied by the Fens, which are artificially drained. The wide grazing lands of the county have been long famous, and the breeds of bullocks and sheep are well known. In Underwit v. 3, the Footman states that "Sir Walter Littleland is well known in L. near the Fens." In Middleton's Mad World ii. 2, when the masqued thieves affirm that they are L.-men, Sir Bounteous says, "O, the honestest thieves of all come out of L.; the kindest natured gentlemen; they'll rob a man with conscience; they have a feeling of what they go about, and will steal with tears in their eyes." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, when the Muleteer asks Forobosco how much the ox will cost that he proposes to roast whole in Madrid, he says, "A hundred French crowns, for it must be a L. ox and a prime one." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Trapdoor boasts, "I have kept a bridge myself and drove 7 at a time before me," but adds, aside, "they were all L. bullocks." In H4 A. i. 2, 85, Falstaff complains that he is as melancholy "as the drone of a L. bagpipe." In Armin's Ninnies, for a Christmas festivity, "a noise of minstrels and a L. bagpipe was prepared." Drayton, in Polyolb. xxv., says of L.: "girls in Lincoln green Whilst some the rings of bells and some the bagpipes ply, Dance many a merry round." In Tarleton's Purgatory, we have: "This Stephano was the chief gallant of all the parish for dancing of a L. hornpipe in the churchyard on Sundays." Drayton, in Polyolb. xxiii. 266, says, "Bells and bagpipes next belong to Lincolneshire." In Trag.

Richd. II iv. 1, 233, "Lyncolneshere" is one of the counties granted by the K. to Greene. The scene of Lvly's Gallathea is laid in L.

LINCOLN'S INN. One of the Four Inns of Court in Lond. It stands between the N. end of Chancery Lane and L. I. Fields, S. of Holborn. In 1221 the site was assigned to the Black Friars on their arrival in England; from them it passed into the hands of the De Lacies, Earls of Lincoln, hence the name. The lawyers obtained the use of it about 1300, and in 1580 bought it outright. The gatehouse in Chancery Lane and the old Hall were erected in the reign of Henry VII, and the buildings facing into Chancery Lane a little later. The rest of the buildings are comparatively modern. In More v. 4, More, on the scaffold, reminds the Sheriff, "When I studied the law in L. I, I was of council with ye in a cause." Sir Thomas was a bench of L. I. Richard Edwards, the author of Damon, also belonged to that honourable body. Fuller tells us that Ben Jonson helped in the building "of the new structure of L. I.": probably the part in Chancery Lane. Prynne's Histrio-Mastix is dedicated to "the students of the 4 famous Inns of Court, and especially those of L. I." Prynne was buried in the vaults below the old chapel. Jonson, in Devil i. 6, speaks of "The walks of L. I. Under the Elms." In Marston's What you iii. 1, a lawyer is called "the glorious Ajax [quasi, a jakes] of L. I., laps up nought but filth and excrements." In Jonson's Devil ii. 2, Mrs. Fitzdottrel sends word to Wittipol "to forbear his acting to me At the gentleman's chamber-window in L.-I. there, That opens to my gallery."

LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS. The square immediately W. of L. I., Lond. It was at first a mere open piece of waste ground, but it was laid out in 1618 by Inigo Jones, with the Arch Row on the W., Portugal Row on the S., and Holborn, or Newman's, Row on the N.; on the E. were the buildings of the Inn. It was supposed to be the same size as the base of the Gt. Pyramid, but was actually 12 acres in extent—1½ acres less. About 1656 there were many proposals to build the whole of the space over, but on the petition of the Society of L. I. Cromwell stopped them. In Glaphorne's Wit i. 1, Thorowgood asks whether Valentine and Sir Timothy have come to town "to see L. I. F. built." The date is 1639. A theatre was opened by Davenant in Portugal Row in 1662, which is the scene of his Playhouse. In i., the Housekeeper says, "There are so many Tom-tumblers [applying to take the theatre] that you'd think L.-I.-F. a forest of wild apes." In Nabbes' Bride ii. 1, Squirrel, the Vintner, says, "The errands of L. I. f. are the best maintainers of my profit's occasion." In De-loney's Craft ii. 5, Peachy says, "Stutely and Strangewidge, if you be men, meet me in Lincolnes Inne-f. presently." . . . "And so into the f. they went" and fought.

LINE (the EQUATOR). "Under the Line" means at the Equator. In B. & F. Corinth iv. 1, Crates tells Onos that if his opponent accepts his challenge, "you may crave To choose the place, which may be Calicut Or underneath the L." In H8 v. 4, 46, the Porter's Man says of a red-faced man: "All that stand about him are under the L., they need no other penance." In Temp. iv. 1, 237, Stephano, stealing a jerkin from the Lime or lime-tree, where it is hanging, says, "Now is the jerkin under the L.; now, jerkin, you are like to lose your hair and prove a bald jerkin." Travellers crossing the Equator were liable to contract fevers which caused them to lose their hair. In Milkmaids i. 3, Ranoff says, "'Tis very precious hot; I protest I have been cooler under the L." In Webster's Law Case iii. 3, Romelio, who is going to ship the surgeons who know his crime to the E. Indies, says, "Let them prate when they are beyond the L."

LINGEN. A town in Hanover, on the Ems, 100 m. E. of Amsterdam. In Barnavel iv. 5, Orange asks: "Who was the cause no greater power was sent against the enemy when he took Oldensell, L., Groll?"

LINGIS (SAINT) PARK. In Kyd's Span. Trag. iii. 2, Lorenzo says to Pedringano, "Meet Serberine at St. L. P.; Thou know'st 'tis here, hard by, behind the house." I have failed so far to discover either the saint or his park. Various emendations have been suggested: as Liugis, Leugis, Leuges, Luges, but Schick's Luigi's seems the most likely, though Luigi is Italian, not Spanish. The traditional name of the centurion whose spear pierced our Lord's side on the Cross was Longinus, which was shortened into Lungis. The word is used for a long, awkward fellow, as in B. & F. Pestle ii. 3, where the citizen's wife says, "The foul great lungies laid unmercifully on thee." But he was not a saint.

LINLITHGOW. An ancient city in Scotland, capital of the county of the same name, 17 m. W. of Edinburgh. The ancient palace, now in ruins, was a favourite residence of the Kings of Scotland. Sir David Lyndsay's Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis was acted at L. in 1540 before James V and his court, in a jousting field near the town.

LINTERNUM, or LITERNUM. A vill. on the coast of Campania, between the mouth of the Volturnus and Cumæ: its site is marked by Tor di Patria. It was at the mouth of a river of the same name, the delta of which formed a marshy lagoon. It was chiefly famous because Scipio Africanus retired there to die, in disgust at his treatment by the people of Rome. In Nabbes' Hannibal v. 3, Scipio says, "At L., My country villa, I will terminate My after life." Gascoigne, in Steel Glas, p. 67 (Arber), says, "Scypio condemns the Roman rule Which suffered him, that had so truly served, To lead poor life at his Lynternum farm."

LION. A tavern sign. In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Monopoly says, "I'm to sup this night at the L. in Shore-ditch." Act iii. 2 is laid outside this Inn. Probably the Red L. is meant: it stood on the E. side of Bishopsgate St. Without. In Feversham ii. 1, Black Will says, "Canst thou remember since we trolled the bowl at Sittingburgh [i.e. Sittingbourne] where I broke the tapster's head of the Lyon with a cudgel-stick?" In Chapman's May Day i. 1, Quintiliano says, "The hostess of the L. has a leg like a giant." The scene is in Venice.

LION KEY. A wharf or landing-place on the N. side of the Thames in Lond., between Billingsgate and Lond. Bdge. Stow says it was called after one Lion, owner thereof. In Fair Women ii. 290, Roger relates that he followed Sanders "to L. quay; saw him take boat, And, in a pair of oars, as soon as he, Landed at Greenwich." In Underwit iii. 3, Engine suggests as a useful project "a bridge from L. k. to Flanders." In B. & F. Prize v. 2, Jaquess says, "We'll get us to Paris. Away to Lyon-k. and ship 'em presently." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 64, the disguised King says, "At L. quay I landed in their view, Yet none of them took knowledge of the King."

LIPSBURY. In Lear ii. 2, 9, Kent says to Oswald, "If I had thee in L. pinfold, I would make thee care for me." No one has yet succeeded in identifying L. I suggest that the phrase is a misprint for "Westbury Pen Hole." The scene of the encounter between Kent and Oswald is in the courtyard before Gloucester's castle, presumably near Gloucester. Now, Shakespeare knew Gloucestershire minutely, as he knew no other county in England, except Warwick: the proof is in H4 B. v. 1, and the references to Greet, Tewkesbury, etc. Hence we should naturally look for L. in Gloucestershire. The ending -bury is quite common there: we have, for example, Lantbury, Tetbury, Sodbury, Thornbury, Oldbury, Henbury, Tewkesbury, Westbury. Of these Lantbury looks most like L. But what Kent wanted was a quiet place where he could thrash Oswald without interruption, and a penfold, or pound, in the middle of a village would not have served his turn: it would be altogether too public. Now, in Pen Park, near Westbury, some 4 m. N. of Bristol, is a huge cavern, possibly the remains of an old lead mine: it is known as Pen Park Hole, or Pen Hole. This would be the very place for Kent's purpose. "W" with the first limb exaggerated would not be unlike a capital "L," and the long "s" would be almost indistinguishable from "p," so that a compositor might easily misread Westbury as L. Penhole he would not understand, and would almost unconsciously change it to the familiar pinfold: he retains, however, the capital "P," and so gives us "L. Pinfold." It is true that in the only other passage in the 1st folio where pinfold occurs (Two Gent. i. 1, 114) it is printed with a capital, so that that point does not go for much. I make the suggestion for what it may be worth.

LISBON. The capital of Portugal, on the N. bank of the Tagus some 8 m. from the sea. It was the last place in Portugal to be taken from the Moors. Alphonso I besieged it for some months in 1147, and took it with the help of some English and French crusaders who were on their way to Palestine. In Span. Trag. i., Hieronimo says of Edmund, Earl of Kent: "When English Richard wore the diadem, He came . . . and razed L. walls, And took the K. of Portingale in fight." The reference is to the expedition of 1381, when Edmund, Earl of Cambridge (not of Kent), came to help Ferdinand of Portugal against John of Castile. Ferdinand, however, turned traitor to the English, with the result that in 1383 they ravaged Portugal and dethroned Ferdinand. In the dying speech of Stucley, in Peele's Alcazar v. 1, 164, he says, "My sails I spread and with these men of war In fatal hour at L. we arrived": fatal because Stucley offered to help Sebastian against the Moors and was killed at Alcazar. In B. & F. Custom ii. 3, Rutilio says, "The ship that took us was of Portugal, And here in L. we may hear of her." In Merch. iii. 2, 272, we learn that one of Antonio's ventures was to L., which had considerable trade with England. In Bacchus, one of the worshippers of Bacchus is "David Driethroat, from Lesbona in Portugale," who brought a cup of Canary as his offering. In Davenant's Wits iv., among the delicacies enumerated by Young Palatine is "Marmalade, made by the cleanly nuns of L." This would naturally be orange marmalade: there were other marmalades made from quinces, cherries, etc. These nuns came from Sion, in Middlesex, at the dissolution of the Monasteries by Henry VIII, and after temporary sojourns in Zuruck see, Mechlin, and Rouen, finally established themselves in L. B. & F. Four Plays is supposed to be performed at L. on the occasion of the marriage of K. Emmanuel the Fortunate to Isabella of Castile in 1497. The last 4 acts of their Custom, and Shirley's Maid's Rev. take place at L.

LISIMACHIUM (i.e. LYSIMACHIA). A city at N.E. end of the Thracian Chersonese, just where the Dardanelles open out into the Sea of Marmora. It was built by Lysimachus, King of Thrace, 309 B.C., and made the capital of his kingdom. It was destroyed by the Thracians in the war between Philip of Macedon and the Romans, but restored by Antiochus the Gt. It has now disappeared except for some ruins near the village of Baular. In Tiberius 1806, Vonones reproaches the Romans because in the war against Mithridates they would not be satisfied "Except he yield up L." In line 2154, we are told that Germanicus, in his journey to Armenia, bent his course "from Ephesus To L."

LISLE. See LILLE.

LITHUANIA. The dist. lying S. of the Gulf of Finland and N. of Poland. It was a powerful independent kingdom in the 14th cent., but in the 18th it was divided between Russia and Prussia. Chaucer's Knight "In Lettowe hadde reysed and in Ruze" (C. T. Prol. 54). In Suckling's Brennoralt iii. 1, Brennoralt says, "The Lns. Are of the wilder sort of creatures, must Be rid with cavezous and with harsh curbs." Cavezous is a misprint for cavesons (French caveçons), a nose-band used for breaking-in horses. Burton, A. M. i. 2, 1, 2, says, "Nothing so familiar as for witches and sorcerers, in Lapland, L., and all over Scandia, to sell winds to mariners and cause tempests."

LITTLE BRITAIN. A st. in Lond. running W. from Aldersgate St., by St. Botolph's Ch., to the point at the top of K. Edward St. where the pump used to stand; thence it turns N. along what was originally called Duck Lane to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. It was named from the City mansion of the D. of Bretagne, which was situated there. It was a great st. for booksellers and publishers, especially in the part from the Pump to St. Bartholomew's. Harman's Fraternity of Vagabondes was "Imprinted at Lond. by Iohn Awdeley dwelling in l. Britayne strete without Aldersgate. 1575." He is described in another imprint as "dwelling by Gt. St. Barthelmewes beyond Aldersgate." Rawlins's Rebellion was "Printed by I. Okes for Daniell Frere, and are to be sold at the sign of the Red Bull in L. Brittain. 1640." Middleton's Old Law was "Printed for Edward Archer at the sign of the Adam and Eve in L. Britaine. 1656."

LIVONIA. Formerly one of the Baltic Provinces of Russia, lying S.W. of Petrograd, S. of the Gulf of Finland, and E. of the Gulf of Riga. It was almost unknown to the rest of Europe until 1158, when merchants from Bremen formed trading settlements there. It was Christianized in 1186 by the monk Meinhard, and a bishopric was founded soon after with Riga as its centre. For a time it was held by the Danes, but at the end of the 12th cent. it became attached to Poland. From the middle of the 16th cent. its possession was continually disputed between Russia, Poland, and Sweden. In 1660 it was ceded to Sweden, and remained a Swedish province till 1721, when it was finally annexed to Russia. With Courland, it now (since 1919) forms the Republic of Latvia. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says that, since he left Oxford, he has "visited Moldavia and L., Pamphlagonia, and Silesia." Burton, A. M. i. 2, 1, 2, tells of one who "sailed to L. on set purpose to see those familiar spirits which are there said to be conversant with men," and who was successful in getting information from them by second-sight.

LIXA. An imaginary place in the altogether imaginary play Andromana. The background is a war between the Argives and the Iberians. In J. S.'s Andromana ii. 6, the Messenger relates: "'Tis scarce 3 hours since the brave Plangus marched from L. with an army."

LLANDAFF. An episcopal city in Glamorgansh. on the Taff, 2 m. N.W. of Cardiff and 163 m. W. of Lond. In Bale's Johan 1363, Private Wealth declares that the Pope's Interdict shall be published in Wales and in Ireland by "The bp. of Landaffe, seynt Assys, and seynt Davy."

LO, SAINT. The capital of the Department of La Manche, France, on the Vire, 158 m. W. of Paris. In Ed. III iii. 3, Prince Edward announces: "Some of their strongest cities have we won, As Harflew, Lo, Crotay, and Carentigne." This was in 1346, just before the battle of Cressy.

LOCRI (or, more fully, L. Epizephyrii). A Greek colony on the E. side of the Brutian peninsula, the "toe" of Italy. Its ruins are near the modern town of Gerace. It was famous for the legislation of Zaleucus, who lived about 660 B.C., in which careful provisions were made to prevent any innovation or change in the laws. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy iii. 1, Clermont says, "The Lan. Princes, therefore, were brave rulers: For whosoever there came new from country And in the city asked, 'What new?' was punished." In the 2nd Punic war it revolted to the Carthaginians, but was recaptured by Scipio in 205 B.C. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 5, a messenger announces: "New Carthage; Sagunt; Locris; Tarracon: All these are re-o'ercome by Scipio."

LODI. A city in N. Italy on the right bank of the Adda, some 16 m. S. of Milan. It is the centre of one of the richest dairying districts in Italy, and has an extensive trade in cheese and other dairy-produce. It produces more Parmesan cheese than Parma itself. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, young Palatine speaks of "Parmesan of Lodi" in a list of delicacies for the table.

LOEGRIANS (Britons = inhabitants of Logris). The form found in the French Arthurian romances. In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 5, Belinus says of part of his army: "All brave L., armed with pike and spear." In Chrétien de Troyes' Chevalier de la Charrette, Lancelot says, "Unes chevaliers fut, ce veez, Del réaume de Logres nez."

LOGIE. See LOWGAVE.

LOGRIS. An old name for England, derived from the name of Locrine, the mythical son of Brute. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 14, makes the Severn the boundary between Cambria (Wales) and L. Milton, P. R. ii. 360, compares the women who wait on the banquet spread by the Tempter for our Lord to "faery damsels met in forest wide By knights of Logres, or of Lyones, Lancelot, or Pelleas, or Pellenore." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 36, calls the Tweed "the limit betwixt L. land And Albany." The name is sometimes applied specifically to Kent. Deloney, in Craft i. 5, speaks of "the virtuous Q. of Logria which now is called Kent."

LOGRONO. A town in Spain on the N. bank of the Ebro, just at the junction of the provinces of Navarre, Alava, and Sori, 150 m. N.E. of Madrid. In Bacchus, one of the worshippers of Bacchus is "a Spaniard, of the city of Logronio, named Blayner Bloblip, who, gratifying his god with a limons and an orange pill, with a most lowly leg he leapt aside."

LOIRE, or LOYRE. One of the longest rivers in France, rising in the Cevennes and flowing in a general N.W. direction past Orleans and into the Bay of Biscay below Nantes. The Roman name was Liger. In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Caesar boasts, "The Gauls . . . Did live to see my soldiers drink at L." See also LOYCE.

LOLLARDS' TOWER. A tower at the S.W. corner of Old St. Paul's, Lond., which was used as the Bp. of Lond.'s prison. It was here that Richard Hunne was murdered by the officers in charge of him in 1544. There was another L. T. at the W. end of the chapel of Lambeth Palace, but it is doubtful whether this was ever used for the confinement of Lollards. In Jonson's Staple v. 1, Pennyboy, the usurer, goes mad, and arrests and imprisons his 2 dogs in a couple of closets, "the one of which he calls his Lollard's T., t'other his Blockhouse, 'cause his 2 dogs' names are Block and Lollard."

LOMBARD STREET. Lond., running from the Mansion House, on the S. of the Royal Exchange, to Gracechurch St. It took its name from the L. merchants who settled there in the 13th cent.: in 1318 a grant to them of a messuage abutting on Lombard St. on the S. and toward Cornhill on the N. was confirmed by Edward II. They were money-changers, bankers, agents for foreign traders, and money-lenders. Themeetings of the merchants were held in the st. until the building of the Bourse, afterwards the Royal Exchange, by Gresham. Gresham lived at No. 68, now Martin and Co.'s; the Goldsmiths Company were at No. 67. The Cardinal's Cap and the Salutation Taverns were in the st. On the S. side is the noble ch. of St. Mary Woolnoth, on the N. Allhallows and St. Edmund King and Martyr. In Davenant's Wits ii. 4, Palatine says, "All gold & the stalls of L. st. poured into a purse?" In T. Heywood's I. K. M., B. i. 264, Ramsie, meeting Dr. Nowell, exclaims: "Master Dean of Paul's, 'Tis strange to see you here in Lumber st., This place of traffic, whereon merchants meet." In Fair Women ii., Sanders, coming home late, explains that he has been at a friend's "in Lumberd St. at supper." Mercers as well as bankers lived in the st. In H. B. ii. 1, 31, the Hostess informs Snare that Falstaff "is indited to dinner to the Lubber's Head in Lumberd st., to Master Smooth's the silkman." The Lubber's Head is Quickly's way of saying the Libbard's, or Leopard's, Head. In Middleton's Quiet Life ii. 2, we learn that Water-Camlet, the mercer's, shop is "the Lamb in L. st." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV, A. i. 64, 2 other signs are mentioned: the K. says, "Here's L. st., and here's the Pelican; And there's the Phoenix in the Pelican's nest." The Phoenix Fire Office is still there at No. 19, and the Pelican at No. 70—next to Change Alley. In Ibid. B. 145, Jane Shore orders her trunks to be conveyed "To Mrs. Blage, an Inn in L. St., The Flower-de Luce." In Deloney's Craft i. 10, Mrs. Eyre speaks of "the George in Lumbard st. where the merchant strangers lie." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Alicia says, "All Cheapside and L.-st. could not have furnished you with a more complete bargain, you will find it in the wearing." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 26, Falconbridge cries to the rebels, "The Mint is ours, Cheape, L. St., our own." Thersites was "Imprinted at London by John Tysdale and are to be sold at his shop in the upper end of L. St. in Allhallows ch. yard near unto Grace ch." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 295, one of the Lords says that the Exchanges of Frankford and Embden "have sts. and penthouses Like Lumber St. before this Bourse [Gresham's] was built." The Lumbard is used for the Exchange. In Ibid. B. 269, Gresham says, "We'll stay here on the Lumbard till thou com'st." From Tarleton's Jests we learn that Armin's master was "a goldsmith in L. st."

LOMBARDY (Ld. = Lombard). The dist. in N. Italy included in the kingdom of the Lds. They were a Teutonic tribe who under their K. Alboin, or Albovin, descended in A.D. 568 into Italy and took possession of the valley of the Po, where they established a kingdom which lasted over 200 years. They were finally subdued by Charles the Gt. in 774. Meanwhile they had adopted the language and religion of their subjects, though in the Arian, rather than the orthodox, form of Christianity; and the race which resulted from their fusion with the Italians proved itself to be of great vigour and ability. L. was joined to the kingdom of Piedmont, the germ of United Italy, by the Peace of Villafranca after the campaign of 1859. During the 13th cent. many of the Lds. went to England to escape the troubles between the Guelfs and Ghibellines, and became the leading merchants and bankers in Lond. They had a messuage assigned to them in Ld. St., which still perpetuates their name; but by the end of the reign of Elizabeth they had all left Lond. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report claims to have visited "Louvain, London, and L." In Shrew i. 1, 3, Lucentio says, "To see fair Padua, nursery of arts, I am arrived for fruitful L., The pleasant garden of great Italy." In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 1, Mattemores says, "I'll fight for Florence; Nor shall the Longobardy Mantuans E'er win a flag while I am in the field." In B. & F. Prophetess v. 1, the Chorus announces: "Good Dioclesian, Weary of pomp and state, retires himself To a most private grange in L." Scene 3 takes place in L. before the farm of Dioclesian. This is a curious mistake: in A.D. 305 Diocletian resigned the purple and retired to a farm in Dalmatia. The Lds. were in Pannonia before they invaded Italy, but were never as far south as Dalmatia. Davenant's Albovine deals with the reign of Alboin. In his U. Lovers iii. 1, Rampino says, "Galeotto . . . Sold us to Heftebrand, the Lds.' K." He reigned, for 6 months only, in 744. In Barnes's Charter i. 4, Alexander, the Pope, allots to the D. of Gandy "all the signories in L., From Porta di Volane to Savona." This was Alexander VI (1492-1503). In T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 85, Robert says, "We have entered Even to the midst of fertile L., B writers termed the garden of the world." The scene of Wilson's Swiss is laid in L. in the 7th century.

The wines of L. were of inferior quality. In Jonson's Volpone i. 1, Mosca speaks of "the merchant who hath filled his vaults With Romagna, and rich Candian wines, Yet drinks the lees of Ld.'s vinegar." In Lælia iii. 2, 17, on the contrary, Brulio appeals to Stragalcus: "Ut tibi aridit vinum Lombardium." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius, in his song about the dress of the various nations, says, "The Spaniard loves his ancient slop, The Ld. his Venetian": which was a tight-fitting pair of breeches. Ld. is used for a moneylender or pawnbroker. In Langland's Piers C. v. 194, he speaks of "other Lumbardes of Lukes [i.e. Lucca] that liven by lone as Jewes"; and in C. vii. 249, Avarice confesses: "Ich lerned among Lumbardes a lesson, and of Jewes, To weie pans with a peis, and pared the heavyeste," and in 244, "with Lumbardes letters ich leneed gold at Rome." In Roister ii. 2, Dobinet says, "If he have not one Lumbardes touch [i.e. touchstone, to distinguish good money from bad] my luck is bad." In Day's Gulls ii. 1, the Page says, "I have seen much gold lying upon Lds.' stalls, and could never finger penny of it." So B. & F., in Candy iv. 2, speak of "an usurer on Ld. Jew." In More, two of the characters, Francis de Barde and Caveler, are described as Lds. Ld. came to be used in the sense of a pawnbroker's shop. In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Kate says, "His apparel lies i' th' Lumbard." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, the Steward says to

LONDON, 1593, by John Norden

Littleworth, "Your coat and cloak's a brushing in Long-Lane L." Long Lane was full of pawnbrokers' shops. Nash, in Lenten, p. 325, tells how Madam Cornificia "sent all her jewels to the Jewish Ld. to pawn." Fuller, in Church History (1656) iii. 13, 10, says, "A Ld. unto this day signifieth a bank for usury or pawns." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Volpone, disguised as a mountebank, says, "I am not, as your Ld. proverb saith, cold on my feet; or content to part with my commodities at a cheaper rate than I am accustomed: look not for it." L. is used in the sense of Italy as a whole. In T. Heywood's Iron Age B. ii., Hector predicts that the glories of Troy shall be revived in "Lumbardies Rome, great Britain's Troynovant." Rabelais, in Gargantua i. 3, says that Grangousier would not eat Bologna sausages, "for he feared the Ld. bit," i.e. poison.

LONDON (Ler. = Londoner). The capital of England, on the Thames, some 50 m. from its mouth. The original site was on the N. bank of the river, but it gradually extended to the S., or Surrey, side. No attempt will be made to give any account of the history of L., but some points may be set down to help the student to form a correct idea of the city in which Shakespeare and his fellow-dramatists lived and worked. The old Roman city was surrounded by a wall, stretching like a bow from the Tower to a point near Blackfriars Bdge., and along the r. side back again. The r. wall had completely disappeared by Shakespeare's time, but Billingsgate and Dowgate still indicate where entrance was gained to the city from the r. On the land side the gates ran in order, starting with the Tower Postern, Aldgate, Bishopsgate, Moor-gate, Cripplegate, Aldersgate, Newgate, Ludgate. All these gates have now disappeared, but a correct idea of their form may be gained from St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell, which happily still remains, or from the gates of York. In Shakespeare's time they were used both as dwelling-houses and as prisons. The establishment of the Inns of Court in the 14th cent. led to the extension of the city westward along Fleet St. and Holborn, and Temple Bar indicated its new limit, so that the phrase "from Tower to Temple" was used for the whole town. The Strand was, as the name implies, near the river, with the houses of the great nobles on its S. side. From Charing Cross, King St. led down to the quite separate city of Westminster. On the E. and N., too, there had been some extension beyond the walls, but the modern suburbs of Bromley, Bow, Hackney, Islington, and Kensington were still a ring of separate villages, and beyond them again lay Barking, Tottenham, Highgate, Hornsey, Hampstead, and Hammersmith. Crossing the r. by the Bdge., a little E. of the present L. Bdge., we find the Ch. of St. Mary Overy, the palace of the Bp. of Winchester, and stretching W. the houses of the Bankside, the Theatres and Paris Garden, and little more.

Within the city everything has to be reconstructed, for the Gt. Fire swept it from Pudding Lane to Pie Corner, and hardly anything of Shakespeare's L. remains except the old lines of the sts., which, luckily for the antiquarian, were not altered in the rebuilding. The sts. must be imagined lined with gabled and timbered houses, like Staples Inn or Crosby Hall (now re-erected at Chelsea). For Wren's churches we must substitute Gothic buildings, and we must almost double the number, for 89 were destroyed by the Fire and only 45 were rebuilt. Fortunately the old type of ch. is still represented by the Savoy Chapel, All Hallows Barking, St. Andrew's Undershaft, St. Giles Cripplegate, St.

Helen's Bishopsgate, St. Margaret's Westminster, St. Saviour's Southwark, and the noble conventual ch. of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, all of which escaped the Fire. The dome of St. Paul's must be replaced by a gothic tower, which formerly had a lofty steeple, destroyed by lightning in 1561 and not rebuilt. Altogether there were about 109 churches within the city area, and the air must have been continually throbbing with the sound of their bells. Old L. was a city of running waters. In almost every st. of importance there was a conduit, or water-standard, and on these the citizens were dependent for their water supply. All these have disappeared. There were, of course, no trams or cabs or omnibuses: only a few private carriages, drawn by heavy Flanders mares. The sts. were badly paved, and consequently the river was the pleasantest and most-frequented thoroughfare from one part of the city to another, as well as to Greenwich and Westminster. The houses and shops were distinguished not by numbers, but by signs, which must have added much to the picturesqueness of the sts. The houses were all inhabited, the shopkeepers living at their shops and the merchants at mansions in the city. It must be remembered that the city was hardly lighted at all at night, and that there was no system of drainage: all the sewage of the town ran down the st. channels into the Fleet Ditch or the Thames.

The principal buildings of Shakespeare's time which still remain, apart from the churches mentioned above, are the Tower, the Temple with its church and hall, Lincoln's Inn and Gray's Inn, the Guildhall, Staples Inn, Crosby House, the Charterhouse, St. John's Gate; and, further afield, Westminster Hall, parts of St. James's Palace, and Lambeth Palace. The main thoroughfares into L. were Oxford Rd. from the W., the Gt. North Road from the N., and the Old Kent Rd., or Pilgrims Rd., from Kent and the Continent. According to Heylyn, the city in 1621 was "wondrous populous, containing well nigh 400,000 people, which number is much augmented in the Term time." Shakespeare never mentions L. outside of his historical plays, and even in them there is very little specific notice of L. streets or buildings. On the other hand, Jonson, Massinger, Beaumont and Fletcher, Field, Middleton, Shirley, Dekker, Nash, Haughton, Marmion, Heywood, Barry, Rowley, and Glapthorne place the scenes of many of their comedies in L., and show a minute knowledge of every detail of its topography. There is hardly a st. or ch. or public building or tavern which is not mentioned in one or other of their plays.

General references. In Ret. Pernas. v. 4, Furor exclaims: "Farewell, musty, dusty, rusty, fusty L. That cheatest virtue of her due desert And sufferest great Apollo's son to want." In York. Tragedy i., Samuel, the serving man, says, "Anything is good here that comes from L." In More iii. 3, More says, "Of all people that the earth affords, The Lers. fare richest at their boards." In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass, Oseas proclaims, at the end of Act I: "Sin reigns in thee, O L., every hour." The whole play is an attempted parallel between Nineveh and L. In Three Ladies (which is also a satire on L. manners) ii., Simplicity says, "No biding in L. for Conscience and Love." In World Child 180, Folly says, "In L. is my chief dwelling." In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Report claims to have been "at Louvain, at L., and in Lombardy." In Davenant's Rutland iii. 214, the Parisian says, "A Ler.'s opinion of himself is no less noted than his opinion of his beef before the veal of Italy." The whole description of L. by the Parisian in this Masque should be read. In T. Heywood's Captives v. 3, Ashburne says, "You shall see what welcome Our L., so much spoke of here in France, Can give to worthy strangers." In Wager's The Longer, D. 5, Discipline prays: "God preserve L., that noble city, where they have taken a godly order for a truth."

London as the capital of England. In R2 iii. 4, 97, the Q. says, "Come, ladies, go To meet at L. L.'s King in woe." In R3 iii. 1, 1, Buckingham says to young K. Edward, "Welcome, sweet Prince, to L., to your chamber." In H4 B. v. 3, 64, Davy says, "I hope to see L. once ere I die." In Dekker's Northward i. 1, Green-shield quotes a proverb: "Lincoln was, L. is, and York shall be." Nash, in Pierce, D. 3, says, "The poets have cleansed our language from barbarism and made the vulgar sort here in L. (which is the fountain whose rivers flow round about England) to aspire to a richer purity of speech than is communicated with the commonality of any nation under heaven."

London as the centre of trade. In H4 A. i. 2, 140, Poins tells of "traders riding to L. with fat purses." In Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, Barabas has debts owing in "Florence, Venice, Antwerp, L., Xeville." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 301, Gresham boasts of the wealth of the L. merchants: he drinks a pearl to the health of the Q., and says, "A L. merchant thus treads on a K.'s present." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Kate says, "[I travel] to L., Sir, as the old tale goes, to seek my fortune." The sub-title of B. & F. Pestle is "The L. Merchant." The 12 principal City Companies or Trade-guilds, with the date of the foundation of each and the location of its Hall, are as follows: Mercers (1393), Cheapside; Grocers (1345), Poultry; Drapers (1374), Throgmorton St.; Fishmongers (1363), Upper Thames St.; Goldsmiths (1327), Foster Lane; Skinners (1327), Dowgate Hill; Merchant-Tailors (1466), Threadneedle St.; Haberdashers (1448), Gresham St.; Salters (1530), St. Swithins Lane; Ironmongers (1464), Fenchurch St.; Vintners (1363), Upper Thames St.; Clothworkers (1480), Mincing Lane. In B. & F. Pestle ii. 3, the Citizen's Wife says of Ralph: "The 12 Companies of L. cannot match him."

London measure = full measure with a little over, as the L. merchants used to give. In Middleton's Quiet Life iii. 2, George says to Water-Camlet, "Your wife says that you give not L. measure." Brome, in Prol. to Jovent G., says, "'Tis not in book as cloth; we never say, 'Make L. measure' when we buy a play." Suckling, in Aglaure, Prol., says, "Men ever get All they can in; will have L. measure." In Cartwright's Ordinary iii. 5, Rimewell says to Catchmey, with his long beard, "I say you are too forward By the length of your L. measure beard." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, when Moll asks, "Was he any more than a man?" Laxton replies: "No, nor so much by a yard and a handful, L. measure." The Author of Reasons in a Hollow Tree (Harl. Misc., iv. 179) thinks that the Lord's Prayer "should have been two yards and a half longer, by L. measure."

London pins. In Skelton's Elynour Rummyn vii., Sibbill gives Elynour "a clout of L. pins in payment for her quart of ale": the clout being a definite measure for pins and needles.

London roads (i.e. roads to London). In H4 A. ii. 1, 16, the carrier complains of the inn in Rochester: "I think this be the most villainous house in all L. road for fleas." This is the Old Kent Rd. In H4 B. ii. 2, 184, Poins says that Doll Tearsheet is "as common as the way between St. Albans and L.," i.e. the Gt. North Road. In Eastward

ii. 2, Quicksilver says that villainy is "the L. highway to thrift," i.e. the common and easy way. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii. 2, Robin says, "The dust upon L. way was so great that not a lord, gentleman, knight, or knave could travel, lest his eyes should be blown out."

London pageants, festivals, etc. The Chorus, in H5 v. 24, tells how, on Henry's return, "L. doth pour out her citizens. The mayor and all his brethren in best sort, With the plebeians swarming at their heels, Go forth and fetch their conquering Caesar in." In R2 v. 5, 77, the Groom says, "O how it yearned my heart when I beheld In L. sts., that coronation day, When Bolingbroke rode on roan Barbary."

London atmosphere. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 228, there is a song: "L. is smothered with sulphurous fires; Still she wears a black hood and cloak Of sea-coal smoke."

London churches. In Abington i. 2, Coomes says that Francis has as many whores as there are churches in L.: "Why," says Philip, "that's a hundred and nine." Stow reckons 114 parish churches in L. and Southwark: 5 of these are in Southwark, so that Philip's count exactly agrees with Stow.

London gates. In H6 B. iv. 8, 24, Cade asks, "Hath my sword therefore broke through L. gates, that you should leave me at the White Hart in Southwark?"

London prisons. Taylor, in Works, says, "In L. and within a mile, I ween, There are of jails or prisons full 18, And 60 whipping-posts, and stocks and cages."

London taverns. In R2 v. 3, 6, Bolingbroke directs the lords to "Inquire at L., 'mongst the taverns there," for his unthrifty son Henry. In H5 iii. 2, 12, the Boy, at the siege of Harfleur, says, "Would I were in an ale-house in L."

London walls. In Fair Women i. 169, Drury says that "Roger is trusty As any fellow within L. walls." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Alicia says to her customer, "You could not have been so fitted on the sudden else within L. walls." In B. & F. Pestle ii. 1, the Citizen's Wife says of Humphrey: "I believe thou hast not thy fellow within the walls of L.; an I should say the suburbs too I should not lie."

The Bishop. In H8 iv. 1, 102, the 2 prelates who walk on each side of the Q. are "Stokesly and Gardiner: the one of Winchester, the other L." John Stokesly was Bp. from 1529 to 1539.

The Lord Mayor. In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 113, Woodstock says, "Hie thee, good Exton: Good Lord Mayor, I do beseech ye, prosecute With your best care a means for all our safeties." The date is 1387, as stated in ii. 1, 111. Nicholas Exton was Lord Mayor in 1386 and 1387, so that "Good Lord Mayor" must be taken as addressed to him. In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 331, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs commit Prince Henry to prison for rioting in Eastcheap. The date is given as the 14th year of Henry IV (p. 333), i.e. 1412. The Mayor that year was William Waldren, mercer; the Sheriffs, Ralph Lovenhinde and William Sevenocks. The Mayor of L. comes to welcome Henry V on his return from Agincourt (H5 v. Chorus 25). This was Nicholas Wotton. In H6 A. i. 3, 57, the Mayor enters to stop the fight between Gloucester and Winchester, and humorously remarks: "Good God, these nobles should such stomachs bear! I myself fight not once in 40 year." This was probably John Coventry, a mercer, who was Mayor in 1425. In H6 B. iv. 5, 4, the Lord Mayor craves aid from Lord Scales to defend the city from Cade. His name was Thomas Chalton, also a mercer. In R3 iii., the Mayor is cajoled by Buckingham into coming in deputation with the citizens to ask Richd. to accept the crown. He was Edmond Sha, a goldsmith. In H8 ii. 1, 151, we are told that the K. has directed the Lord Mayor to stop the rumour about his intended divorce from Catherine of Arragon. But this is a slight anachronism: the scene takes place in 1521; and it was not till 1527 that there was any thought of the divorce. The Mayor comes 5th in the coronation procession of Anne Boleyn (H8 iv. 1), "bearing the mace." This was Sir Stephen Pecocke, haberdasher. The Lord Mayor is also present at the christening of Elizabeth (H8 v. 5) in the same year. In Peele's Ed. I, the Mayoress of L. is poisoned by Q. Elinor by means of a snake: in dying she calls on her husband, "John Bearmber, Mayor of L." There is no such name in Stow's list; indeed, the whole story is an absurd legend. In More i. and ii., the Mayor plays a considerable part: it was in the year when More was under-sheriff and the May Day riots took place, i.e. 1517. The Mayor was John Rest, a grocer. In Youth ii. 100, Riot says, "The Mayor of L. sent for me forth of Newgate for to come for to preach at Tyburn." In Bale's Johan 272, Verity says, "The City of L. through his [John's] mere grant and premiss was first privileged to have both Mayor and Shrieve, where before his time it had but bailiffs only." The 1st Mayor was Henry Fitz Alwin, elected in 1189, in the reign of Richard I, but John granted several charters to the city confirming its right of self-government. Donne, Elegy i. 34 (1633), says, "We will scorn his household policies . . . As the inhabitants of Thames' right side Do L.'s Mayor." There was considerable rivalry between the citizens of the borough of Southwark and the city of L.

London citizens. In Massinger's New Way iv. 1, Lord Lovell says he will not marry Margaret and so leave his issue "made up of several pieces, one part scarlet, And the other L. blue." L. blue was a particular dye for cloth: here it is used depreciatingly of the L. citizen's blood as compared with the scarlet of the aristocracy. In Eastward i. 2, Girtred says to her sister, "Do you wear your quioff with a L. licket; I must be a lady, and I will be a lady." N.E.D. does not contain licket: it is clearly some appendage to a lady's headdress which distinguished a citizeness.

London cooks. A cook, evidently of L., is one of the pilgrims in Chaucer's C. T. In Jonson's Epicoene iii. 1, Clerimont says, "there's good correspondence between [the musicians] and the L. cooks." The musicians learned from the cooks where there was a feast going on, and came to offer their services.

London prentices. The apprentices of the tradesmen in Cheapside and elsewhere: they were a picturesque feature in the life of the city, and at the cry of "Clubs" swarmed out of the shops to protect any of their number who had got into trouble. Chaucer sketches one of them in the fragment of the Cook's Tale. His name was Perkyn Revelour. He was a lover of dancing and pageants and dicing, and occasionally found himself in Newgate. In Scott's Fortunes of Nigel, there is a vivid picture of the life of these young fellows. There is a contemporary picture, still more vivid, in Eastward. In T. Heywood's Prentices, he tells how Godfrey of Bulloign apprenticed his 4 sons in L., and how they went to Jerusalem and helped to take it, and each received as his reward a royal crown. The hero of B. & F. Pestle is a L. grocer's apprentice. In Merry Devil i. 4, Faber speaks of "The frank and merry L. prentices." In Massinger's Renegado i. 3, when Grimaldi strikes Gazet the shopkeeper, Gazet exclaims: "The devil gnaw off his fingers! If he were in L., among the clubs, up went his heels for striking of a prentice." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. iii. 1, when Fustigo insults Candido, the mercer, the prentices rush in and belabour him with their clubs. In iv. 3, when Crambo strikes Candido, George, the prentice, cries: "'Sfoot, clubs, clubs! Prentices, down with 'em!" and a number of prentices rush in and disarm Crambo. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 17, a prentice cries: "L. prentices, be ruled by me; Die, ere ye lose fair L.'s liberty."

London waits. A body of wind-instrument players, appointed by the city authorities, who played during the night, especially in the weeks immediately preceding Christmas. In Jonson's Epicoene i. 1, Cleremont says of Morose: "The waits of the City have a pension of him, not to come nigh that ward." The name seems to be connected with the root of watch, and implies that they kept awake during the night, but it came to be used as a synonym for the Hautboys, which were their chief instruments. In Famous History of Dr. Faustus (E. E. Prose Rom. iii. 178), we have "Lastly was heard by Faustus all manner of instruments of music—as lutes, viols, waits, hornpipes." Butler, in Principles of Music (1636) ii. 1, 93, speaks of "the waits or hobboys." These town musicians were hired to play at weddings and other festivities: thus, in Armin's Moreclacke i. 1, at the wedding of Sir William at Mortlake, Humil asks, "What, are the waits of L. come?" and goes on: "Play in their highest key then." Whereupon the serving-man says, "Sound, Hoboyes," and the direction is "Hoboyes play."

London's Joy. The name of a pudding. In Vox Borealis (1641), Jamie says, "They call a bag-pudding L.'s Joy."

London Lavender (= a pawnshop). Lavender used to be placed amongst clothes which were stored away; hence to lay in lavender meant to put away for a time: the transition to putting into pawn is obvious. In Shirley's C. Maid iii. 1, the Player says, "He wore them [a uniform] that day and sent them up to taste our L. lavender."

The following is a list of plays the scene of which is laid in London:—Shakespeare: parts of all the English History plays; Jonson: Ev. Man in Humour, Epicoene, Alchemist, Bartholomew Fair, Devil is an Ass, Staple of News, Magnetic Lady, Tale of Tub (in northern suburbs); Beaumont and Fletcher: Scornful Lady, Wit without Money, Monsieur Thomas, Knight of Burning Pestle, Woman's Prize, Coxcomb, Wit at Several Weapons, Nightwalker; Massinger: City Madam; Marlowe: Edward II (in part); Peele: Edward I (in part); Field: Woman is a Weathercock, Amends for Ladies; Ford: Perkin Warbeck (in part); Middleton: Trick to Catch the Old One, Chaste Maid in Cheapside, Roaring Girl, Fair Quarrel, Michaelmas Term, Family of Love, Your Five Gallants, Anything for a Quiet Life, No Wit like a Woman's; T. Heywood: English Traveller, Fair Maid of the Exchange, Wise Woman of Hogsdon, Edward IV (in part), If You Know not Me; Dekker: Shoemaker's Holiday, Witch of Edmonton, Westward Hoe, Northward Hoe; Chapman, etc.: Eastward Hoe; Marston: Dutch Courtesan; Webster: Sir Thomas Wyatt, Cure for a Cuckold; Cowley: The Cutter of Coleman Street; Shirley: Witty Fair One, Hyde Park, Lady of Pleasure, Wedding, Love in a Maze, Ball, Gamester, Example, Constant Maid, Honoraria and Mammon; Haughton: Englishmen for my Money; Marmion: Fine Companion; Davenant: Wits, Playhouse to Let; Barry: Ram Alley; Mayne: City

Match; Cooke: Greene's Tu Quoque; Cartwright: Ordinary; Rowley: New Wonder; Glapthorne: Hollander, Wit in a Constable; Killigrew: Parson's Wedding; Brome: Northern Lass, City Wit, Sparagus Garden, Covent Garden Weeded, Mad Couple, Court Beggar, Damoiselle, English-Moor, New Academy, Antipodes; Nabbes: Bride, Covent Garden, Totenham Court; Sharpham: The Fleire, Cupid's Whirligig; Anon: Arden of Feversham, London Prodigal, Puritan, Sir Thomas More, Thomas Cromwell (in part), London Chaunticleers, Warning for Fair Women, Nobody (in part); Yarrington: One of the Two Tragedies. The Old Chronicle Plays in large part: Trag. of R3, Famous Vict. of H5, King John, Contention of York and Lancaster, Trag. of R2, etc.

LONDON BRIDGE. The only b. over the Thames in L. in the Elizabethan period. Dion Cassius speaks of a b. over the Thames in the reign of the Emperor Claudius: it is certain, at any rate, that there was a b. in 1008 which was pulled down by the ships of Olaf the Norwegian. It was at once replaced, but was washed away by a flood in 1090, and its successor, also of wood, was burnt down in the reign of Stephen. The first stone b. was begun by Peter, chaplain of St. Mary Colechurch, a true Pontifex Maximus, in 1176. The legend runs that he founded the arches upon woollsacks, which has been rationalistically explained to mean that the money for the work was raised by a tax on wool. The b. was 33 years in building, had 19 stone arches with a wooden drawbridge to admit of the passage of ships, and was 926 ft. long and 40 wide. There was a chapel to St. Thomas à Becket upon it, and there the builder was buried. Another fire did great damage in 1212, and an order of "Brethren of L. B." was instituted in 1252 to raise money for repairs. There was a gate at each end over which the heads of traitors were exhibited in terrorem. During Elizabeth's reign a new gate and tower were erected at the Southwark end, and the famous Nonsuch House, 4 stories high, over the 11th and 12th arches. Houses and shops ran along the whole length of the B. on each side. The B. gradually became unsafe, and, after many attempts at repairing it, was replaced in 1824 by the present structure, which is 100 ft. W. of its predecessor. Hentzner, in his Travels (1612), describes it as follows: "On the S. is a b. of stone 800 ft. in length of wonderful work; it is supported upon 20 piers of square stone, 60 ft. high and 30 broad, joined by arches of about 20 ft. diameter. The whole is covered on each side with houses so disposed as to have the appearance of a continued st., not at all of a b. Upon this is built a tower on whose top the heads of such as have been executed for high treason are placed on iron spikes: we counted above 30." Fynes Morison, in Itinerary (1617), says, "The B. at L. is worthy to be numbered among the miracles of the world . . . The houses built upon the B. [are] as great and high as those of the firm land, so as a man cannot know that he passeth a b., save that the houses on both sides are combined in the top, making the passage somewhat dark, and that in some few open places the r. of Thames may be seen on both sides." Lupton, in London and the Country Carbonadoed (1632), says, "It may be said to be polypus, because it is so well furnished with legs: every mouth is 4 times filled in eight-and-forty hours, and then as a child it is still, but, as soon as they be empty, like a lion it roars and is wondrous impatient. . . . It is some prejudice to the water-man's gains: many go over here which otherwise should row or sail." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 45, says of Troyaovant (L.): "that with the waves Of wealthy Thamis washed is along, Upon whose stubborn neck (whereat he raves With roaring rage and sore himself does throng) . . . She fastened hath her foot, which stands so high That it a wonder of the world is song In foreign lands; and all which passen by, Beholding it from far, do think it threatens the sky." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge i. 119, says of L.: "There is such a b. of pulchritudeness that in all the world there is none like."

In Jonson's Tub i. 2, To-Pan boasts that his ancestors came over with Julius Cæsar, "vore either L., ay, or Kingston B., I doubt, were kursin'd." In Bale's Johan 272, Verity says of John: "In his days the B. the citizens did contrive." In B. & F. Pestle, Ind., the Citizen suggests, as subjects for a play, "The story of Q. Elinor; or, The Rearing of L. B. upon woollsacks." In Chaunticleers viii., Curds recalls the days "when we danced The building of L. B. upon woollpacks." In H6 B. iv. 4, 49, it is reported: "Jack Cade hath gotten L. B.," and in iv. 5, 3, "They have won the b., killing all those that withstand them." This was in 1450. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i., the Recorder says, "The rebels will either make assault at L. B. or else at Aldgate, both of which entrances should be strongly fortified."

The arches often needed repairing. In Jonson's Staple ii. 4, Shunfield says that old Pennyboy "minds a courtesy no more Than L. B. what arch was mended last." In Dekker's Satiromastix iii. 1, 278, Tucca says to Mrs. Miniver, "Thy teeth stand like the arches under L. b." i.e. there are frequent gaps between them. Dekker speaks of "your stiff-necked rebatoes [i.e. ruffs] that have more arches for pride to row under than can stand under 5 L. Bs." The gates were seldom free from the ghastly ornaments of traitors' heads. In R3 iii. 2, 72, Catesby affirms that the princes make high account of Lord Hastings: "For they account his head upon the B." In B. & F. Pestle ii. 8, Merrythought soliloquizes: "I have seen a man come by my door with a serious face, in a black cloak, without a hatband, carrying his head as though he looked for pins in the st.; I have looked out of my window half a year after, and have spied that man's head upon L. B." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii. 1, Ilford tells Wentloe that his face looks "worse than a knave's head shook 7 years in the weather upon L. B." Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchet (Eliz. Pamphlets, p. 73), hopes to see Martin Marprelate "look over all the city at L. B." In Bale's Johan 289, Imperial Majesty orders Sedition to be executed, "And on L. B. look ye bestow his head." In Nash's Wilton A. 2, the Hero says, "In a camp be many quarters, and yet not so many as on L. B." B. & F., in Corinth iv. 1, transfer the B. to Corinth and speak of "the poles on Corinth B. That bear the traitors' heads." In Trag. Richd. II i. 2, 115, Nimble hopes "that when I have passed the L. B. of affliction I may arrive . . . at the Westminster Hall of promotion."

As the piers occupied quite one-half of the breadth of the r., the banking up of the tide caused a difference of level on the 2 sides of the B. of as much as 4 ft.: hence there was great danger in trying to "shoot the b.," and the noise of the rushing water was loud. The figure in Cor. v. 4, 50 was no doubt suggested to the poet by what he had often seen as he crossed the B. on his way to the Bankside theatres: "Ne'er through an arch so hurried the blown tide As the recomforted through the gates." There is a similar allusion in Lucr. 1667: "As through an arch the violent roaring tide Outruns the eye that doth behold his haste, Yet in the eddy boundeth in his pride Back to the strait that forced him on so fast: In rage sent out, recalled in, rage being past:" Shirley, in Brothers, Prol., appeals to his audience: "As you were shooting the B., let no man shift or stir." In his Gamester iii. 3, the Gamester "desperately will shoot the B. at midnight Without a waterman." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity promises to take Pug to Billingsgate: "From thence shoot the B., child, to the Cranes in the Vintry." In Eastward iv. 1, Slitgut, watching the r. from Cuckolds Haven, exclaims: "Lord, what a coil the Thames keeps! it runs against L.-b., as it were, even full-but." Trimtram, in Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, says, "I'll practise to swim too, Sir, and then I may roar with the water at L. B.: he that roars by land and by water both is the perfect roarer." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, Fred, who is going to the Bear at the B.-foot, says, "We'll have music; I love noise. We will outroar the Thames and shake the B., boy." Morose, in Jonson's Epicoene iv. 2, mentions L. B., along with Paris Garden, Billingsgate, and other places, as a locality "where the noises are at their height and loudest." In B. & F. Prize i. 3, Sophocles says that Maria is such a talker that "The noise of L. B. is nothing near her." In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, George says, "There is such a noise as if it were a tenelement upon L. B. and built upon the Arches": with a pun upon the Court of Arches, where divorce cases were tried. In Nabbes' Totenham i. 1, Worthgood, approaching London, says, "Sure I hear the B.'s cataracts."

People crossed the river to Southwark by the B. instead of taking the ferry. Overbury, in his Character of a Waterman (1614), says, "L. B. is the most terrible eyecore to him that can be." In World Child i. 180, Folly says, "Over L. B. I ran and the straight way to the Stews I came." The Stews were on the Bankside, Southwark. Suicides were sometimes committed from the B. True-wit, in Jonson's Epicoene ii. 1, wonders that Morose is still alive when there is "L. B. at a low fall with a fine leap to hurry you down the stream." In Davenant's Wits iii. 1, the elder Palatine says, "You may as soon Take me for a whale, which is something rare, you know, o' this side of the B." Whales were occasionally stranded below the B., but not above it. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Sir Politick regards the appearance of "3 porpoises above the B." as a serious portent. This was on January 19th, 1605. But in Eastward iii. 3, the Drawer takes the fact that "there was a porpoise even now seen at L.-B." as merely an indication of a coming tempest. In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, "as long as the water runs under L. B." is used to mean "for ever." In Gamester iii. 3, Dwindle says of a great glutton: "Would he had L. B. in his belly too!" In Nash's Lenten, p. 326, mention is made of a "Bedlam hat-maker's wife by L. B.," who claimed to be the Messiah. The Bear at the Bridgefoot was a famous tavern (see under BEAR). During the reign of Elizabeth a Dutchman, Peter Morris, set up waterworks at the N. end of the B. for the pumping up of the river-water and the supplying of it to the citizens' houses. In Nash's Wilton, A. 4, Jack says, "The wheel under our city b. carries not so much water over the city as my brain hath welled forth in gushing streams of sorrow." So much for "that brave B., the bar that thwarts the Thames," as it is called in Peele's Alcazar.

LONDON STONE. One of the most venerable relics in L. It was probably the Roman miliarium, which stood in the centre of the city, and from which the miles on the roads out of L. were numbered. It used to stand on the S. side of Canwick (now Cannon) St., but was shifted to the N. side in 1742; and again in 1792 it was removed as an obstruction, and would have been destroyed but for the exertions of Mr. Thomas Maldon. It was then built into the wall of St. Swithin's Ch. in Cannon St., set in stone and protected by an iron cage, where it may still be seen. The original position was 35 ft. S.W. of its present location. In H6 B. iv. 6, the direction is: "Enter Jack Cade and the rest, and strikes his staff on L. S." Then he says, "Now is Mortimer Lord of this city. And here, sitting upon L. S., I charge and command that the Pissing Conduit run nothing but claret wine this first year of our reign." According to Hall, he struck it with his sword. Lydgate, in Lickpenny 71, says, "Then went I forth by L. S., Throughout all Canwick St., Drapers much cloth me offered anon." In T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 82, Eustace says, "Oh that I had with me As many good lads, honest prentices, From East Cheap, Canwick-st., and L. S." In Middleton's Aries, one of the worthies celebrated is "John Hinde, a re-edifier of the parish ch. of S. Swithin by L. S." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Valentine speaks of "Tom, the draper's man at L. S." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 5, Firk, being asked if he is sure of his news, replies: "Am I sure that Paul's steeple is a handful higher than L. S.?" In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, Frisco, leading the unhappy foreigners round L. in the night, says, "I have the scent of L. S. as full in my nose as Abchurch Lane of Mother Wall's pasties." In the list of Taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we have "the Bores Head near L. S." This is the famous Boar's Head in Eastcheap, a few yards E. of L. S.

LONDON WALL. The old wall of the city of L. ran in a circle from the Tower, by way of Aldgate, Bishopsgate, Aldersgate, Newgate, and Ludgate, to the Bridgegate at the entrance to L. Bdge. Posterns were afterwards broken through at Moorgate and Cripplegate, and at Christ's Hospital. Water-gates at Dowgate and Billingsgate gave admission to the city from the r. The circuit was a little over 2 m. The wall, built in Roman times, was from 9 to 12 ft. thick, and 20 ft. high. The portion along the river-side from the Fleet R. to L. Bdge. had been subverted long before the reign of Henry II, according to William Fitzstephen's evidence, but the part on the land side, with its gates and ditch, was kept in repair, and the gates closed at night, until the 17th cent. Since then it has gradually disappeared until none of the gates are now left, and the only fragments of the wall still visible are in the churchyard of St. Alphege, L. Wall; a bastion at St. Giles, Cripplegate; a small portion in St. Martin's Court, Ludgate Hill; and another in George St., Trinity Sq., Tower Hill. The st. called L. Wall runs W. from Bishopsgate St. to Wood St., along the S. side of the wall, which was still standing in a ruinous condition along the N. side of the st. in 1761. In Shirley's Riches iii., Gettings swears, "By the Hall ycleped Guild, and L. Wall." In Brome's Wit iii. 3, Crasy says he met Dol Tryman "about L. Wall." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iv. 4, Brainworm tells us that Cob, the water-bearer, "dwells by the Wall."

LONG ACRE. A st. in Lond. running N.E. from St. Martin's Lane to Drury Lane. It was first called the Elms, then Seven Acres, and finally L. A. from a narrow strip of land on the N. side, which belonged to the Abbot of Westminster. The name occurs as early as 1556, when Machyn relates in his Diary that one Recharde Eggylston was killed "in the L. Acurs, the back side of Charyng Cross." It seems to have been from the time of Charles I a favourite haunt of coachmakers, but it shared the bad reputation of its neighbours, Drury Lane and Covent Garden. In Spiritual

LONGAVILLE

Courts Epitomized (1641), Scrape-all, the proctor, says, "All Bloomsbury, Covent-Garden, L.-a., and Beech-lane were as fearful of me as of a constable." In St. Hilary's Tears (1642), the author speaks of "Covent-Garden, L.-a., and Drury-Lane, where those doves of Venus, those birds of youth and beauty (the wanton ladies) do build their nests." In Alimony ii. 1, the Boy says, "She [Lady Alimony] will make a quick despatch of all his L.-a.," i.e. of his estate.

LONGAVILLE (= LONGUEVILLE). A town in Normandy, 27 m. N. of Rouen. It gave their title to the Ducs de L., one of whom was prominently engaged in the wars of Henry of Navarre against the League. Probably the name of L. in L. L. L. was suggested to Shakespeare through this fact. There are French lords of L. in Dekker's Fortunatus, and in B. & F. Gentleman and Hon. Man.

LONG LANE. A st. in Lond. running E. from W. Smithfield to Aldersgate St. on the N. side of the old Priory of St. Bartholomew. It was chiefly occupied by pawnbrokers and old-clothes dealers. In Val. Welsh v. 4, Morgan says, "Cornwall, you are as arrant a knave as any Proker in Longlanes." This was in the time of Caractacus! In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Doll says to Jack Horner, "If all the brokers in L. l. had rifled their wardrobe, they would ha' been damned before they had fitted thee thus." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "She searched the middle aisle in Paul's and pressed 3 knaves, hired 3 liveries in L. L., to man her." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, the Steward says to Littleworth, "Your coat and cloak's a brushing In L.-l. Lombard": where Lombard means pawnshop. Nash, in Pierce, C. 3, laments that "swords and bucklers go to pawn apace in L. L." In 1634, Cromes, a broker of L. L., was imprisoned for lending a ch. robe with the name of Jesus upon it to the players in Salisbury Court. Taylor (Works ii. 3) couples L. L. with Houndsditch and Bridewell as places of ill-fame. In Shrew iv. 3, 187, Petruchio, after dwelling on the poor clothes that he and his wife are wearing, says, "Bring our horses unto L. L. End." The scene is in N. Italy, but probably the mention of the old clothes suggested to Shakespeare the name of the lane: certainly an Elizabethan audience would not be slow to take the point. In Nabbes' C. Garden i. 1, Ralph says of the players at the Cockpit: "They are men of credit; they make no yearly progress with the anatomy of a sumpter horse, laded with the sweepings of L.-L., purchased at the exchange of their own whole wardrobes." In ii. 2, Warrant says to Spruce, "Thou buyest thy laundry in L.-l. or Houndsditch." In Dekker's Last Will, the Devil writes: "Item, my will is that all the brokers in L.-l. be sent to me with all speed possible, because I have much of them laid to pawn to me." In Puritan i. 2, Pyebord says, "Where be your muskets, calivers, and hot-shots? In L. L., at pawn, at pawn." Fuller, Church Hist. (1656) vi. 1, 5, speaking of his work, says, "My wardrobe . . . will be but as from the second hand fetched from L.-l.," and in vi. 4, 2, he says, "Brokers in L.-l., when they buy an old suit, buy the linings together with the outside." Richard Olive, the printer, dwelt in L. L. and published, for Thomas Creede, Lyly's Maid's Meta, and Greene's Groatworth of Wit (1596). The imprint of the latter describes Richard Olive as "dwelling in long l. L.": the repetition is probably a misprint, not a description.

LONGOBARDS. See LOMBARDY.

LORRAINE

LORD MAYOR'S BANQUETING HOUSE. A house erected near the Tyburn conduit-head in Lond. for the entertainment of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen when they came out to inspect the source of their water-supply. It stood N. of Oxford St., where Stratford Pl. is now. It was a rustic building with gables and a thatched roof, and was taken down about 1750. In Jonson's Devil v. 1, Ambler tells, "I got the gentlewoman to go with me And carry her bedding to a conduit-head, Hard by the place toward Tyburn, which they call My Lord Mayor's banquetting house."

LORENZO'S (SAINT) MONASTERY. There is a ch. of San L. in Venice, in the E. part of the city, in the Rio di San L., a little W. of the Arsenal: this may be the place intended. In Middleton's Blurt iii. 1, the scene of which is laid in Venice, Fontanelle writes to Violette: "Meet me at the end of the old chapel next St. L. m." The next scene is laid there.

LORETTO. A city in Italy, 15 m. S.W. of Ancona and 120 m. N.E. of Rome. It derives its fame from the presence there of the Santa Casa, or Holy House: this is said to be the house in which our Lord lived at Nazareth. When it was in danger of being destroyed by the Turks the angels carried it through the air and set it down at Tersato in Dalmatia. This was in 1291; in 1294 they shifted it to a laurel grove near Recanati, and the next year brought it to its present site. It is a brick building 28 ft. by 12½, and 13½ ft. high. It contains a small black cedar-wood image of the Virgin and Child, said to have been carved by St. Luke. It is enclosed in the cathedral, and has been for centuries a most popular resort of pilgrims, and is still visited by half a million annually. In Webster's Malfi iii. 2, Bosola suggests to the Duchess "to feign a pilgrimage To our Lady of L., scarce 7 leagues From fair Ancona": it is really only 15 m. away. In Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, Vidame says that La Fin is near arriving: "For his particular journey and devotion Vowed to the holy Lady of L. Was long since past." In Davenport's Nightcap iii. 3, Dorothea, being asked to deny the paternity of her son, says, "Enjoin me first upon my knees to creep From Verona to L.": which would be about 200 m. Burton, A. M. Intro., satirizes those who run "to our lady of Sichern or Lauretta, to seek for help." Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603) ii. 15, says that "those of Galicia [go on pilgrimage] rather unto our Lady of Loreto" than to their own shrine of Santiago.

LORNE. An ancient name for a dist. in Argyleshire, Scotland, the chief town of which is Oban. The eldest son of the D. of Argyle bears the title of Marquis of L. In B. & F. Gentleman v. 1, his wife calls Marine, who has been gulled into the belief that he is the D. of Burgundy, "This gentleman, the Lord of L., my husband," i.e. the lost or forlorn lord. Mr. Oliphant thinks the reference is to some ballad.

LORRAINE. A dist. on the N.E. boundary between France and Germany, W. of Alsace. It took its name Lotharingia from Lothar II (855-869), and then included almost the whole of Holland and Belgium. The name was subsequently restricted to Upper L. In the 11th cent. it was conferred on Gerard of Alsace, whose descendants held the dukedom until the death of the last D., Stanislas, titular K. of Poland, in 1766, when it was united with France. In 1871 a large part of it was annexed to the German Empire, but restored to France in 1919. In H5 i. 2, 70, the Archbp. of Canterbury says that "Hugh Capet usurped the crown of Charles, the

d. of Loraine, sole heir male Of the true line and stock of Charles the Gt."; further, he says that Isabel, the grandmother of Lewis X (it should be IX) was "Lineal of the Lady Ermengare, daughter to Charles, the fore-said d. of Loraine." Hugh Capet was elected K. of France in 987: Charles of L., the heir of the Carolings, opposed him, but was taken prisoner and died in prison at Orleans. Lewis IX is St. Lewis: his grandmother was Isabel, niece of the Count of Flanders and wife of Philip II (Dieudonné). The point of the Archbp.'s argument is that the French kings claimed the crown through the female line, and therefore could not logically plead the Salic Law against the claim of Henry V. In Ed. III, the D. of L. appears as the ambassador from France to demand homage from Edward (i. 1), and at the battle of Crecy, where, as a matter of fact, he was slain (iii. 3 and 4). This was D. Rudolph. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, the Capt. tells Byron, "The horse the D. of L. Sent you at Vimie . . . pined away and died." This is Charles, who was D. from 1545 to 1608. Probably the same D. is referred to in B. & F. Chances iii. 1, where Peter brings word "The D. of L. now Is 7000 strong; I heard it of a fish-wife." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., the Cardinal of L. is present at the Pope's banquet. He was John, brother to D. Claude, who died in 1550. In Marlowe's Massacre v., a friar brings word to Dumaine: "Your brother, the Cardinal of L., by the K.'s consent, is lately strangled unto death." This was the brother of D. Henry, and the 3rd Cardinal of L. In Devonshire iv. 1, Manuel pretends that he "left his father at Nancy in L." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 100, Edward complains of Burgundy's breach of faith: "the place appointed [for our meeting] Was Cales, not L.," he says.

LOSTRIGON (i.e. LÆSTRYGMON). The Læstrygones were a race of cannibal giants visited by Odysseus (see Od. x). They were supposed to have lived near Leontini, in Sicily. In Mason's Mulleasses 1863, Timoclea says, "I am no Lamia nor L.," i.e. not an unnatural monster.

LOSTWITHEIL. Ancient town in Cornwall on the Fowey, 5 m. S. of Bodmin. In Cornish M. P. i. 2400, K. Solomon says to the Messenger, "My a re thyugh Bosuene, Lostuthyel, ha Lanerchy," i.e. "I will give you Bosvene, L., and Lanerchy."

LOTHBURY. A st. in Lond., N. of the Bank of England, running E. from the corner of Moorgate St. to Throgmorton St. Stow says, "This st. is possessed for the most part by founders that cast candlesticks, chafing dishes, spice mortars, and suchlike copper or laton works, and do afterwards turn them with the foot, making a loathsome noise to the by-passers, and therefore by them disdainfully called Lothberie." One can hardly believe that this derivation was seriously suggested. When Hotspur, in H4 A. iii. 1, 131, says he "had rather hear a brazen canstick turned" than a ballad-singer, he was probably thinking of a L. experience. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon, in the expectation of getting the philosopher's stone, says, "I will send to L. for all the copper." In Gipsies, Patricio prays that the K. may be delivered "from the candlesticks of L.," amongst other disagreeable noises. In Davenport's New Trick ii. 1, Mrs. Changable threatens to make her husband's house as noisy "As if you were to lodge in L., Where they turn brazen candlesticks." Amongst the taverns mentioned in News Barthol. Fair is "the Windmill in Lothburry." There were also booksellers in the st. Youth was "Imprinted in L. over against St. Margaretes Ch. by me Willyam Copland." He also printed an edition of Howleglas in 1548. Abington was "Imprinted for Joseph Hunt and William Ferbrand and are to be sold at the corner of Coleman st. near Loathburie." There was a conduit at the corner of L. and Coleman St. In Armin's Moreclacke, C. 3, Ferris says to John, "Your nose is like L. conduit that always runs waste."

LOTTERY HOUSE. The first English public lottery was drawn on 11 January 1569, in a wooden shed at the W. door of St. Paul's. Wager's The Longer was "Imprinted at Lond. by Wyllyam How for Richarde Johnes, and are to be sold at his shop under the Lotterie H." It is undated, but was published just about 1569. In The Great Frost (1608), the Countryman speaks of the L. "in the 11th year of Q. Elizabeth. It was held at the W. door of St. Paul's Ch." In Induction to Jonson's Barthol, the Book-holder says of the would-be critic of the Play: "He shall put in for censures here, as they do for lots in the L.; marry, if he drop but 6d. at the door, and will censure a crowns-worth, it is thought there is no conscience or justice in that."

LOUNDRES. Flemish for Lond.; Cf. French Londres. In Webster's Weakest iii. 4, Jacob van Smelt says, "For England, for L., they segt."

LOUVAINE, or LOVAINE. A town in Belgium, 18 m. E. of Brussels. The University, founded in 1425, had no fewer than 6000 students annually during the 16th cent. It was one of the chief strongholds of the Roman Catholic faith. L. is one of the places visited by Merry Report in J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100. In Greene's Friar ix. 113, Vandermaast claims to have given the non-plus to them of "Rheims, L., and fair Rotterdam." Ascham, in Scholemaster (1570), says, "More Papists be made by your merry books of Italy than by your earnest books of L." In B. & F. Elder B. ii. 1, Miramont says to Charles, "The University L. for thy sake Hath tasted of my bounty." He had paid for Charles as a student there. In Massinger's Madam iii. 2, Frugal is reported by Lacy to have retired into a monastery: "I saw him," he says, "take post for Dover . . . and by this he's safe at Calais, And ere long will be at L." Dekker, in Double P. P. (1606), says of the Papist volant: "Better does he thrive at Louayne than in Lond., for Rome lends him a free tongue there." In Davenant's Plymouth iv. 1, one of Trifle's ridiculous reports is: "Antwerp is plundered, the cannon brought before L."

LOUVRE. A palace in Paris on the N. bank of the Seine, S. of the Rue de Rivoli and E. of the Tuileries. The site was chosen and the building begun by Philip Augustus. It was rebuilt by Francis I, and the work was continued by Charles IX, Henri III, Henri IV, and Louis XIII: it was not completed, however, until the time of Napoleon III. It was originally a royal palace, but in 1793 was converted into a National Museum and Art Gallery. In H5 i. 3, 132, Exeter says to the Dauphin, "He [Henry] will make your Paris L. shake for it. Were it the mistress-court of mighty Europe." In H8 i. 3, 23, the Lord Chamberlain says, "I would pray our monsieurs To think an English courtier may be wise And never see the L." In Middleton's Blurt i. 1, Fontinelle says, "The darkest dungeon her eyes can make as lightsome as the fairest chamber in Paris L." In B. & F. French Law iii. 2, Cleremont promises La Writ to meet him "to-morrow morning in the L." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 223, the Londoner says, "I point not with great wonder at the L., the fame of the palace consisting more in the vast design of what it was meant to be than in the largeness of what it is."

LOVE LANE. A st. in Lond. running S. from Eastcheap to Lower Thames St., a little E. of Pudding Lane. There is also a L. L. running from Wood St. to Aldermanbury, but in the following passage the mention of Pudding L. would seem to indicate that the former is intended. In Jonson's Christmas, Venus says, "I am Cupid's own mother: I dwell in Pudding L.—ay, forsooth, he is prentice in L. L., with a bugle-maker, that makes of your bobs, and birdbolts for ladies."

LOW COUNTRIES (Cs. = Countries, Cy. = Country). Properly, countries on the seashore, but specially applied to the Netherlands, including Holland and Belgium. In Dekker's Northward iv. 2, Jenkin speaks of "all the L. Cs. in Christendom, as Holland and Zealand and Netherland and Cleveland." Most of the references are to the wars in the Netherlands between the United Provinces and the K. of Spain, in the late 16th and early 17th cents. Large numbers of Englishmen served in these wars against the Spaniards as volunteers, amongst them Ben Jonson, who was there about 1595. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy i. 1, Monsieur, the D. of Anjou, is taking his leave for Brabant, where he is going professedly to help the Dutch against the Spaniards, and Clermont speaks of him as "The toward victor of the whole L. Cs." The prophecy was not fulfilled, for the expedition was a complete failure. In Shirley's C. Maid iii. 1, Clement says, "If the K. of Spain had but that politick head, I know who might go fish for the L. Cs.," i.e. no one could successfully oppose him. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Sir Politick says that Stone, the Fool, "received weekly intelligence . . . out of the L. Cs., in cabbages." Cabbages were first brought into England from Holland about the beginning of the 17th cent. Evelyn, in Acetaria 11 (1699), says, "'Tis scarce a hundred years since we first had cabbages out of Holland." In Massinger's New Way i. 2, Furnace, the cook, says that he raises "fortifications in the pastry such as might serve for models in the L. Cs." In Jonson's Staple v. 1, Picklock says that the deed he possesses "is a thing of greater consequence than to be borne about in a black box like a L. Cy. vorloffie," i.e. furlough. In Brome's Covent G. iii. 1, Cockbrain boasts, "I have seen the face of war and served in the L. Cs., though I say it, on both sides." Dekker, in Beltman, says of certain beggars: "These carry the shapes of soldiers, and can talk of the L. Cs., though they never were beyond Dover." In T. Heywood's Traveller ii. 2, Reginald promises to make young Lionel as safe from his father "as you were now in the L. Cs., Virginia, or the Indies": all of which were used as places of refuge by people in difficulties. Earle, in Microcosmog. viii., says of the Younger Brother: "His last refuge is the L. Cs., where rags and lice are no scandal." Jonson, in Underwoods lxi. 203, wishes that Vulcan had been "fixt in the L. Cs. where you might On both sides do your mischief with delight."

There are many complaints about the low rate of the soldiers' pay. In Shirley's Riches, sc. 2, the Courtier says to the Soldier, "You have 12 pence for your service in the L. Cs." In Dekker's Edmonton iii. 1, Cuddy says, "Ask any soldier that ever received his pay but in the L. Cs., and he'll tell thee there are 8 days in the week there hard by." In Kirke's Champions iii. 1, the Clown says, "They that in the L. Cy. garrisons kill men for 3/- a week are punies to us." Consequently the soldiers were not good payers. In Glapthorne's Hollander iv. 1, Sconce says, "'Tis hereditary to L. Cy. soldiers to wear off reckonings." There was naturally a good deal of loose living in the camps. In Dekker's Northward iii. 1,

Philip asks: "Would not this woman deceive a whole camp in the L. Cs.?" In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Sconce complains of "the gentle itch which I obtained in the L. Cs." In Middleton's Blurt i. 2, Lazarillo says, "The commodities which are sent out of the L. Cs. and put in mother Cornelius' dry-fats are most common in France." These dry-fats, or tubs, were used in the treatment of syphilis. In Tuke's Five Hours iv. 1, Sancho says, "I shall soon forget my damsels in the L. Cs." There was plenty of hanging done in the wars. In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Flamineo says, "When knaves come to preferment, they rise as gallowses are raised in the L. Cs., one upon another's shoulders." The imposts in the L. Cs. were very heavy. In the same play (iii. 1) Monticelso says that whores are "Worse than those tributes i' the L. cs. paid Exactions upon meat, drink, garments, sleep."

The Dutch had the reputation of being fond of beer, and of butter, cheese, and greasy foods in general. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, the Clown, acting as Zany for Forobosco, says, "When he was in the L. Cs. he used nothing but buttered beer, coloured with alligant, for all kinds of maladies; and that he called his catholic medicine. Sure the Dutch smelt out it was buttered beer, else they would never have endured it, for the name's sake": the Dutch being Protestants, and therefore hating the name Catholic. In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Folly says, "Another steep but into the L. Cs. and was drunk dead under the table." In iv. 1, he avers that drinking is "a humour in fashion with gallants and brought out of the L. Cs." Nash, in Pierce, E. 3, says, "Let me descend to superfluity in drink, a sin that, ever since we have mixed ourselves with the L. Cs., is counted honourable." In Lawyer iv., Vaster says, "A piece of cheese of the L.-Cy. dairies, This is the usual diet of the fairies." In Three Lords, Dods. vi., 413, Simony says, "In Scotland and the L. Cs. where they are reformed, they cannot abide me." Dekker, in Catchpol, says, "Hypocrisy came into the L. Cs. where he would not talk unless he drank with you and called you Myn Leeuin Broder, only to overreach you of your bargain."

The L. Cs. is often used for the lower parts of the body, especially the sexual organs. In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Trimtram says of the pander, bawd, and whore: "The L. Cs. did ever find them bread." In Underwit v. 4, Underwit says, "She will do you service in a L. Cy. leaguer," i.e. a brothel. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, when Trapdoor is asked where he has served, he says, "Not in the L. Cs., if it please your manhood, but in Hungary." In H4 B. ii. 2, 26, the Prince says to Poina, "The rest of thy L. Cs. have made a shift to eat up thy Holland, and God knows whether those that bawl out the ruins of thy linen shall inherit his kingdom." In other words, Poina has sat through the tail of his shirt: note the puns on Holland (i.e. linen) and shift, and the allusion in the last sentence to the revolt of the Netherlands. In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Bellamont talks of a citizen lying "in his own L. Cy. of Holland, his own linen I mean." In his Satiromastix ii. 1, 28, Mrs. Miniver says, "I ha' some things that were fetched as far as some of the L. Cs., and I paid sweetly for them, too." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Mrs. Openwork says to her husband, who has just spoken to Moll, "How now? Greetings? Love-terms? I send you for Hollands, and you're i' the L. Cs. with a mischief!" In B. & F. Wild Goose v. 6, Belleur, who has decided to give up travel in order to be married, says, "No more for Italy; for the L. Cs. I." The L. Cs. is also used for Hell. In Noble Soldier v. 2, Baltasar says,

"You were better sail to Bantam in the W. Indies than to Barathrum in the L. Cs." In Brewer's Lovesick King iv., Grim says, "If you would rake hell and Phlegitan, Acaron and Barrathrum, all those L. Cs. cannot yield you such a company" as his colliers. See also HOLLAND, FLANDERS, NETHERLANDS, and SUFFOLK.

LOWESTOFT. A spt. in Suffolk, 23 m. S.W. of Norwich, on the most easterly point of England. The birthplace of Thomas Nash.

LOWGAVE. See ADDENDA.

LOW PROVINCES (= LOW COUNTRIES, q.v.). In B. & F. Cure i. 1, Lamoral speaks of "Holland, with those L. P. that hold out against the arch-duke."

LOYCE (a misprint for LOYRE = LOIRE, q.v.). Daniel, in Epist. Ded. to Cleopatra, says that English poetry ought "to Iberus, L., and Arve to teach That we part glory with them."

LUBBER'S HEAD. See LIBBARD'S HEAD.

LÜBECK. One of the Free Cities of Germany, at the confluence of the Wackenitz and the Trave, 10 m. from the Gulf of Lübeck, 150 m. N.W. of Berlin. It was the principal emporium of the Baltic, and carried on an extensive trade. In Chettle's Hoffman H. 3, Hoffman says of Prince Charles: "He did perish in the wrack When he came first by sea from L. haven." In Faire Em. i. 3, the Marques of L. is present in the Danish court. He is an entirely imaginary personage. In Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, Barabas talks of debts owing to him "In Frankfort, L., Moscow, and where not." The beer of L. was noted for its strength. Nash, in Wilton, E. 1, says, "Thy horses shall kneel up to their knees in spruce beer and L. liquor." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 3, Brutus professes, "Were it in L. or double-double beer, I'd pledge it," and in iii. 5, Valerius sings, "The Russ drinks quass: Dutch, L. beer, And that is strong and mighty." In Glaphorn's Wallenstein iii. 3, Newman says, "I think you're drunk with Ls. beer."

LUCANIA. A dist. in ancient Italy in the S. of the peninsula, on the Gulf of Tarentum, lying W. of Apulia and N. of Bruttium. Venusium, the birthplace of Horace, was on the borders of Apulia and L. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 2, Horace says, "Ln. or Apulian, I not [i.e. know not] whether, For the Venusian colony ploughs either": a translation of Hor., Sat. ii. 1, 35.

LUCAR'S (SAINT); SANLUCAR-DE-BARRAMEDA. A spt. in Spain, at the mouth of the Guadalquivir, 18 m. N. of Cadiz. It was here that Columbus started for his 3rd voyage in 1498, and Magellan for his circumnavigation of the world in 1519. In B. & F. Cure i. 1, Lamoral tells that he saw Alvarez "land at S. L." on his return to Seville from banishment.

LUCCA. City in N. Italy, near the coast, 40 m. W. of Florence. During the Middle Ages it was constantly at war with Pisa and Florence. In Davenant's Siege i. 1, the Pisan Colonel says, "Twice have we sent to Florence for redress Of injuries received from those of L." In his Cr. Brother iii. 4, the scene of which is Sienna, Foreste says to Lucio, "The sun will fail ye Ere ye reach L." In Oth. i. 3, 44, the D. asks: "Marcus Luccicos, is not he in town?" and is answered: "He's now in Florence." Probably Luccicos means "of L.": some editors would read Luchese. He was, it may be guessed, one of the military officers in the pay of Venice. In Langland's Piers C. v. 194, he speaks of "Lumbardes of Lukes that liven by lone as Jewes." In the shrine in the nave of St. Martin's Cathedral is preserved a cedar-wood crucifix, said to have been carved by Nicodemus. In Langland's Piers C. ix. 109, Piers swears "by the rode of Lukes." The staple manufacture was silk, but L. olive oil was also celebrated. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, Engine enumerates amongst other dainties "snails soused in L. oil." In the neighbourhood of L. there are several mineral springs which have long had a reputation for the cure of various ailments. In Webster's Malfi ii. 1, Bosola advises Castruccio and the old Lady, "Get you to the wells of L. to recover your aches." In Ford's Sacrifice iv. 2, the D. of Pavia says, "I mean To speed me straight to L. where perhaps Absence and bathing in those healthful springs May soon recover me." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 3, Juliana being ill, the physicians "Prescribed the baths of L. as a means For her recovery." In Webster's Malfi iii. 2, Cariola advises the Duchess to "progress to the baths of L. Or go visit the Spa In Germany." Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603) ii. 15, satirizes the men of Liège for preferring "the Bathes of Luca" to their own Spa. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio characterizes it as "industrious L."

LUCERA (the ancient LUCERIA). A city and the seat of a bp. in S. Italy, 65 m. N.E. of Naples. The cathedral and bp.'s palace are noteworthy buildings. In Brome's Concubine v. 9, Alinda says, "I beg my father's aid to be removed Back to my country Naples; and, in that, Into the Magdalene nunnery at L."

LUCRECE. A bookseller's sign in Lond. The Trial of Treasure was "Imprinted in Paules churchyard at the sign of the Lucrece by Thomas Purfoote. 1567."

LUCRINE LAKE. A salt-water lagoon at the head of the bay in the Gulf of Naples, between Baia and Puteoli. It was separated from the sea by a broad sandbank, and from Lake Avernus by a sandy flat. It was used for the cultivation of oysters, which had a great reputation. In May's Agrippina v. 476, Anicetus tells how Agrippina escaped from Nero's plot to drown her in the Bay of Baia and "through L. 1. To her own house was carried at the last." In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline, inveighing against the aristocrats, says, "The r. Phasis cannot afford them fowl, nor L. L. Oysters enow." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises Physander "cockles of L.": no doubt he means oysters. Drayton, in Polyolb. xix. 118, says that the oysters of Walfleet excel those "on the Lucrinian coast." Milton, P. R. ii. 347, speaks of "all fish . . . of shell or fin, And exquisitest name, for which was drained Pontus, and L. bay, and Afric coast."

LUDGATE. One of the old gates of the City of Lond., overstriding L. Hill just W. of St. Martin's Ch. Tradition assigned its building to a fabulous K. Lud in the year 66 B.C. The old wall came down from New-gate to L., and went on to the Thames. The gate was rebuilt by the Barons, who were opposed to K. John, in 1215, the stones being taken from the Jews' houses which they had pulled down. In 1260 it was repaired and adorned with statues of K. Lud and his sons: the heads of the statues were knocked off by the Puritans in the reign of Edward VI, but replaced by Q. Mary. In 1586 the old gate was taken down and a new one erected with K. Lud and his sons on one side and Q. Elizabeth on the other. It was gutted, but not destroyed, in the Gt. Fire. In 1760 the materials were sold to a certain Blagden, a carpenter, and the venerable building was removed. The statue of Elizabeth was placed on the tower of St. Dunstan's in Fleet St., and when the ch. was rebuilt in 1830 was let into the wall over the vestry porch, where it still stands. K. Lud and his sons were stored away in the bone-house, but in 1830 they were bought, along with the old church clock, and set up by Lord Hertford on his new house in Regent's Park, which he called St. Dunstan's. The gate was guarded by a Watch and closed every night: it was not till 1753 that the postern was allowed to be kept open all night.

In the 1st year of Richd. II Ludgate was made into a prison for debtors and bankrupts. In 1419 it was disqualified as a prison and the inmates were removed to Newgate, but so many of them died there of gaol-fever that those who survived were brought back to L. a few months later by order of Sir Richard Whittington and the debtors' prison re-established. According to the story, which was dramatized in W. Rowley's New Wonder, a certain Stephen Forster was in his youth confined in L., but was released by the generosity of a rich widow whom he afterwards married. He became Lord Mayor in 1454, and his widow in 1463 enlarged the prison by adding a quadrangle and a chapel, and also laid on water for the prisoners and had the roof leaded. It remained a prison to the end, when the prisoners were removed to the Lond. workhouse. In More ii. 2, Williamson reports, "Shreve More an hour ago received Some of the Privy Council in at L." This was on the occasion of the prentices' riot. In Webster's Wyat, p. 47, Wyat says, "Soft, this is L.: stand aloof! I'll knock." This was in the rebellion of 1554, when Wyat led his followers up Fleet St. to L., but Lord William Howard closed the gate against him and answered his knock with "Avaunt thee, traitor, thou shalt not come in here." He then fell back to Temple Bar, where he was arrested. "From Aldgate to L." is used, like "from the Tower to the Temple," for the whole of the city. Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchet (Eliz. Pamphlets, p. 73), says, "We hope to see him [Martin] stride from Aldgate to L. and look over all the city at Lond. Bdge." In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Eyre adjoins his prentices, "Fight, by the Lord of L.!" i.e. K. Lud. In Mayne's Match i. 4, Newcut, the Templar, says, in reference to Plotwell, the mercer, "Sirrah Bright, Didst look to hear such language beyond L.?" and Bright rejoins: "I thought all wit had ended at Fleet-Bdge." The Fleet St. lawyers and wits regarded the citizens beyond (i.e. to the east of) L. with contempt. In Puritan i. 3, Frailty, catching a whiff of the Corporal's breath, exclaims, "Foh! I warrant, if the wind stood right, a man might smell him from the top of Newgate to the leads of L.," i.e. a furlong off. There appears to have been a clock on the gate, for, in Middleton's R. G. ii. 2, Sebastian says, "The clock at L., Sir, it ne'er goes true." In B. & F. Pestle iii. 2, the Citizen's wife cries, "Away, George, away! raise the watch at L.!" In Glapthorne's Wit iv. 1, Busie says, "A sedan shall carry them unseen through the watch at L. into Whitefriars." Allusions to L. as a debtors' prison are numerous. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 7, Fallace says her husband "kept a poor man in L. once 12 years for 16 shillings." In W. Rowley's New Wonder i. 1, Brewen says of Forster: "He's now in L., Sir, and part of your treasure lies buried with him." In Act V we have the account of Stephen Forster's purpose to enlarge the prison. He gives directions that the prisoners should be conveyed "From L. unto Newgate and the Counters," in order that he may "take the prison down and build it new, With leads to walk on, chambers large and fair"; and later he says, "The plumbers and the workmen have surveyed The ground from Paddington; whence I'll have laid pipes To Lond. to convey sweet water into L."

In Massinger's Madam i. 3, Frugal says that to borrow money at interest is "The certain road to L. in a citizen." Taylor (Works ii. 38) calls it "K. Lud's unlucky gate," and (ii. 91) he says, "The ocean that Suretyship sails in is the spacious Marshalsea; sometimes she anchors at Newgate rd., sometimes at L. Bay." In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, Monopoly says, "If I could meet one of those sergeants I would make them scud so fast from me, that they should think it a shorter way between this [Shoreditch] and L. than a condemned cut-purse thinks it between Newgate and Tyburn." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Valentine says that wives, by their extravagance, "see their husbands lodged in L." In Dekker's Satiro. iv. 3, 107, it is said of Horace (Ben Jonson): "He talks and rants for all the world like the poor fellow under L.," i.e. the prisoner who clapped his dish and kept up a monotonous cry of "Pity the poor prisoners," in order to get alms from the passers-by. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. i. 1, Cordatus says, "Beware you commerce not with bankrupts or poor needy Ludgathians," i.e. people who have been in L. for debt. In Brome's Northern iii. 3, Luckless says, "If she be not mistress of her art, there is no bankrupt out of L. nor whore out of Bridewell."

In Hycke, p. 99, Frewyll tells how Imaginacioun "to L. took the way," and there went into an apothecary's shop and stole a bag of gold. In Nabbes' C. Garden iv. 3, Dasher says, "A country gentleman to sell his land is, as it were, to change his copy; which changing of copy ends many times in the city freehold at L." Dekker, in Seven Sins, makes Politicke Bankruptism enter the City by L. and receive a welcome "by a bird picked out of purpose amongst the Ludgathians." In Bellman, he speaks of "Citizens that have been blown up [i.e. made bankrupt] without gunpowder, and by that means have been free of the Grate at L." The grate was the opening through which the prisoners solicited alms from the passers-by. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says of the author: "L., the floodgate of great Lond.'s people, With double doors receives a wight so dapper."

LUDGATE HILL. Originally L. stood across the st. just W. of St. Martin's, Lond.: the st. as far as L. was called Fleet St., and that from L. to St. Paul's Bowyer Row or L. St. Later, the part between the Fleet Bdge. and L. was called L. Hill, and when the gate was removed the whole st. from the Fleet Bdge. to St. Paul's took that name. Barclay's Lost Lady was "Imprinted at Lond. by Jo. Okes for John Colby and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the Holy Lamb on L. H." The date is 1639.

LUDLOW. A town in Shropshire on the Teme, 143 m. W. of Lond. The castle, the ruins of which are in a fair state of preservation, was repaired by Edward IV. and made the court of the Prince of Wales. In R3 ii. 2, 121, after the death of Edward IV, Buckingham suggests that "Forthwith from L. the young prince be fetched Hither to Lond.": which is accordingly done. During the reign of Henry VIII, and subsequently, the Lords-Presidents of the Marches held their courts there, and during the Presidency of the Earl of Bridgewater in 1634 Milton's Comus was "presented at L. Castle." In B. & F. Nightwalker iii. 4, Alathe, disguised as a pedlar, offers for sale "a Ballad of the witches hanged at L.": no doubt in one or other of the British Solomon's witch-hunts.

LUD'S TOWN. An affected archaism for Lond., in reference to the legend that a mythical king, Lud, repaired the city, which had been built by Brute under the name of Troynovant (i.e. New Troy), and gave it his own name, L. T., which was also preserved in Ludgate, q.v. In Cym. iii. 1, 32, the Q. recalls how Cassibelaun "Made L. T. with rejoicing fires bright." In iv. 2, 99, Cloten threatens to set the head of Guiderius "on the gates of L. T.": referring to the practice of fixing the heads of traitors on the gates of Lond. In v. 5, 481, Cymbeline gives order to "march through L. T." to ratify the peace with the Romans.

LUUGORY, CAPE. Probably Cape Caccia on the W. coast of Sardinia in the dist. of Logudoro is intended. In Ford's Trial iii. 4, Banatzi says, "I was born at sea, as my mother was in passage from C. L. to C. Cagliari, toward Afric, in Sardinia."

LUGG. A river on the borders of England and Wales, rising in Radnorsh., and after a course of about 40 m. falling into the Wye a little S. of Hereford. In Death Huntington ii. 2, Young Brian speaks of the "Lord of the March That lies on Wye, Lug, and the Severn streams."

LUKE'S (SAINT). The parish ch. of Chelsea, near the Thames. Here Sir Thomas More was buried, also the mother of the poet John Fletcher. It dates from the 14th cent.: the chapel in the S. aisle was added by Sir Thomas More about 1530.

LUKE'S, SAINT. A ch. in Padua. In Shrew iv. 4, 88 and 103, Biondello tells Lucentio, "The old priest of St. L. ch. is at your command," and later: "My master hath appointed me to go to St. L. to bid the priest be ready." I can find no such ch. in Padua, nor was there any ch. of St. Luke in Lond.

Also a country suburb of Vienna. In Meas. iii. 1, 276, the D. says, "I will presently to St. L.: there, at the moated grange, resides this dejected Mariana." I can find no S. L. at Vienna: was Shakespeare thinking of Chelsea, the old parish ch. of which was dedicated to St. Luke? It was a country vill., where there were no doubt moated granges.

LUMBARDY. See LOMBARDY.

LUMBER, or LUMBERT, STREET. See LOMBARD STREET.

LUNINGBERGE (= LUNEBURG). A town in Hanover, 28 m. S.E. of Hamburg. In Chettle's Hoffman B. 1, Lorrique says, "Were I at L. and you caught me thus, I should go near to ask you 'At whose suit?'" and again, "Here is the Duke's heir of Leningberge."

LUSITANIA. One of the 3 Roman provinces in the Iberian peninsula, roughly corresponding to the modern Portugal. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 1, Cassius says, "Brutus, thou hast commanded The feared Celts and Ln. horse." In Nero iv. 5, Poppæa speaks of "Otho, who is now under pretext of governing exiled to L." Otho was sent as governor of L. because Nero was jealous of his attractions for Poppæa. In May's Agrippina v. 245, Otho announces: "The government of L. By Nero's grace and favour is bestowed On me." This was in A.D. 58. In Jonson's Blackness, Niger, having been told to seek for freedom in a land ending in -tania, tries Mauritania, then "swarth L.," then Aquitania, and finally Brittania. In B. & F. Bonduca i. 2, Petillius complains that the soldiers are so fastidious that "No oil but Candy, Ln. figs, And wine from Lesbos now can satisfy 'em."

LUTETIA (more fully, L. PARISIORUM). The Roman name for what afterwards became Paris. In Greene's Friar ix. 114, the quartos represent Vandermast as boasting that he "has given the non-plus To them of Frankfort, Lutrecht, and Orleans." Fleay conjectures "L." for the unintelligible "Lutrecht," and Ward accepts it. In iv. 50, the Emperor mentions Paris as one of the universities that had been visited by Vandermast: which seems to demand that it should be in this list. In Marlowe's Massacre v., Henri says, "Here we'll lie before L.-walls Girding this strumpet city with our siege." This was in 1589, after the murder of the D. of Guise. In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater says, "Paris was built by the youngest son of Priam, and was called by his name; yet some call it L. because the gentlewomen there play so well upon the lute": a truly ingenious derivation! In T. Heywood's Dialogues i. 414, Adolphos says of St. Christopher: "He in the chief ch. of L. stands." There was a colossal wooden statue of the Saint in Notre Dame at Paris, erected in 1413 and destroyed in 1785.

LUTRECHT. There is no such place as Lutrecht, and the obvious correction to Utrecht can hardly be maintained, because the University of Utrecht was not founded till 1636. See, however, under LUTETIA.

LUX (= LUXEUIL, or LUXEN). A town in France in the Department of Haute-Saône, abt. 200 m. S.E. of Paris. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy, speaking of the battle at Fontaine Française, says, "The Baron of Lux Set on their charge so hotly, that his horse Was slain." This was Edmé de Malain, who afterwards joined in Biron's conspiracy.

LUXEMBOURG. A public garden in Paris, on the S. of the Seine in the angle formed by the Boulevards St. Germain and St. Michel. The Palais de L. was built at its N. end in the beginning of the 17th cent. as the residence of Marie de Medici, and was converted by Napoleon I into a hall for the meetings of the Chamber of Peers. The picture galleries are famous in the artistic world. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 221, the Parisian says, "L. and the Tuileries no ill accommodations for the citizens of Paris" (as compared with Moorfields in London).

LUZ. The old name of Bethel, q.v. (see Gen. xxviii. 19). Milton, P. L. iii. 513, tells of Jacob "in the field of Luz Dreaming by night under the open sky."

LYBANUS. See LEBANON.

LYBIA. See LIBYA.

LYCÆUS. A lofty mtn. in Arcadia from which a magnificent view of a large part of the Peloponnesus is obtained. It was the seat of the worship of Zeus, and Pan was supposed to have been born there and had a temple on the mountain. In Milton's Arcades 98, the song begins: "Nymphs and shepherds, dance no more; On old L. or Cyllene hoar Trip no more in twilight ranks." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises Phylsander, "From some height we'll number The pines that crown L."

LYCAONIA. A dist. in the centre of Asia Minor. After the fall of the Persian Empire it came successively under the dominion of the Seleucidae at Antioch and Eumenes of Pergamos. Under a local chieftain named Amyntas during the 1st cent. B.C., it became an important independent kingdom, and Amyntas was one of the allies of Antony in his war with Octavian. After his murder L. became part of the Roman Empire. In Ant. iii. 6, 75, Cæsar enumerates "Polemon and Amyntas, The Kings of Mede and L." amongst the allies of Antony. It was part of the kingdom of Midas. In Lyly's Midas iii. 1, Midas says, "I call to mind My cruelties in L." Barnes, in Parthenophil xi. 8, asks: "Was it concluded . . . that . . . Beneath the Ln. axle-tree Where ceaseless snows and frost's extremity Hold jurisdiction, should remain my Fear?"

LYCEUM. A garden, E. of ancient Athens, used as a gymnasium, and dedicated to Apollo Lyceus, a little way outside the city walls. It was the place where Aristotle taught as he walked about in the grounds, whence his school was called the Peripatetic school. Milton, P. R. iv. 253, makes Satan say to our Lord, "Within the walls then view The schools of ancient sages—his who bred Great Alexander to subdue the world, L. there." Satan is wrong: the L. was not within the walls.

LYCIA. The dist. in S.W. Asia Minor between Caria and Pamphylia, extending from the Taurus range to the coast. It was inhabited by a people distinct from the Greeks, whose federal constitution was the admiration of Strabo and Montesquieu. They preserved their independence until 546 B.C., when they were conquered by the Persians, and henceforward fell under the sway of the successive empires of the East, retaining, however, much of their primitive constitution. L. became part of the Roman Empire. With the rest of Asia Minor it came under the rule of the Turks. In Davenant's Rhodes A. ii., "Pioneers from L. brought" are in the army of Solyman, the Turkish emperor. The country was mountainous and well watered, and became a sort of Arcadia in Asia Minor. In Shirley's Arcadia v. 2, Pyrocles chooses as his champion "Daiphantus of L." L. is the scene of B. & F. Cupid's Rev., which is based on Sidney's Arcadia, Bk. II, and in i. 1 it is stated that the Lns. were the inventors of the worship of Cupid. A K. of L. is one of the characters in T. D.'s Banquet. In Apus 426, Apus prays: "O gods above, bend down to hear my cry As once he did to Salmasis, in pond hard Lyzia by." See SALMACIS.

LYCUS (the name given by Polybius to the ZABATUS, or GREATER ZAB). A r. of Assyria, rising in the mtns. of Armenia and flowing into the Tigris a little S. of the mounds of Nimrod, the site of the ancient Calah, a few m. S. of Nineveh. In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass iv. 1, Jonah says, "Behold sweet L. streaming in his bounds, Bearing the walls of haughty Nineveh"; and in i. 10, Rasni speaks of "great Ninivie, Rounded with L. silver flowing streams." Nineveh was actually on the Tigris.

LYDFORD. A vill. in Devonsh. on the borders of Dartmoor, 31 m. W. of Exeter. It has an ancient castle which was formerly used as the prison for the tin-mining districts. The summary administration of justice there gave rise to the phrase "L. law"; which means hanging a man first and trying him afterwards. Langland, in Rich. Redeless (1399) iii. 145, says, "Now, be the lawe of lydford, . . . thilke lewde ladde ought evyll to thryve." Jewell, Repl. to Harding (1565), 356, says, "Heere he thought . . . to charge us with the Law of L." W. Browne (1645) is the reputed author of a verse "I oft have heard of L. law, How in the morn they hang and draw, And sit in judgement after." Blount, Glossogr. s.v. (1656), defines L. law "to hang men first and indite them afterwards."

LYDIA. A dist. on W. coast of Asia Minor, between Mysia on the N. and Caria on the S. Under the rule of Croesus (560-546 B.C.) it became the dominant state of Asia Minor. Croesus had the reputation of fabulous wealth, and the tragedy of his fall impressed the mediaeval imagination. His story is told by the Monk in Chaucer's C. T. B. 3917. In Cyrus, Cyrus says, "Croesus is foiled and fled to L." In Massinger's Actor ii. 1, Latinus says, in the play within the play, "I have hoarded A mass of treasure, which, had Solon seen, The Ln. Croesus had appeared to him Poor as the beggar Iru." Solon was reported to have visited Croesus, and, after being shown his treasures, to have advised him to call no man happy till his death. It was said that Croesus had a son who was dumb from his birth, but who suddenly gained the power to speak when he saw his father's life in peril at the taking of Sardis. In Tiberius 1328, Germanicus says, "Speak to my joy, More joy unto joy-robbed Germanicus Than was the Lidian Cressus' dumb-born son, Stopping his father's execution." Surrey, in Eng. Helicon (1614), p. 68, asks, "When Croesus, King of Lyde, was cast in cruel bands, . . . What tongue could tell his woe?" In Ant. i. 2, 107, the Messenger reports of Labienus: "His conquering banner shook from Syria To L. and to Ionia." This was in 41 B.C., when Labienus, who had taken refuge after the battle of Philippi with Orodes, K. of Parthia, overran all Asia Minor and routed Antony's lieutenant. In iii. 6, 10, Cæsar reports that Antony has made Cleopatra "Of lower Syria, Cyprus, L., Absolute queen." The Ff. have Libya, but the correction was made by Johnson from North's Plutarch. This was in 34 B.C. In Massinger's Actor v. 1, Cæsar says to Domitia, "Ln. Omphale had less command O'er Hercules than you usurp o'er me." Omphale was the daughter of Jardan, King of L.: Hercules was sold to her by Hermes, and she divested him of his lion skin and made him spin amongst her maids. In T. Heywood's B. Age v., Omphale says, "We are Queen of L. And this our vassal."

After their conquest by Cyrus the Lns. were forbidden to bear arms, and devoted their energies to music and dancing. Their music was of an effeminate type, contrasted with the severe martial strains of the Dorians, and the wild orgiastic dithyrambs of the Phrygians. In Middleton's Quarrel i. 1, Russell says, "Most unpleasing shows to the beholders A Ln. ditty to a Doric note." In T. Heywood's Mistress i. 1, Admetus says, "Change your Arcadian tunes to Lidian sounds, Sad notes are sweetest where deep woe confounds." In Marmion's Leaguer i. 4, Fidelio tells of a lady with "a voice sweeter than the Ln. tunes." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 1, 40, says, "Sweet Music did divide Her looser notes with Ln. harmony." Milton, L'Allegro 136, asks: "Ever against eating cares Lap me in soft Ln. airs." In Massinger's Actor i. 3, Paris says of the actors: "We show no arts of Ln. panderism." A King of L. is one of the characters in T. D.'s Banquet. Mt. Tmolus (S. of Sardis) was named after a Ln. King, and was famous for its wine. In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Autumn says, "Thou shalt command The Ln. Tmolus and Campanian mts. To nod their grape-crowned heads into thy bowls." In Mason's Mulleasses 2381, Mulleasses, dying, says, "Stoop down, thou Ln. mount, bend thy cold head." Probably Mt. Tmolus is intended. In Lyly's Sapho v. 1, Venus says, "This shaft is headed with Ln. steel, which striketh a deep disdain of that which we most desire." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 3, Ferdinand, affecting to be mad, says, "I would but live to subdue the Pisidians and so to bring the Lns. under tribute." In T. Heywood's Challenge i. 1, Bonavida says, "For wisdom, Rome presented a Cornelia and Lidia a Sosipatra." I have not been able to identify this wise lady. In Tiberius 3001, Macro says, "What Lidian desert, Indian vastacy, So hateful monster ever nourished?" Probably he is thinking of the Chimæra, whose home was in Lycia, near to L., but possibly Lidian is a misprint for Lician, or for Libyan, the deserts of Africa being notorious for producing savage monsters. Donne, Elegy ix. (1633) 29, says, "Xerxes' strange Ln. love, the platane tree, Was loved for age, none being so large as she." See Pliny Hist. Nat. xii. 1-3.

LYEAS (a misprint for LYCUS). A river in Phrygia, now Tchörük-Su, flowing into the Mæander. Laodicea lay about a mile from the Lycus. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius speaks of his conquest in 42 B.C. of "Laodicea, whose high-reared walls Fair L. washeth with her silver wave."

LYMBO. See LIMBO.

LYMOGES. A city in France in the department of Haute-Vienne on the Vienne, 236 m. S. of Paris. It was an ancient Roman town: Vidomar, Viscount of L., having found some golden statues of a Roman emperor and his wife, refused to give them up to Richd. Cœur-de-lion, who was his suzerain. Richd. consequently besieged him at Chaluz-Chabrol, and was killed by a poisoned arrow from the castle in 1199. L. was himself killed by Faulconbridge in 1200. He is one of the characters in K. J., where he is called Archduke of Austria, as in Trouble. Reign. This is an absurd mistake. The Archduke of Austria was Leopold VI, who succeeded in 1184. But he had nothing whatever to do with the death of Richd.

LYNCOLNESHIRE. See LINCOLNSHIRE.

LYNN (LYNN REGIS, or KING'S LYNN). A port in Norfolk, on the estuary of the Ouse, 96 m. N. of Lond. It was first called Bishop's L., but the name was changed to King's L. by Henry VIII. In H6 C. iv. 5, 21, after the defeat and capture of Edward in 1470, he asks of his friends who are arranging for his escape from Middleham Castle: "Whither shall we then?" and Hastings replies: "To L., my Lord; and ship from thence to Flanders." In Fair Women ii. 1079, James tells the story of a woman who, "sitting to behold a tragedy At Linne, a town in Norfolk," was so moved that she confessed to having murdered her husband. In Day's B. Beggar ii., Young Strowd, who is a Norfolk man, says of his 2 companions: "They can talk of nothing but how they sell a score of cow-hides at Lynmarte," i.e. L. market. In Brewer's Lovesick King ii., Randolfe orders his coal-ships from Newcastle to "put in at Lyn and Yarmouth and let Lond. be the farthest of their journey." In Hall's Characters (1608), one of the topics of the Busybody's conversation is "the report of the great fish taken up at Linne." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the sights of England "K. John's sword at Linne, with the cup the Fraternity drink in."

LYNTERNUM. See LINTERNUM.

LYONES. The old name in the Arthurian romances for Cornwall. Milton, P. R. ii. 360, compares the attendants at the banquet spread for our Lord by the Tempter to "Faery damsels met in forest wide By knights of Logres or of L., Lancelot, or Pelleas, or Pellesnore."

LYONS. The second city in France, at the junction of the Rhône and Saône, 240 m. S.E. of Paris. Its archbp. is the metropolitan of all Gaul. In Bale's Laws iv., Hypocrisy says, "As for L., there is the length of our Lord in a great pillar. She that will with a cord be fast bound to it shall sure have child, for within it is hollow all." This was a hollow pillar said to be of the exact height of our Lord. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy v. 1, when Clermont advises Guise to retire, he says, "The Archbp. of L. tells me plain I shall be said then to abandon France In so important an occasion." In Consp. Byron iii. 1, Roncas says that "the archbp. of L., Pierce Pinac," said that he had never seen a face of worse presage than that of Byron. In Chivalry, the servant of the D. of Bourbon is "Peter de Lions." In Middleton's Quiet Life iii. 2, Franklin junior professes to be a Frenchman "de L." A lost play, Raymond Duke of Lyons, was acted in 1613.

LYON'S INN. An Inn of Chancery in Lond., belonging to the Inner Temple. It was originally a tavern with the sign of the Lion, and was converted into an Inn of Chancery in the reign of Henry VIII. It stood on the site of the Globe Theatre in Newcastle St., off the Strand: it was sold by the members in 1863, and the theatre was erected in 1868. The now defunct Opéra Comique occupied a part of the site. In a letter from W. Fleetwood to Lord Burghley in 1584, he relates how a tailor, having quarrelled with a clerk, raised the pretences, and "thinking that the clerk was run into L. L. brake down the windows of the house." In Brome's Moor iii. 1, Phillis says, "I have a cousin that is a Re-torney of L. L., that will not see me wronged."

LYZIA. See LYCIA.

MACEDONIA (Mn. = Macedon, Mnn. = Macedonian).

The country N. of Thessaly, from Thrace on the E. to Illyria on the W. Philip II (359-336 B.C.) established the supremacy of M. over the whole of Greece, and his son Alexander the Gt. (336-323) marched into Asia, and in the victories of Granicus, Issus, and Gaugamela destroyed the Persian Empire and became the master of the Eastern World. He penetrated as far as India, where he defeated Porus in the Punjab, and in Egypt he founded Alexandria at the mouth of the Nile. After his death his empire was divided amongst his generals, and after a long period of intestine war and confusion M. was conquered by the Romans and made into a province 168 B.C., Æmilius defeating the last K., Perseus, at Pydna. In the middle of the 15th cent. it passed into the hands of the Ottoman emperors.

Most of the Elizabethan allusions are to Alexander and his father Philip. In Val. Welsh iv. 7, Cartamanda speaks of "Philip, k. of Mn., Whose boundless mind of sovereign majesty Was like a globe whose body circular Admits no end." Alexander is the hero of Lyly's Campaspe: in ii. 2, Hephæstion asks: "Is the son of Philip, k. of Mn., become the subject of Campaspe?" In H5 iv. 7, 20, Gower says, "I think Alexander the gt. was born in Mn.; his father was called Philip of Mn., as I take it"; and Fluellen proceeds with his memorable comparison of Monmouth, the birthplace of K. Henry, with Mn., both beginning with "M.," and both possessing a river with salmon in it. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron speaks of Alexander as "the little, yet great Mn." He is said to have been short of stature. In Clyomon, v. 431, Clyomon says, "The conqueror of conquerors, who Alexander hight, is returning to Mn." In Massinger's Madam iv. 2, Luke says, "The valiant Mn. Having in his conceit subdued one world Lamented that there were no more to conquer." In Davenant's Platonic iii. 4, Fredeline says, "Aristotle . . . fooled the drunken Mnn. Out of a thousand talents to buy books." Aristotle was Alexander's tutor; and Alexander in a drunken fit killed his friend Clytus. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Ceneus says to Cosroe, "We will invest your highness Emperor, Whereat your soldiers will conceive more joy Than did the Mnn. at the spoil Of great Darius and his wealthy host." Darius was the last K. of Persia, who was defeated by Alexander. In Suckling's Brennora ii. 1, there is a round: "The Mn. youth left behind him this truth That nothing is done with much thinking: He drank and he fought till he had what he sought; The world was his own by good drinking." In Nabbes' Hannibal ii. 4, Syphax says, "What's Rome or Scipio to Sophonisba? in whose richer beauty more's comprehended than the Mnn. could from his many conquests boast himself owner of." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xvii., Magnificence mentions, in his list of heroes, "Alexander of Macedony k., That all the orient had in subjection." In Chapman's Cæsar iii. 1, 122, Pompey says that the gods have not made the Roman genius "grow in conquests for some little time As did the genius of the Mns." In Fraunce's Victoria iv. 8, 2022, Narcissus says, "Persei Macedonum regis Filius Ex principe factus est faber ferrarius." Alexander, the son of Perseus, last k. of Mn., is said by Plutarch, Vit. Æm. Pauli 37, to have been an expert goldsmith: this is probably what Fraunce was thinking of. In Milton, P. R. iii. 32, the Tempter says to our Lord, "The son of Mnn. Philip had ere these [years] Won Asia." Alexander overthrew the Persian Empire when he was only 25. In P. R. iv. 271, it is related how the Greek Orators "fulminated over Greece To Mn. and Artaxerxes' throne." Milton is thinking of the speeches of Demosthenes against Philip of Mn. In Brandon's Octavia 1390, Plancus calls Alexandria "That fair city by that great Mnn. monarch builded." In Chettle's Hoffman ii., Mathias says, "Their caparisons exceed The Persian monarch's when he met destruction From Philip's son and his stout Mns." In Hester ii. 286, the Scribe speaks of Haman as "Aman, a Mn. born." Haman is called an Agagite in the Hebrew text of Esther, but a Mnn. in the LXX version. In Per. ii. 2, 24, the 2nd knight in the tourney is "a Prince of Mn.": with a Spanish motto on his shield! In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, a lord says, "From vanquished M., Triumphant o'er k. Persius' overthrow, Conquering Æmilius in great glory came." The reference is to the triumph after the battle of Pydna 168 B.C. In Tiberius 1058, the Archflamen greets Germanicus as equalling in glory "Paulus Emilius of proud Mn." In Nero ii. 3, Scævinius speaks of the Romans "whom neither The Median bow nor Mnn. spear . . . could subdue." An entirely unhistorical K. of Mn. is one of the characters in Massinger's Virgin, and there is a Euarchus, k. of Mn., in Shirley's Arcadia, who is taken from Sidney's Arcadia. In Selimus 2030, Selimus says, "We mean to rouse false Acomat And cast him forth of M." In Kirke's Champions v., there is an imaginary K. of Mn. whose daughters have been turned into swans, but recover their human shape through the efforts of the Champions, and marry 3 of them. Mnn. is used humorously for a valiant soldier. In Shirley's Honor iv. 3, Fullbank says, "I thought myself as brave a Mnn. as the best of them." In his Gent. Ven. iii. 1, when Thomazo says, "I'll return with Indian spoils like Alexander," Melipiero adds: "Spoken like a true Mnn."

MACHAERUS. A fortification 6 m. E. of the Dead Sea in the Moabitish territory, 12 m. from the N. end of the Sea. It was fortified by Herod the Gt., who made it one of his principal residences, and it was here that Herod Antipas imprisoned and beheaded John the Baptist. It is now a heap of ruins called Mukwar. In Milton, P. R. ii. 22, M. is mentioned as one of the places where the disciples went to seek our Lord on His disappearance from Galilee before His baptism.

MACHDA. The capital of Prester John's kingdom in Abyssinia. One is tempted to identify it with Magdala, which was made his principal stronghold by K. Theodore and was taken and destroyed by the English in 1868. But Magdala is not mentioned by the old geographers; and I am disposed to think that M. is derived from Maqueda, the Q. of Sheba who visited Solomon, and from whom the kings of Abyssinia claimed to be descended. Prester John is a vague and shadowy figure, and was originally located in Asia; but from the 13th cent. onward he was identified with the K. of Abyssinia. Heylyn says that all the kings of Guagere, as he calls Abyssinia, were called John, "with the prænomen of Presbiter," and that they were sprung from Solomon and Maqueda, the Queen of the South. Probably Marlowe confused the name of the Q. with that of her supposed capital. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles reports: "I have marched along the r. Nile to M., where the mighty Christian Priest, Called John the Gt., sits in a milk-white robe."

MADEIRA. The largest island of the Madeiras, lying in the Atlantic Ocean, 360 m. W. of the coast of Morocco. The islands were colonized by Portugal in 1420, and are still a province of that country. The vine was introduced in the early part of the 16th cent., and M. wine, which resembles a full-bodied brown sherry, began to be made and exported. In H4 A. i. 2, 128, Poinis says to Falstaff, "How agrees the devil and thou about thy soul that thou soldest him on Good-Friday last for a cup of M. and a cold capon's leg?"

MADIAN. See MIDIANITES.

MADRID (also spelt MADRILL). A city in the centre of Spain, in the province of New Castile, on the left bank of the Manzanares. It was made the capital of Spain by Philip II. in 1560. Heylyn (s.v. SPAIN) says, "M., the king's seat, whose residence, though the country be neither fruitful nor pleasant, hath made that place, of a vill., the most populous town of all Spain." In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "Now being entered Madrill, the enchanted circle of Spain, have a care to your new lessons." In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Pacheco speaks of "a famous courtezan, lately come from M." In Jonson's New Inn iv. 2, Tipto says, "They are here, have been at Seville in their days, And at M. too." In ii. 2, Tipto says, "Don Lewis of M. is the sole master now of the world," i.e. in fencing. In Dekker's Match me i., Gazetto says, "I'll mount my jennet and take the way to Madrill." In Kyd's Span. Trag. iii. 14, the K. of Spain welcomes the Viceroy of Portugal to M.: "'Tis not unknown to us for why you come, Or have so kindly crossed the raging seas": an even more curious bit of geography than Shakespeare's sea-coast of Bohemia. In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto speaks of "my gloves, the natives of M.," i.e. made of Spanish leather. In Davenport's New Trick iii. 1, Friar John says, "The best wheat in Spain; what say you now to a couple of cheat-loaves baked in M.?" In Wilson's Inconstant i. 1, Tonsus says, "Nor can your ruff, though printed at M., But suffer censure." The ruff was a Spanish article of apparel: printed means pleated. The scenes of Middleton's Gipsy, Shirley's Brothers and Ct. Secret, Lust's Dominion, and The Noble Soldier are laid at M.

MAEANDER. See MEANDER.

MAENALUS. A lofty mtn. in Arcadia, specially sacred to the god Pan. In Milton's Arcades 102, the poet adjoins the nymphs and shepherds of Arcadia: "From the stony M. Bring your flocks and live with us."

MAEOTIS. The Sea of Azov, a shallow lake, lying N. of the Black Sea, with which it is connected by the Straits of Yenikale, immediately E. of the Crimea. It is about 200 m. long, and abounds in fish. Milton P. L. ix. 78, says of Satan: "Sea he had searched and land From Eden over Pontus and the pool M., up beyond the river Ob."

MAESTRICHT. A strongly fortified city in Holland, close to the Belgian frontier, on the Maas, 56 m. E. of Brussels. In the War of Liberation it was besieged by the Spaniards in 1579, by the Prince of Orange in 1580, and by Frederick Henry in 1632. In Larum A. 3, Danila says, "From Nastricht [an obvious misprint] first there comes a thousand horse," sc. to help the Spanish in the siege of Antwerp. In Lady Mother ii. 1, Crackby boasts: "My Capt.'s courage at M. did conclude Papenham's overthrow." The reference is to the siege of 1632, but unfortunately for Crackby's accuracy Pappenheim was killed at Lutzen a few months before the siege of M.

MAGDALA. A town or castle on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee, from which Mary the Magdalene derives her name. In the Legenda Aurea it is called Magdalo, and is said to be 2 m. from Nazareth. The name means a tower, and there were probably several such in Galilee. In Magdalen 59, Syrus, the father of Mary, says, "The castell of Maudleyne is at my wylddyng"; and in 81 he bequeaths it to Mary.

MAGDALEN COLLEGE (pronounced MAUDLIN). University of Oxford. It stands at the E. end of the High St., on the N. side, on the banks of the Cherwell, over which the M. Bdge. connects it with the Water Walk. The Tower of the C. is one of the most conspicuous features of Oxford. It was founded by William of Waynflete, bp. of Winchester, in 1457, on the site of a hospital founded by Henry III. in 1232. The 1st stone of the new building was laid in 1473. The books of the C. show that scriptural plays were performed there from an early date. The 1st recorded performance of a play in Oxford is at M. in 1486, and there is record of a comedy in 1535 and of a tragedy in 1540. The comedy was called Piscator, or the Fisher Caught, and was written by John Hoker, one of the Fellows. Amongst its distinguished students were Wolsey and John Lyly.

MAGELLAN, STRAITS OF. Separating the Continent of S. America from Terra del Fuego. They were discovered by Fernando M. in 1520. In Underwit v. 3, Underwit says, "She is still like the bottom of the map, terra incognita. I have been a long time hovering about the M. streights, but have made no new discoveries." The coarse jest needs no explanation. Milton, P. L. x. 687, explains that if the axis of the earth had not been inclined to the Ecliptic, it would have "forbid the snow From cold Estotiland, and south as far Beneath M." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says that Coryat's fame "finds no other bound Than from the M. strait to Gibraltar." See under Mayor's Lane.

MAGGOT-A-PIE, or MAGPIE. A tavern in the Strand, London. In Shirley's Ball i. 1, Freshwater says, "I do lie at the sign of Donna Margeritta de Pia in the Strand"; which Gudgeon interprets: "At the M.-a-P. in the Strand."

MAGNESIA. More fully M. ad Sipylum, to distinguish it from M. ad Maeandrum. A city of Lydia, on the slopes of Mt. Sipylus, on the S. bank of the Hermus. Here the Scipios inflicted a crushing defeat on Antiochus the Gt. in 190 B.C. It continued to flourish during the Byzantine empire, and later was for a time the residence of the Sultan. It is now called Manissa. In Selimus 86, Baiazet says, "Carcut in fair M. leads his life."

MAGNUS (SAINT). Ch. in Lond., at the bottom of Fish St. Hill, just at the foot of old Lond. Bdge. It was one of the oldest churches in Lond. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. In 1759 the footway under the steeple was made in order to widen the approach to the Bdge. In H6 B. iv. 8, 1, Cade cries: "Up Fish St. I down St. M. corner! kill and knock down! throw them into Thames!" In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 2, when Sir Boniface addresses Sir Harry "Vale, vir magne," the latter, not knowing Latin, replies: "You shall not have me at St. Magnes, my house is here in Gracious st." Nash, in Lenten, p. 311, describes a clash of swords: "that from Salomon's Islands to St. M. corner might cry clang again," i.e. all round the world.

MAGORES. The country of the Great Mogul or Emperor of Delhi, which included the greater part of Hindustan. In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 5, Albumazar directs that his almanac should be given to the East India Company, that they may "know the success of the voyage of M." Heylyn (s.v. INDIA INTRA GANGEM) says that all the 47 Provinces of India, except Narsinga and Calacute, "are under the command of the great Magor, Mogul, or Mongul."

MAHANAIM (i.e. the 2 hosts). A name given by Jacob to the place where he met the angels of God. It was clearly on the E. of the Jordan and N. of the Jabbok. The exact site is uncertain, but it may probably be identified with the Wady Suleikhat, near the Jordan, 14 m. N. of the point where the Jabbok flows into it. It afterwards became an important place, and on the death of Saul Ishbaal made it his capital. Milton, P. L. xi. 214, refers to the time "when the angels met Jacob in M., where he saw The field pavilioned with his guardians bright."

MAIDEN LANE, or MAID LANE. A st. in Southwark, now called Park St. It ran W. from Deadman's Pl., now Red Cross St., to Gravel L., parallel to the Bank-side. In the original lease of the Globe Theatre site it is said to be "upon a L. there called M. L., towards the S." It has been long supposed that the Globe was on the S. of M. L., and a bronze memorial tablet let into the wall of Barclay's Brewery declares: "Here stood the Globe Playhouse of Shakespeare." But Prof. Wallace has lately brought evidence, which seems to be conclusive, that the actual site was on the N. of M. L., between Deadman's Pl. and Rose Alley.

MAIDENHEAD. A town in Berks., near the right bank of the Thames, 25 m. W. of Lond., and 6 m. N.W. of Windsor. In M. W. W. iv. 5, 78, Evans tells how the 3 cozen-germans "has cozened all the hosts of Readins, of M., of Colebrook, of horses and money." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Trimtram wishes that Meg may "be burnt at Colebrook for destroying of M.," where the double play on the names is obvious. In the same punning fashion, Chough, in v. 1, says he could have had a whore "at M. in Berks.; and did I come in by M. to go out by Staines?"

MAIDENHEAD. The sign of a tavern in Islington. Taylor, Works i. 140, says, "I stole back again to Islington to the sign of the Maydenhead; after supper we had a play of Guy of Warwick, played by the Earl of Darbie his men." There was a M. Tavern at the Temple end of Ram Alley, the worst of all the dens of infamy in that notorious court.

MAIDSTONE. The county town of Kent, on the Medway, 32 m. S.E. of Lond. Wat Tyler broke open the prison and released John Ball. Sir T. Wyatt raised the standard of rebellion here in 1554. M. is the assize-town for the county, and condemned criminals were executed on Penenden Heath, 1 m. N.E. of the town. In Middleton's Quinborough ii. 3, Simon, the tanner, says, "I have such a trick of stretching, too! I learned it of a tanner's man that was hanged last sessions at M."

MAINE. A province in France, lying S. of Normandy, and N. of Anjou and Touraine. Henry II was born at its capital, Le Mans; he was Count of Anjou and M., and on his accession to the Crown of England these provinces passed to England. Philip II of France claimed it in Arthur's name from John, and ultimately took possession of it. During the wars in the earlier part of the reign of Henry VI it was conquered by the English, but it was ceded to René, the father of Margaret of Anjou, on her marriage with Henry VI, and the English were finally driven out of it two years later by Dunois. In K. J. i. 1, 11, Chatillon demands for Arthur: "Ireland, Poitiers, Anjou, Touraine, M.," and the claim is repeated in ii. 1, 152. In ii. 1, 487, John offers it as a dowry to Blanche if she marries Lewis the Dauphin. In H6 A. iv. 3, 45, York announces: "M., Blois, Poitiers, and Tours are won away." In v. 3, 95, Suffolk speaks of René as "D. of Anjou and M."; and in 154 René (Reignier) consents to the marriage of Margaret, "upon condition I may quietly enjoy mine own, the country M. and Anjou." In H6 B. i. 1, 51, the treaty is read making this grant; and in 209, Warwick cries: "O father, M. is lost: that M. which by main force Warwick did win." In iv. 1, 86, the Capt. charges Suffolk: "By thee Anjou and M. were sold to France." In iv. 2, 170, Dick says, "We'll have the Lord Say's head for selling the dukedom of M." In iv. 7, 70, Say protests: "I sold not M., I lost not Normandy." In Davenport's Matilda i. 3, John is upbraided by Fitz-water with the loss of "Anjou, Brittain, Main, Poictou, and Turwin." In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 35, Lancaster recalls "the warlike battles won At Cressey field, Poyteeres, Artoyse, and Mayne," by Edward the Black Prince.

MAINE. A river rising in N. Bavaria and flowing into the Rhine a little above Mayence. In Marlowe's Faustus, vii. 7, Faust says, "Coasting the realm of France, We saw the river M. fall into Rhine, Whose banks are set with groves of fruitful vines."

MAINZ. See MENTZ.

MAJORCA. The largest of the Balearic Isles, abt. 150 m. E. of Spain, in the Mediterranean. The islands were annexed to the crown of Aragon towards the close of the 13th cent. In T. Heywood's I. K. M., A. 202, Philip and Mary are proclaimed "Count and Countess of Hasbuge, M., Sardinia." In Partial, i. 1, Feredo speaks of "the great D. of M., our near neighbouring isle." The scene is in Corsica.

MALABAR. A dist. on the W. coast of India, N. of Cochin and S. of Canara, between the Nilghiri Hills and the Arabian Sea. Milton, P. L. ix. 1103, says that the fig-tree from which Adam and Eve made themselves clothing was "not that kind for fruit renowned, But such as, to this day to Indians known, In M. or Decan spreads her arms," i.e. the banyan or "Ficus Indicus."

MALAGA. A spt. on the S. coast of Spain, 70 m. N.E. of Gibraltar, at the head of a bay in the Mediterranean. It had a large trade in wine, called M., and in raisins, oranges, and figs. In Middleton's Witch i. 1, Gaspero says of his servant: "He hath not pledged one cup but looked most wickedly Upon good Malego." In Dekker's Northward iii. 1, Doll says, "I have learnt to mingle water with my M." Day, in Law Tricks i. 2, says, "I'll put all my love into one quart of Maligo." In Middleton's Gipsy iii. 1, Sancho sings: "Peter-see-me shall wash thy noul, And m. glasses fox thee." In Ford's Queen iii., Pynto says, "I will swim through a whole Element of dainty, neat, brisk, rich claret, canary, or maligo." In Dekker's Satiromastix iv. 2, 112, Tucca calls his poetical associates "those maligo-tasters." Rowlands, in Knave of Hearts (1612) 20, says, "Bring in a quart of Maligo, right true, And look, you rogue, that it be Pee and Kew." Potatoes were also imported thither from America. In Ford's Sun ii. 1, the Spanish confecianador boasts that he has for sale, inter alia, "potatoes of M."

MALDON. A town in Essex, on the Chelmer, 9 m. E. of Chelmsford. In Percy's Cuckqueans, the stage direction runs: "Harwich. In middle of the stage Colchester, with image of Tarlton. The raunger's lodge, M., a ladder of ropes trussed up near Harwiche." Evidently all 3 places were represented at the same time by different sections of the stage.

MALEGO, MALIGO. See MALAGA.

MALFI. A port on the E. shore of the Adriatic in Dalmatia, 7 m. N.W. of Ragusa. It is the scene of the earlier part of Webster's Malfi, the date of the play being supposed to be 1504, as is clear from ii. 3, where Bosola reads the nativity of the infant of the Duchess: "The Duchess was delivered of a son anno Dom. 1504—that's this year—taken according to the meridian of M."

MALMSEY. A sweet wine, originally made in the neighbourhood of Monemvasia, or Napoli di Malvasia, a town on the E. coast of the E. promontory of the Morea, 42 m. S.E. of Sparta. In L. L. v. 2, 233, Biron names "metheglin, wort, and m." as 3 sweet drinks. In R3 i. 4, 161, the murderer proposes to chop the body of Clarence "in the m.-butt in the next room," and in 277, says to him, "I'll drown you in the m.-butt within." In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 1, Roger tells how Tom the coachman is so drunk "that he lies lashing A butt of m. for his mares!" In H4 B. ii. 1, 42, the Hostess calls Bardolph "that arrant m.-nose knave." In Bale's Johan 2088, Dissimulation says, "It passeth malmesey, capric, tyre, or hyppocras." In Wit Woman, F. 4, Errinta describes an old man "with a palsy hand, a malmsie nose." In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi says, "First did I wash my liver, lungs, and heart With headstrong Malvesie." In Chaucer C. T. B. 1260, Dan John brought with him "a jubbe of malvesye." In Magdalen 476, the Taverner says, "Here is wine of Mawt and Malmeseyn." In Chester MP. of Noah's Flood 233, the gossip sings: "Here is a pottle full of Malmsine, good and strong."

MALO, SAINT. A harbour on the N. coast of Brittany, 200 m. W. of Paris. It stands on the rocky islet of Aron, and communicates with the mainland by a causeway called Le Sillon. In Stucley 1877, the Capt. says of Vernon: "This gentleman . . . came from Brittain [i.e. Brittany] as a passenger; for at St. Mallows we had cause to touch, And there we found this honest gentleman." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 226, the Londoner says of the French: "Their larding is diversified from bacon of Mayence to porpoise of St. M."

MALTA. An island in the Mediterranean, about 60 m. due S. of Sicily. St. Paul was shipwrecked in the Bay which still bears his name, and it is said that the island was Christianized by him. After the downfall of the Roman Empire the Saracens took M. and held it till 1127, when the Norman knights, under Roger II, captured it and held it for about a cent. In 1194 it passed to the Emperor Henry VI, and so became dependent on the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. In 1530 Charles V granted it to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and 28 successive Grandmasters of the Order ruled the island until 1798. They were frequently attacked by the Turks, who in 1551 ravaged the neighbouring island of Gozo and in 1565 besieged M. for 2 months. They were repelled, however, and Valetta was built in 1566. Through the 16th and 17th cents. intermittent warfare took place between the Knights and the fleets of the Turks, and owing to the number of slaves captured in these fights Valetta became one of the largest slave-markets in Europe. Napoleon seized M. in 1798, but it was soon reduced by the English, and by the Treaty of Paris in 1814 it was handed over to Great Britain.

The scene of Marlowe's Jew is laid in the island; all Jews had been expelled in 1492, but they had returned since the coming of the Knights. In i. 1, Barabas says, "Long to the Turk did M. contribute; Which tribute . . . The Turks have let increase to such a sum As all the wealth of M. cannot pay." In i. 2, the Turks come to demand their tribute, and Ferneze, the Governor, obtains a month's respite. On their return the Turks are betrayed and M. freed. All this is romance; there was no such Governor as Ferneze, and M. never paid tribute to the Turks. Dekker, in News from Hell, calls one of his characters "my rich Jew of M." W. Rowley, in Search 19, describes a moneylender as having a vizard "like the artificial Jewe of Maltaes nose." Both references are doubtless to Marlowe's play. So, in Cowley's Cutter ii. 3, Puny says, "I'm the very Jew of M., if she did not use me . . . worse than a rotten apple." B. & F. Malta takes place during the grand-mastership of La Valette (1557-1568), and is full of fights with the Turks. In ii. 1, there is a sea-fight in the harbour, and Norandine reports: "All their silver crescents then I saw Like falling meteors spent and set for ever Under the Cross of M." The Red Cross on a white ground is the well-known sign of the Knights of St. John. In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi says, "I fought at M. when the town was girt With bull-beggars of Turkie." As the action of the play takes place before 1503, this is something of an anachronism. In Massinger's Renegado ii. 5, Asambeg, viceroy of Tunis, upbraids his followers: "You suffered Those thieves of M., almost in our harbour, To board a ship and bear her safely off." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 3, Prospero says he was a prisoner for 12 years in the Turkish galleys; then "Some ships of M. met the Ottoman fleet, Charged them, and boarded them, and gave me freedom." In Webster's White Devil v. 1, two of the conspirators come disguised as "noblemen of Hungary that vowed their service against the enemies of Christ, went to M. [and] were there knighted." In Kyd's Soliman i., "a knight of M." is one of the visitors in honour of the nuptials of the Prince of Cyprus. In Davenant's Favourite iii. 1, Eumena asks: "Yond slaves, are they those of Maltha, whom I bought from the galleys of Algiers?" In Massinger's Maid Hon., Gonzaga and Bertoldo are both Knights of M. Camiola says to the latter, "You are, Sir, a Knight of M., by your order Bound to a single life," and in i. 1, Antonio says to him, "You are a Knight of M., and have served Against the Turk." In Partiail iv. 1, Fiducia wishes for her enemy: "May his aimed-at happiness be Some piece of flesh who hath served prenticeship In the M. galleys," i.e. a woman who has been the common property of the galley-slaves there. In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Fortress says, "Our order, like the Knights of M., does admit no persons espoused." Harrison, in Desc. of England, speaks of a kind of lap-dogs "called Melitei, of the island M., whence they were brought hither." This was a kind of spaniel, "Canis Brevipilis." They are mentioned in Fleming's English Dogs (1576) as "little, pretty, proper and fine." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 415, says, "If I had brought, ladies, little dogs from M. . . I am sure that you would have wooed me." In Nash's Summers, p. 70, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to Phrygia for wood-cocks, to M. for cranes." In Magdalen 474, the Taverner says, "Here is wine of mawt and Malmeseyn," where mawt may perhaps mean M.

MALVERN HILLS. A range of hills running for abt. 10 m. N. and S. between Herefordsh. and Worcesterh. They will be ever memorable for the "ferly of fairy" that befell William Langland "on a May mornynge on Malverne hilles" (Piers C. i. 6). In Thersites 199, Mulciber, having armed Thersites, says, "If M. H. should on thy shoulders light, They shall not hurt them." In Brewer's Lovesick King iv. 2, he says that his colliers with their picks could "make a dale of Mauburn h." Drayton, in Polyolb. vii. 53, says, "Malverne, king of h., fair Severn overlooks." Bacchus is dedicated to "Sir Richard Swash, Lord and Master on Mt. Malvorn"; and later, the author says that to rehearse all the names of the company "were no less labour than to make . . . a louse to leap over the high tops of Me. h." The author of Old Meg, p. 11, says that the old men of Hereford danced a morris "as if Mawlbome H. in the depths of winter, when all their heads are covered . . . with snow, had shook and danced at some earth-quake."

MALVESIE. See MALMSEY.

MAMELUKO, or MAMELUKE. Properly the military body, originally made up of Circassian slaves, who seized Egypt in 1254 and retained the government of it till the beginning of the 19th cent. The word was also used of cross-breeds between the whites and the natives of Brazil. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Peregrine, drawing out Sir Politick, suggests: "Your baboons were spies And were A kind of subtle nation near to China." Sir Pol., not to be beaten, says, "Ay, ay, your Mamaluchi." In the old Timon v. 1, Pseudolus says to Gelasimus, who is about to take a flight on Pegasus, "Fly to Pindus hill; on right and left hand there thou shalt behold the Mamaluccian inhabitants," and then he reaches the Zodiac. In the written guide which he gives Gelasimus he sets down the distance from Pindus to the Mamalukes 59 m. This is, of course, all elaborate fooling. Heylyn (s.v. EGYPT) says, "These Mamalukes were the offspring of Georgia and Colchis, vulgarly called the Circussi."

MAMORAH (now called MEHEDIA). A port on the N.W. coast of Morocco, at the mouth of the Wad Sebou, which is navigable from M. to Fez. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. ii. 4, the surgeon says he is on a ship "now bound for M., A town in Barbary." In iv. 4, Chorus, we are told that Bess has "Put into M., in Barbary," and the news is brought to the K. of Fez. In v. 1, Mullishag says he would not make Bess weep "for M.'s wealth." In part ii., act iii., Bess says, "I, without thee, came to M."

MANASSE. The elder son of Joseph, from whom the tribe of M., or Mh., descended. Half the tribe received lands on the E. of the Jordan, the other half along with Ephraim occupied the central part of W. Palestine, in what was afterwards Samaria. Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxx. 10, says, "In Ephraim's view and Benjamin's, And in M.'s sight, Awake thy strength." In B. & F. Elder B. iii. 5, Miramont addresses Brisac: "He shall, Jew; Thou of the tribe of many asses, coxcomb!"

MAN-IN-THE-MOON. A tavern in Cheapside, Lond. In Middleton's Quiet Life iii. 2, Sweetball says that Franklin is "at the Man-in-the-Moon, above stairs."

MAN, ISLE OF. An island in the Irish Sea, almost equidistant from the coasts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. From the close of the 9th cent. until 1266 it was ruled by a succession of Norwegian and Icelandic kings, the last of whom, Magnus VI, sold it to Alexander III of Scotland. In 1344 the Earl of Salisbury, by marriage with the heiress to the throne, became K. of M., and thenceforward the island came under English control. In 1406 it was granted to Sir John Stanley, and it remained in his family—carrying the title K. in Man—till 1825, when it was bought by the British Parliament and its present constitution given to it. In H6 B. ii. 3, 13, Henry sentences Eleanor, the wife of the D. of Gloucester, to be banished and to live "With Sir John Stanley in the I. of M." In the next scene Stanley informs her accordingly. He was the grandson of the original grantee. The Duchess is said to have been confined in the crypt of St. German's Cathedral on St. Patrick's Isle, off the coast near Peel. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Edward creates Gaveston "Earl of Cornwall, K. and lord of M." This was in 1307; but the lordship of M. was an empty title. In Nash's Summers, p. 70, Christmas says, "I must send to the I. M. for puffs." The Manx puffin (Procellaria Anglorum) used to be very common, and is still found on the Calf islet.

The name lends itself to an obvious pun. In Day's Parl. Bees iv., Armiger, satirising the courtiers, says: "These pied-winged butterflies Ne'er landed in the I. of M., i.e. they have never become true men at all. The word is also used in the sense of the microcosm of man. In Cooke's Green's Quoque, p. 560, Will Rash says, "Love runs through all countries, will travel through the I. of M. in a minute." In Dekker's Satiromastix iv. 1, 89, Horace says, "All our understanding faculties Sit there in their high court of parliament Enacting laws to sway this humorous world, This little I. of M." In Marston's Mountebanks, the Mountebank says, "If any woman be troubled with the falling sickness, . . . she must avoid the I. of M." Harrison says that the witches of the I. of M. "oftentimes sell winds to the mariners, inclosed under certain knots of thread."

MANCHA, LA. The elevated plateau in the centre of Spain, stretching from the Sierra Morena northwards to the Alcarria. It is a desolate and barren dist. It is chiefly memorable as the country in which Cervantes' "Don Quixote" lived, and from which he took his title. In May's Heir i., Clerimont speaks of "The witty knight, Don Quixote de la Mancha."

MANCHESTER. A city in Lancs., on the Irwell, 180 m. N.W. of Lond. There was a Roman station there, and the town suffered greatly at the hands of the Danes. But little is known of its early history, and it is only once mentioned in the plays of this period. In Fair Em, the heroine is the daughter of the Miller of M. in the reign of William I; and several of the scenes are laid in M. in or near the Mill. One of the clothiers in Deloney's Reading Intro. is "Martin Byram of M." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 3, 144, says, "M. is an old town . . . rich in the trade of making woollen cloth . . . and the cloths called M. Cottons are vulgarly known."

MANICO. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles, telling the story of his (fabulous) march through Africa, says: "I did march to Zanzibar . . . where I viewed The Ethiopian Sea, rivers, and lakes, But neither man nor child in all the land; Therefore I took my course to M.; And by the coast of Byather at last I came to Cubar, where the Negroes dwell." M. would therefore seem to lie between Zanzibar and the Bight of Biafra. There is a dist. called Manica, near the E. coast of S. Africa, just S. of the Zambesi, but this seems too far

S. Heylyn calls the whole district in S. Africa from Zanzibar across to Loanda and the Congo, Manicongo; and M. might well be a shortened form of this cumbersome word.

MANNINGTREE. A town in Essex on the estuary of the Stour, 58 m. N.E. of Lond. It possessed the privilege of holding fairs on condition of the exhibition of a certain number of plays annually. The Essex oxen were famous for their size and quality, and the roasting of one whole would be a common accompaniment of the fair. In H4 A. ii. 4, 498, the Prince apostrophises Falstaff as "that roasted M. ox with the pudding in his belly, that reverend vice, that grey iniquity," the Vice being an invariable character in the Moralities. Dekker, in News from Hell, says, "You shall have a slave drink more ale in 2 days than all M. does at a Whitsun-ale." Nash, in Choosing of Valentines, speaks of "seeing a play of strange morality shewen by bachelrie of M." In Dekker's Seven Sins, he says, "It was acted, like the old Morals at Maningtree, by tradesmen."

MANNOCK-DENNY. The local name for Cadir Idris, q.v. In Peele's Ed. I, vii., Lluellen says, "Every man take his standing on M.-d. and wander like irregulars up and down the wilderness." In ii., Guenthan says to Lluellen, "You might as soon move Monk Davey into the sea as Guenthan from his side," where a probable conjecture for Monk Davey is Mounchdenny or M.-d. Drayton, in Polyolb. iv. 455, calls it Mounchdeny.

MANOA. The legendary capital of Guiana, otherwise known as El Dorado, q.v. Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "I would see those inner parts of America, whether there be any such great city of M. or Eldorado in that golden empire."

MANSFIELD. A town in Notts., 13 m. N. of Nottingham. It is in the heart of the Robin Hood country. In Downfall Huntington i. 3, Little John says to Robin, "I at M. will attend your coming." M. is the scene of the Ballad of The King and the Miller of M., in Percy Reliques iii. 2. In Jonson's Love's Welcome, the scene of which is in Notts., one of the characters is "Master A. B. C. Accidence, schoolmaster, of M."

MANTES. A town in France on the Seine, 29 m. N.W. of Paris. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, Byron says, "It would have stirred the image of a k. Into perpetual motion to have stood Near the conspiracy restrained at M." Apparently the reference is to the k.'s acceptance of the Catholic faith at M. in 1593; and the suggestion is that Byron saved him from the plottings of the disappointed Protestants.

MANTINEA. One of the largest cities in Arcadia, on the borders of Argolis, abt. 16 m. W. of Argos. It was the scene of 5 great battles in the time of the ancient Greeks, the most important being that in which Epaminondas defeated the Spartans, but lost his own life, in 362 B.C. In Shirley's Arcadia ii. 1, Musidorus says to Miso, "Meet her this evening at M. at her father's." In Glapthorne's Argalus iii. 1, Philarchus says, "Amphialus is in the grove 'twixt M. and his castle."

MANTUA. A city in N. Italy, 80 m. W. of Venice, 90 m. S.E. of Milan, and 25 m. S. of Verona. It was the birth-place of Vergil. From 1329 to 1708 it was ruled by the Dukes of the Gonzaga family. It gave its name to a sort of silk, and, through a confusion with the French manteau, to the word m.-maker. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it: "Glorious M., Virgilius Maro's birth-place." Chaucer, in Leg. of Good Women 924, says, "Glorie and honour, Virgile Mantuan, Be to thy name!" Davies, in Orchestra (1594) 128, prays: "O that I had . . . the Man of M.'s charmed brain!" In B. & F. Valentinian ii. 2, Lycias claims to be a Roman and a Mn. In Cromwell iii. 2, Cromwell says, "The men of M. And these Bononians are at deadly strife"; and he gets a passport for Bedford to M. The reference may be to the war in 1511, which resulted in the restoration of the sons of Bentivoglio to Bologna. In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater says, "I saw little in M. beside dancing upon the ropes; only their strong beer was better than any I ever drank at the Trumpet." Freshwater is romancing wildly, and no credit can be attached to his travellers' tales. In Two Gent., the scene of iv. 1 and v. 3 and 4 is a forest on the frontiers of M. One of the outlaws is a Mn. In Coryat's Crudities (1611) 117, it is said that the town of Mirandula, 12 m. from M., was almost depopulated, because "the Bandits . . . make their abode in it as it were their safe sanctuary and refuge." Valentine flees from Milan to M., whither he is followed by Silvia. The D. pursues them and overtakes them in the forest, where all things are made even. In Shrew ii. 1, 60, Hortensio is introduced to Baptisto in Padua as "Licio, born in M." In iv. 2, 79, the pedant says he is "of M."; and Tranio tells him that "Tis death for anyone in M. To come to Padua." In Rom. i. 3, 28, the Nurse reminds Lady Capulet that, when Juliet was weaned, "My Lord and you were then at M." In iii. 3, 148, Friar Laurence advises Romeo, banished from Verona, to "pass to M." and sojourn there. When Lady Capulet hears of it, in iii. 5, 88, she plans to "send to one in M." to poison him. In v. 1, 67, Romeo is in M. and buys poison from the apothecary there, though "M.'s law is death To any he that utters them." The letters sent to M. miscarry, and Romeo returns "in post from M." to Juliet's tomb. In Davenant's Cr. Brother i. 1, Foreste says, "The treatise lately written to confute The desperate sect in M., calls it you The author?" The reference is to the disputes about the succession in M. on the death of Vincenzo II in 1627. The scene of Day's Humour is laid partly at Venice and partly at M. There is war between Venice and M., and in ii. 1, Octavio says, "I cut some few of the Mns.' throats." It is quite unhistorical. The scene of Massinger's Lover is laid in M. and the neighbourhood; the D. is called Gonzaga, but the story is entirely imaginary. Shirley lays the scenes of his Bird, Courtier, and Imposture (in part) at M. In T. Heywood's Maid of West B., after the shipwreck of Act III, Goodluck gets to M., and the D. of M., who is at war with Ferrara, is one of the characters in Act iv. In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 1, Mattemores says, "I will fight for Florence, Nor shall the Longobardy Mns. E'er win a flag while I am in the field." A play, now lost, was presented at Court in 1579 entitled "The Duke of Milan and the Duke of Mantua." The scene of Carlell's Deserv. Fav. is probably intended to be M., though it is not so stated. It is taken from Solozarno's La Duquesa de M., and it is clear from line 2299 that it is within a day's journey of Florence. In L. L. L. iv. 2, 97, Holofernes cries: "Old Mn. I who understandest thee not, loves thee not." The reference is to the poet Baptista Spagnolus Mantuanus (Mantuan, 1448-1516), whose Eclogues were used as a schoolbook in the 16th cent.

MANTUAN PORT. One of the gates of Bologna, leading out to the road to Mantua. Probably the W. gate, called Porta San Felice, is intended. In Cromwell iii. 2, Cromwell, in Bologna, says to Bedford, "Could you but get out of the Mantua p., Then were you safe."

MAPLE DOWN

MAPLE DOWN. A place in Kent, some 12 m. N.W. of Maidstone, near Wrotham. In Brome's M. Beggars i., the next rendezvous of the Beggars is fixed "Neither in village nor in town, But 3 mile off, at Maple-down."

MARATHON. A plain on the coast of Attica, 18 m. N.E. of Athens in a direct line, 22 m. by the N. road, and 26 m. by the S., which is the easier one. It is famous for the victory won by Miltiades and the Athenians over the Persians in 490 B.C. The tomb of the 192 Athenians who fell is still to be seen, and is called the Soro. In Wilson's Cobler 186, the soldier says, "In the conflict of Arbaces, general of Persia, at M., I rescued the colours of Boeotia." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 2, Frederick, who is mad, says of Diana: "Perhaps she hunts to-day I' th' woods of Merathon or Erymanthus."

MARCELLIS. See MARSEILLES.

MARCH. The land on the boundaries of two adjacent countries, specially applied to the borderland between England and Scotland, often called the N. Mes., and to that between England and Wales. In H5 i. 2, 140, Canterbury says, when an invasion by the Scots is discussed, "They of those mes. Shall be a wall sufficient to defend Our inland from the pilfering borderers." In H6 C. ii. 1, 140, Warwick, arriving in Herefordsh., says, "We are come to join with you, For in the mes. here we heard you were." In Val. Welsh i. 1, the father of Caradoc is styled "the great Earl of M.," where the Welsh m. is meant. In Death Huntington ii. 2, Brian speaks of "the Lord of the m. That lies on Wye, Lug, and the Severn streams." The younger Mortimer of Marlowe's Ed. II was created Earl of M., i.e. of the Welsh M., in 1328. His grandson, the 3rd Earl, married Philippa, daughter of Lionel, 3rd son of Edward III. He was succeeded in the earldom by his son Roger, and he again by his son Edmund, who died in 1424 without issue. Roger's daughter Anne married Richd. of Cambridge, and the title of Earl of M. descended to their son Richd., D. of York; and so to his son Edward, afterwards Ed. IV. The man referred to as the Earl of M., and husband of Glendower's daughter, in H4 A. i. 3, 84, iv. 3, 93, and v. 5, 40, was not the Earl of M. at all, but Edmund, the 2nd son of Edmund and Philippa, and uncle of the young Edmund, Earl of M. In H6 B. ii. 2, 36, Richd. of York bases his claim to the crown on his descent through his mother from Lionel. In iv. 2, 144, Cade claims to be the grandson of a twin brother of Roger Mortimer. In H6 C. i. 1, 106, Henry admits that Richd.'s grandfather was Roger Mortimer, Earl of M., but asserts a superior claim as the son of Henry V. In ii. 1, 179, Warwick addresses Edward of York as "brave Earl of M.," and in 191 says, "No longer Earl of M., but D. of York; The next degree is England's royal throne." In Peele's Ed. I, the supposed potter claims, in xii., "No potter I, but Mortimer, the Earl of M." This is an anachronism. The 1st Earl of M. was created by Edward II.

MARCYLLE. See MARSEILLES.

MARE MAJORE. An old name for the Black Sea, used by Marco Polo. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Theridamas says, "I crossed the gulf called by the name Mare Majore of the inhabitants."

MARE ROSO. The Red Sea. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, Callipine makes Almeda "K. of Ariadan Bordering on M. R., near to Mecca."

MARE RUBRUM. The Red Sea. In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 37, Roderique says of the Moors: "They come to sacrifice their bloods to us. If that be red, a mare rubrum we'll make so high to quench their silver moons," i.e. the crescent standards of the Turks.

MARGARET (ST.) AT CLIFFE. Spt. on E. coast of Kent, just N. of the S. Foreland and S. of Walmer. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 343, Drake reports that the Admiral of the Spanish Armada and other noble prisoners "are by this time landed at St. Margrets from whence your Admiral brings them up by land."

MARGARET'S (SAINT). A ch. in Lond., in Lothbury, opposite to the N. front of the Bank of England. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and rebuilt by Wren. Youth was "Imprinted in Lothbury over against St. Margaret's ch. by me, Wylyam Copland." Jyl of Breyntford's Testament has the same imprint.

MARGARET'S HILL (SAINT). The open space in front of the Town Hall Chambers, Southwark. It got its name from the ch. of St. Margaret on the Hill, which was disused in 1539 and the site employed for the building of the Town Hall. It was the scene of the Southwark, or S. M.'s, Fair, which was 2nd only to St. Bartholomew's Fair and was established in 1550. Hogarth has immortalized it in his picture. An edition of The Merry Devil was "Printed by A. M. for Francis Falkner, and are to be sold at his shop near unto S. Margarite's-hill in Southwarke. 1626."

MARGATE. A town in the Isle of Thanet, Kent, 90 m. E. of Lond. Its fame as a watering place began only in the 18th cent.; till then it was merely an obscure fishing village. In Webster's Cuckold ii. 4, Woodroff says, "I should by promise see the sea to-morrow As low [i.e. as far S.] as Lee or M."

MARGIANA. Dist. in the W. of Central Asia, lying between Hyrcania, Scythia, Bactriana, and Ariana. It corresponds to the modern Khorasan. It had a splendid climate and was very fertile. Milton, P. R. iii. 317, describes troops coming "From Arachosia, from Candaor east, And M., to the Hyrcanian cliffs Of Caucasus."

MARIA DEL POPOLO, SANTA. A ch. in Rome, in the Piazza del Popolo, near the gate of the same name. The ch. was founded in 1099, but its present form is due to Alexander VII, who restored it in the middle of the 17th cent. The gate was built in 1561 from the design of Michel Angelo, and is the principal entrance to the city from the N. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, Alexander orders Castilian to "fortify upon the tower of St. Sebastian, affronting that port where proud Charles should enter, called S. M. di P."

MARIA, PUERTO DI SANTA. Spt. on the S.W. coast of Spain, at the mouth of the Guadalete, just opposite to Cadiz, about 60 m. N.W. of Gibraltar. In Stuckey 1562, Philip promises to send 50 gallees to help Sebastian, "Which, on the 4th of June, near to the straits Of Giberlter, in a haven there Called El Porto de Sancta M., shall wait His coming on toward Apherica." In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo takes his leave because he has to get to the gallees this night "for in the morning They put from Port Saint Mary's." The scene is at Osuna, so he would have 80 m. to go.

MARKET-PLACE. Used of the Forum Romanum in Coriolanus and Julius Cæsar. It lay in the valley between the Palatine, Capitoline, and Quirinal hills, and was about 200 yds. long by 70 wide at the N. end. It was the centre of the political and social life of ancient Rome. In Cor. ii. 3, Coriolanus appears in the market-place to solicit the votes of the citizens. In iii. 3, he is banished by the people assembled there by the tribunes. The scene of the offering of the crown to Julius Cæsar, described by Casca in J. C. i. 2, was the market-place, and there Cæsar's body was brought in iii. 2 and his funeral oration pronounced by Antony.

MARK LANE. A st. in Lond., running S. from Fenchurch St. to Gt. Tower St. At its N.E. corner was a manor called Blanch Appleton, where a market or mart was kept in old times, though it had long been discontinued, says Stow. Hence the lane was called Marte L.; this was corrupted into M. L., and even, as in the quotation, into St. M.'s L. On the E. side, between Crutched Friars and Gt. Tower St., stands the Corn Exchange—the Old Exchange opened in 1747, and the New in 1827. Hence M. L. in modern parlance means the Corn Market. In Dekker's King's Entertainment, on March 15th, 1603, the City Companies were seated on stands, "the first beginning at the upper end of St. Mark's L., and the last reaching above the Conduit in Fleetstrete." In Prodigal v. 1, Flowerdale says, "To-morrow I crave your companies in M. L."—where he evidently lived.

MARK'S (SAINT). A ch. and convent in Florence, at the N. end of the Piazza San Marco. Savonarola's cell is still shown in the convent. In Middleton's Women beware (the scene of which is in Florence) i. 3, we have a representation of "a yearly custom and solemnity, Religiously observed by the D. and States, To St. M.'s temple, the 15th of April." If this was to celebrate St. M.'s Day (April 25th), Middleton is slightly out in his date.

MARK'S (SAINT). A ch. in Milan, in the Strada Pontarcio, in the N. of the city. It was built in 1254. In Webster's Malvi v. 2, the Dr. tells of a man afflicted with lycanthropia who "met the D. 'bout midnight in a lane Behind St. M. ch." In B. & F. Woman Hater iii. 4, the Pander makes an appointment with the Mercer to meet a woman at his house—"the fair white house at the further corner of St. M. st." In both these cases I suspect that the authors are thinking of Venice, though the scenes of the plays are laid in Milan.

MARK'S (SAINT). An ancient Basilica in Rome in the Piazza Venezia, N. of the Capitol. It was founded by Pope Mark in 337, and rebuilt in 833 by Gregory IV, and again by Paul II in 1468. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, Charles VIII orders: "Cause 10 brass pieces with their shot and powder To be drawn out of S. M."

MARK'S (SAINT). The famous ch. at the E. end of the Piazza San Marco at Venice. It was founded in 828 to receive the body of St. Mark (which had been brought from Alexandria), burnt down in 976, re-founded in 977, completed and consecrated in 1111. The Treasury of St. Mark is off the S. transept, and was stored with a large number of relics and objects of art of the greatest value; it was used as a sort of reserve fund by the State, and in 1797 many of its treasures were turned into money. The Campanile, near its S.W. corner, was finished in 1155, and has recently been restored after its downfall a few years ago. In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick notes in his diary a visit to St. M. and what he did there. In iv. 2, Mosca, complimenting the advocate Voltore, says, "They're bound to erect your statue in St. M." In Massinger's Renegado i. 1, Francesco tells of the scorn done to him by Grimaldi "in S. M., To me as I stood at the holy altar." In ii. 5, Asambeg says to Grimaldi, "Thou hast blasphemed the Othoman power, and safer At noonday might'st have given fire to St. M., Your proud Venetian temple." In Marston's Ant. Rev. iii. 1, Antonio asks, "Is this

St. M. Ch.?" and there the whole scene takes place, in front of Andrugio's tomb. In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Pert, returning from his travels, says, "Meager and I have not"—and Palatine interrupts, "The treasure of St. M., I believe, Sir." The Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP. i. has visited "Saynt Mark in Venis." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 295, one of the Lords says, "I have been in Venice, In the Realto there called S. Marks; 'Tis but a bauble, if compared to this," i.e. Gresham's Exchange. The noble Lord is a little mixed in his recollections of Venice. In Day's Travails, p. 53, Sir Antony, being at Venice, asks, "What tidings at St. Marke?"

MARK'S PLACE (SAINT). The Piazza di San Marco, in front of St. M. at Venice. In Jonson's Volpone, ii. 1 is laid in "St. M. P., a retired corner before Corvino's house." Later on in the scene Volpone appears as a mountebank Dr. and apologizes for retiring on this occasion "into an obscure nook of the Piazza." Probably the Piazza is meant by St. M. St. in the following passages. In Middleton's Blurt ii. 1, Hippolito asks: "Do you know the gentleman that dwells in the midst of St. M. St.?" and in Chapman's Usher v. 3, Cortezza tells of a maid who tried to commit suicide by throwing herself from a tower "in St. M. st.," presumably the Campanile. In Marston's What You iii. 1, Simplicius says, "I know you dwell in St. Marke's Lane at the sign of the Muscat." This is in Venice, but probably Marston invented the Lane without any definite idea of it, except that it was near St. M.

MAROFUS. An imaginary island, somewhere in the East. In Com. Cond. 238, Cardolus says, "Who dares alive presume to tread Within M. isle?"

MARROWBONE PARK. See Marybone.

MARS, FIELD OF. The Campus Martius at Rome, q.v. In Massinger's Actor v. 1, the Tribune reports that the body of the astrologer Ascletrario "Was with all scorn dragged to the Field of Mars And there" burnt.

MARS, TEMPLE OF. Probably the Temple of Mars Ultor at Rome is intended. It was built by Augustus in his Forum, as a thank-offering for his victory at Philippi, 42 B.C.; three of its fine Corinthian columns may still be seen in the Via Bonella. In Richards' Messallina v. 1, 2091, Pallas says, "From the high top of the temple of god Mars Let a bright burning torch i' th' dead of night Waft our approach."

MARSEILLES. The ancient Massilia; a spt. on the N.E. shore of the Gulf of Lyons, 408 m. S.E. of Paris. It was colonized by Greeks from Phocæa about 600 B.C., and has been an important commercial port throughout its history. It is now the 3rd largest city in France. The Massiliots aided Rome in the 2nd Punic War. In Nabbes' Hannibal ii. 1, Syphax says, "Hath not Scipio Joined unto him Massilia's k.?" Massilia, however, was a republic and had no k. The city took part with Pompeius in the Civil War between him and Cæsar, and in 49 B.C. it was besieged and taken by the latter. In B. & F. False One ii. 3, Cæsar says, "I razed Massilia in my wanton anger." In Magdalene the heroine visits "Marcylle" in order to convert the k. It was often chosen as a place of exile during the earlier days of the Roman Empire. In Jonson's Catiline iv. 3, Catiline says, "Let it be given out here in the city That I am gone, an innocent man, to exile Into Massilia." The laws of Massilia prohibited the production of Mimes in the city. William Alley, in Poor Man's Library (1565), commends its "great gravity" in this respect.

In Shrew ii. 1, 378, Gremio promises to give to his wife "an Argosy That now is lying in Marcellus road." In All's iv. 4, 9, Helena says, "I duly am informed His Grace is at Marcellae, to which place We have convenient convoy." In iv. 5, 85, Lafeu says, "His Highness comes post from Marcellus" to Rousillon, which lies on the opposite side of the Gulf of Lyons. In v. 1, Helena arrives there, and the scene is laid in a st. of the city. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 2, Brainworm pretends, "I have been at M. . . . a gentleman-slave in the galleys." In B. & F. French Law i. 1, Cleremont says that Champernel is "as tall a seaman as any that ever put out from M." In T. Heywood's Captives i. 1, the Clown informs the audience: "They call this place Marcellis Roade, the chief haven town in France," and it is the scene of the play. It is also the scene of Massinger's Unnat. Com.; and in i. 1, Montreville says, "Here's brave young Beaufort, The meteor of Marcellis, one that holds The governor his father's will and power In more awe than his own." In his Parl. Love i. 4, Chamont says of Beauré: "She was bestowed upon A pirate of Marsellis, with whose wife She lived 5 years." In Day's Law Tricks i. 1, Polymetis speaks of "the choicest gems Marcellis, Pisa, or Ligorine could yield."

MARSHALSEA. A prison in Lond., connected with the Court of the King's Marshall. It was used as a prison for debtors, and for persons charged with contempt of the Courts of the Marshall, the King's Palace, and the Admiralty. It stood in the Borough High St., Southwark, on the E. side, opposite to the end of Union St. Towards the end of the 18th cent. it was removed to the site of the Old White Lion prison close to St. George's Ch. The Court was abolished and the prison pulled down in 1849. Skelton, in Colin Clout 1164, says of an unauthorized preacher: "The King's Bench or Marshalsea, Have him thither by and by." In Straw ii., Newton reports: "They [the rebels] have spoiled all Southwark, broke up the M. and the King's bench." This was in 1381. In Bale's Johan 287, Sedition says, "Get they false witnesses they force not of whence they be, Be they of Newgate or be they of the M." In Poverty 340, Envy says to Poverty, "Thou art come alate out of M." In H8 v. 4, 90, the Chamberlain says, "Go, break among the press and find a way out To let the troop pass fairly, or I'll find A M. shall hold ye play these 2 months." In the Puritan, i. 4 and iii. 5 take place in the M. prison. In iii. 5, the prisoners are heard crying: "Good gentlemen over the way, send your relief." Taylor, in Works i. 91, says, "The ocean that Suretyship sails in is the spacious M." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 120, to Jane's inquiry, "What prison's this?" Jocky replies: "The M., forsooth." In his Royal King iii. 1, the Clown says, "We have houses rent free, and goodly ones, to choose where we will: the Martialsie, the Counter, Newgate, Bridewell; and would a man desire to dwell in stronger buildings?" In his Fortune v. 1, the Purser says, "Set sail from the fatal Marshal seas." Deloney, in Newberie vi., tells how Wolsey sent the clothiers to prison: "4 days lay these men in the Marshalsey." The word is also used for a prison generally. In Stucley 1349, the Provost of Cadiz says of Stucley: "He's here within the palace yet ready to go unto the M." In Greene's Alphonsus iv. 3, 1379, Amurath orders the Provost: "Go, carry Fabius presently Unto the Marshalsey; there let him rest, Clapt sure and safe in fetters all of steel." This is in Constantinople.

MARSHLAND. The low-lying dist. in Lincs. and Cambridgesh. There were many projects for draining these fens in the 17th cent. In Nabbes' C. Garden i. 4, Jerker says, "'Tis more improbable than the projection of draining M. with a windmill."

MARTIN-DE-RÉ, SAINT. A town in France, on the Isle of Rhé, 11 m. N.W. of La Rochelle. It has a large trade in white and red wine. In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Diego, bringing in wine, says, "Here 'tis, and right St. M."

MARTIN, PORTE SAINT. One of the gates of the ancient city of Paris, on the N.E. of the city, at the point where the Boul. St. Denis becomes the Boul. St. Martin. The main road from the N. entered by this gate. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 222, the Londoner says to the Parisian, "I entered your city at P. St. M." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary i. 2, 188, says of Paris: "The streets are somewhat large, and among them the fairest is that of St. Dennis, the 2nd St. Honoré, the 3rd St. Antoine, and the 4th St. Martine."

MARTIN'S (SAINT). A ch. in Lond., on the N. side of Ludgate Hill, E. of the Old Bailey. Its slender spire is to be seen in all views of St. Paul's taken from the W. It is said to have been founded by the British King Cadwallo; at all events, it was rebuilt in 1437, with a curious spire-steeple, destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and rebuilt by Wren. Davenport's Crowne for a Conqueror was "Printed by E. P. for Francis Constable, and are to be sold at his shop under St. Martin's Ch. at Ludgate. 1639."

MARTIN'S-IN-THE-FIELDS (SAINT). A ch. in Lond., now on the E. side of Trafalgar Sq., but formerly, as the name implies, in the open country. It was built first in 1535, but the old ch., being too small for the growing parish, was pulled down in 1721 and the present fine building erected. Here Francis Bacon was christened; and it was a favourite place for burials, amongst many others who were interred here being George Heriot, well known to the readers of The Fortunes of Nigel; Sir John Davis, the poet; Mayerne, the physician; Dobson, the painter; and, later, Nell Gwynne. It gave its name to St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross, which was laid out in 1613 and soon became a fashionable residential st. In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 2, the Col. directs in his will "the disposal of my body in burial at St. Martin's i' the Field." In his Five Gallants i. 1, Arthur brings in a trunk of apparel "from St. Martin's-in-the-Fields." The Booke of Fortune, attributed to Sir T. More, was "Imprinted by me, Robert Wyer, dwelling in Saynt Martyns parish, in the Duke of Suffolk's rents, beside Charing Cross."

MARTIN'S-LE-GRAND (SAINT). A collegiate Ch. in Lond., with the right of sanctuary, founded in 750, enlarged in 1056, and chartered by William I in 1068. It stood on the E. side of St. M. Lane, now St. M.-le-g., on the site of the present Post Office. The curfew was rung from its tower, and at its sound the gates of the city closed for the night. The ch. was destroyed at the dissolution of the Monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII, but the right of sanctuary remained till 1697, and as a result St. M. Lane became the resort of all manner of criminals and debtors. Many foreign artificers also settled within the sanctuary, and it became notorious for the sale of cheap clothes and boots, sham jewellery, copper lace, known as St. M. lace, and all sorts of second-rate finery. When the ch. was pulled down a tavern was built on its site, called St. M. in the Sentree, or Sanctuary. In News Barthol. Fair, in the list of taverns, we find: "Now of late, St. Martin's in the Sentree."

In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Eyre speaks of the shoemakers as "the flower of St. M." Deloney, in Craft ii. 10, says, "There dwelt in St. M. a jolly shoemaker, he was commonly called the Green King." In Reading vi., the visitors to Lond. "viewed in St. M. shoemakers." Dekker, in Hornbook iii., advises the Gull to "fetch thee boots out of S. Martens." Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchet (Eliz. Pamph.), p. 56, accuses Martin Marprelate of drawing "divinity from the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge to Shoemakers' Hall in Sainct Martins." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says to Judith, "You must to the Pawn to buy lawn; to St. M. for lace." So Milton, Areopagitica (Fletcher), p. 114, "our Lond. trading St. Thomas in his vestry, and add to that St. Martin and St. Hugh—that patron saint of shoemakers—have not more vendible ware, ready made." In Northward i. 2, when Jack Hornet is to be dressed up as Doll's father, with a chain about his neck and so forth, Doll says, "For that St. M. and we will talk." In Massinger's Madam iv. 2, young Goldwire, being assured that he is to inherit a fortune, says to Shave'em, his mistress, "Cheapside and the Exchange Shall court thy custom, and thou shalt forget There e'er was a St. M." In the Accounts of Revels at Court (1572), there is an entry of "Copper silver fringe" bought of "John Wever of St. M." St. M. rings were gilt copper rings, and St. M. stuff or ware meant counterfeit goods. Mynshull, in Essays of a Prison (1618) 23, says, "They are like the rings and chains bought at S. Martines, that wear fair for a little time, but shortly after will prove Alchimy, or rather pure copper." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Hornet, with a brass chain about his neck, says, "Your right whiffler hangs himself [fits himself with a chain] in St. M. and not in Cheapside." In Brome's Moor iii. 3, Banelass mentions amongst his conquests "the straight spiny shop-maid in St. M." In Braithwaite's Honest Ghost (1658), we have "By this he travels to St. M. Lane And to the shops he goes to buy a chain." Becon, in Jewel of Joy (1560) ii. 19, says, "Certain light brains will rather Wear a Marten chain, the price of viiid. than they would be unchained." In Compter's Commonwealth (1617), p. 28, St. M.'s rings are defined as "fair to the eye, but if a man break them asunder and looke into them, they are nothing but brasse and copper." In Greene's Quip, p. 246, we read of "a frenchman and a millainer in S. M., and sells shirts, bands, bracelets, jewells, and such pretty toys for gentlewomen." In More, ii. 2 is laid in St. M.-le-g., and Lincoln says, "This is St. M., and yonder dwells Mutas, a wealthy Picardye, De Bard, Peter Van Hollocke, Adrian Martine, With many more outlandish fugitives."

MARY AUDRIES (SAINT). A variant of St. Mary Overies, q.v. Taylor, in Works ii. 163, says, "Now here I land thee at S. Mary Audries."

MARY AXE (SAINT). A st. in Lond., running N. from Leadenhall St. to Camomile St. There was a ch. dedicated to St. Mary in the street in old times, but it had been turned into a warehouse before Stow's day. A shop at the corner with the sign of The Axe gave it its specific name. Dekker, in Jests, mentions "Milk St., Bread St., Lime St., and S. Mary Axe" as quarters inhabited by city merchants.

MARY-LE-BOW (SAINT). See BOW CHURCH.

MARY MAGDALEN (SAINT). A ch. in Lond., in Old Fish St. at the junction of Old Change and Knighttrider St., destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. It was much damaged by a fire in 1886, and was consequently taken down. Thomas Lodge belonged to this parish. There was another ch. of St. M. M. in Milk St., which was not rebuilt after its destruction in the Gt. Fire. In Middleton's Five Gallants i. 1, Frillery, the broker, speaks of having customers in the parishes of St. Bride's, St. Dunstan's, and St. M. Maudlin's. It is impossible to say which of the two is meant. T. Heywood's Traveller was "Printed by Robert Raworth, dwelling in Old Fish-st., near St. M. Maudlins Ch. 1633."

MARY OVERIES (SAINT), now ST. SAVIOUR'S, SOUTHWARK. An ancient ch. on the W. side of the Borough High St., Southwark, just over Lond. Bdge. Its tall square tower is almost as prominent a feature in pictures of Old Lond. as the steeple of St. Paul's. It is mythically connected with a certain Mary Audrey, the wife of a Thames ferryman, who is said to have founded a sisterhood there; at any rate, there was a priory at this place in the 12th cent., which was burnt down in 1212. When it was rebuilt the ch. was dedicated to St. M. Magdalene, and was probably called St. M. Overy, or O., because it was over the river from Lond. The poet Gower gave generously to its enlargement and is buried in the ch. James I of Scotland was married there in 1424. At the dissolution of the Monasteries the ch. was bought by the inhabitants as their parish ch., and, being united with the priory ch. of St. Saviour's, took that name. The Lady Chapel is part of the old ch.; the tower dates from the 16th cent., and had a fine peal of 12 bells. Edmund Shakespeare (the brother of the dramatist), John Fletcher, and Philip Massinger are buried there. It shared with St. Antholin's (q.v.) the favour of the Puritans. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Hodge says his coins "jingle in my pocket like St. M. Overy's bells." In The Puritan, two of the serving-men of the Puritan widow are Nicholas St.-Tantlings and Simon St.-M.-O.: they are described in i. 3 as "Puritanical scrape-shoes, Flesh a good Fridays." Dekker, in Jests 10, 14, tells how "A couple of serving-men, having drunk hard in Southwarke, came to take water about 10 or 11 of the clock at night at S. M.-o. Stairs." In Deloney's Reading xi., Cole says, "Methinks these instruments sound like the ring of S. M. O. bells." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says that for joy at Coryat's return "St. Marie O. shot the Bdge." In Urquhart's Rabelais i. 27, the Friars appeal to "Our Lady on the other side of the water, St. M. Over."

MARY (SAINT), WHITECHAPEL, or ST. M. MATFELLON (i.e. S. MARIE MATRI ET FILIO). An ancient ch. in Whitechapel, dating from 1329 at least. It was originally a chapel of ease to Stepney, and was called the White Chapel, whence the name of the parish. It stands at the W. end of the Whitechapel Rd. on the S. side, just this side of Union St. Brandon, the supposed executioner of Charles I, was buried here; and it was a centre of Puritan teaching during the Commonwealth. In Cowley's Cutter iv. 5, Cutter speaks of "our brother Zephaniah Fats, an opener of revelations to the worthy in Mary Whitechappel."

MARY'S (SAINT) CHAPEL. At Angers, in which Lewis and Blanche were married. The cathedral of Angers is dedicated to St. Maurice; possibly St. M. may be meant for St. Maurice, but it is more probably the Lady

C. of the Cathedral. In Trouble. Reign, Haz., p. 351, John says, "Prepare the marriage rites Which in S. Maries C. presently Shall be performed."

MARY'S (SAINT), CAERNARVON. The chapel-of-ease to the parish ch. of C., the ch. itself being some distance from the town. In Peele's Ed. I p. 24, the Harper says to Lluellen, "Your father, by foul weather of war, was driven to take sanctuary in St. M. at Carnarvon, where he begat your worship and your brother David."

MARY'S (SAINT), NOTTINGHAM. The principal ch. in Nottingham, said to have been built in the 7th cent., now enlarged and modernized. It stands on a hill, and its tall square tower is conspicuous in all views of the city. In Sampson's Vow i. 1, 53, Ursula says to the lovers, "To St. Maries presently! The Priest stays, the clerk whines to say Amen." In ii. 1, 71, Bateman says, "Commend me to the bells of St. Maries and tell 'em my chops water to chime all in."

MARY (SAINT) SPITAL. A Priory of St. M., founded by Walter Brune, or Brewen, and his wife, Rosia, in 1197. It stood at the point where Bishopsgate St. Without becomes Norton Folgate, on the E. side of the St., between Spital Sq. and White Lion St. In the corner house of the latter one of the jambs of the old gateway may still be seen, built into the wall. It had 180 beds for the sick at the time of the dissolution of the religious houses by Henry VIII, but it had to go all the same, and the site was used for private mansions. A part of the churchyard was, however, left, with an open-air pulpit, and from this annual sermons were preached on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of Easter Week, on the Resurrection. After the Gt. Fire the sermons were removed, first to St. Bridget's, Fleet St., and then to Christ Ch. in Newgate St. They were attended by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen in state. Rowley's New Wonder tells the story of the benefactions of Walter Brune: in iv., he says, "Near Norton Folgate have I bought ground, . . . to erect this house, Which I will call St. M. Hospital." In Skelton's Colin Clout 1177, the Prelates complain: "At Paul's Cross and elsewhere, Openly at Westminster And M. Spittle they set not by us a whittle."

MARY THE VIRGIN (SAINT). A ch. in Lond. at the corner of Aldermanbury and Love Lane. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. John Hemminge and Henry Condell, the editors of the 1st Folio of Shakespeare, are buried here.

MARY (SAINT) THE VIRGIN, OXFORD. The University Ch. of Oxford, on the N. side of High St., at the corner of Catherine St. It was founded by Alfred the Great, but the present ch. was built during the reign of Henry VII, and the interior was restored in the early part of the 19th cent. Here the University sermons are preached. Earle, in Microcosmography ii., says of the young raw preacher: "His collections of study are the notes of sermons, which, taken up at St. Mary's, he utters in the country." The University Ch. of Cambridge is Gt. St. Mary's, but as Earle was an Oxford man it may be assumed that it is to the Oxford St. Mary's that he is referring. So, in xliii., Earle says of the bold, forward man: "He never defers St. Mary's beyond his regency, and his next sermon is at Paul's Cross," i.e. he takes the earliest opportunity of preaching before the University. So Burton, A. M. Intro., says, "Had I been as forward as some others, I might have haply printed a sermon at Paul's Cross, a sermon in St. Marie's, Oxon." Burton, like Earle, was an Oxford man.

MARY'S PORT (SAINT). See MARIA, PUERTO DI SANTA.

MARY'S (SAINT), YORK. A Benedictine Abbey, founded by Alan, Earl of Richmond, on the N. bank of the Ouse at York, just beyond Lendal Bdge. The ruins are extensive and are very interesting; the grounds are used as a public park, under the name of the Museum Gardens. In Downfall Huntington ii. 2, Scarlett says of a certain priest: "He is of York and of St. M. cloister."

MARYBONE (or, more fully, MARYLEBONE). Lying between Oxford St. and Regent's Park. Was, in the 16th cent. a country vill. near Lond. It took its name from a little chapel dedicated to St. Mary-le-Bourne, i.e. on the Bourne or brook which gave its name also to Tyburn. Others think it is a corruption of St. Mary-la-Bonne. This chapel was replaced by a ch. on the W. side of High St., near its junction with Marylebone Rd., which is represented in Hogarth's picture of the Rake's Wedding. It was pulled down in 1741 and replaced by the present ch., now a chapel-of-ease to the new ch. on the S. side of Marylebone Rd., opposite to the York Gate of Regent's Park. M. Park and M. Park Fields corresponded to what is now Regent's Park. In Jonson's Tub iii. 5, Hugh, having been robbed between Hampstead Heath and Kentish Town, "went to the next Justice, One Master Bramble, here at M." In v. 1, Scriben says, "The clock dropped 12 at M." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 3, Laxton, entering in Grays-Inn-Fields with a coachman, says, "Prithee drive thy coach to the hither end of M. Park, a fit place for Moll to get in." In his Quarrel iv. 4, Trimtram gives as the reason why the pander, the bawd, and the whore were "buried near M. Park" that they were hanged at Tyburn. In Fragmenta Regalia (1641), we are told of a duel fought between Lord Essex and Sir Charles Blount "near M. Park." In Brome's Northern ii. 1, Fitchow surmises that her sister has come "to invite me forth into the air of Hide-Park or M." In Nabbes' Totenham i. 6, Worthgood says, "This, sure, is Marrowbone-park and he the keeper."

MARYBOSSE FERRY. In Boss Alley, on the S. side of Thames St., Lond., there was a boss, or drinking fountain, continually running, erected by Sir Richard Whittington. On the N. side of Thames St., opposite to Boss Alley, was St. Mary's Hill, with the church of St. Mary-at-Hill upon it. The boss was in the parish of St. Mary, and would naturally enough be called M. It is close to Billingsgate, and the ferry would therefore be that from Billingsgate, at the bottom of Boss Alley, across the Thames. In Wilson's Pedler 1101, the Pedler says, "To pass through M. F. they have chosen, In the which sea unto death they shall be frozen."

MARYGOLD. A bookseller's sign in Lond. H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier was "Printed by I. Okes, and are to be sold by Francis Eglesfield at his house in Paul's churchyard at the sign of the M."

MARYLEBONE. See MARYBONE.

MASHAM. A town in N. Riding Yorks., 30 m. N.W. of York. In H5 ii. prol. 24, "Henry, Lord Scroop of M.," is named as one of the conspirators; and in ii. 2, 94, he is condemned to death. He was the grandson of Henry le Scroop, the 1st Baron M.

MASSAGETAE. A Scythian tribe living to the E. of the Caspian Sea, on the E. bank of the Araxes. Cyrus was killed in fight with them and their Q. Tomyris. Herodotus (i. 215) describes them as savage and warlike, having their wives in common, and killing and eating their old people. In Tiberius 1135, Germanicus, speaking of the Angrivarii in Germany, says, "Not Massagetes were so cruel called." In Antonie i. 191, the Chorus says, "To shun them go we should To Scythes and Massagetes Who near the Pole reside."

MASSIC HILLS (now MONTÉ MASSICO). A range of hills in N. Campania in Italy. They still produce a wine which ranks second only to the famous Falernian. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Maharball says of the Carthaginians at Capua: "We drink no wine But of Campania's Masicus."

MASSILIA. See MARSEILLES.

MASSINGHAM. A vill. in Norfolk abt. 28 m. N.W. of Norwich. In Mankind, p. 23, Nought says, "I should go to William Patrick of M.; I shall spare Master Allington of Bottisham, and Hammond of Swaffham."

MASTER'S SIDE. See COUNTER, FLEET PRISON.

MAUBORN. See MALVERN.

MAUDLEYN. See MAGDALA.

MAURETANIA. The old name for the dist. in N.W. Africa including Morocco and part of Algiers. In Marlowe's Dido iv., Dido commands her guards "With Mn. darts to wait upon" Aeneas. In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline assures his followers that the armies near hand are "commanded by our friends: one army in Spain by Cnaeus Piso, the other in M. by Nucerinus." In his Blackness, "black M." is the first place ending in -tania, one of which is to be the abode of liberty (Britannia being naturally the one intended). In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. v. 1, Clem addresses the K. of Fez as "Great monarch of the Mns." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 555, Spendall speaks of "a Mn. Moor." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, the Basso announces that the Turks have "now in arms 10,000 Janissaries, Mounted on lusty Mn. steeds," i.e. Barbary horses. In May's Agrippina iv. 473, Petronius, inveighing against Roman extravagance, says, "The Mn. grounds To get wild beasts are searched" for the amphitheatre. See also BARBARY, MOROCCO, MOOR.

MAURICE (or, more fully, THE GRAVE M., i.e. GRAF). A house of entertainment in Hyde Park. It was named after Prince M. of Nassau, the son of William the Silent, governor of the United Provinces (1584-1625). He was popular in England as the champion of Protestantism against Spain. It was called the Lodge in the latter part of the 17th cent., and, later still, the Cake House. It stood about the centre of the Park, and was pulled down in 1730 when the Serpentine was constructed. The Lond. Directory records still 2 taverns with the sign of the Grave M., one in Whitechapel Rd., the other in St. Leonard's Rd. In Shirley's Hyde Park iv. 1, Fairfield says, "I'll try what sack can do; I have sent my footman to the M. for a bottle." Later the inn is called "His Excellence' Head."

MAURUS (a MOOR, q.v.). In Tit. iv. 2, 20, Demetrius reads from a scroll: "Integer vitae, scelerisque purus, non eget Mauri jaculis nec arcu," to which Chiron responds "O, 'tis a verse in Horace; I know it well; I read it in the Grammar long ago." This couplet is twice quoted in Lily's Grammar, first as an example of the use of the ablative after verbs of lack, and then in the section "De generibus carminum."

MAUSOLEUM. The tomb erected by Artemisia at Halicarnassus in the middle of the 4th cent. B.C. to the memory of her husband Mausolus, K. of Caria. It was accounted one of the 7 wonders of the world. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 4, Tamburlaine, on the death of Zenocrate, exclaims: "In as rich a tomb as Mausolus We both will rest." In Webster's Gamster iv., Beaumont predicts: "When I am dead, Thy tears shall raise a monument of pearl, To outdo the great Mausolus' sepulchre."

MAYOR'S LANE. Apparently some st. in the neighbourhood of Bunhill Fields, Lond. I suspect a pun is intended with Magalhaen; I cannot find a M. L., but the name may have been given jestingly to City Rd., or Worship St. On further consideration I am disposed to read Magel L., i.e. Magalhaen. In B. & F. Friends i. 2, Blacksnout says that he got a wound in the groin "at the siege of Bunnil, passing the straights 'twixt M. L. and Terra del Fuego, the fiery isle." The Straits of Magalhaen lie between S. America and Terra del Fuego.

MAY-POLE. There was a M. set up annually in Lond. in Leadenhall St., opposite St. Andrew Undershaft, so called from the M. which towered above the ch. steeple. In the intervals it was hung on a set of hooks let into the wall of Undershaft Alley. It was last erected on the "Evil May-Day" of 1513. It was kept on its hooks till 1549, when it was destroyed by the Puritans as an Idol. Another M., 100 ft. high, stood on the site of the ch. of St. Mary-le-Strand. It was destroyed by the Puritans in 1644, but another, 134 ft. high, was set up at the Restoration of Charles II. It gradually decayed and was replaced by another, a little further W., in 1713. This was removed in the time of Sir Isaac Newton and the timber used as a support for Huyghens' telescope in Wanstead Park. M. Alley preserves its memory. In Rowley's Match Mid. iv., Alexander threatens to strip himself "as naked as Grantham steeple or the Strand M." In Pasquin's Palinodia (1619) B. 3, we have: "Our approach Within the spacious passage of the Strand Objected to our sight a summer-brooch, Ycleped a M., which in all our land No city, st., nor town can parallel, Nor can the lofty spire of Clerkenwell." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 3, Trapdoor, exhorted to stand up, says, "Like your new M."

MAZIÈRES. A town in S. France, on the Lers, 29 m. N.E. of Foix; but in the passage following the author appears to confuse it with Najarra, or Nagero, an old town in N. Spain, 140 m. N. of Madrid. It was formerly a favourite residence of the Kings of Navarre. In Smith's Hector i. 2, 73, the Bastard of Spain tells how the Black Prince "opposed me at M. and won the day." Scene 1 of Act III is laid at M.

MAZZARA. An ancient division of Sicily, including the W. part of the island. Its chief town was Palermo. In Davenant's Platonic i. 1, Fredaline says that Phylamont rules "all that rich Mazara yields."

MEANDER. A river in Asia Minor, rising in Phrygia, and flowing W. by a proverbially circuitous course to the Aegean Sea, close to Miletus. It abounded in swans. In Glapthorne's Argalus ii. 2, Aminta says, "Winding M. first shall straightly run Ere Clitophon's false heart do serious prove." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Justiniano says, "Come, drink up Rhine, Thames, and M. dry." In Nash's Summers, p. 70, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to M. for swans." In Chapman's Usher iii. 2, Bassiolo swears he will keep his friendship "While there be bees in Hybla, or white swans in bright M." In Milton's Comus 230, a song begins: "Sweet Echo that liv'st unseen By slow M.'s margent green." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 21, calls it "Maeander intricate." Davies, in Orchestra (1594) 53, says, "I love Maeander's path Which to the tunes of dying swans doth dance Such winding slights." In Preface to Zepheria (1594) 8, the author says, "Ye fetcht your pens from wing of singing swan, When . . . she floats Adown M. streams." Tofte, in Laura (1597) xiv. 1, says, "The swift M., turning, winds so fast And with his stream in circle-wise so runs, That wanton-like from whence he springs at last Back to his fountain-head again he comes." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, says that "M. [breeds] heath." In Antonie ii. 347, the Chorus says, "The bird in death That most Maeander loves So sweetly sighs his breath When death his fury proves." The word is used generally of any winding path or course. In Temp. iii. 3, 3, Gonzalo says, "Here's a maze trod indeed through forth-rights and ms." T. Heywood, in Witches iv. 226, says, "The more I strive to unwind myself From this M., I the more therein Am intricated."

MEATH. See MENTZ.

MECCA. A town in Arabia, near the E. coast of the Red Sea, abt. 45 m. E. of the port of Jiddah. Here Mohammed was born about A.D. 570, and here he began to preach his doctrine of the unity of Allah. After 10 or 12 years he and his followers left M. in 622, and from this flight, or Hijra, all Mohammedan dates are reckoned. He returned and conquered M. in 630, and died there in 632. His coffin, it was said, remained suspended in the air without any visible support. The Ka'aba, an ancient heathen shrine, became the centre of Mohammedan worship, the most revered object being the Black Stone, set in the S.E. corner of the Ka'aba, which is itself in the middle of the great Mosque. It is the ambition of every Mohammedan to make the Pilgrimage to M. at least once in his life, and scores of thousands of pilgrims travel thither every year. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, Callapine invests Almeda "K. of Ariadan Bordering on Mare Rosa, near to M." In Jonson's Angurs, Vangoose, by his Ars Catoptrica (a sort of magic lantern), promises to show the company "de pilgrim dat go now, two, dre tousend mile to de great Mahomet at de Mecha." In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. iv. 3, Mullisheg says, "Our God shall be our pleasure; For so our Mn. prophet warrants us." In Nash's Lenten, p. 303, one Mr. Harborne is credited with having so spread the fame of England that the pagans "talk of Lond. as frequently as of their prophet's tomb at M." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes swears by "Sacred Mahomet whose glorious body Closed in a coffin mounted up the air And hung on statly M.'s temple-roof." In S. Rowley's When You B. i., Summers says, "Mahomet, that was buried i' th' top of's ch. at Meca, his tomb fell down." In Nash's Wilton E. 2, we have: "We being Moechi [i.e. adulterers] fetch our antiquity from the temple of Moecha where Mahomet is hung up": where there is, of course, an allusion to Mohammed's permission of a plurality of wives. Constable, in Diana (1594) iv. 5, says of Mahomet: "In midst of M.'s temple roof, some say, He now hangs, without touch or stay at all." In Mason's Mulleasses 693, Mulleasses addresses Mahomet as "Thou God of Mecha, mighty Mahomet." In B. & F. Scornful iii. 2, the Capt. says to Loveless, "M. shall sweat and Mahomet shall fall, And thy dear name fill up his monument."

MECHLIN. A city in Belgium, 14 m. S.E. of Antwerp, famous for its lace. In Middleton's Chess iv. 4, the Black Knight promises a Savoy dame that she should have a child "If she could stride over St. Rumbaut's breeches: A relique kept at M." This Rumbaut is Rumoldus, or Rumbold, said to have been Bp. of Dublin, and to have been murdered at M. A.D. 775. His body was miraculously discovered, and the cathedral was built in his honour, with a massive square tower, 300 ft. high, which is still the principal object of interest in the city. Here were preserved the miraculous nether garments of the Saint.

MECKLENBURG. Dist. in N. Germany on the Baltic, E. of Holstein. It was divided into 2 duchies, M.-Schwerin and M.-Gustrow. In the 30 Years' War they were sold by the Emperor to Wallenstein, and the Dukes expelled. They were subsequently restored by Gustavus Adolphus. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein ii. 3, the K. of Hungary speaks of Wallenstein as "Your General of your forces Of Gloyawe, Mechlenburg, Saga, Fridland." Wallenstein was D. of Friedland, in W. Prussia, then part of Poland; Glogau and Sagan are in the N. of Silesia.

MEDDELLOM. See MIDDLEHAM.

MEDIA (Ms. = Medes, Mn. = Median). The country lying S. of the Caspian Sea, E. of Armenia and Assyria. Its capital was Ecbatana. The Ms. were probably of Indo-European stock, closely akin to the Persians. Cyrus of Anshan united the Ms. and Persians under his rule, and founded the Medo-Persian Empire 538 B.C. After the downfall of the Persian Empire the Ms. were subject to the Greeks and the Syrian kings. Then they came under the rule of the Parthian kings, on the E. frontier of the Roman Empire. Their subsequent history is bound up with that of Persia, of which they form a part. In old times the Ms. were famous for their courage and their skill in horsemanship and the use of the bow. Later they gained a reputation for luxury both in dress and living. M. is one of the characters in Darius. In Cyrus i. 1, Cyrus addresses his army as "Ye Persians, Ms., and Hyrcanians." In Respublica ii. 1, Respublica, meditating on the mutability of things, says, "Where is the great empire of the Ms. and Persians?" In Middleton's Changeling i. 1, when Alsemero kisses Beatrice, Jasperino exclaims, "How now? the laws of the Ms. are changed sure." The idea that the laws of the Ms. and Persians could not be changed got currency from the statements in Daniel vi. 9 and Esther i. 19, but it does not seem to have any authority from history. In Partiall i. 3, Lucina says, "Your commands, like to laws of Ms. and Persians, I have obeyed."

In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 4, Cæsar says, "I'll fill Armenians plains and Mns. hills With carcasses of bastard Scithian brood." This was to be in revenge for the defeat and death of Crassus in 53 B.C. In Octavia 504, Byllius says, "I was in M. when Phraates slew Great Tatianus fighting for my lord." The reference is to the defeat of Antony's generals in 36 B.C., by Phraates IV, K. of Parthia. In Ant. iii. 1, 7, after the defeat of Pacorus of Parthia, in 38 B.C., Silius urges Ventidius "Spur through M., Mesopotamia, and the shelters whither The routed fly." In iii. 6, 14, Cæsar complains that Antony has given "Great M., Parthia, and Armenia" to his son Alexander. This arrangement was to take effect after Antony had conquered these lands, which he never did. In iii. 6, 75, Cæsar says that amongst Antony's allies are "Polemon and Amyntas, The kings of Mede and Lycaonia." This is a slip: Polemon was K. of Pontus;

the K. of M. was Artavasdes, who allied himself with Antony after the disasters of 36 B.C., in which he had fought along with Phraates, but had later given shelter to Antony's fleeing troops. In Nero ii. 3, Scaevinus says, "Shall we, whom neither The Mn. bow nor Macedonian spear . . . could Subdue, lay down our necks to tyrant's axe?" In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Cosroes announces: "The plot is laid by Persian noblemen And captains of the Mn. garrisons To crown me emperor of Asia." He is made Emperor, but is conquered by Tamburlaine, who founded the Persian dynasty of the Timurides. In Kyd's Cornelia i., Cicero asks, "Were they [the Romans] the heirs To Persia or the Ms., first Monarchies?" Milton, P. R. iii. 320, introduces troops of soldiers "Of Adiabene, M., and the S. Of Susiana." In P. R. iii. 376, he recalls how the Ten Tribes of the N. kingdom of Israel "yet serve In Habor and among the Ms. dispersed." (See II Kings xvii. 6.) In P. L. iv. 171, he tells how the devil Asmodeus was "with a vengeance sent From M. post to Egypt." (See Tobit viii. 3.)

In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron says that Alexander the Gt. did not spend his treasures "On Mn. luxury, banquets, and women." In Massinger's Maid Hon. iii. 1, Bertoldo says, "All delicacies Prepared by Mn. cooks for epicures, When not our own, are bitter." In Taming of a Shrew, Haz., p. 513, Fernando promises Kate: "Thou shalt have garments wrought of Mn. silk." In Massinger's Bondman i. 3, Timoleon sarcastically advises the Syracusans to humour their conquerors: "Cover the floors on which they are to tread With costly Mn. silks." In Noble Ladies, Cyprian promises Justina "Fine Mn. linen and barbarian silks." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 2, Tamburlaine promises Zenocrate "Thy garments shall be made of Mn. silk." In Jonson's Magnetic i. 5, Polish, in a couple of atrocious puns, says, "the Persians were our Puritans, Had the fine piercing wits," and the Ms. were "the middle-men, the lukewarm protestants."

MEDINA SIDONIA. A city in the extreme S. of Spain, on a hill 21 m. W. of Cadiz. It gave their title to the Dukes of the house of Guzman el Bueno. The fact that the D. of M. Sidonia commanded the Spanish Armada made the name familiar to Englishmen. In Webster's Weakest i. 2, we have mention of "Hernando the great D. of M." There is a D. of M. in B. & F. Rule a Wife. In Lust's Domin. ii. 3, the Q. says, "Spread abroad in Madrid, Granada, and M. The hopes of Philip." In Dekker's Babylon 257, Como, speaking of the Spanish Armada, says: "This squadron stout Medyna does command." In B. & F. Pilgrim iv. 3, Julietta says, "I have a business from the D. of M."

MEDITERRANEAN ILE. Used humorously for Paul's Walk, the middle aisle of St. Paul's, Lond., q.v. Dekker, in Hornbook iv., says, after speaking of Paul's Walk: "Your Mediterranean Ile is then the only gallery wherein the pictures of all your true fashionate and complement Guls are, and ought to be, hung up." (See under PAUL'S (SAINT). See also below.)

MEDITERRANEAN SEA. Between the S. of Europe and the N. of Africa, from the Straits of Gibraltar to Syria. In Temp. i. 2, 234, Ariel announces: "For the rest of the fleet Which I dispersed, they all have met again And are upon the M. flote Bound sadly home for Naples." In L. L. L. v. 1, 61, Armado swears: "Now, by the salt wave of the Mediterranean, a sweet touch, a quick venue of wit." The M. is much saltier than the open ocean, and salt is an emblem of wit. In the old

Timon iii. 3, Pseudocheus says to Gelasimus, "If anything can help thee that doth grow . . . in the M. S., It shall be had forthwith." In Thracian iii. 3, the Alcalde of Africa says, "Our sable ensigns never yet before Displayed beyond the M. S." In B. & F. Span. Cur. v. 2, Diego, asked what dish he prefers, says, "For me some 40 pound of lovely beef, Placed in a M. S. of brewis." Dekker, in Dead Term, says in the name of St. Paul's: "Thus doth my middle Ile shew like the M. S. in which as well the merchant hoists up sails to purchase wealth honestly as the rover to light upon prize unjustly." (See previous article.) In Shirley's Gamester iii., Wilding says that the vessel he has been chasing has struck sail, and cries: "Aboard, my new lord of the M." In B. & F. Pilgrim iv. 2, Alinda, pretending to be mad, says, "I must sup with the moon to-night in the M."

MEDLEY, probably = MADELEY. A town in Shropsh., 13 m. S.E. of Shrewsbury. In Swetnam iv. 2, Swash says of Misogonus (Swetnam): "He came to M. to eat cakes and cream at my old mother's house."

MEDWAY. A river in England, rising in Sussex and flowing in a N.E. direction across Kent to Chatham and Sheerness where it enters the estuary of the Thames. It is navigable up to Penshurst, 20 m. from Chatham. In Jonson's Ode to Penshurst, he says, "If the high-swollen M. fail thy dish, Thou hast thy ponds that pay thee tribute fish." In Webster's Monuments, it is directed that in the scene shall appear "Thamesis and M., the 2 rivers on whom the Lord Mayor extends his power, as far as from Staines to Rochester." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, describes at length the marriage of the Thames and the M., which he christens "the lovely Medua." In his Shep. Cal., July 81, Morrell speaks of "The salt M., that trickling streams Adown the dales of Kent, Till with his elder brother Themis His brackish waves be meynt." Drayton, in Polyolb. xviii. 109, says, "This M. still has nursed those navies in her road Our armies that had oft to conquest borne abroad." Milton, in Vacation Exercise 100, calls it "M. smooth." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 8, says, "Kent will say her M. doth excell." Bryskett, in Astrophel (on the death of Sir Philip Sidney), says, "The M.'s silver streams that wont so still to slide Were troubled now and wroth." Penshurst was Sidney's home.

MEISSEN. The March of Meissen lay along the N. frontier of Bohemia from the Saale to the border of Silesia, crossing the Elbe where the city of Meissen stands. In H5 i. 2, 54, the Archbp. of Canterbury says that the Salique land "twixt Elbe and Sala Is at this day in Germany called Meisen." This identification probably arose from the name of the river Saale, but it is more than doubtful. The Salian Franks lived in Holland, and extended their territory later as far S. as the Somme. In Milkmaids iii. 2, the Indictment runs: "Dorigen Ebroistene, daughter to Guido Ebroistene, in the province of Mysen, gentleman, etc."

MELFORD. A vill. in Suffolk, 18 m. W. of Ipswich, generally called Long M. In H6 B. i. 3, 25, a petition is presented "against the D. of Suffolk for enclosing the commons of M." In the Contention the petition calls it "long M."

MELIBOEIA. An ancient town on the coast of Thessaly, at the base of Mt. Ossa, now Aghia. The purple dye of M. was almost as famous as that of Tyre in ancient times, and the shellfish from which it was obtained is still found off the Thessalian coast. Milton, P. L. xi. 242, represents Michael as wearing a "vest of military purple . . . Livelier than Meliobean, or the grain Of Sarra," i.e. Tyre.

MELILLA. A port in Morocco on the W. side of the G. of M., abt. 170 m. E. of the Straits of Gibraltar. In Stucley 2461, M. is mentioned as one of the towns in Morocco held by the Portuguese at the time (1578).

MELIND. A spt. on the E. coast of Africa, abt. 100 m. N. of Mombasa. It was visited by Vasco di Gama on his 1st voyage to India, and was taken by the Portuguese in 1605. It is now in British East Africa. Milton, P. L. xi. 399, mentions "Mombaza, and Quiloa, and M., And Sofala" amongst the S. African kingdoms shown in vision to Adam. Rabelais, in Gargantua i. 8, quotes the opinion of "the K. of Melinda's jeweller" on the value of an emerald.

MEMNONIUM. A name applied to Susa (q.v.) by Herodotus (v. 54), because of a tradition which ascribed its foundation to Memnon, the son of Tithonus. Milton, P. L. x. 308, describes Xerxes as coming to invade Greece "From Susa, his Memnonian palace high."

MEMPHIS (Mn. = Memphian). The ancient capital of Lower Egypt, on the Nile, 120 m. from its mouth, a little S. of the modern Cairo. Here the first 6 dynasties ruled, and in the immediate neighbourhood the 3 great pyramids were built by Chufu, Chephren, and Menkaura, of the 3rd dynasty, some 3800 years B.C. It was the abode of Ptah, and the seat of the worship of the Apis bulls, whose mummies were interred in the so-called Serapeum at Sakkarah close by. The site is now quite deserted and desolate. In H6 A. i. 6, 22, Charles says of Joan of Arc: "A statelier pyramid to her I'll rear Than Rhodope's or M. ever was." So the Ff.; but the emendation "Rhodope's of M." is inevitable. Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 12) says that the 3rd pyramid was built by Rhodope of Naucratis, a friend of Aesop's, and contemporary of Sappho's. This is, of course, a mistake. The 3rd pyramid was built by Menkaura, of the 3rd dynasty. In Jonson's Barriers the Lady of the Lake laments the destruction of K. Arthur's palace, which "did the barbarous Mn. heaps outclimb." In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 3, Cleopatra says to Cæsar, "I will show thee all the cost and curious art Which either Cheops [i.e. Chufu] or our M. boast." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1656, Earth says, "Where be those high Pyramides so famed By which the barbarous M. first was named?" Milton, P. L. i. 694, speaks of "Babel and the works of Mn. Kings" as examples of the most enduring of human buildings.

In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 2, Zenocrate, the daughter of the Soldan of Egypt, is seized by Tamburlaine on her way "To M. from my uncle's country of Media"; iv. 1 is laid at M., and the Soldan cries: "Awake, ye men of M., hear the clang Of Scythian trumpets!" In B. & F. Bonduca ii. 4, this line is burlesqued, Judas exclaiming: "Awake, ye men of M.! Be sober and discreet." In Chapman's Blind Beggar i. 1, 112, Irus says, "I am but a shepherd's son, at M. born." Milton, P. L. i. 307, speaks of the overthrow of "Busiris and his Mn. chivalry" in the Red Sea. (See Exodus xiv.) Milton took the name of the K. from Raleigh, but it is unhistorical. The priests of Egypt, and especially of M., were credited with occult powers. In Davenant's Wits ii. 4, the elder Palatine speaks of his books, "which, though not penned By dull Platonic Greeks or Mn. priests, Yet have the blessed mark of separation Of authors silenced for wearing short hair." In Davenant's Italian iv. 3, Altamont says, "I look . . . like to a Mn.

priest That had direction made of hecatombs." In Daniel's Cleopatra iv. 3, Cesario says, "Who can that deny Which sacred priests of M. do foresay?" In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 163, Selinthus says, "I can speak this, Though from no Mn. priest or sage Chaldaean." In K. K. Hon. Man C. 3, Sempronio says, "An ox in M. with his poaring tongue Licking in doctious weeds did so foretell My following death." The reference is to the Apis bull. Poaring = poring, i.e. meditating, musing. See N.E.D., s.v. PORE. Milton, Nat. Ode 214, says, "Nor is Osiris seen In Mn. grove or green, Trampling the unshowered grass with lowings loud." He confuses Osiris with Apis. In Rutter's Shepherd. Hol. v. 2, Alcon says, "This rare mirror is Made of a Mn. stone that has a power To bring a deadly sleep on all the senses." Egyptian magic has always been famous. In Nabbes' Bride iv. 1, Horten complains that though we have plenty of aromatic herbs in England, "yet we must from M. and Judaea Fetch balsam though sophisticate." In Cockayne's Obstinate ii. 2, Carionil talks of "swimming violently up those rocks From which the Mn. Nilus tumbles down." In Tiberius 1698, Julia speaks of monsters like "Theban sphinx or M. crocodile." In Scot. Presb. iii. 1, Liturgy says, "You are more cruel than the crocodile That mangles Mns. on the banks of Nile."

MENSECK (= MINSK). A province of W. Russia, E. of Poland, to which it formerly belonged. In Suckling's Brennoralt, the Palatine of Mensek is the chief of a rebellious confederacy against the K. of Poland, Sigismund: presumably Sigismund III, who came to the throne 1587.

MENTEITH. Dist. in S. Perthsh., Scotland. In H4 A. i. 1, 73, the Earl of M. is one of the prisoners taken by Hotspur at Holmedon. He was the same person as the Earl of Fife, mentioned just above as another of the prisoners. In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 16, "George Gram, and son to the Earl of Menteich," is one of the Scots hostages.

MENTZ, MAINZ, or MAYENCE. A city in Hesse-Darmstadt on the Rhine, nearly opposite its confluence with the Main. It was the seat of an archbp. who was one of the 7 Electors. It was at the height of its glory in the 13th cent., and was called "Goldene Maintz." The cathedral, with its 6 towers, is one of the finest in Germany. Here Gutenberg invented printing in 1440. Hatto, archbp. in 914, was said to have been devoured by mice (or rats) in the Mouse-tower, on an island in the Rhine opposite Bingen, some few miles down the river from M. He is one of the characters in Costly Wh., and exclaims in his agony, "The Lord Archbp. of Meath and die by rats!": where Meath is a curious mistake for Mentz. In Ford's Sacrifice iii. 2, Fernando tells how he saw in Brussels "The D. of Brabant welcome the Archbp. Of M. with rare conceit. . . . In nature of an antic"; the ladies of the court took part in it—a thing which he had never seen before, and which was much commended. This is an allusion to the performance of the Q. and her ladies in a masque at Whitehall, which had just taken place and aroused the indignation of Prynne. The Archbp. of M. appears as one of the Electors of the Empire in Chapman's Alphonsus. In i. 2, 14, he says, "Next seat belongs to Julius Florius, Archbp. of M., Chancellor of Germany, By birth the D. of fruitful Pomerland." His real name, however, was Gerhard, and he had nothing to do with Pomerania. He also appears in Smith's Hector. In Bacchus, one of the worshippers of Bacchus is "a German, born in M., his name was Grotfey Grouthead," who "came wallowing in." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 226, the Londoner says, "Their [the Parisians] larding is diversified from bacon of M. to porpoise of St. Malo." Rabelais, Gargantua i. 3, tells how Grangousier was "furnished with gammons of bacon of Mayence." In Deloney's Newberie ii., Jack tells of "the wicked spirit of Mogunce who flung stones at men and could not be seen." Mogunce is Moguntia, the Latin name for M. The story is told in the Nuremburg Chronicle i. 357.

MERATHON (= MARATHON, q.v.).

MERCERIA. The part of Venice where all the best shops are. It is entered by an archway under the Torre del Orologio, in the Piazza di San Marco, just to the right as one comes out of the cathedral. In Brome's Novella i. 2, Nanulo says, "He means to send anon A Mercadente from the M., The famous pedler woman of this city With her most precious wares."

MERCHANT TAYLORS' HALL. The M. T. of Lond. received their 1st Charter in 1327. Their 1st Hall was behind the Red Lion in Basing Lane, Cheapside; but in 1331 one Edmund Crecpin sold his house in Threadneedle St., between Fish Lane and Bishopsgate St., to John of Yakley, on behalf of the Company. There they built a Hall with a ground floor and 3 upper stories, and attached to it were 7 almshouses. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt in 1671. In Dekker's Hornbook i., he says of the Golden Age: "T. then were none of the 12 Companies; their H., that now is larger than some dorpes among the Netherlands, was then no bigger than a Dutch botcher's shop." James I and Prince Henry dined in the H. on June 7, 1607, and Ben Jonson wrote the entertainment. In the Song of Four Famous Feasts (1606), we have: "The M. T. Company, the fellowship of fame, To Lond.'s lasting dignity, lives, honoured with the same." In Jonson's Magnetic v. 5, Sir Moth says, "We met at M.-T.-H. at dinner in Thread-needle-st." John Webster, the dramatist, was a member of the Company, and wrote his Monuments in its praise. In it he says that "Worthy John Yeackesley purchased first their Hall." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xvi., Magnificence says to Liberty, "What, will ye waste wind and prate thus in vain? Ye have eaten sauce, I trow, at t. h."

MERCHANT TAYLORS' SCHOOL. Lond., in Suffolk Lane, in the parish of St. Lawrence Poultny. It was founded by the Company in 1561, and part of the old Manor of the Rose (q.v.) was bought for its accommodation. The 1st headmaster was Richard Mulcaster, under whom the boys appeared at Court in 1573 in a Latin play, and frequently afterwards. When the Charterhouse School was removed to Godalming in 1873 the Company bought the site and transferred their school thither. Amongst the pupils at the School were Nathanael Field, James Shirley, Thomas Lodge, and Edmund Spenser.

MERCIA. One of the kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxon Heptarchy, founded in A.D. 626. It included all the country between the Thames, the Severn, and the Humber. In Brewer's Lovesick King i. 1, Edel announces to Etheldred that "The traitorous Osbert D. of Mertia" is in alliance with the Danes. In Lochrine v. prol. 16, Ate says, "Stout Thrasimachus . . . Gives battle to her [Gwendoline's] husband and his host Nigh to the river of great Mertia." Apparently the Severn is meant, for after the battle, described in scene 4, Sabren drowns herself in that river. Drayton, in Polyolb. ix., tells of the wars between the Mins. and the Welsh in the old days.

MERIBAH (i.e. strife). A name given to the place where the Israelites "strove" with Moses, because they had no water, and where he brought water out of the rock for them. It is also called M.-Kadesh, and must be located somewhere near Kadesh, abt. 50 m. S. of Beer-sheba. Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxi. 32, says, "I tried thee at the water steep Of Meriba renowned."

MERMAID. A famous Lond. tavern, in Bread St., with passage entrances from Cheapside and Friday St. Its tokens are inscribed "Ye M. Tavern, Cheapside." Jonson calls it Bread St.'s M.; and Aubrey says it was in Friday St. A certain Haberdasher, W.R., whose shop was between Wood St. and Milk St., describes it as "over against the M. Tavern in Cheapside." It was a favourite inn of Ben Jonson; and though the story of Sir Walter Raleigh's M. Club is probably mythical, Beaumont, in his verses to Ben Jonson—"What things have we seen done at the M.!"—is a sufficient witness to those convivial meetings of the poets, which inspired Keats' Lines on the M. Tavern. The host in 1603 was one Johnson, as appears from the will of Albion Butler, of Clifford's Inn, who owed him 17/-. The inn was destroyed in the Gt. Fire.

In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit says, "A pox on these pretenders to wit! your Three Cranes, Mitre, and M.-men: not a corn of true salt, not a grain of right mustard amongst them all. They may pay 2d. in a quart more for their Canary than other men. But give me the man can start up a Justice of wit out of 6/- beer and give the law to all the poets and poet-suckers in town." In Devil iii. 1, Meercraft taunts Everill for "haunting the Globes and Ms., wedding in with lords still at the table." In Epigrams xi., he says, "That which most doth take my Muse and me is a pure cup of rich Canary wine Which is the M.'s now, but shall be mine." In Epigrams cxxxiii. (The Famous Voyage), he says that the 2 Knights "At Bread-st.'s M. having dined, and merry, Proposed to go to Holborn in a wherry." In Middleton's Five Gallants ii. 1, Pursenet suggests that the company should sup "at the M.," but Goldstone says, "The Mitre for neat attendance, diligent boys, and—push!—excels far." In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 4, Valentine says, "Draw me a map from the M.; I mean a midnight map to 'scape the watches." Later he says, "Meet at the M." In Mayne's Match iii. 3, Timothy rejoices that he has escaped shipwreck, for then he might have been "converted into some pike and made an ordinary, perchance, at the M." Dekker, in Armourers, says, "Neither the M. nor the Dolphin, nor he at Mile-end-green, can when he list be in good temper when he lacks his mistress, that is to say, Money." Tom Coryat sent a letter from the Mogul's Court in 1615 to "The worshipful Fraternity of Sireniacal [i.e. Cyrenaical, from the Cyrenaics, an offshoot of the Epicureans] gentlemen that meet the 1st Friday of every month at the sign of the M. in Bread St. in London," and mentions among them Ben Jonson and John Donne. In the quarto of Jonson's Ev. Man i., the M. is the inn which in the later edition of 1616 is called the Windmill. In Middleton's Hubbub, p. 77, the young gallant is advised that "his eating must be in some famous tavern, as the Horn, the Mitre, or the M." In Dekker's Satiromastix iv. 2, 76, Tuca says to Horace (Jonson), "A gentleman shall not . . . sneak into a tavern with his m. but he shall be satyred and epigram'd upon." M. here means a mistress, but the reference to Jonson's connection with the M. tavern is obvious. There was another M. in Cornhill mentioned in the list of taverns in News Barthol. Fair, another at the S. side of Charing Cross, and yet another on the S. side of Gt. Carter St., near Addle Hill. Suckling, in Sad One iv. 4, has a M. Inn in Sicily. Miss Wotton has recently called attention to another M. Tavern at the corner of Aldersgate and Gresham St. It is now the Lord Raglan, and there is evidence that it was there in early Plantagenet times. The landlord in Shakespeare's time was William Goodyear, who was connected with the Warwickshire family of the Gooderes, one of whom adopted Michael Drayton. Miss Wotton argues that Drayton must have visited this tavern, and that probably Shakespeare often spent an evening with him there.

MERMAID. A common house-sign in Lond. In Beguiled, Dods, ix. 304, Cricket says, "He looks like a tankard-bearer that dwells in Petticoat Lane at the sign of the M." The Hundred Merry Tales was printed by Johannes Rastell, the brother-in-law of Sir T. More, "at the sign of the M. at Powlys Gate, next to Chepe syde. 1526."

MERMIDONS. See MYRMIDONS.

MEROE. The ancient name for the dist. in Nubia lying E. of Khartoum, between the Nile, the Atbara, and the Rahad. It was very fertile and well watered by irrigation from its enclosing rivers, and was often spoken of as an island. It was a great centre of caravan trade, and was consequently wealthy and prosperous. In B. & F. Valentinian iv. 4, Maximus says of the dead Aecius: "Let's burn this noble body; sweets as many As sunburnt M. breeds I'll make a flame of, Shall reach his soul in heaven." In Greene's Orlando iv. 2, 1086, Orlando says, "Tell him I'll up to M., I know he knows that watery, lakish isle." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar speaks of Pompey as "guarded with Numidian horse And aided with the unresisted power That M. or the seven-mouthed Nile can yield." Nash, in Wilton 148, says, on what authority I know not, "The Ethiopians inhabiting over against M. feed on nothing but scorpions." In Locrine ii. 5, Albanact says, "I'll pass the Alps to watery M., Where fiery Phœbus in his chariot Casts such a heat, yea, such a scorching heat, And spoileth Flora of her chequered grass." Milton, P. R. iv. 71, speaks of it as "where the shadow both ways falls, M., Nilotic isle." It was within the Tropics, and therefore the shadow falls sometimes to the N., sometimes to the S.

MERSAGANNA (= MARSA GHAMART). A port in Tunis close to the site of Carthage. In H. Shirley's M. Soldier iii. 4, Eugenius demands from Huneric, K. of the Vandals, "Free all those Christians which are now Thy slaves in M.": the Vandals having at one time (A.D. 428-533) a kingdom in N. Africa.

MERSEY. R. rising near Huddersfield in Yorksh. and flowing W. to the magnificent estuary at the entrance of which Liverpool stands. Drayton, in Polyolb. xi, says, "Proud M. is so great in entering of the main, As he would make a shew for empery to stand."

MERTHYN. A manor in the parish of Constantine, in S.E. of Cornwall, on the N. shore of Helford Creek, abt. 5 m. S. of Falmouth. In Cornish M. P. iii. 94, it is one of the places given by Pilate to the Gauler for his good services.

MERTIA. See MERCIA.

MERTON COLLEGE. University of Oxford, founded in 1264 by Walter de Merton, Chancellor of England and afterwards Bp. of Rochester. It stands on the S. side of King St., next to Corpus Christi. In its registers is contained the account of the election in 1285 of the Rex Fabarum, or King of Beans, who was a sort of Master of the Revels, and the office is there stated to be of ancient custom. The author of the True and Faithful Relation of the Rising and Fall of Thomas Tucker, etc., which contains an invaluable account of the performances of plays and pageants in the University during parts of 1607 and 1608, was written by Griffin Higgs, a Fellow of M. Nicholas Grimald, the author of Christus Redivivus (1543) and Archipropheta (1548), was a Fellow and Lecturer of M. from 1540 to 1547.

MESOPOTAMIA. Dist. between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, the seat of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empires. In Bale's Promises v., David says, "Thou threwest them [the Israelites] under the K. of M." (see Judges iii. 8, where the Hebrew has Aram; a probable conjectural emendation is Edom). In Ant. iii. 1, 8, after the victory of Ventidius over the Parthians, Silius exhorts him: "Spur through Media, M., and the shelters whither The routed fly." In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, 838, Amurack says, "You, Bajazet, go post away apace to . . . M., Asia, Armenia, and all other lands Which owe their homage to high Amurack." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Ortygius crowns Cosroes "D. of M. and Parthia." In Jonson's Case v. 2, Valentine begins a traveller's tale: "Gentlemen, having in my peregrination through M." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Eyre cries to his journeymen, "Here, you mad Mns., wash your livers with this liquor." He is fond of names like this: he uses Cappadocians and Assyrians in the same way. In Day's B. Beggar iv., Canby, describing a motion, or puppet-play, says, "You shall see the stabbing of Julius Cæsar in the French Capitol by a sort of Dutch Mns."

MESSEGON. See MEZAGA.

MESSALINE. In Tw. N. ii. 1, 18, Sebastian says, "My father was that Sebastian of M. whom I know you have heard of." In v. 1, 239, Viola says, "[I am] of M., Sebastian was my father," where it is a trisyllable. No such place is known. The suggestion that Mytilene is meant has little to support it. In the story of Apolonius and Silla, from which Shakespeare derived the plot of the play, the brother and sister who correspond to Sebastian and Viola are the children of Pontus, D. and Governor of Cyprus, and are shipwrecked on a voyage from their father's court. Now, according to Heylyn, Famagusta, the capital of Cyprus, well known at this time through its famous siege by the Turks in 1571, was also called Salamine, and I conjecture that M. is a mistake for Salamine. Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary i. 3, 213 (1596), calls the port of Cyprus "Le Saline," which may possibly be what Shakespeare wrote. Fuller, Holy State (1642) i. 11, calls Epiphanius "Bp. of Salamine in Cyprus."

MESSENE. The capital of Messenia, the country in Greece in the S.W. of the Peloponnesus. Messenia was conquered by her neighbour Sparta in 2 wars which ended 724 and 668 B.C. respectively. From this latter date Messenia was a part of the Spartan kingdom. Ford's Heart is supposed to take place at the end of the 2nd Messenian war; and in i. 2, Amyclas announces: "Laconia Hath in this latter war trod under foot M.'s pride; M. bows her neck To Lacedaemon's royalty."

MESSINA. A city in N.E. Sicily, on the Straits of M., 130 m. E. of Palermo. Pedro of Arragon took it from the French, and it remained a possession of the Spanish royal house from 1282 to 1713. The scene of Ado is laid at M., probably at the time of the visit of Pedro of Arragon after his victory over the French in 1282. In Massinger's Very Woman, the scene of which is laid at Palermo, one of the characters is a D. of M. In Phineas Fletcher's Sicelides (1615), Cosma, a light nymph of M., figures. In Davenant's Platonic i. 1, Fredaline says, "There lives within M., 3 leagues hence, One Buonateste." Act II. 1 of Ant. takes place in Pompey's house at M. M. and its neighbourhood is the scene of B. & F. Philaster.

MEUSE. A river rising in the Ardennes in N. France, and flowing past Sedan and Namur through Belgium into the North Sea, after a course of 580 m. Bryskett, in Astrophel (1591), says that at the news of Sidney's death "The Thames was heard to roar, the Rhine, and eke the M." Hall, in Ep. i. 5, says he had "a delightful passage up the sweet river Mosa."

MEXICANA. Used for N. America by Heylyn, who divides America into 2 parts, M. and Peruana, the former including what we call the United States, Canada, and British N. America. In Middleton's No Wit ii. 3, Weatherwise says, "There should be an eclipse, but not visible in our horizon, but about the western inhabitants of M. and California." Fuller, Holy State (1642), uses M. for N. America; in iv. 13, he says, "There is a tree in M. which is so exceedingly tender that a man cannot touch any of its branches but it withers presently."

MEXICO. A country in N. America, stretching from the S. of the United States to the isthmus of Panama. In the 16th cent. it included California and Texas. It was discovered and conquered by the Spaniards early in the 16th cent., and remained a part of the Spanish empire until it declared itself independent in 1821. Indeed, it was commonly called Nova Hispania. In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 53, Mandricarde declares: "I am Mandricarde of M., Whose climate fairer then Tyberius [i.e. Tiberias] Seated beyond the sea of Trypoly, And richer than the plot Hesperides." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine, in the spirit of prophecy, dreams of a Persian fleet circumnavigating India "Even from Persepolis to M., And thence unto the straits of Jubalter." In Merch. i. 3, 20, Shylock mentions, amongst Antonio's ventures, "He hath [an argosy] at M.," which, in iii. 2, 271, we learn has been lost. This shows that Antonio was not a very cautious merchant, for only Spanish ships were permitted to trade to M. In Mayne's Match i. 4, Newcut, the Templar, speaks contemptuously of a merchant's velvet jacket which "knows the way to M. as well as the map." In B. & F. Cure i. 2, Lucio tells of "an Indian maid the governor sent my mother from M." Lucio is the son of Don Alvarez of Seville. In Cockayne's Obstinate ii. 3, Phryginos declares his readiness to "Post afoot to M." Milton, in P. L. xi. 406, says of Adam: "in spirit perhaps he also saw Rich M., the seat of Montezume." Montezume was the last emperor of M., conquered by Cortes 1519-20. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Hoskins says, "Fame is but wind, thence wind may blow it . . . From M. and from Peru To China and to Cambalu." The chief city of the country was at first known as Teuschitlan, but since 1530 it has been called M. It is beautifully situated, and is one of the finest cities in the world. Montaigne

(Florio's Trans., 1603), iii. 6, speaks of "amazement-breeding magnificence of the never-like-seen cities of Cuzco and M."

MEZAGA. A river in Morocco, close to Alcazar. There is a plain of Meshara, just S. of Alcazar, from which the river, evidently the Alkhas, may have got a second name. There is also a town Mazaga, near the mouth of the Oum-er-beg, further S., but this seems too far away to be the one intended. In Stucley 2488, Sebastian asks, "Advise us, Lords, if we this present night Shall pass the river of M. here Or stay the morning." Stucley advises him to await the enemy where he is; but Sebastian decides to cross at sunrise, so that he may be at Alcazar by 10 o'clock. In Peele's Alcazar iii., Sebastian says, "See this young prince conveyed safe to Messegon."

MICHAEL HOUSE. A college in Cambridge, founded by Herve de Stanton in 1324; it was merged in Trinity College in 1546. In the accounts of M. H. in 1386 certain theatrical properties are mentioned which proves that at that date dramatic performances in the University had begun to be given by the students.

MICHAEL'S MOUNT (SAINT). A conical mass of granite abt. 250 ft. high, forming a small island in Mount's Bay, opposite Marazion, in S. Cornwall. It is connected with the mainland by a causeway at low water. It got its name from a legend that St. Michael once appeared sitting on the seaward-facing crag, still called St. M. Chair. Another legend stated that it was brought from Greece by the great wrestler Corineus, who overthrew the giant Goemagot and flung him into the sea, for which he received the whole W. country of England and called it after himself, Corineia—afterwards Cornwall. Corineus is one of the characters in Lochrine. In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Chough, the Cornishman, says, "I am as high as the Mt. in love with her already," and later in the scene he appeals to Corineus: "O Corineus, when Hercules and thou wert on the Olympic Mt. together, then was wrestling in request." Trimtram adds, "Ay, and that Mt. is now the Mt. in Cornwall—Corineus brought it thither under one of his arms, they say." Milton, in Lycidas 160, speaks of "the fable of Bellerus [in 1st edition, Corineus] old Where the great vision of the guarded Mt. Looks towards Namancos and Bayona's hold." Act V. sc. 1 of Ford's Warbeck takes place at St. M. Mt., where Katharine Gordon had taken refuge after Warbeck's failure at Exeter. In Spenser's Shep. Cal. July, 41, Morrell asks: "St. Michel's Mt. who does not know That wards the W. coast?" Donne, Satire ii. (1593), speaks of "all the land From Scots to Wight, from Mt. to Dover strand."

MICHAEL'S PORT (SAINT). A port in Malta, at the head of Sabina Bay in the N.E. of the island. In B. & F. Malta i. 3, Oriana writes to the Turks: "Put in at St. M., the ascent at that port is easiest."

MICHAEL'S (SAINT). A ch. in Famagosta, in Cyprus. It is likely, however, that Dekker was thinking of the bell of St. M., Cornhill. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortunatus says, "Women are like the great bell of St. M. in Cyprus, that keeps most rumbling when men would most sleep." Was this the "dreadful bell" which Othello ordered to be silenced?

MICHAEL'S (SAINT). There were several churches in Lond. dedicated to St. Michael: 1. A fine ch. with a noble tower on the S. side of Cornhill, E. of St. M. Alley. It was destroyed, all but the Tower, in the Gt.

Fire and rebuilt by Wren. The tower, which is an imitation of the Magdalen Tower at Oxford, has been since restored; and the whole ch. was elaborately repaired and enlarged by Sir Gilbert Scott in 1858. It had a fine peal of bells. In Three Ladies ii., Simplicity says, "The parsonage of St. M. ! by'r Lady, if you have nothing else, You shall be sure of a living besides a good ring of bells." In Pride and Lowliness (1570), we have the couplet: "Higher, as they suppose, than any steeple In all this town, St. M. or the Bow." 2. A ch. in Wood St. at the corner of Huggin Lane, destroyed in the Fire and rebuilt by Wren. Liberality was "Printed by Simon Stafford for George Vincent, and are to be sold at the sign of the Hand-in-Hand in Wood st., over against St. M. Ch." 3. A ch. in Crooked Lane, which abutted on the Boar's Head Tavern. It was taken down in 1831 in making the approach to Lond. Bdge. 4. Other churches destroyed in the Fire and rebuilt by Wren were St. M. Bassishaw, on the W. side of Basinghall st.; St. M. Paternoster Royal, in Tower Royal, where Whittington was buried; St. M. Queenhythe, in Upper Thames St., pulled down in 1876. 5. St. M. le Querne, or ad Bladum, at the corner of Cheapside and Paternoster Row, was destroyed in the Fire and not rebuilt. It is not clear which is intended in the following: In World Child, p. 182, Folly says, "I swear by the church of St. Michael I would we were at stews." In B. & F. Thomas v. 9, Hylas says, "Did not I marry you last night in St. M. chapel?"

MIDDLEBURGH. The ancient capital of Zealand, on the island of Walcheren, nearly opposite to Harwich. It was formerly the centre of an extensive trade with England, France, and the Indies, but its importance has declined since the 17th cent. Between 1384 and 1388 the wool-staple for England was removed from Calais to Middleburgh; hence the anxiety of the Merchant, in Chaucer's C. T. A. 277, that "the see were kept for any thing Betwixe M. and Orewelle." In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 3, Quomodo says, "They'll despatch [the cloth] over to M. presently and raise double commodity by exchange." In Barnavel iv. 5, Barnavel says, "When the Sluice was lost and all in mutiny at Middleborough, who durst step in before me to do these countries service?" The reference is to events in the wars of Prince Maurice, 1600-1604. In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "At Middleborough, night or day, you could scarce find the Exchange empty."

MIDDLEHAM. A town in N. Riding Yorks. on the Ure, abt. 40 m. N.W. of York. It had a fine castle, the ruins of which are still very considerable. In George-a-Greene v., Old Musgrove gives K. Edward a sword of which he says, "K. James at Meddellom Castle gave me this," and the K. rejoins, "To mend thy living take thou Meddellom Castle." There is nothing historical in this story. Scene v. of Act V. in H6 C. took place in the Archbp. of York's park near M. Castle.

MIDDLESEX. The smallest county but one in England in area, and the largest but one in population owing to the fact that Lond., N. of the Thames, is within its boundaries. In Liberality v. 5, the clerk of the court says to Predigality, "Thou art indicted that thou at Highgate in the county of M. didst take from one Tenacity, of the parish of Pancridge, £1000." In T. Heywood's Traveller iii. 4, the Clown says to Geraldine, "Oh, Sir, you are the needle, and if the whole county of M. had been turned to a mere bottle of hay, I had been enjoined to have found you out." In Brome, Ct. Beggar ii. 1, Citywit says, "I am M. indeed, born i' th' City." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Stephen affirms that his uncle, old Knowell, "is a man of a thousand a year, M. land," which was reckoned uncommonly fertile. Lond. was strongly Puritan, and the Players had constant conflicts with the M. justices and juries, who were opposed to the drama; indeed, it was through their dismantling the Theatre and Curtain that the Burbages went over to the Bankside, which, being in Surrey, was out of their jurisdiction. The juries were disposed to be severe in their verdicts, especially in cases of alleged witchcraft. In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Satan accuses Pug of souring the citizen's cream that some old woman "may be accused of it and condemned by a M. jury, to the satisfaction of the Londoners' wives." Habington, in Epilogue to Arragon, says, "Though a M. jury on this play should go, They cannot find the murder wilful." In Middleton's Trick to Catch iv. 5, Dampit says to Gulf, "Thou inconscionable rascal! thou that goest upon M. juries and wilt make haste to give up thy verdict, because thou wilt not lose thy dinner." In Brome's Northern iv. 1, Squelch, the Justice, says, "As I am in my right mind and M., I will shew my justice on thee." The sub-title of Brome's Covent G. is The M. Justice of Peace. In Nabbes' Tottenham i. 4, Cicely says, "Let but an honest jury (which is a kind of wonder in M.) find you not guilty." In Middleton's Chaste Maid ii. 2, Allwit inveighs against "ravenous creditors that will not suffer The bodies of their poor departed debtors To go to the grave, but e'en in death do vex And stay the corps with bills of M., i.e. bills issued from the M. courts. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 560, Rash says, "Love runs through the Isle of Man in a minute, but never is quiet till he comes into M." The play on the words is obvious. According to Old Meg, p. 1, M. men were famous "for tricks above ground," i.e. for rope-dancing.

MIDDLE TEMPLE. One of the 4 Inns of Court in Lond. It lay on the S. side of Fleet St. between the Outer and the Inner Temples (see under Inns of Court and Temple). The Hall (an unrivalled example of Elizabethan architecture) still remains, in which Shakespeare's Twelfth Night was acted in February 1602. John Marston and John Ford were members of the M. T. Chapman wrote a Masque for the M. T. and Lincoln's Inn on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth and the Elector Palatine in 1613.

MIDDLETON. The name of more than a dozen villages in various parts of England. I cannot determine which of them is the origin of the following jingle. In Lyly's Maid's Meta. iii., Jocolo says, "I am so weary that I cannot go, with following a master that follows his mistress that follows her shadow that follows the sun that follows his course." And Frisco chimes in: "that follows the colt that followed the mare the man rode on to M."

MIDDLE WALK. See PAUL'S (SAINT).

MIDIANITES. A tribe of predatory Bedawin who occupied the country E. and S.E. of Palestine, N. of Arabia, and E. of the Gulf of Akabah. They oppressed the Israelites for 7 years, and were finally driven out by Gideon (Judges VI). The word was afterwards used for any enemies of God's people. In Bale's Promises v., David says, "Oppressed were they 7 years of the M." In his Laws ii., Idolatry says, "I dwelt among the Sodomites, The Benjamites and M., And now the popish hypocrites Embrace me everywhere." In Milton's S. A. 281, the Chorus tells how Gideon went "in pursuit Of Madian and her vanquished kings." In Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 33, he says, "Do to them as to Midian bold That wasted all the coast."

MIDLAND SEA (the MEDITERRANEAN SEA, q.v.). Cowley, in Prol. to Cutter, says, "The M. S. is no where clear From dreadful fleets of Tunis and Argier."

MILAN. A city in the centre of the plain of Lombardy in N. Italy, 150 m. W. of Venice and 300 m. N.W. of Rome. It is said to have been founded by Bellovesus, K. of the Celts, in the 6th cent. B.C. It was the 2nd city in Italy in the days of the Roman Empire, and under the bishopric of St. Ambrose became the resolute champion of orthodoxy against the Arians. It was attacked by the Huns and the Goths, and utterly destroyed by Uraia the Goth in A.D. 539. During the Lombard rule M. was the centre of the native Italian party, and when Charles the Great conquered the Lombards in 774 M. received special privileges. In 1162 it was again razed to the ground by Frederic I, but in 1167 the Milanese returned and rebuilt their city. The democratic party, under the Torriani, ruled the city from 1237 to 1277, when they were expelled by the Visconti, who held supreme power till 1450. The successive lords were Otto (1277), Matteo (1310), Galeazzo (1322), Azzo (1328), Lucchino (1339), Giovanni (1349), Bernabo (1354), Gian Galeazzo, the 1st D., and founder of the Duomo (1385), Giovanni (1402), and Filippo (1412-1447). The Sforza family succeeded and held the dukedom till 1535. Francesco, the 1st Sforza D., was succeeded by Galeazzo Maria (1466), and he by his young son, Gian Galeazzo. Lodovico, "the Moor," son of Francesco, seized the supreme power in 1480, but in 1501 he was taken prisoner by the French and died in captivity. From that time to 1714 M. was under the Spanish crown, then it passed to Austria. In the revolutionary wars it was capital of the Cisalpic Republic, and eventually of the Napoleonic Kingdom of Italy. In 1814 it passed back to Austria, but, with Lombardy, became part of the kingdom of Sardinia, soon to be the kingdom of Italy, at the Peace of Vienne (1815). M. lies in a circle round the great Duomo, its walls being 7 m. in circumference. The Castello on the S.E. side of the Piazza d'Armi on the W. of the city was built in 1358, destroyed in 1477, and rebuilt by Francesco Sforza. M. was famous in our period for its ribbons, hats, and other articles of haberdashery, the dealers in which came to be known as Millainers. It also made swords and armour of the finest quality.

Prospero, in the Tempest i. 2, tells how he was D. of M., and how his brother expelled him and made "poor M." tributary to Naples. This is all unhistorical. It would appear from Prospero's story in i. 2, 140 that Shakespeare imagined M. to be on the sea-coast. In Two Gent., Valentine goes to M. from Verona, whither he is followed by Proteus. Silvia is the daughter of the D. of M., and most of the scenes of Acts II.-V. are laid there. In K. J. iii. 1, 138, Pandolph announces himself as "of fair M. Cardinal." Lingard, however, denies that he was ever a Cardinal. In Ado iii. 4, 16, Margaret quotes "the Duchess of M.'s gown that they praise so." In Costly Wh., the Prince of Millean and the Palatine of the Rhine are suitors for the hand of Euphrata. Forsa (i.e. Sforza), D. of Myllan, is one of the characters in K. K. Hon. Man. Chaucer, in C. T. B. 3589, tells the story of "Grete Barnabo, Viscount of Melan," who was imprisoned by his nephew and son-in-law, Gian Galeazzo, in 1385; Chaucer was sent to Italy to treat with this very Barnabo in 1378. In Marlowe's Faustus

vii. 66, the Pope says, "Here is a dainty dish was sent me from the Bp. of M." The scene of Jonson's Case is laid in M. There is a war going on with the French, who "mean to have a fling at M. again" (i. 1); the date is 19 years after "The great Chamont, the general for France, Surprised Vicenza" (i. 2). The son of Count Ferneze was then between 3 and 4 years of age, and was the godson of the Emperor Sigismund, who died in 1437 (v. 4). The action of the play is thus fixed to 1460; but there were no French wars at that date, and I suspect that Jonson intended the taking of Vicenza to be in 1494, when Charles VIII invaded Italy; and the attack on M. to be that of Francis I, in 1515, when Massimiliano Sforza was D., who is spoken of in the play as the leader of the forces of M., whilst the imaginary Ferenze is Count of M. In Ford's 'Tis Pity i. 2, Grimaldi is spoken of as having done "good service in the wars Against the Milanese"—probably these same wars between 1494 and 1525. In Sacrifice i. 1, Bianca, the Duchess of Pavia, is said to have been "daughter Unto a gentleman of M., no better, Preferred to serve i' the D. of M.'s court." In Davenant's Siege i. 1, Ariotto speaks of "a skirmish at M. against the Grisons." This was also in the wars of the early 16th century, when the Swiss were employed by the French. In B. & F. Women Pleased ii. 5, the D. of M. is mentioned as a suitor for the hand of Belvidere, the daughter of the D. of Florence. In Massinger's Lover v. 3, news is brought that "the great John Galeas" is dead, and his brother Galeazzo thus "the absolute lord of M." This fixes the supposed date to 1402, but there is nothing else historical in the play. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, the D. of Savoy proposes to Henri IV to bring an army into Savoy, but Henri replies, "Where you have proposed . . . my design for M., I will have no war with the K. of Spain." In Trag. Byron i. 1, Byron asks his friends "in passing M. and Turin" to pretend that they have come to treat of his marriage with the daughter of the D. of Savoy. In Webster's Malfi iii. 5, the Duchess advises Antonio "to take your eldest son And fly towards M."; he does so, and the last Act takes place there. Massinger's Milan takes place at the time of the Battle of Pavia (1525), according to Act III. The D. is called Ludovico, though he was really Francesco. The scene of the play is M., except parts of Act III. The scene of Dekker's Hon. Wh. is M., in the reign of an imaginary duke, Gasparo Trebazzi. In Davenant's Love Hon. i. 1, Prospero says, "Close by the valley Lies conquered by my sword a Millain knight." The scene of T. Heywood's Maidenhead is laid in part at M., and the D. of Millean is one of the principal characters. In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 1, the Grand D. of Florence says, "Sforza, the D. of Milain, Hath promised me the matchless Isabella, His sister, for my wife." An imaginary D. of Milaine is one of the characters in Greene's Alphonsus. A play, now lost, was presented at Court in 1579 entitled The Duke of M. and the Duke of Mantua. The scene of Middleton's Dissemblers is laid in M. The heroine of Shirley's Servant is Leonora, who is called the Princess of M. and is the daughter of Gonzaga, D. of M.

In Marston's Ant. Rev., A. Ind., Alberto says, "M. being half Spanish, half High Dutch, And half Italian, the blood of chiefest houses is corrupt and mongrelled." In Greene's Alphonsus iv. 2, Carinus testifies: "When my feet in Milaine land I set, Such sumptuous triumphs daily there I saw As never in my life I found the like." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "great Milain." In W. T. iv. 4, 192, the servant says of Autolycus: "No milliner can so fit his customers with gloves." In H4 A. i. 3, 36, Hotspur tells how the lord that brought him the King's message "was perfumed like a milliner." In Davenant's Italian i. 1, Altamont says, "A Millanoise showed me to-day for sale bright and spacious jewels." In Alimony ii. 2, the Boy says, "She was a tire-woman at first in the suburbs of M." In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater says he found M. "a rich state of haberdashers." In Davenant's Favourite iv. 1, the Lady complains: "I fear you have not sent to M. yet For the carkanet of pearl." In Greene's Quip, p. 246, we are told of "a Frenchman and a milliner in St. Martin's, and sells shirts, bands, bracelets, jewels, and such pretty toys for gentlewomen." In Brief Concept of English Policy (1581), it is stated that men will not be contented with "ouche, brooch, or aglet but of Venice making, or Millen, nor as much as a spur but that is fetched at a Millener. There were not of these Haberdashers that sells French or Millen caps, glasses, knives, daggers, swords, girdels, and such things, not a dozen in all London; and now from the Tower to Westminster along, every st. is full of them." In B. & F. Valentinian ii. 2, Claudia satirizes "the gilded doublets and M. skins" (i.e. gloves) of the courtiers. In their Maid's Trav. iv. 1, Melantius scoffs at "your gilded things, that dance In visitation with their M. skins." In their Elder B. v. 1, Cowsy boasts of his good sword, "A M. hilt and a Damasco blade." Jonson, in his Execration upon Vulcan, says, "Would you had Maintained the trade at Bilboa or elsewhere, Struck in at M. with the cutlers there." In his New Inn ii. 2, Tipto recommends to Lord Beaufort "the M. sword, the cloke of Genoa." The passage is copied verbatim in B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1. In Webster's Law Case v. 4, Romelio asks, "Can you tell me whether your Toledo or your M. blade be best tempered?" In Brewer's Lovesick King ii., Thornton says, "All this have I got of a cunning man for two poor Millan needles." Lauson, in Secrets of Angling (1653), recommends hooks made "of the best Spanish and M. needles."

MILDRED'S, SAINT. A ch. in Lond., on the N. side of the Poultry, at the corner of St. M. Court. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, rebuilt by Wren, and finally taken down in 1872. In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 2, Knavesby says, "I'll bring you [to Lombard St.] through Bearbinder Lane." Mrs. Water-Camlet replies, "Bearbinder Lane cannot hold me; I'll the nearest way over St. M. ch." An early edition of Colin Clout was "Imprinted by me Rycharde Kele dwelling in the powltry at the long shop under saynt Myldredes chyrche." Like was "Imprinted at the long shop adjoining unto St. M. Ch. in the Pultrie by John Allde. 1568." Middleton's Blurt was "Printed for Henry Rockytt, and are to be sold at the long shop under St. M. ch. in the Poultry. 1602." There was another St. M. ch. in Bread St., on the E. side at the corner of Cannon St., destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren.

MILE END. A hamlet in Lond., E. of Whitechapel, beginning exactly a mile from Aldgate along the Whitechapel Rd. M. E. Green was S. of the M. E. Rd., where Stepney Green now is. It was used as the training ground for the citizen forces of Lond., as well as for fairs and shows of various kinds. The vill. was still in the country, and citizens used to go out there of an afternoon to eat cakes and drink cream. Criminals were also hung in chains at M. E. Green. Kemp, in Nine Days' Wonder (1600), tells how, when he had started on his famous dance to Norwich, "Multitudes of Londoners left not me, either to keep a custom which many hold, that M. E. is no walk without a recreation at Stratford Bow with cream and cakes, or else for love they bear towards me." In Contention, Haz., p. 502, Cade orders the rebels: "Go to Milende-greene to Sir James Cromer, and cut off his head too." In Look About v., Slink, trying to escape from arrest, complains, "M. E.'s covered with 'Who goes there?'" In S. Rowley's When You, D. 4, Black Will complains that "for a venture of 5 pound he must commit such petty robberies at M. E." In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Lacy reports that in preparation for the French expedition "The men of Hertfordshire lie at M.-e."

In All's iv. 3, 302, Parolles says that Capt. Dumain, when in England, "had the honour to be the officer at a place there called M.-E., to instruct for the doubling of files." In B. & F. Pestle v. 1, the citizen's wife exhorts Ralph: "I would have thee call all the youths together in battle-ray and march to M. E. in pompous fashion." In Three Lords, Dods., vi. 451, Policy says, "Myself will muster upon M.-E.-Green That John the Spaniard will in rage run mad." In Shirley's Riches ii., the Soldier says, "Some fellows have beaten you into belief that they have seen the wars, that perhaps mustered at M.-E. or Finsbury." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. ii. 3, Brainworm, having deceived Knowell in the disguise of an old soldier, says, "He will hate the musters at M.-e. for it to his dying day." In iv. 4, Formal says of Brainworm's stories of his wars: "They be very strange, and not like those a man reads in the Roman histories or sees at M.-e." In Middleton's R. G. i. 2, Laxton says of Moll: "Methinks a brave captain might get all his soldiers upon her, and ne'er be beholding to a company of M.-e. milk sops." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 1, the Lord Mayor says to the rebels that the way to Bow shall be safe, "Although thou lie encamped at M.-E.-Green," and that they will not dare to molest the travellers. Indeed, M.-E. Green had some reputation for highway robberies. In T. Heywood's F. M. Exch., Act I opens with an attempted robbery there, which is frustrated by the opportune arrival of the Cripple of Fenchurch. Milton, in Sonn. on the Detraction 7, says of the title of his Tetrachordon: "Cries the stall-reader, 'Bless us! what a word on A title-page is this!'" and some in file Stand spelling false, while one might walk to M.-E. Green," i.e. about a mile.

In B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, amongst the Fiddler's ballads is one entitled "The Landing of the Spaniards at Bow, with the Bloody Battle at M.-e." The same incident seems to be referred to in the 3 following passages. In their Pestle ii. 2, Michael asks his mother, "Is not all the world M.-e., mother?" to which Mrs. Merrythought replies, "No, Michael, not all the world, boy; but I can assure thee, Michael, M.-e. is a goodly matter; there has been a pitch-field, my child, between the naughty Spaniels and the Englishmen, and the Spaniels ran away, Michael, and the Englishmen followed." In T. Heywood's F. M. Exch., vol. ii., p. 45, Frank says, "Cripple, thou once didst promise me thy love When I did rescue thee on M.-e. Green." In B. & F. Wife Epi., "the action at M.-e." is mentioned. In Shirley's Pleasure i. 2, Celestina, dissatisfied with her new coach, says, "To market with't; 'Twill hackney out to M.-e." In H4 B. iii. 2, 298, Shallow says, "I remember at M.-e. Green, I was then Sir Dagonet in Arthur's show." This was an exhibition of shooting given by a society called "The Fellowship of Prince Arthur's Knights." There were 58 of them. In Yarrington's Two Trag. v. 2, the Officer directs: "Let his body be conveyed hence to M.-e.-green And there be hanged in chains." In Middleton's Black Book, p. 25, we read of "two men in chains between M.-e. and Hackney." M. E. was apparently a fashionable quarter for residence. In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 2, Valentine says, "Why should madam at M.-e. be daily visited, and your poorer neighbours neglected?" In Day's B. Beggar ii., Old Strowd says, "Come along with me to M.-e. to my lodging." Dekker, in Armourers, says, "Neither the Mermaid nor the Dolphin nor he at M.-e.-green can when he list be in a good temper when he lacks his mistress, that is to say, Money." The reference is to some well-known tavern.

MILETUS. One of the chief cities of Ionia, on the W. coast of Asia Minor at the mouth of the Maeander. In T. Heywood's Dialogues xiii. 4272, Mausolus boasts: "The great'st part of Ionia I laid waste And my great army to Miletum passed." This was 362 B.C. In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "History accuseth Cillicon for betraying of M." I think he must mean by Cillicon, Syloson, who, along with his brothers, seized by treachery the island of Samos about 530 B.C.; his brother, Polycrates, shortly afterwards conquered M., but he had previously banished Syloson. The Persians, however, sent a fleet and reinstated him. Sir John Beaumont, in verses on Francis Beaumont's Salmacis, says, "With fair Mylesian threads the verse he sings." "Milesian tales" were the Greek and Roman name for wanton tales, after the fashion of the Milesiaca of Aristides, the earliest prose romances known.

MILFORD HAVEN. A long indentation of the sea in the W. coast of Pembrokesh., S. Wales. It runs 10 m. inland, and is abt. 2 m. across. It is one of the best and safest harbours in the United Kingdom. The town of M. is on the N. side of the H. In Cym. iii. 2, 45, Leonatus writes to Imogen to meet him "in Cambria, at M. H." She accordingly journeys thither, and Scene IV. is laid "in the country near M. H." In iv. 2, 335, the Capt. announces to Lucius, "The legions garrisoned in Gallia . . . have crossed the sea, attending You here at M. H." In R3 iv. 4, 535, Catesby brings word: "The Earl of Richmond Is with a mighty power landed at M." In Ford's Warbeck v. 2, Warbeck speaks of the day that dawned for Richmond and his supporters, "When first they ventured on a frightful shore At M. H." In Peele's Ed. I ii. 13, Lluellen brings his friends "disguised to M. H." to stay the landing of the Lady Elinor from France. Drayton, in Polyolb. v. 275, commands "M., which this isle her greatest port doth call."

MILFORD LANE. A lane in Lond., running S. from the Strand, opposite St. Clement Danes, between Essex St. and Arundel St. It was a narrow st., inhabited by poor people for the most part, and having a bad reputation. It is now mostly occupied by printing offices. In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Careless, having got hold of some money, exclaims, "I need no more inconsidering now in Ram Alley, nor the sanctuary of White-fryers, the forts of Fullers-rents, and M.-l., whose walls are daily battered with the curses of bawling creditors." In Brome's Damoiselle i. 2, Bumpsey taunts the impecunious knight, Sir Humfrey Dryground, with the wretched pittance "which now maintains you where you live confined in M. L. or Fuller's Rents, or who knows where."

MILK STREET. Lond., running N. from Cheapside to Gresham St., between Wood St. and Lawrence Lane. It was originally the part of the market where milk and butter were sold. The Ch. of St. Mary Magdalene, destroyed in the Gt. Fire and not rebuilt, was in this street. Here Sir T. More was born. Taylor, in Merry-come-twang, tells of a friend who invited him "to go dine at the Half-Moone in M. St." In Jonson's Christmas, Carol asks, "Shall John Butter of M. St. come in?" and Gambol replies, "Yes, he may slip in for a torch-bearer, so he melt not too fast." In B. & F. Pestle iii. 4, Ralph says, "O faint not, heart! Susan, my lady dear, The cobbler's maid in M. St. for whose sake I take these arms, O let the thought of these Carry thy knight through all adventurous deeds." Dekker, in Jests, mentions "M. st., Bread St., Lime St., and S. Mary Axe" as places where the respectable citizens used to have their dwellings. Mayberry, in Dekker's Northward, lived there, for in v. 1 he says, "Let's once stand to it for the credit of M.-st."

MILLAINE. See MILAN.

MILLBANK. A dist. running along the N., or rather the W., bank of the Thames from Old Palace Yd. to Peterborough House, between the positions now occupied by the Westminster and Vauxhall Bdes. Towards its S. end, the M. Penitentiary was built in 1821; it has since been pulled down, and its site is occupied by the Tate Art Gallery. M. St. preserves the name. In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Jolly says that Cutter and Worm are always changing their residence: "To-day at Wapping, and to-morrow you appear again at M., like a duck that dives at this end of the pond and rises unexpectedly at the other." Wapping is in the extreme E., M. in the extreme W. of Lond.

MILTON. A vill. in Berks., 2½ m. S. of Abingdon. In Abingdon ii. 1, Philip says he has been "over the meads, half way to M."

MILVIAN BRIDGE (PONS MILVIUS, now PONTE MOLLE). The bidge. by which the Via Flaminia crossed the Tiber, 2 m. N. of Rome. It was here that Cicero arrested the ambassadors of the Allobroges on their way to the city at the time of the Catilinarian conspiracy. In Jonson's Catiline iv. 6, Sanga brings word to Cicero, "You must instantly dispose your guards Upon the M. B., for by that way They mean to come." The next scene is at the M. B., and describes the arrest of the Allobroges.

MIMS (SOUTH). A small vill. in N. Middlesex, on the borders of Herts., and on the Great North Road from Lond. In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 1, the servant who, much against his will, is ordered to drive his mistress out of Lond., prays that the horses may tire at Highgate, that all the innkeepers at St. Alban's may be too drunk to entertain the lady, that there may be neither music nor food nor a bed for her; and then goes on: "Let M. be angry at their St. Bel swagger, And we pass in the heat of it, and be beaten, Beaten abominably." St. Bel means Sanctus Bell, or Saunce Bell, the little bell rung by the priest during the celebration of Mass; it is very insignificant as compared with the bells in the ch. tower, and so is used for anything trifling. See N.E.D. s.v. SANCTUS BELL. Hence St. Bel swagger means the silly, trifling roystering of the drunken innkeepers of St. Alban's. The next lines "[May] all my lady's linen [be] sprinkled With suds and dish-water!" (i.e. ditch-water) may be a sarcastic allusion to Mims Wash, a shallow ford on the road about 1 m. S. of M. The smallness of the vill. and the absurdity of its name give such point as there is to the jest. [I am indebted for this article to the late Prof. C. E. Vaughan, as well as for very many other valuable suggestions.]

MINCIUS (now MINCIO). A river in N. Italy, rising in the Rhaetian Alps, and flowing into the Lago di Garda, from which it issues at Peschiera and runs S. into the Po past Mantua, the birth-place of Vergil. Milton, Lyc. 86, invokes it as "thou honoured flood, Smooth-sliding M., crowned with vocal reeds." Milton invokes it as representing Latin Pastoral Poetry, because Vergil wrote the Eclogues; and the description is taken from Ec. vii. 12: "Hic virides tenera praetextit arundine ripas M."

MINEVER, SAINT. Vill. in Cornwall, a little N. of the river Camel, near its mouth, 24 m. S.W. of Launceston. In Brome's City Wit iii. 1, Jane Tryman leaves in her will "to my nephew, Sir Marmaduke Trevaughan, of St. M., £1000 in gold."

MINORIES. An abbey of the Nuns of the order of St. Clare, founded in 1293 by Edmund of Lancaster. It was surrendered to Henry VIII in 1539. Its site is indicated by the st. called the M., running from Aldgate High St. to Tower Hill. It was formerly almost entirely occupied by gunsmiths. In Bale's Laws iii., Infidelity says to Mosei Lex, "I would ye had been at the M., Sir, late yester-night, at Compline." Lex replies, "At the M.! Why? What was there ado?" Infidelity answers, "For such another would I to Southampton go." I suppose the reference is to the papistical character of the service, which pleases Infidelity. In Davenport's New Trick i. 2, Slightall, who is looking out for an impudent lass, sends Roger to seek for one "in Turnball, the Banke side, or the M." Evidently the st. had gained an evil reputation.

MINT. The M. in Lond. was in the Tower until 1811, when the present building on Tower Hill was erected for the purpose. A M. was also established by Henry VIII in Suffolk House opposite St. George's Ch., Southwark, which gave the name to the dist. round. The inhabitants claimed for it the privilege of sanctuary, and it became a refuge for all sorts of swindlers and vagabonds, until the privilege was definitely abrogated by Act of Parliament in the reign of George I. In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 4, when Francisco asks him for £100, Valentine replies: "There's no such sum in nature; forty shillings There may be now in the M., and that's a treasure." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 26, Falconbridge, encouraging his rebels, says, "The M. is ours, Cheape, Lombard St., our own." In Jonson's Devil iii. 5, Fitz-Dottrel says, "There's not so much gold in all the Row, he says, Till it come from the M."

MINTIUM (= MINCIO). A river in N. Italy, rising in Lake Garda, and flowing S. into the Po, 9 m. below Mantua. Daniel, in Epist. Ded. to Cleopatra 65, prays that "the music of our well-tuned Isle Might hence be heard to M., Arn, and Po." See MINCIUS.

MIRAPONT (probably should be MYRAPONT, i.e. the Lycian Sea, which lies round the coast of Lycia, of which Myra is the chief seaport). Brutus had conquered Lycia, shortly before the battle of Philippi. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 1, Cassius says that Brutus commands "all the coasters on the M."

MIRRIDONS. See MYRMIDONS.

MISENUM. The promontory at the N. end of the Bay of Naples, so called from the trumpeter of Aeneas who was buried there. Behind it is a land-locked harbour which was made the naval station for the Roman fleet by Augustus. In Ant. ii. 2, 163, Cæsar says that Pompey lies "about the mt. M."; ii. 6 takes place near M., and ii. 7 on board Pompey's galley off M.

MISERGA. Defined as being in the confines of Persia. In Bacchus, the 14th guest is "Hodge Heaviebreech: he came from M., a city in the confines of Persia."

MITRE. A Lond. tavern sign. There were 2 famous M. Taverns: one in Bread St., Cheapside, the other in Fleet St. 1. The M. in Bread St. was either at the corner of Bread St. and Cheapside or had an entrance from the latter thoroughfare, as it is sometimes called the M. in Cheap. It is mentioned in the vestry books of St. Michael's before 1475. It was burnt down in the Gt. Fire, and not rebuilt. In More ii. 1, Robin says, "The head-drawer at the Miter by the Great Conduit called me up, and we went to breakfast into St. Anne's Lane." In News Barthol. Fair, "The Miter in Cheape" is in the list of Lond. taverns. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii. 1, Ilford says, "I, Frank Ilford, was inforced from the M. in Bread-st. to the Compter in the Poultry." In iii. 3, Scarborow says, "We'll meet at the M., where we'll sup down sorrow." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii. 2, Capt. Carvegut proposes: "Come, we'll pay at bar, and to the M. in Bread-st., we'll make a mad night on't." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iv. 1 (1st edition), the M. takes the place of the Star of the later editions. In The pleadings of Rastell v. Walton (1530), Nicholas Sayer deposed that "he and William Knight were desired by the said Rastell and Walton, being at the M. in Cheap, to view such costs, etc." In Dekker's Westward iv. 1, Lucy, guessing who has put his hands over her eyes, says, "O, you are George, the drawer at the M."

2. The M. in Fleet St. was on the S. side of the st. at No. 39, now occupied by Hoare's Bank. It had a passage into M. Court, and a back way into Ram Alley. It was certainly in existence in 1603; it was kept by the widow Sutton in 1629 and by one Alsop 10 years later. The wooden balcony was set alight in the Gt. Fire, but the tavern itself escaped. It was Dr. Johnson's favourite inn, and was the dining-place of the Royal Society and the Society of Antiquaries. It was closed in 1788, and the present M. Tavern in M. Court took over the name, together with the Johnson tradition, which does not, however, really belong to it, in spite of the cast of Nollekens' bust which it displays. The old Tavern was reincarnated as Saunders' Auction Room, and was finally demolished in 1829 to make more room for Hoare's Bank. In Barry's Ram ii. 4, Throate says, "Know what news and meet me straight at the M. door in Fleet-st." A little before, Smallshanks says to Frances, "We will be married to-night, we'll sup at the M., and from thence will to the Savoy." In T. Heywood's Witches ii., Generous says, "It comes short of that pure liquor we drunk last term in Lond. at the Myter in Fleet-st.," and later, Robert says of Generous: "Since he was last in Lond. and tasted the divinity of the Miter, scarce any liquor in Lancashire will go down with him; sure he will never be a Puritan, he holds so well with the Miter"; and again, in Act III, Generous says, "I durst swear that this was Myter wine." In Middleton's Hubbard, p. 77, the young gallant is advised that "his eating must be in some famous tavern, as the Horn, the M., or the Mermaid."

In the following passages it is not certain which of the Ms. is intended, though in most of them I think the Bread St. tavern is meant. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, when Sogliardo asks which is the best house to dine at, Puntarvolo says, "Your M. is your best house." In iv. 4, Puntarvolo commissions Carlo to "bespeak supper at the M. against we come back." In v. 3, Macilente says, "Our supper at the M. must of necessity hold to-night," and the next scene is laid there. In Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit says, "A pox o' these pretenders to wit! your Three Cranes, M., and Mermaid-men!" In Middleton's Five Gallants ii. 1, there is a discussion as to the relative merits of the Mermaid and the M., and Goldstone says, "The M. for neat attendance, diligent boys, and—push!—excells far"; ii. 3 is "in a room at the M." In his Mad World v. 1, Sir Bounteous says, "This will be a right M. supper, a play and all." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 2, Sencer says, "Being somewhat late at supper at the M., the doors were shut at my lodging." In his Lucrece ii. 5, in the list of Roman (London) taverns, Valerius says, "The churchman to the M."

MOAB. The country E. of the Dead Sea and the lower Jordan in Palestine. According to Judges iii. 12, Eglon K. of M. took Jericho and oppressed Israel for 18 years. In Bale's Promises v., David says of Israel: "Thou subduedst them 18 years to Eglon the K. of M." Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 23, speaks of "M., with them of Hagar's blood That in the desert dwell" among the enemies of Israel. The god of the Moabites was Chemosh. Milton, P. L. i. 406, speaks of "Chemos, the obscene dread of M.'s sons."

MODENA (the ancient MUTINA). A city of N. Italy, S. of the Po, some 200 m. N. of Rome. Here Mark Antony was defeated by the forces of Hirtius and Pansa 43 B.C. It was under the government of Dukes of the D'Este family until 1859, when it became part of the kingdom of Italy. In Ant. i. 4, 57, Cæsar reminds Antony, "When thou once wast beaten from M., where thou slewest Hirtius and Pansa, consuls, at thy heel Did famine follow." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have visited over a dozen Italian cities, one of which is M. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio concludes a long list of the chief cities of Italy with "M., happiest of them all." In iv. 2, the Grand D. of Tuscany says that his sister had "refused The youthful Dukes of M. and Parma." The scene of Laelia is laid at M., in the 1st half of the 16th cent. In iii. 1, 2 proverbs are quoted: "Taurus Modinensis habet durum cornu sed molle corium," and "Semel in anno taurus non reperietur Modenæ."

MODIN (now EL-MEDYEH). A town in Palestine, 17 m. N.W. of Jerusalem. It was the home of the Maccabæan family, and a fine tomb was erected there in their honour by Simon, the last of the 5 great brothers. Milton, P. R. iii. 170, tells how Machabeus "David's throne usurped, With M. and her suburbs once content."

MOGUL (a form of MONGOL, applied specially to the followers of Jenghis Khan in the 13th, and of Berber in the 16th cents.). The M., or the Great, or Grand, M. is used of the Emperors of Delhi. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, John says, "I will do anything; kill the Great Turk, pluck out the M.'s eye-teeth," as Huon of Bordeaux plucked out "four of the Admiral's greatest teeth" and brought them to Charlemagne. In Jonson's Augurs, Vangoose undertakes, by his "Ars catoptrica" to show the company "de Tartar Cham mit de groat K. of Mogull." M.'s breeches seem to mean a kind of long drawers or loose trousers. In B. & F. Fair Maid i. iv. 2, the Host says, "Oh, let him have his shirt on and his m.'s breeches; here are women i' th' house." The Spanish and Portuguese form was Mogor. In Tomkins' Albumazar i. 5, Albumazar has prepared an almanac by which merchants may "know the success of the voyage of Magores," i.e. the voyage to the country of the great M.

MOGUNCÉ. See MENTZ.

MOLDAVIA. One of the Danubian provinces lying N. of Wallachia and E. of Transylvania. It was governed by princes called Voivodes, and during the 16th cent. was under the control of the Turks, who exacted tribute and claimed the right of veto on the appointment of the Voivodes. England was interested in the Danubian provinces at this time, and in 1593 sent Edward Barton as ambassador to Constantinople to support the claim of Michael the Brave of Wallachia to independence. Judging by the reference in Jonson's Epicoene, some Moldavian prince had visited England shortly before 1609. In v. 1, La-Foole says that Daw drew maps (i.e. portraits) "of Nomentack when he was here, and of the Prince of M." In B. & F. Pestle, Ralph visits the court of the K. of M. in iv. 2, and wins the love of his daughter, but rejects her advances. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says that since leaving Oxford he has "visited M. and Livonia, Pamphlagonia and Silesia."

MOLE. A river rising in N. Sussex, and flowing through Surrey into the Thames opposite Hampton Court. Its length is 42 m.; near Mickleham it disappears underground for a time—hence its name. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 32, mentions: "M., that like a mousing mole doth make His way still underground, till Thamis he overtake." Milton, Vac. Ex. 95, calls it "sullen Mole that runneth underneath."

MOLOCCUS, or MOLOCCAS. Often known as the Spice Islands, a group of islands in the E. Indies between Celebes and New Guinea. The Portuguese made the first settlements there in 1510, but the Spaniards arrived later, and there was much dispute as to the possession of the islands until the Dutch took them in the early part of the 17th cent. In Peele's Alcazar iii. 1, 26, the Legate says in the name of Philip of Spain: "His Majesty doth promise to resign [sc. to Sebastian of Portugal] The titles of the islands of M., That by his royalty in India he commands." Spenser, F. Q., v. 10, 3, says that the fame of Mercilla (Elizabeth) "it self enlarged hath From th' utmost brink of the Armericke [Armorica] shore Unto the margent of the Molucas." Wilbye, in First Set of Madrigals (1598), speaks of "Coral and ambergris sweeter and dearer Than which the South Seas or Moluccas lend us." Heylyn quotes from Du Bartas: "From the Moluccoes [come] spices" (p. 12). In B. & F. Subject iii. 4, Theodore, introducing his sisters to certain gentlemen, says, "Nay, keep off yet, gentlemen! What would ye give now to turn the glove up and find the rich M.?" The coarse jest need not be explained.

MOLOSSI. A tribe in Epirus, originally dwelling to the S. of the Ambraciot Gulf, but afterwards obtaining the mastery of the whole of Epirus from the Ambraciot Gulf to the Aous. There are many references in the classical writers to Molossian hounds. In Greene's Mamillia ii., we read of "Sarcas, the K. of the Molossians." In Lochrine i. 1, 47, Corineus boasts how he had conquered "The Grecian monarch, warlike Pandrassus, And all the crew of the Molossians." This is quite unhistorical. In Lyly's Maid's Meta. ii. 2, Belizarius tells how "the blind Molossians worshipped a toad and one of them, drinking a health with his god, was poisoned." Fleming, in English Dogs (1576), says, "A country in Epirus called Molossia harboureth many stout, strong, and sturdy dogs; for the dogs of that country are good indeed."

MOLUCCAS. See MOLOCCUS.

MOMARAH (= MAMORAH, q.v.).

MOMBAZA. A town on the E. coast of Africa, just N. of Zanzibar, 1400 m. S. of Cape Guardafui. It has one of the finest harbours in the world. It was visited by Vasco di Gama in 1498, and was taken by the Portuguese in 1528, in whose possession it remained till 1631, when it was retaken by the natives. The castle, which still remains, was built by the Portuguese in 1635 on a hill S. of the town. M. is now under British control. Milton, P. L. xi. 399, mentions "M., and Quiloa, and Melind, And Sofala" amongst the S. African kingdoms shown in vision to Adam.

MONA. The old name of the Isle of Anglesey, off the N.W. coast of Wales. It was the principal seat of Druidical worship, and was invaded by Suetonius A.D. 61. He was recalled, however, by the revolt of Boadicea (Bonduca), and the island was not conquered by the Romans till A.D. 78. In B. & F. Bonduca i. 2, Suetonius says, "My will to conquer M. and long stay To execute that will, let in these losses." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 48, tells of a prediction that the fire of the old British blood shall "be freshly kindled in the fruitful Ile Of M." The reference is to the accession of Henry VII, who was popularly supposed to have been born in Anglesey, though he was really born at Pembroke Castle. Milton, Lyc. 54, speaks of "the shaggy top of M. high."

MONACO. The smallest sovereign principality in Europe, covering less than 8 sq. m. It lies most picturesquely on the shore of the Gulf of Genoa, 9 m. E. of Nice. The principality has been in the Grimaldi family since the 12th cent.; it is now under French protection. In Ford's Sacrifice i. 1, Petruchio tells us that the Duchess of Pavia was a lady in the court of Milan: "And passing late from thence to M., To visit there her uncle, Paul Baglione the Abbot, Fortune . . . presents her to the D.'s eye." In ii. 2, D'Avolos says, "I have here 2 pictures to be sent for a present to the Abbot of M., the Duchess' uncle."

MONMOUTH. The county town of Monmouthsh., at the confluence of the Wye and Monnow, 128 m. W. of Lond. The castle, now in ruins, came into the possession of John of Gaunt, and here Henry V was born in 1388. Mshire. is now an English county, but was formerly regarded as part of Wales. M. was noted for the manufacture of flat round caps, much worn by soldiers and seamen. In H4 A. v. 2, 50, and v. 4, 59, Prince Henry is called Harry M. by Hotspur. The Induction of H4 B. 29, speaks of him in the same way. In i. 1, 19, Lord Bardolph calls Falstaff "Harry M.'s brawn, the hulk Sir John." In H5 iv. 7, 11, Fluellen, after pointing out that the K. was born at M., and Alexander the Gt. at Macedon, draws a comparison between the 2 places: "There is a river in Macedon; and there is also moreover a river at M.—it is called Wye at M.; and there is salmons in both." In H6 A. ii. 5, 23, Mortimer calls the late K. "Henry M." In H4 B. ii. 3, 45, Lady Percy calls him simply M. In H6 A. iii. 1, 198, Exeter quotes a prophecy "that Henry born at M. should win all and Henry born at Windsor lose all." The same prophecy is quoted in The Puritan ii. 1. In Val. Welsh. i. 1, the Bardh says, "Twice The base usurper Munmouth got the day" (against Octavian). In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, the Capt. maintains that Styanax (i.e. Astyanax) was "a M. man," and proves it by affirming "Hector was grannam to Cadwallader; when she was great with child, there was one young Styanan of Mshire. was a madder Greek as any is in all England."

Monmouth Caps. In H5 iv. 7, 104, Fluellen says, "The Welshmen did good service in a garden where leeks did grow, wearing leeks in their M. caps." In Eastward iv. 4, Touchstone says, "You may drink drunk, crack cans, hurl away a brown dozen of M. caps or so, in sea-ceremony to your bon voyage." In Jonson's Wales, Howel sings that the Welshman may "Get him as much green velvet perhaps, Shall give it a face to his M. cap." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Austin says that the author "Slept in his clothes . . . Sans M. cap or gown of rug." In W. Rowley's Search 31, the felt-makers complain of the popularity of "M.-caps."

MONS. The capital of Hainault in Belgium, 31 m. S.W. of Brussels. It was a strongly fortified city, and reached its greatest prosperity during the reign of the Emperor Charles V. In Tuke's Five Hours ii. 2, Octavio says of the Marquis d'Olivera: "They say he did wonders at the siege of M." The reference is to the siege by Alva in 1572, when the town had been occupied by Count Lodowicke, who tried in vain to hold it against Spain.

MONTAGUES CLOSE. A st. in Southwark, running round St. Saviour's Cathedral on the N. and W. sides, on the site of the old cloisters. It took its name from a mansion built there by Viscount Montague after the dissolution of the monasteries. It was here that Montague was living when he received the mysterious letter which gave the clue to the Gunpowder Plot of 1605; and in consequence of this persons residing in M. C. were exempted from actions for debt or trespass, so that it became a sanctuary, with the usual result that it grew to be the resort of bad characters and had to be suppressed. In Brome's Couple v. 1, Saleware gets a letter: "Come with this bearer over into M. c., where you shall find your wife with a private friend at a private lodging."

MONTALBAN, or MONTAUBAN. A town in S. of France, on the Garonne, 342 m. S. of Paris. It was the castle of the knight Renaud, or Rinaldo, in the old romances. Milton, P. L. i. 583, speaks of the knights who "jousted in Aspramont or M." Deloney, in Reading ix., says that Dove, when Jarrat had taken him to his inn, "thought himself as safe as K. Charlemaine in mt. Albon."

MONTARGIS. An ancient town of France, on the Loing, 60 m. S. of Paris. In Peele's Ed. I ii. 336, Guenther announces to Lluellen that his love, Elinor, and her brother have been captured by ships of Bristow "As from M. hitherward they sailed."

MONTE ALTO. See ALTOMONTE.

MONTEFIAScone. A town in central Italy, on the E. shore of Lake Bolsena, 50 m. N.W. of Rome. It is famous for its muscatel wine. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 1, Trapolin, being banished, laments: "Farewell, my draughts of M. and Bologna sausages." Fynes Moryson, i. 2, 143, says that its white and red Muskedine is "one of the most famous wines in Italy."

MONTENEGRO. A small dist. on the E. coast of the Adriatic, just S. of Herzegovina. In Marmion's Antiquary iii. 4, the Antiquary claims that his great-grandfather was "Jovanno Veterano, de M."

MONTEPULCHENA (= MONTEPULCIANO). An ancient Etruscan town in Tuscany, abt. 90 m. N. of Rome. Cardinal Bellarmine was born there. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor mentions "M." as one of the many cities in Italy which he has ambled through.

MONTFAUÇON. A hill on the N.W. of Paris, N. of the Parc Monceaux, where the Lutheran ch. now stands. It was used as a place of execution for criminals. In Marlowe's Massacre (Dyer's edition), p. 231, after the murder of the Admiral, Anjou says, "Unto Mount Fauçon will we drag his corse; And he that living hated so the cross, Shall being dead be hanged thereon in chains." In Coryat's Crudities 20, we read: "A little on this side Paris, even at the town's end, there is the fairest gallows that ever I saw, built upon a little hillock called Mt. Falcon, which consisteth of 14 fair pillars of freestone; this gallows was made in the time of the Guisian massacre, to hang the Admiral of France, Chatillion, who was a Protestant, anno dom. 1572." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary i. 2, 190 (1595), says, "The dead bodies [of criminals] are carried out of the gate of St. Martin to be buried upon Mont-falcon."

MONTFERRAT. An ancient duchy in Italy, in the S. of Piedmont, just N. of Genoa. In Merch. i. 2, 126, Nerissa reminds Portia of Bassanio's visit "In company of the Marquis of M."

MONTMORENCY. A town in France, 9 m. N. of Paris. It possesses an old château and ch. Anne de M. (1492-1567) is one of the characters in Chapman's Chabot. His portrait in the play is much more attractive than history warrants.

MONTROSE. A spt. in Forfarsh., Scotland, at the mouth of the S. Esk, 60 m. N.E. of Edinburgh in a direct line. It gave their title to the Earls of M. In Dekker's Fortunatus, M., a fictitious Lord of Scotland, is one of the characters. The time is the reign of Athelstan in England.

MONTSURREAU. A town in France at the junction of the Loire and the Vienne, 155 m. S.W. of Paris. The Earl and Countess of M., or Montsurry, are important characters in Chapman's Bussy.

MOOR (Mh. = Moorish). Originally meant an inhabitant of Mauretania, in N.W. Africa; then extended to the people of mixed Berber and Arab stock, who lived in the same dist. and crossed over into Spain and founded the Mh. kingdoms there in the 8th cent. Up to the 17th cent. the Ms. were spoken of as black, and the word was often used as equivalent to negro: sometimes in the form Black-a-M. Heylyn describes them as "of a duskish colour, comely of body, stately of gait, implacable in hatred, constant in affection, laborious and treacherous." In Tit., the villain of the piece is "Aaron that damned M." (v. 3, 201). He has a "fleece of woolly hair" (ii. 3, 34); he is "a coal-black M." (iii. 2, 78); his child by Tamora is "a blackamoore, as loathsome as a toad Amongst the fairest breeders of our clime" (iv. 2, 67); "a black slave" (iv. 2, 120); "a thick-lipped slave" (iv. 2, 174). Aaron speaks of himself as "a black dog" (v. 1, 122). He is "barbarous" and "misbelieving." Clearly Aaron is regarded as a negro. Othello is "the M. of Venice." In i. 1, 66, Roderigo calls him "the thick-lips." In i. 1, 88, Iago speaks of him as "a black ram," and in 110, as "a Barbary horse." In i. 2, 70, Brabantio speaks of his "sooty bosom." In i. 3, 291, the D. says to Brabantio, "Your son in law is far more fair than black." In iii. 3, 263, Othello himself says, "Haply for I am black . . . she's gone"; and in iii. 3, 387, he says of Desdemona: "Her name . . . is now begrimed and black As mine own face." In spite of his "free and open nature" and his approved valour, it can hardly be doubted that Shakespeare thought of him as a negro.

In Merch. iii. 5, 42, Lorenzo says to Launcelot, "I shall answer that better than you can the getting up of the negro's belly; the M. is with child by you": where negro and M. are synonymous.

In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Geraldine says, "Even the M., He thinks the blackest the most beautiful." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. ii. 1, Bellafront says, "Blackness in Ms. is no deformity"; in A. ii. 1, Hippolito upbraids Bellafront because she is ready to entertain anyone, "Be he a M., a Tartar, though his face Look uglier than a dead man's skull." In Jeronimo i. 3, Lazarotto says, "I have no hope of everlasting height, My soul's a M., you know, salvation's white." In B. & F. Span. Cur. v. 1, Jamie says to Violante, "You are so far from fair, I doubt your mother Was too familiar with the M. that served her." In Webster's White Devil, Zanche, who is described as a M., is evidently black. Flamineo calls her "my precious gipsy" (v. 1); she thinks that the 100,000 crowns she gives to Francisco "Should make that sun-burnt proverb false, and wash The Ethiop white." She boasts, "Death cannot alter my complexion, For I shall ne'er look pale." She says to Francisco, "I ne'er loved my complexion till now, 'Cause I may boldly say without a blush, I love you." In v. 1, Francisco comes to Brachiano's court, disguised as a M.; he calls himself Mulinassar, and "hath by report served the Venetian in Candy These twice 7 years;" he has become a Christian and has done "honourable service 'gainst the Turk" (v. 1); in short, he is a replica of Othello. Zanche, who is black, says of him: "That is my countryman, a goodly person." In B. & F. Subject iii. 4, Theodore, introducing some ladies to his friends, says, "Do ye like their complexions? They be no Ms." In Maid in Mill ii. 1, Bustopha says, "There's as deadly feud between a M. and a miller as between black and white." In Massinger's Very Woman iii. 1, the Merchant says of the 2 Ms. he has just sold: "You never had such blackbirds." Davies, in Nosce, says that the sun "Makes the M. black." In Chapman's May Day iii. 1, Angelosays, "As of Ms., so of chimney-sweepers, the blackest is most beautiful." In Greene's James IV v. 4, the Lawyer says, "Sooner may the M. be washed white Than these corruptions banished from this realm." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 1, Cæsar speaks of "The proud Parthian and the coal-black M." In Wilson's Cobler 100, Sateros boasts, "The coalblack M. that revels in the Straights Have I repelled." In Middleton's Triumph Truth, the Moor says, "I being a M., then, in opinion's lightness, As far from sanctity as my face from whiteness." In Massinger's Unnat. Com. iv. 1, Malefort speaks of a man as "M.-lipped, flat-nosed, dim-eyed." In Brome's M. Beggars i. 1, Oldrents says, "I will no longer strive to wash the M." In his Moor iii. 1, Millicent speaks of "the M., the blackamoore you spake of; would you make me a negro?" In contrast, we find a European, who had been kidnapped and brought up amongst the Ms., described in Thracian v. 2 as "this White M."

Used definitely of the Inhabitants of Barbary without any Implication as to Colour. In Tomkis' Albumazar iii. 8, Trincalo says, "I remember, while I lived in Barbary, a pretty song the Ms. sing"; the first words are "Alcoch dolash," which are Arabic. In Jonson's Catiline iii. 3, Catiline boasts that he will do "what the Gaul or M. could not effect," i.e. destroy Rome. In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 5, Cato says, "No Parthian, Gaul, M., no, not Cæsar's self, Would with such cruelty thy worth repay." In Kyd's Soliman i., "The M. upon his hot Barbarian horse" comes to grace the nuptials of the Prince of Cyprus. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, the 2nd Pyrgus promises, "You shall see me do the M." and proceeds to recite a speech of the Mh. King in Peele's Alcazar ii. 3. Throughout this latter play and Stucley, M. is used for an inhabitant of Barbary. In Dekker's Satiromastix ii. 2, 53, Horace (Jonson) says that Crispinus (Marston) and Fannius (Dekker) "cut an innocent M. i' the middle, to serve him in twice, and, when he had done, made Poules work of it." Apparently the reference is to the patching up of Stucley out of Peele's Alcazar and other plays, for performance by the Paul's boys. Barnes, in Parthenophil lxxv. 5, bids Cupid, because of his cruelty, "Seek out thy kin Amongst the Ms." In B. & F. Valentinian i. 3, Aecius asks, "Were our fathers The sons of lazy ms.?"

The Moors as Conquerors of Spain. In Davenant's Distresses ii., Androlio says, "Such scratching for females was ne'er heard of since first the hot Ms. did overcome Spain." In Noble Soldier ii. 1, Baltasar is "a brave soldier employed against the Ms." in Spain. In Lady Mother i. 2, Sir Geoffrey says, "The Spanish Basolas manos sounds as harsh as a Morisco kettledrum." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "Spain! there are so many Mores in't that I know you would hope of nothing less" (than to find beauties there). In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 47, which is concerned with the defeat of Roderique, the Gothic K. of Spain 711-714 A.D., Julianus says to the K., "Spain is wasted in her noble strength. On which presuming, 'tis to be supposed, The Moore is thus encouraged." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 3, K. Henry says that Ferdinand of Spain "Comes near a miracle in his success Against the Ms., who had devoured his country." In Thracian iii. 3, the Alcalde says, "In Africa the Ms. are only known And never yet searched part of Christendom." The supposed date is long before the Mh. invasion of Spain. In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Lazarillo says to the Alguazier, "Are you not a Portuguese born, descended o' the Ms.?"

The Moors were Mahometans in religion. In W. Rowley's All's Lost ii. 6, 44, Antonio says, "Persuade me to turn Turk, or Moore Mahometan, For by the lustful laws of Mahomet I may have 3 wives more." In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, a M. is offered for sale in the market "but at 200 plates" (i.e. about £5), a plate being the 8th part of a piastre, or Spanish dollar. In Massinger's Very Woman iii. 1, two Ms. are sold for 25 chequins (about £12) for the two. The Morris-pike was supposed to be of Mh. origin; hence the name. In the Ballad of Agencourt quoted in T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 52, we have: "O, the French were beaten down, Morris-pikes and bowmen."

M. is used vaguely of an Eastern, with reference to sun-worship, pearl-diving, etc., as in Marlowe's Jew i. 1, where Barabas envies "The wealthy M. that in the E. rocks Without control can pick his riches up And in his house heap pearls like pebble-stones." In Tamb. B. iii. 4, Olympia calls the soldiers of Tamburlaine "These barbarous Scythians, full of cruelty, And Ms., in whom was never pity found." In Jonson's Sejanus v. 10, Lepidus compares Sejanus to the sun "as gazed at and admired as he, When superstitious Ms. adore his light." In Nero i. 4, Scaevinus speaks of "The M. that in the boiling desert seeks With blood of strangers to imbrue his jaws." In Massinger's Lover i. 1, Hortensio exclaims: "As Ms. salute The rising sun with joyful superstition, I could fall down and worship." In Chapman's Blind Beggar i. 61, Aegiale says, "I will,

M.-like, learn to swim and dive Into the bottom of the sea for him." In Lady Mother iii. 1, Bonville says, "There's virtue enough here to excite belief in Ms. that only women have heavenly souls." The Mahometans were said to deny that women had souls.

The word lends itself to puns. In Merch. iii. 5, 42, Launcelot says, "It is much that the M. should be more than reason." In Tit. iv. 2, 52, when the Nurse asks: "Did you see Aaron the M.?" Aaron answers: "Well, more or less, or ne'er a whit at all, Here Aaron is." A pun may be intended in Ham. iii. 4, 67, where Hamlet asks his Mother: "Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed And batten on this m.?"

M. is also used to mean an aboriginal American, or a dark man of any nation. In Davenant's Playhouse iii., Pedro is described as "a slave employed by the Mh. king to conduct Drake to Panamah." Spenser, F. Q. vi. 7, 43, says of the giant Disdain: "On his head a roll of linen plight, Like to the Mores of Malabar, he wore." In B. & F. Princess, the inhabitants of Ternata in the E. Indies are called Ms. In Marlowe's Faustus i. 119, Valdes says, "Indian Ms. obey their Spanish lords," i.e. in America.

MOORDITCH. The part of the old city moat of Lond. lying between Bishopsgate and Moorgate. It was kept full of water by the drainage into it of the adjoining fen of Moorfields, and was the depository for all kinds of filth and rubbish. Stow records efforts to cleanse it in 1540 and 1549; and in 1595 it was thoroughly cleansed and made a little broader. In 1638 it was covered in with brick arches; and in the course of the next 20 years buildings began to be erected on it.

In More iii. 2, Faulkner, who has had his hair cropped by the order of More, says, "More had bin better a scoured Moreditch than a notched me thus." In Nobody 754, Nobody promises: "I'll empty Mooreditch at my own charge and build up Paules-steeple without a collection." Nash, in Lenten, p. 326, speaks of the astonishment of the "common people about Lond., some few years since, at the bubbling of M." Possibly the bubbling was due to some putrefactive action, and it may have been this that led to the cleansing of 1595. Dekker, in Hornbook i., says that to purge the world "will be a sorer labour than the cleansing of Augeas stable, or the scouring of Mooreditch." In his News from Hell, he says, "Look how Moor-ditch shows, when the water is three-quarters out, and by reason the stomach of it is overladen, is ready to fall to casting."

It seems to have been used for the ducking of scolding women. W. Rowley, in New Wonder ii., says, "'Twill be at Moorgate, beldam; where I shall see thee in the Ditch, dancing in a cucking stool." In H4 A. i. 2, 86, when Falstaff says, "I am as melancholy as a gib cat or a lugged bear," the Prince suggests, "What sayest thou to a hare, or the melancholy of M.?" Taylor, in Penniless, says, "My mind is attired with moody, muddy, M. melancholy." The old Bedlam hospital was close by, on the E. side of Moorfields, and the reference may be to some wretched Bedlam who haunted the neighbourhood.

MOORFIELDS. A low-lying, marshy piece of ground immediately N. of the old city wall of Lond., between Bishopsgate and Cripplegate. In Norden's Map (1593) it is shown as an oblong, measuring about 320 yards from E. to W., and 200 from N. to S. Finsbury Circus occupies a part of it. In 1415 a postern, called Moorgate, was broken through the wall to give access to it; in 1527 it was drained, but continued to be a "noisome and offensive place, being a general lay-stall, a rotten morish ground, crossed with deep stinking ditches" (Howes, Continuation of Stow's Annals, 1631). In 1606 it was laid out in walks and became a popular summer resort for the citizens. It was also used as a training ground for the citizen forces and as a place for the bleaching of linen. It was a favourite haunt of beggars, especially of the poor lunatics from Bedlam, which lay on its E. side; and duels were frequently fought there. The concourse of citizens drew thither fortune-tellers, ballad-singers, and pick-pockets. A few summer-houses began to be erected on it, but it was not built over till after the Gt. Fire—indeed, it remained partly open ground till the end of the 18th cent. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. ii. 2, Brainworm says, "My old master intends to follow my young master, dry-foot, over M. to Lond. this morning"; and this scene is laid there. In iv. 4, Knowell tells how he engaged the disguised Brainworm "this morning, as I came over M." The next scene is laid in M., where Matthew and the rest have gone out for a stroll. In Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit, praising his wife's dress, says, "I challenge all Cheapside to show such another; M., Pimlico-path, or the Exchange, in a summer evening." In Jonson's Underwoods ix., he says, "O what strange Variety of silks were on the Exchange, Or in M., this other night." In Braithwaite's Whimsies (1631), we read of "the flourishing city-walks of M." In Mayne's Match iii. 3, Bright says that his father "would commend the wholesomeness of the air in M." In H8 v. 4, 33, the Porter, annoyed by the crowd, asks indignantly, "Is this M. to muster in?" In B. & F. Pestle v. 3, Ralph says, "Then took I up my bow and shaft in hand, And walked into M. to cool myself; But there grim, cruel Death met me again, And shot this forked arrow through my head."

In Ret. Pernass iii. 1, Sir Raderick says, "I am going to M. to speak with an unthrift." In Mayne's Match ii. 6, Plotwell says, "We have brought you a gentleman of valour, who has been in M. often; marry, it has been to squire his sisters and demolish custards at Pimlico." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1641), says, "Go among the Usurers in their walk in Moor Fields." In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, Anne says of Hebe and Iris: "They were sure some chandler's daughters, Bleaching linen in M." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 221, the Parisian says of M.: "Because the place was meant for public pleasure and to shew the munificence of your city, I shall desire you to banish the laundresses and bleachers, whose acres of old linen make a shew like the fields of Carthage, when the 5 months' shifts of the whole fleet are washed and spread." In Shirley's Riches iii., Gettings swears by "our Royal Change, and by M." In The Great Frost (1608), the Countryman commends "your new, beautiful walks in M." Donne, Elegy xv. (1609) 27, refers to "New-built Aldgate and the Moorfield crosses." In Raleigh's Ghost (1626), mention is made of "our new Moorfield walks." W. Rowley, in Search Intro., says to his readers, "There hath been many of you seen measuring the longitude and latitude of Morefields any time this 2 years." In Field's Weathercock iv. 2, Pouts says, "Zoons! I see myself in M. upon a wooden leg, begging three-pence." In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Subtle pictures Mammon, after he has got the philosopher's stone, "dispensing for the pox, Walking M. for lepers." The Author of Penn. Parl. opens by enacting that anyone who does not laugh at his book "shall be condemned of melancholy, and to be adjudged to walk over M. twice a week, in a foul shirt and a pair of boots, but no stockings." In More ii. 1, Kit says to Harry, "If thou beest angry, I'll fight with thee at sharp in M.; I have a sword to serve my turn." In Massinger's Madam i. 2, Plenty says to Lacy, "How big you look! Walk into M., I dare look on your Toledo." In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Mrs. Littlewit quotes "the t'other man of M." as having told her mother's fortune. In Dekker's Northward ii. 2, Mayberry says, "Your sister shall lodge at a garden-house of mine in M."

MOORGATE. A gate in the wall of Lond., made in 1415 to admit the citizens to Moorfields. It was restored in 1472 and rebuilt in 1672 in noble style. It was pulled down in 1762, and the stones sunk in the Thames to protect the central arches of Lond. Bdge. It stood at the junction of M. St. and Lond. Wall. In W. Rowley's New Wonder ii. 1, Stephen says, "At M., beldam, I shall see thee in the ditch [i.e. Moorditch] dancing in a cucking stool." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. i. 2, Edward Knowell says, "I am sent for this morning by a friend in the Old Jewry, to come to him [from Hogsdon]; it's but crossing over the fields to M." Dekker, in Seven Sins, says of Lying: "Espying certain colliers with carts most sinfully loaden for the City, he mingled his footmen carelessly amongst these, and by this stratagem of coals bravely through Moore-gate got within the walls." There is a pun on the meaning of Moor, viz., a negro.

MORA. A town in Spain, 18 m. S.E. of Madrid, and abt. 30 m. from Toledo. In B. & F. Maid Mill v. 2, Gillian explains that Florimel's nurse Araminta, "In a remove from M. to Corduba, Was seized on by a fierce and hungry bear."

MORAT. A town on the N.E. shore of the Lake of Morat in Switzerland, 8 m. N. of Freybourg. It is chiefly memorable for the defeat inflicted by a small army of Swiss on the huge host led by Charles of Burgundy in 1476. In Massinger's Dowry i. 2, Charalois recalls his father's exploits "In those 3 memorable overthrows At Granson, M., Nancy, where his master, The warlike Charalois, lost treasure, men, and life."

MORAVIA. A margravate in the Austrian Empire, S.E. of Silesia and Bohemia. The horses bred in the plain of the Hanna were highly esteemed. In Jonson's Epigram cvii. to Capt. Hungry, he says, "Tell the gross Dutch those grosser tales of yours . . . fill them full Of your Moravian horse, Venetian bull."

MOREA. A name given to the Peloponnesus in S. Greece, according to the popular etymology, because of its resemblance to a mulberry leaf in shape. Donne, in Progress of Soul (1601) xxxi., says, "As if unmanacled From Greece M. were, and that, by some Earthquake unrooted, loose M. swim."

MORECLACK. See MORTLAKE.

MOREH. The Oak, or Terebinth, of M. is mentioned in Gen. xii. 6 as the scene of a Divine revelation to Abraham. The A. V. translation, "plain of M.," is incorrect. This sacred tree was in the neighbourhood of Shechem, but its exact position cannot be identified. Milton, P. L. xii. 137, says of Abraham: "I see his tents pitched about Sichem and the neighbouring plain of M."

MORENA, SIERRA. The mtn. range in Spain, S. of the central plateau, and separating Andalusia from La Mancha. In May's Heir i., Clerimont speaks of "the most sad penance of the ingenious knight, Don Quixote, on the mountains of S. M." The story is told in Book iii. c. 11 of Cervantes' Don Quixote.

MORIAN (= Moor, q.v.). In T. Heywood's Maid of West B. 2, Clem says, "The same M. intreated me to lie with him." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 297, says, "A fair pearl in a M.'s ear cannot make him white."

MORISCO. Properly used of the Moors who remained in Spain after they were conquered by the Christians. By a great breach of faith they were ultimately expelled by Philip III. It seems, however, to be used loosely for anything Moorish. In Dekker's Match Me ii., Bilbo asks, "Do you want no rich spangled M. shoe-strings?" A little before he has called them "Barbarian shoe-strings." M. is used in the sense of a Morris-dance, or a Morris-dancer. Dorialus says, "There's mad mes. in the state" (B. & F. Cupid ii. 3); York says, "I have seen Him [Cade] caper upright like a wild M." (H6 B. iii. 1, 365); Mullisheg says, "In wild Moriskoes we will lead the bride" (T. Heywood's Maid of West B. i.).

MORLAIX. Spt. on N. coast of Brittany. Sacked by the Earl of Surrey in July 1522. In True Trag., Epilogue, it is said of Henry VIII: "Then after, Morle and Morles conquered he, And still he kept the Frenchmen at a bay." Morles is meant for M., the scansion requiring a dissyllable.

MORLES. Vill. in Normandy, close to Bayeux, about half-way between Havre and Cherbourg. In True Trag., Epilogue, it is said of Henry VIII: "Then, after, Morle and Morles conquered he." Morle is Morles, Morles is Morlaix, q.v.

MOROCCO. The country in N.W. Africa, anciently called Mauretania. The native name is Marrakush. From the 8th cent. onwards it has been governed by a succession of Mohammedan dynasties; Hamed Sherif el-Mansur was the Sultan from 1579 to 1603, and this was the time of M.'s greatest splendour. In 1578, Sebastian of Portugal was defeated at Alcasar; in 1585, the Company of Barbary Merchants was founded in Lond., and Elizabeth sent an ambassador to M., who was well received. The inhabitants are a mixed race of Berbers and Moors with a strong infusion of Jews. The Elizabethans regarded them as black. In Merch. i. 2, the Prince of M. is announced as one of Portia's suitors; and she says, "If he have the condition of a saint and the complexion of a devil, I had rather he should shrive me than wive me." In ii. 7, he chooses the golden casket, and so fails. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight tells how "Fat Sanctius, K. of Castile, was killed by a herb, taken to make him lean, which old Corduba, K. of M., counselled his fear to." This old Corduba was Miramoline. In Kirke's Champions iii. 1, George, having redeemed Sabrina, is imprisoned by her father Pomil, who is moved thereto by "the M. king, our champion's rival." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, the K. of M. appears as one of the dependents of Bajazeth. Tamburlaine defeats him, and makes Usum-casane K. of Morocco. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A., iv. 3 and the whole of Act v. are placed in the court of the K. of M., whose name is given as Mullisheg. To him says Clem, "Mayst thou never want sweet water to wash thy black face in, most mighty monarch of M." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 70, Mura is called "Governor i' th' Ms." Milton, P. L. i. 584, speaks of the knights who "Jousted in . . . Damasco or Marocco or Trebisond." These joustings took place in the wars between the Moors and Spaniards. In xi. 404, Adam is shown in vision "The kingdoms of Almansor, Fez and Sus, Marocco and Algiers and Tremisen."

The capital of M. has the same name. The city lies at the foot of the Atlas range, abt. 350 m. S.W. of Gibraltar. It was one of the most flourishing cities in the Mohammedan world, with a population of about 700,000, but it now has less than a tenth of that number. In Stucley 2505, Stucley says, "We have Larassa and M. both, Strong towns of succour to retire unto." In Peele's Alcazar i. 2, the Moor orders Pisano to march by "those plots of ground That to Moroccus leads the lower way."

MORTIMER'S CROSS. In the parish of Kingsland, in Herefordsh., some 13 m. N. of Hereford. Here Edward, afterwards Edward IV, defeated Pembroke in 1461. Act ii. 1 of H6 C. apparently takes place near the battlefield.

MORTIMER'S HOLE. An underground passage from the river Leene to Nottingham Castle, said to have been constructed by Mortimer to enable him to visit Q. Isabella secretly. Other explanations have been suggested, but probably it was merely a passage made to convey provision into the Castle if it should be besieged. In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 114, the Q. says, "To-morrow we'll survey The under-minings and unpaced greise That Mortimer and Isabell did devise To steal their sportive dalliances in, Of whom your stately fortress does retain The Labyrinth, now called M. H." A full description of the building of it is given in Drayton's Barons' Wars vi. 30 seq., where it is called "the Tower of Mortimer."

MORTLAKE. A town on the S. bank of the Thames, some 9 m. W. of St. Paul's, in Surrey. James I set up a manufactory of tapestry here, which attained considerable celebrity. In Mayne's Match ii. 3, Timothy says, "Why, lady, do you think me Wrought in a loom? some Dutch piece weaved at M.?" In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano asks: "Hath he not a child at nurse at Moreclacke?" Armin's Moreclacke is laid in M.

MOSCHI. A Colchian tribe living S.E. of the Black Sea, N. of the mtns. of Armenia. In Nero iii. 3, Seneca says, "O Rome, The men of Colchis at thy sufferings grieve, The Mosch condemned to perpetual snows." Mosch is Bullen's satisfactory conjecture for the Qq. reading "most."

MOSCOW. The old capital of Russia, lying about the centre of the country on the Moskva, 400 m. S.E. of Petrograd. It began to rise to importance towards the end of the 13th cent., and in 1367 the Kremlin, or central fortress of the city, was surrounded by stone walls. Under Ivan III and IV in the 16th cent. it became the capital of all Russia, though it had hard fighting to do against the Mongols, who burnt it to the ground in 1571. It soon recovered, however, and its position made it in the 17th cent. the centre of Russian trade. An English company was formed to carry on the large fur trade, and so M. became interesting to English people. It was now a large city 14 m. in circumference, though Heylyn says that both the churches and houses are mostly "made with wood and dirt." In Ed. iii. 1, the Polish Capt. says to the K. of France, "From great Musco, fearful to the Turk, I bring these servitors to fight for thee." In Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, Barabas claims to have debts owing to him "In Frankfort, Lubeck, M., and where not." Greene, in Quip, p. 239, satirizes the skinner who swears that a worthless fur "is a most precious skin and came from Musco." T. Smith, in Voyage in Russia (1605), compares a ship in a storm to "a Musco beare bayted with excellent English dogs."

In Webster's Malfi v. 2, Ferdinand, pretending to be mad, says, "I am studying the art of patience, to drive 6 snails before me from this town [Milan] to M." Jonson, in Epigram xxxii., says that "the cold of Mosco" had not been able to kill Sir John Roe. The scene of B. & F. Subject is laid in M. and the neighbouring country, and a war with the Tartars forms its enveloping action. In Milton, P. L. xi. 395, Adam beholds in vision "where the Russian Ksar in Mosco [sat]."

MOTHER REDCAP. A famous tavern which still is to be found on its old site, though it has been pulled down and rebuilt at least twice. It stands in High St., Camden Town, at the corner where it is joined by Camden Rd. and Kentish Town Rd. It is said to have been the favourite resort of Moll Cutpurse, the heroine of Middleton's R. G. In Bacchus, one of the characters is Tom Typsay, "wellnear choked with a marvellous dry heat, which he of late had got by lifting overlong at old M. R.'s." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 3, Sencer says, "This, over against M. R.'s, is her house; I'll knock." In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, Micropepes says, "I have seen in M. R.'s hall, in painted cloth, the story of the Prodigal." A lost play by Drayton and Munday, produced in 1597, was entitled M. R., and dealt with the story of the old witch whose name survived in this tavern. In Dekker's Satiromastix iii. 1, 263, Tuca says to Mrs. Miniver, "I'll name thee no more, M. R., upon pain of death." In v. 2, 316, Tuca says, "Run, R., ware horns there." The allusion is probably to the play by Drayton and Munday mentioned above. There is another old tavern with the same sign in Holloway Rd., at the corner of Whitley Rd.: it is hard to say which of the 2 is intended in the above quotations. M. R. is said to have been a witch who was carried off by the Devil during the time of the Commonwealth. The name was used for a variety of cap. In W. Rowley's Search 31, the felt-makers complain that their trade is destroyed by the popularity of caps: "that was Monmouth-caps, Wantige caps, round caps, Mother-red-caps."

MOULINS. A city in France on the Allier, 195 m. S.E. of Paris. In the 14th cent. it became the residence of the Dukes of Bourbon, and the ruins of the old château are still to be seen. In Webster's Weakest i. 1, a gentleman reports: "a mighty power had in charge To meet the D. [of Anjou] at Mullins."

MOUNT, THE. See MICHAEL'S MOUNT, SAINT.

MOUTH. A Lond. tavern, probably the Bull and M. close to Aldersgate St. at the N. end of Butchers' Hall Lane, which led up to it from Newgate St. The Post Office buildings on the W. side of St. Martin's-le-grand have absorbed the site. The original name is said to have been "The Boulogne M." In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his list of Roman (Lond.) taverns, says, "Unto the M. the oyster wife." There was also a M. Tavern in Bishopsgate St. Without. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 21, Spicing says, "There's hot drinking at the M. of Bishopsgate, for our soldiers are all mouth." In his I. K. M. B. 270, John says to Timothy, "A man might find you quartered betwixt the M. at Bishopsgate and the preaching place in the Spittle." In Dekker's Satiromastix iii. 1, 245, Tuca says to Mrs. Miniver, "I'll dam thee up, my wide M. at Bishopsgate." In his Lanthorn, he speaks of "the Father of Hell looking very terribly with a pair of eyes that stared as wide as the M. gapes at Bishopsgate."

MOZAMBICK. A province on the E. coast of Africa, opposite to Madagascar. The capital of the same name is on a small island off the coast, some 1800 m. N. of the Cape of Good Hope. It was visited and taken by the Portuguese at the beginning of the 16th cent., and was made the centre for their S. African possessions. Milton, P. L. iv. 161, says, "to them who sail Beyond the Cape of Hope, and now are past M., off at sea N.E. winds blow Sabæan odours from the spicy shore Of Araby the Blest."

MUCARE. In Marston's Insatiate ii., Abigail says, "My husband goes to M. to renew the farm he has." Later in the play the same place is called Maurano and Mawrano. But both scene and personages in this play are purely fictitious.

MUFFE. A name applied with some degree of contempt to the Germans and Swiss. It appears to have been originally a Dutch nickname for the Westphalians. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Uribassa reports: "K. Sigismund hath brought from Christendom Slavonians, Almain rutters, Ms., and Danes." Florio translates Stiticozzi "swearing or swaggering muffs or dutchmen." Dekker, in his Dream (1620), speaks of "The M., the Scythian, and the Freeze-land boor" as inhabitants of specially cold countries. In his Satiromastix i. 2, 426, Tuca says, "Marry m., my man a' gingerbread, wilt eat any small coal?" Lodge, in Wits Miserie (1596), dresses Lying in "the French doublet, the Ms. cloak, the Toledo rapier," etc. Moffen is still used by the Dutch as a nickname for the Germans (like the French Boches).

MUGGLE ST. (= MUGWELL, or MONKWELL, ST.) Lond., running S. from the front of St. Giles Cripplegate to Silver St. A hermitage with a well stood at the N. end of the st., from which it is said to have derived its name. William Lambe bought the hermitage in the reign of Edward VI and erected on its site a set of almshouses called after him. Barber Surgeons' Hall is in M. St. In Brome's Moor iii. 1, Phillis says, "I have an old aunt in M.-st., a midwife that knows what's what as well's another woman."

MULLINS. See MOULINS.

MUNSTER. The S.W. of the 4 old divisions of Ireland, including the counties of Clare, Cork, Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford. In Jonson's Irish, Dennise introduces himself and his fellows: "We be Irish men of Connough, Leymster, Ulster, M."

MÜNSTER. The chief town of Westphalia in Prussia on the Aa, 250 m. W. of Berlin. It is a well-preserved example of an old German town, and has a very interesting old Cathedral. It was here that the Anabaptists under Johann Matthyszoon, Johann Bockhold of Leyden (best known as John of Leyden), Knipperdolling, and others tried to set up a Theocracy in 1535-6. Matthyszoon was killed in a sally, and John proclaimed himself King. He delivered all sorts of fantastic prophecies, took 4 wives, whom he subsequently beheaded in the market-place with his own hands, and generally introduced profligate licence amongst his followers. The town was besieged and taken in 1535, and John and his leading officers were executed and their bodies hung up in iron cages, which are still to be seen on the tower of St. Lambert's Ch. It was at M. that the treaty of Westphalia was signed in 1648 in the Hall still called the Frieden Saal. In Bale's Johan 291, Imperial Majesty says, "The Anabaptists—the city of M. was lost through their debate": a curious anachronism. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortune speaks of "This Dutch butcher wearing M.'s crown, John Leyden, born in Holland poor and base, Now rich in empery and Fortune's grace." In Davenant's Playhouse i., the Player says, "Your Kings of M. pay in prophecies only." Hall, in Characters, says of the Unconstant man: "Of late he is leapt from Rome to M., and is grown to giddy Anabaptism."

MURANO. A town on an island in the Venetian lagoon, abt. 1 m. N. of Venice. It has been famous for its glass manufactories since the 11th cent. Harrison, in Descrip. of England (1587), says of Venetian glass: "Such is the estimation of this stuff that many become rich only with their new trade unto M. from whence the very best are daily to be had."

MURCIA. A city and province in S.E. Spain, abt. 210 m. from Madrid. It was taken from the Moors in 1269. M. is the scene of Shirley's Doubtful Heir.

MUSCO. See Moscow.

MUSCOVY (Me. = Muscovite). Properly the dist. around Moscow, but applied to the whole of Russia. Heylyn gives the boundaries of Muscovie as Tartary on the E., Livonia, Lithuania, and Sweden on the W., the Frozen Ocean on the N., and the Caspian and Turkey on the S. (see under RUSSIA). In Ed. III iii. 1, before the battle of Cressy, K. John of France stations "My eldest son, the D. of Normandy, Together with this aid of Mes." on the higher ground. It has just been stated by a Polonian Capt. that he has brought men "from great Musco" to help the French. This was during the reign of Simeon the Proud, who first took the title of Grand D. of all the Russias. In Selimus 540, Selim says, "Basilus, the mighty Emperor of Russia, Sends in his troops of slave-born Mes." This was Basil V (1505-1533). In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 234, the D. of Anjou, receiving the ambassadors who offer him the crown of Poland, says that the K. of Poland will have to manage "The greatest wars within our Christian bounds, I mean our wars against the Mes., And on the other side against the Turk." Ivan the Terrible (1533-1584) was constantly at war with the Swedes and the Poles. Sidney, in Astrophel (1581), says that "the Poles' right k. . . . means . . . To warm with ill-made fire cold M." In ii. 10, he says, "Now, like slave-born Me., I call it praise to suffer tyranny." In L. L. L. v. 2, 121, Boyet announces that the K. and his companions are coming to visit the Princess "apparelled thus, Like Mes. or Russians." The ladies chaff them out of countenance, and, as they retire, the Princess says, "20 adieus, my frozen Muscovits": where Muscovits rhymes with wits. They were in "shapeless gear"; and Rosalind thinks they are "sea-sick, coming from M." The idea was probably suggested by the fact that Ivan the Terrible had sent an embassy to England to secure a wife for himself from Elizabeth's Court; had again commissioned an Englishman, Anthony Jenkinson, to convey his compliments to Elizabeth in 1567, and 3 years later had written an autograph letter to the Q. In Day's Travails, p. 37, we are told that Haly "Is graced by the Muscovian Emperor." This was Michael Romanoff. An imaginary Great D. of Muscovia is one of the characters in B. & F. Subject.

In Jonson's Love Rest., Robin tells how Love is "wrapt up in furs, like a Me., and almost frozen to death." Nash, in Pierce, says that Greediness had "his cap furred with catskins after the Muscovie fashion." In Somewhat to Read (1591), he says that the ass "wears his ears, usewant muffs, after the M. fashion." Habington, in Arragon ii. 1, speaks of "the long night which becombs the Me." In Davenant's

Platonic iii. 4, Fredaline says, "He is less apt for love than Mes. Benighted when they travel on the ice." In B. & F. Cure ii. 2, Alvarez, mocking Lucio's coldness in love, says, "Did the cold Me. beget thee That lay here lieger in the last great frost?" Habington, in Castara (1640), Arber, p. 91, speaks of "the cold Me. whose fur and stove Can scarce prepare him heat enough for love." In Wit Woman 912, Bizardo says to Braggardo, who has grown a beard, "I fear some will say you have robbed a Me.": the Russians being a bearded race. In B. & F. Hon. Man iii. 3, Mallicorn says, "We are true Mes. to our wives, and are never better pleased than when they use us as slaves, bridle and saddle us." He is speaking by contraries. Heylyn says of the Mes.: "It is the fashion of these women to love that husband best which beateth them most." Fuller, Holy State (1642) iii. 13, says, "The Me. women esteem none loving husbands except they beat their wives."

Dekker, in Dead Term, says, "No stoves [i.e. vapour baths] in M. can put a man into more violent sweats." Burton, A. M. i. 2, 2, 2, says, "Their chief comfort, to be merry together in an ale-house or tavern, as our modern Mes. do in their mede-inns." In B. & F. Captain ii. 2, Piso says of Capt. Jacomo: "His hide is ranker than the M. leather, And grained like it." Russia leather is tanned with birch-bark oils, and has a peculiar smell and a dark colour. In Marston's Malcontent i. 7, Passarello says of Maquerelle: "She were an excellent lady, but that her face peeeth like M. glass." M. glass is mica; it was used for lanterns, hence called M. lanterns. Dekker, in News from Hell, says, "A wise man might have taken it for the snuff of a candle in a Muscovie lanthorn." Jonson's Devil Prol. says, "Would we . . . were M. glass That you might look our scenes through as they pass." One of the ingredients of the aphrodisiac prescribed by Maquerelle in Marston's Malcontent ii. 4 is "lamb-stones of Muscovia." The bears for the sport of bear-baiting were imported from Russia. In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Worm says, "The Emperor of M. has promised to land 10,000 bears in England to over-run the country": which Jolly thinks is "in revenge of the late barbarous murder of their brethren here."

MUSKO. A Muscovite, or Russian. In All's iv. 1, 76, Parolles says, "I know you are the Muskos' regiment And I shall lose my life for want of language."

MUSSELBURGH. A town in Scotland, at the mouth of the Esk in the Firth of Forth, 6 m. E. of Edinburgh. In its neighbourhood was fought the battle of Pinkie, in 1547, when the D. of Somerset defeated the Scots with great slaughter. In Wit and Wisdom ii. 1, Idleness says, "I have been at Musselborough at the Scottish field." In his Nine Days Wonder (1600), Kemp tells how, on his dance to Norwich, he met an old soldier at Rockland to whom "Kett's Field and Musselborough fray Were battles fought but yesterday." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 3, Ferdinand says, "The battle of Musleborough Field was a brave one." In Sampson's Vow, v. 3, 94, Elizabeth speaks of "The bloody sweat that Musilborough bred." Deloney, in Craft ii. 11, tells how Tom Drum came "from the winning of Mustleborow." A ballad in Choyce Drollery (1656) begins: "On the 12th day of December In the 4th year of K. Edward's reign two mighty hosts, as I remember, At Musleborough did pitch on a plain." In Tw. N. ii. 3, 90, Sir Toby starts singing this ballad: "O the 12th day of December": where the O should be printed O', i.e. On.

MUSWELL HILL

MUSWELL HILL. A hill in Hornsey, some $5\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. of the Lond. Post Office. On the top of the hill was a famous spring, the M., under the protection of our Lady of M., the waters of which performed miraculous cures. One of the patients was an unnamed K. of Scotland. It was frequented by pilgrims in the Middle Ages. The site is now occupied by the Alexandra Palace. In J. Heywood's Four PP i., the Palmer mentions "Muswel" as one of the shrines which he has visited.

MUTINA (the Roman name for MODENA, q.v.). In Antonie iii. 948, Antony says, "I bare, mean while besieging M., Two consuls' armies."

MUTTON LANE. Lond., between Vine St. and Clerkenwell Green. It shared the bad reputation of the district. In Davenport's New Trick i. 2, Slightall wanting a loose woman, sends Roger to search, amongst other places, "White Fryers, St. Peters st., and M. L."

MYCANIAN. See MYCONUS.

MYCENAE. One of the most ancient cities in Greece, at the N.E. extremity of the plain of Argos. It was the royal city of Agamemnon, and the scene of his murder by Clytemnestra and the subsequent vengeance of Orestes. It was taken by Argos, 468 B.C., and was never again inhabited. Its ruins are of the greatest interest as illustrating the Heroic Age of Hellenic history. M. is the scene of the play Horrestes. Early in the play a Messenger announces, "Horrestes purposeth to invade this Mycoene city strong." In Nero i. 3, Nero mentions it as one of the Greek towns which he has amazed with his artistic glories. This is an error, as the city was in ruins in his time. In T. Heywood's B. Age ii., Atreus prays, if he does not kill the Calidonian boar, that he may nevermore "Mycenes visit." In May's Agrippina 161, Octavia says, "Thou hast at Rome beheld A feast more black than e'er M. saw." The reference is to the banquet at which Atreus served up to Thyestes the flesh of his own sons.

MYCONUS. An island in the Aegean Sea, N.E. of Delos, 100 m. W. of Miletus. According to tradition, the inhabitants lost their hair at an early age: as both Pliny and Strabo avouch. Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 358, says, "To be without hair amongst the Myconians is accounted no shame, because they be all born bald." In his Sapho iii. 1, Pandion says, "To be bald among the Mycanians it was accounted no shame, because they were all bald."

MYLESIAN. See MILETUS.

MYRMIDONS. A tribe settled near Phthia in ancient Thessaly who were led by Achilles to the Trojan War. In Troil. i. 3, 378, Ulysses calls Achilles "the great Myrmidon." In v. 5, 33, Ulysses says that "his mangled M." have roused the drowsy blood of Achilles. In v. 7, 1, Achilles cries: "Come here about me, you my M.," and in v. 8, 13, he appeals to them: "On M., and cry you all amain, Achilles hath the mighty Hector slain." In T. Heywood's Iron Age A. iii., Ajax says to Achilles, "Let thy Patroclus lead thy Mirmidons." In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 490, Sacrepant's man says to him, "Stand you in dumps, like to the Mirmydon Trapt in the tresses of Polixena?" Achilles fell in love with Polixena. In Lochrine iii. 1, 46, Lochrine speaks of the sons of Priam "Slain traitorously by all the Mermidons."

MYTILENE

The M. were credited with extraordinary callousness and cruelty. In Span. Trag. iv., p. 504, Senex says, "My cause, but slightly known, Might move the hearts of warlike M." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. ii. 2, 49, Selinthus says, "Not a soldier here but's an Achilles, Valiant as stoutest Myrmidon." The word is used of any faithful follower. In B. & F. Philaster v. 4, the Capt. cries, "Come, my brave M., Let us fall on!" In Partiell iii. 3, the serving-man refers to his boon-companions as "our Myrmidonians." In B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Livia says, "This quarter fierce Petruchio Keeps with his m." In Tw. N. ii. 3, 29, the Clown says, "The Mermidons are no bottle-ale houses." This is mere fooling; but it may have been suggested by the ancient legend of the mission of St. Matthew to the Mermidones, as they are called in the old English poem Andreas. They are represented as cannibals, who eat and drink nothing but human flesh and blood: hence they would have no alehouses. I venture to suggest ha' as an emendation for are: "The Mermidons ha' no bottle-ale houses": the Clown implying that Sir Toby and he, who love good ale, are far higher in the scale of humanity than the savage M.

MYSEN. See MEISSEN.

MYTER. See MITRE.

MYTILENE. The capital of the island of Lesbos, in the Aegean Sea, off the coast of Asia Minor. It is still a flourishing city. It was the home of the poetess Sappho, and her head appears on some of its coins. In Per. iv. 2, Marina is brought by the pirates to M. and sold to a brothel-keeper. The scenes of iv. 5 and 6 are laid in M., and of v. 1 off the coast of M. In the old Timon v. 1, Demosthenes says, "What is the end of his journey? not Sparta, not Thebes, not M. itself; but he travels to the Antipodes." Hall, in Satires vi. 1, says they "would their face in stamped coin express As did the Ms. their poetess."

NABATHEANS. The inhabitants of the Northern part of the Arabian peninsula. They settled also in Idumaea, and their city Petra was a great entrepôt for commerce in the products of the East. In Lady Mother iv. 1, Thorowgood says, "You do appear more glorious Than the red morn when she adorns her cheeks With Nabathean pearls."

NAG'S HEAD. A tavern in Lond., at the E. corner of Cheapside and Friday St. In Ret. Pernass. i. 6, Phantasma says, "I promised to bring you to a drinking Inn, in Cheapside, at the sign of the Nagges Heade." In Feversham ii. 2, Michael says that Master Arden supped "at the Nages head at the 18 pence ordinary." Nash, in Saffron Walden, says Watson first told him of Gabriel Harvey's vanities and hexameters "one night at supper at the N. H. in Cheape." There was another N. H. at the S. corner of Lombard St. and Gracechurch St., opposite Leadenhall Market (see under LEADENHALL).

NAMANCOS. A town on the coast of Galicia, in North-W. Spain, near Cape Finisterre. Milton, in Lyc. 162, speaks of the angel looking from St. Michael's Mt. "toward N. and Bayona's hold." There is nothing between the S. of Cornwall and the North of Spain except sea.

NANCY. The old capital of Lorraine, on the Meurthe, 219 m. E. of Paris. Charles the Bold was defeated and killed at the battle of N. in 1477. A large piece of tapestry, found in his tent after the battle, is preserved in the Galerie des Cerfs in the old Ducal Palace; and the place where his body was found is marked by a cross. In Massinger's Dowry i. 2, Charalois tells how his father "did as much as man In those 3 memorable overthrows At Granson, Morat, N., where his master, The warlike Charalois, lost treasure, men, and life." In Devonshire iv. 1, Manuel says he left his father "at N. in Lorraine."

NANTES. A city in France, on the right bank of the Loire, 35 m. from its mouth. It was a strongly Catholic city, but when it was taken by Henri IV in 1598 it was there that he signed the famous Edict of Toleration, afterwards repealed by Louis XIV in 1685. In Bale's Laws ii., Sodomy says, "Pope July sought to have 2 lads from the cardinal of N."

NANTWICH. A town in Cheshire, on the Weaver, 17 m. S.E. of Chester. It had as many as 300 salt-works in the 16th cent. In Brome's Crew ii. 1, Vincent suggests to Hilliard "a journey to the Wise Woman of N., to ask if we be fit husbands for them," i.e. Merial and Rachel. Drayton, in Polyolb. xi. 61, celebrates the "2 renowned Wyches, The Nantwyche and the North, whose either briny well For store and sorts of salts make Weever to excell."

NAPAE. A wooded glen in the island of Lesbos, mentioned in Strabo ix. 426. In Peele's Ed. I vi. 35, Joan speaks of the Thames as "wallowing up and down On Flora's beds and Napae's silver down."

NAPLES (Lat. NEAPOLIS, It. NAPOLI); Nn.—Neapolitan. A city in Italy, on the Northern shore of the Bay of Naples, 120 miles S.E. of Rome in a direct line. The site is one of the most beautiful in the world. Neapolis originally was a Greek colony, though the date and circumstances of its origin are uncertain. It fell under the dominion of Rome, and after the break-up of the Roman Empire was for over 4 cents. an independent republic. About 1050 the Normans established their authority over the S. of Italy and Sicily, and in 1130 Count Roger assumed title of K. of the Two Sicilies. In 1194, by default of male issue, the kingdom passed to the Emperor Henry VI of the house of Hohenstaufen, his successors being Frederick II, Conrad, Conradine, and Manfred. In 1265 Charles I of Anjou defeated and slew Manfred, and was granted the kingship of the Two Sicilies by the Pope; but in 1282 a popular revolution, the Sicilian Vespers, turned the French out of Sicily. Under the Aragonese, and then the Kings of Spain, Naples and Sicily remained until 1707. The Austrians then held fleeting possession until 1733, when Don Carlos (son of the Bourbon Philip V of Spain) founded the Bourbon line of kings, who retained their throne till 1860, when they were expelled by Garibaldi, and Naples became part of the united Kingdom of Italy.

In Tempest there is an Alonzo, K. of N., and his son Ferdinand. Whilst there is nothing historical in the story, the names were probably suggested by those of Alphonsus I (1434) and his son Ferdinand I (1458); or of Alphonsus II (1494) and his son Ferdinand II (1494). In H6 A. v. 3, 94, Suffolk says of Margaret of Anjou: "Though her father be the K. of N., D. of Anjou and Maine, yet is he poor." In v. 4, 78, he is called "Reignier, K. of N.," and in v. 5, 39, "The K. of N. and Jerusalem"; and again, in H6 B. i. 1, 48, "Reignier, K. of N., Sicilia, and Jerusalem." In v. 1, 118, York calls Margaret "Blood-bespotted Neapolitan, Outcast of N., England's bloody scourge." Reignier's poverty is again referred to, in H6 C. i. 4, 121; and in ii. 2, 139, Richd. calls Margaret "Iron of N. hid with English gilt, Whose father bears the title of a K., As if a channel should be called the sea." Q. Joanna I left the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to René (Reignier) of Anjou in 1435, but Alphonso of Arragon also claimed the throne. René reached N. in 1438, but in 1441 Alphonso besieged and took the city, and René retired to France, though he continued to the end to call himself K. of N. and Sicily.

The scene of B. & F. Double Mar. is laid partly at N., during the reign of "Ferrand, the libidinous tyrant of N." In i. 1, Violeto speaks of him as "this Arragonian tyrant," and says that he "seized on the government." Ferdinand I, the natural son of Alphonso of Arragon, and a man of great cruelty, is intended. He reigned from 1458 to 1494, and though cordially hated by his people, did much for N. He established printing there, and introduced the manufacture of silk. He built the Castel del Carmine and the beautiful Porta Capuana, and erected a lighthouse on the Molo. The scene of B. & F. Wife is also laid in N. The K. is Alphonso, but his throne has been usurped by his "unnatural and libidinous brother, Frederick." Alphonso retires to a monastery, but is ultimately restored to his kingdom. There is nothing historical in this; but, as Sir Adolphus Ward suggests, the idea may have been suggested by the imprisonment of Alphonso of Leon by his brother Sancho of Castile in the 11th cent. and his ultimate restoration. Massinger's Guardian is laid partly in N.; the K. is Alphonso, but there is nothing to show whether Alphonso I or II is meant, unless, indeed, an allusion to the Indies may be taken as more consistent with the later of the 2 monarchs, who died in 1495. The scene of Webster's Law Case is laid in N. in the time of Philip II of Spain. 3 of Shirley's plays have their scene in N.: The Young Admiral, The Royal Master, and The Two Gentlemen of Italy. In Gascoigne's Supposes i. 4, presents are taken from D. Hercules of Ferrara to the K. of N. As Hercules II was D. from 1508 to 1559, the Emperor Charles V was the K. of N. intended. In Barnes' Charter (the date of the action in which is 1494-1503) i. 1, Sforza proclaims Charles VIII of France "Undoubted heir unto the crown of N. By lawful right of the great house of Anjou"; and in ii. 1, Guicchiardine says "The D. of Orleans, Lewis XII, conjointly knitting forces, Doth march in arms with Ferdinand of Spain: These regain N. and divide that realm." This was in 1494, but their hold of N. did not last long. Ferdinand II returned from Ischia, whither he had fled, and soon recovered his throne. In Greene's Alphonsus there is a Belinus, K. of N., and the action takes place there. Alphonsus probably is intended for Alphonsus V of Arragon; but Belinus is an entirely imaginary person. In Swetnam, one of the characters is an imaginary Lisandro, Prince of N. The scene of Dekker's If it be is laid at N. during the reign of Alphonso, but he is merely a generalized figure. In T. Heywood's Maidenhead, we are told in Act i. that Milan has captured N. after a siege of 9 months. This is unhistorical altogether. In May's Heir iv. 2, Euphues boasts that his ancestors "have been props of the Sicilian crown 'Gainst the hot French and Nns."

The Nns. had a bad reputation as poisoners and inventors of various methods for secret assassination. In Marlowe's Ed. II v. 4, Lightfoot says, "I learned in N. how to poison flowers; To strangle with a lawn thrust down the throat; To pierce the windpipe with a needle's point; Or, whilst one is asleep, to take a quill And blow a little powder in his ears; Or open his mouth and pour quicksilver down." Nash, in Wilton 142, says, "The Nn. carrieth the bloodiest wreakful mind, and is the most secret fleeing murderer. Wherefore it is grown to a common proverb, 'I'll give him the Nn. shrug' when one means to play the villain and makes no boast of it." Dekker, in Hornbook ii., says, "Who knows not that the Nn. will embrace you with one arm and rip your guts with the other? There's not a hair in his mustachio but, if he kiss you, will stab you through the cheeks like a poinard." In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 1, 178, Lorenzo says, "Julius Lentulus, A most renowned Nn., Gave me this box of poison."

The Nns. speak with a very marked nasal twang. In Oth. iii. 1, 4, the Clown says to the musicians, "Have your instruments been in N. that they speak i' the nose?" Some commentators see a reference to the Nn. Punchinello; others think there is an allusion to the loss of the nose, which is a common effect of the Nn. disease (syphilis).

Nn. horses were highly esteemed. Moryson, Itinerary iii. 133, speaks of "English coursers bred of the Nn. horses and English mares." In Merch. i. 2, 42, Portia says of the Nn. prince: "That's a colt indeed; for he doth nothing but talk of his horse"; and in 63, she says that the French lord "hath a horse better than the Nn.'s." In Chapman's D'Olive iii. 2, D'Olive satirizes "the travelling humour; as if an ass for going to Paris could come home a courser of N." In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Antonio says, "I have horses Of the best breed in N., fitter far To break a rank than crack a lance; and are, in their career, of such incredible swiftness They outstrip swallows." In B. & F. Friends iii. 2, Sir Pergamus boasts, "In that career, Ere I could stay my Nn. steed, [I] Unhorsed some 15 more." In their Fair Maid i. i. 1, Mentivole asks, "Is the Nn. horse the Viceroy sent you In a fit plight to run?" In Peele's Polyhymnia 152, Carey is "On mighty horse of N. mounted fair." Gervase, in English Horseman (1617), says, "Next to the English horse I place the courser of N., which is a horse of a strong and comely fashion, of great goodness, loving disposition, and an infinite courageousness."

Syphilis is called the Nn. disease. It is said to have made its first appearance in Europe at N. about 1494. In Troil. ii. 3, 20, the Qq. read: "After this, the vengeance on the whole camp! or rather, the Nn. bone-ache; for that, methinks, is the curse dependent on those that war for a placket." In Davenport's Nightcap iv. 1, Morro asks of Abstemia: "Came this nice piece from N., with a pox to her?" and Timpania answers, "And she has not Neapolitanized him, I'll be flayed for it." In Ford's Sacrifice iv. 1, D'Avolo advises Manruccio to "pass to N. and set up a house of carnality; you need not fear the contagion of any pestilent disease, for the worst is very proper to the place." In Milkmaids iv. 1, Ferdinand says, "The Nn. canker has searched into his bones, and he lies buried in ulcers." In T. Heywood's Captives v. 3, Mildew prays, "May the disease of N. take both the judge and the jurors." In Alimony i. 3, Haxter says, "I got a snap from a Nn. ferret." In Shirley's Admiral ii. 1, Cesario prays, "All the diseases N. ever groaned with overtake Vittori!" In Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, Sconce says, "If I should obtain the Nn. beneath [f boneache], a crick i' the back, or so, from her, 'twould be but a scurvy touch." In Cartwright's Ordinary i. 3, Hearsay says, "Refined People feel N. in their bodies; and An ache in the bones at 16 passeth now For high descent." Fuller, Holy and Profane State (1642) v. 1, calls it "That disease, unknown to antiquity, created within some hundreds of years, which took the name from N."

The Manufactures of Naples. N. was famous for its manufactures of silk, velvet, a kind of cotton velvet known as fustian-in-n.—corrupted into fustianapes, anapes, and even apes—hats, biscuits, and armour. In Pleadings in the Case of Rastell v. Walton (1530), one of the theatrical garments in question was "paned and guarded with gold skins and fustians of N. black." Greene, in Quip, p. 219, speaks of a pair of velvet breeches with panes "made of the chiefest Neapolitane stuff." Laneham, in his Letter (1575), describes a doublet with "a welt toward the hand of fustian anapes." In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater speaks of the Nns. as "a soft kind of people and clothed in silk." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Frangipan says, "Our ladies seek supply [of silk] from N." In B. & F. Woman Hater iv. 2, the Pander says, "These stockings are of N., they are silk." In their Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubus mentions "the N. hat" amongst the clothes that a man of fashion should wear. The passage is plagiarized from Jonson's New Inn ii. 2. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 1, Trapolin says of his hat: "I think some N. devil made it, 'tis so high-crowned; one that saw me in this would rather think me a fool than a Duke." In Chaunticleers x., Budget says, "I'll mend her with sugar nails and a N.-biscuit hammer," i.e. a hammer made of N. biscuit. N. Biscuits were sold at 2/6 a pound in Lond. In the Accounts of the Carpenters' Company of London, Aug. 2nd, 1644, it is ordered that this year there shall be no election-dinner, "but only wine and N. biscuits."

The Beauty of the City. In B. & F. Double Mar. i. 1, Violet says, "N., the Paradise of Italy, As that is of the earth; N., that was The sweet retreat of all the worthiest Romans; This flourishing kingdom, whose inhabitants, For wealth and bravery, lived like petty kings." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faustus tells of his visit to "N., rich Campania, Whose buildings fair and gorgeous to the eye, The streets straight forth, and paved with finest brick, Quarter the town in 4 equivalents. There saw we learned Maro's golden tomb, The way he cut, an English mile in length, Thorough a rock of stone in one night's space." The Via di Roma, or Toledo, running North and S., and the Strada San. Trinita crossing it, divide the old city into 4 quarters: they are paved with basalt. Vergil's tomb stands at the N. end of the tunnel through the promontory of Posillipo, which was probably constructed by Agrippa in 27 B.C. It is 2244 ft. long—not an English mile. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio characterizes it as "Sweet N., plenteous in ability."

General References. In Temp. i. 2, 161, Gonzalo is called a Neapolitan. In Shr. i. 1, 210, Lucentio proposes to disguise himself as "some Florentine, some Neapolitan, Or meaner man of Pisa." In Webster's Malfi v. 1 and 2, we learn that Antonio owned the "citadel of St. Bennet at N." According to one form of the legend, Danae drifted in her chest to Naples, where she married K. Pellonus, or Pelonnus, and became Queen. In T. Heywood's Gold. Age v., Arges reports of Danae: "As far as N. The friendly winds her mastless boat transports, There she's presented to K. Pelonnus, Who, ravished with her beauty, crowns her Q." Perseus refers to the same legend in the S. Age i. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 2, Brainworm, in the disguise of an old soldier, pretends: "I have been at Marseilles, N., and the Adriatic Gulf, a gentleman slave in the galleys," sc. as a prisoner of war. Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit (1578), p. 11 (Croll), speaks of N. as "a place of more pleasure than profit, and yet of more profit than piety."

In Massinger's Very Woman i. 1, Cardenes says, "They wrong the Nns. . . . That say they are fiery spirits, uncapable Of the least injury, dangerous to be talked with After a loss." In Jonson's Cynthia v. 2, the Perfumer says, "I assure you, Sir, pure benjamin [i.e. benzoin, frankincense], the only spirited scent that ever awaked a Nn. nostril." In Massinger's Guardian i. 1, Durazzo says of "the wise men of N.": "To me they are hide-bounded money-mongers." In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi speaks of one "Armed in a mailly Briggandie [brigandine] of N." In Webster's Malfi iii. 2, the Duchess says, "My brother stood engaged with me for money Ta'en up of certain Nn. Jews."

NARBONNE. The ancient capital of Gallia Narbonensis, and one of the oldest cities in France. It stands near the W. shore of the Gulf of Lyons, abt. 380 m. S. of Paris in the ancient province of Roussillon. In All's i. 1, 31, 43; ii. 1, 104, we are told that the father of Helena was Gerard de N., who has been a great physician. Shakespeare took both the name of Gerard and the story of the play from Boccaccio (Decam. iii. 9).

NARRE, or NERA. R. in Italy, rising in the Apennines and flowing through Terni, where it forms the famous Cascade delle Marmore, to the Tiber, which it joins a little below Orte. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander bestows on Cesar Borgia the provinces "Within the river N. and fruitful Arno."

NARROW SEAS. The seas between England and the continent of Europe and between England and Ireland—the English Channel and St. George's Channel—but most often of the former, especially the part surrounding the coasts of Kent. In Merch. ii. 8, 28, Salario tells the report that "in the n. s. that part The French and English, there miscarried A vessel of our country"; and in iii. 1, 3, he says, "Antonio hath a ship of rich lading wrecked on the n. s.: the Goodywings, I think they call the place." In H5 ii., Chor. 38, the speaker promises the audience "To France shall we convey you safe, And bring you back, charming the n. s. To give you gentle pass." In H6 C. i. 1, 239, Margaret says, "Stern Falconbridge commands the n. s." In iv. 8, 3, Warwick announces: "Edward from Belgia Hath passed in safety through the n. s." In Webster's Weakest ii. 3, Lodowick, in Flanders, says, "I will cross the n. s., for England." In Peele's Alcazar ii., Sebastian says of England: "The south the narrow Britain sea begirts." In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano quotes an Italian proverb: "If there were a bridge over the n. s., all the women in Italy would fly over into England." Nash, in Lenten, p. 294, talks of K. Edgar scouring "the n. s." Cowley's Cutter, Prol., calls Charles I "The sovereign of these n. s. of wit."

NATOLIA, or ANATOLIA (= ASIA MINOR). So called as being E. of Greece. In Turkish usage it is limited to the Pashalic which occupied the W. half of the peninsula, and its capital Kutaya, 200 m. North-E. of Smyrna. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes, K. of N., says, "Now have we marched from fair N. 200 leagues and on Danubius' banks Rest." In iii. 1, Orcanes crowns Callapine "Emperor of N." In iii. 5, the messenger announces that Tamburlaine "means to girt N.'s walls with siege, Fire the town, and overrun the land." In Selimus iii. 3, Acomat says, "March to N., there will we begin Our massacres." He subsequently takes N. and slays Mahomet and his wife, Zonara. This was about 1513. In Death Huntingdon i. 2, the Prior says, "A pint of this ransomed the Sophy's son When he was taken in N." In Massinger's Renegado iii. 3, Asambeg says, "The Basha of N. and myself Were rivals for her," i.e. Donusa.

NAVARRÉ. A small kingdom lying on both sides of the Pyrenees: the Spanish part lies between the Pyrenees on the North, Aragon on the E., and Leon on the W., with Pampeluna for its capital; the French part around the valley of the Adour, with Pau for its capital. The kingdom was founded in the 8th cent. A.D. by Garcia Ximenes, who successfully resisted the Moors and maintained the independence of N. The Spanish portion of it was annexed by Ferdinand of Spain in 1512, the French part alone being left in the hands of K. John d'Albret and his queen, Katharine. Their great-grandson was the well-known Henri of N., who became K. of France in 1589 and added his kingdom to her dominions.

The scene of L. L. L. is laid in the park of the K. of N. The only indication of the date of the play is given in ii. 1, 129, where the K. says to the Princess of France, "Madam, your father here doth intimate The payment of 100,000 crowns, Being but the one half of an entire sum Disbursed by my father in his wars." Monstrelet, in his Chronicles, says, "Charles, k. of N., came to Paris to wait on the k. He negotiated so successfully with the K. and Privy Council that he obtained a gift of the castle of Nemours, with some of its dependent castle-wicks, which territory was made a duchy. He instantly did homage for it, and at the same time surrendered to the K. the castle of Cherburgh, the county of Evreux, and all other lordships he possessed within the kingdom of France, renouncing all claims or profits in them to the K. and to his successors, on condition that with the duchy of Nemours the K. of France engaged to pay him 200,000 gold crowns of the coin of the K. our Lord." (Translation by Thomas Johnes [1819], Vol. I, p. 108.) The French K. is decrepit, sick, and bedrid, and his daughter has come to treat about the surrender of Aquitaine. There is no history in the play, but if the K. of N. is to be identified at all he must be Charles III, the son of Charles II, who reigned from 1386 to 1425.

The K. of N. is one of the characters in Chivalry, the supposed date of which is about 1260: in that case the K. would be Theobald II. The scene of Shirley's Cardinal is laid in the capital of N., and there is a war going on between N. and Aragon. The reference is probably to the conquest of the Spanish portion of N. by Ferdinand of Aragon in 1512. In Webster's Weakest i. 2, a messenger announces: "The power of Spain has passed the Pyren Hills . . . N. is sacked." The supposed date is during the reign of Louis IX, about 1245, but the statement is not historically correct. Henri of N., afterwards Henri IV of France, is one of the leading characters in Marlowe's Massacre. In i. 1, Guise says, "Ay, but N.—'tis but a nook of France, Sufficient yet for such a petty k., That with a rabblement of his heretics Blinds Europe's eyes and troubleth our estate." In Barnes' Charter v. 5, the chorus announces that Cæsar Borgia "Escaped into the kingdom of N., Where, in an ambush at Viano slain, Just Nemesis repaid his treachery." This was on March 12th, 1507.

NAXOS. The largest island of the Cyclades, lying in the Ægean, abt. 100 m. due W. of Halicarnassus and 130 E. of the nearest point of the Peloponnesus. It is now called Capo di Schiso. It was here that Ariadne was deserted by Theseus and saved by Bacchus, to whom the island, which produces much excellent wine, is sacred. In Wilson's Pedler 790, the Pedler says, "When Bacchus was disposed to sail unto Naxion, the mariners promised to bring him thither." The reference is to the story told by Ovid that Dionysus (Bacchus), having hired a ship from some Tyrrhenian pirates to convey him from Icaria to N., they tried to pass by the island and take him to Asia to sell him there; whereupon he drove them all mad and they jumped into the sea. Beaumont, in Salmacis, speaks of Bacchus going "To N., where his house and temple stands." In Barnes' Charter i. 5, Lucretia would rather dwell "in N. where no noise is heard But Neptune's rage" than in Rome. Lodge, in Answer to Gosson, p. 8, says, "It is reported . . . that the beasts of Naxus have distentum fel."

NAZARETH (now AL-NASIRA). A town in Galilee, North of the plain of Esdraelon, abt. 65 m. North of Jerusalem. It was the home of Joseph and Mary, and here our Lord spent his infancy and youth. The house in which he lived was said to have been transported by angels to Loretto, where it now stands in the cathedral. In 1271 Prince Edward of England besieged and took it in the 9th crusade, and massacred all the inhabitants. In York M. P. xii. 136, the prologue says, "Fro God in heaven is sent . . . An Angel is named Gabriell To N. in Galale, Where then a maiden mild gon dwell That with Joseph should wedded be." Milton, P. R. i. 23, says, "with them came From N. the son of Joseph deemed To the flood Jordan." In ii. 79, Mary says, "in N. Hath been our dwelling many years." In Bale's Baptyste, Jesus says he has come "From N. this hour, a city of Galyle." In Merch. i. 3, 35, Shylock refuses to dine with Bassanio, because he would have "to smell pork; to eat of the habitation which your prophet the Nazarite conjured the devil into" (see Matthew viii. 28-34). In Peele's Ed. I v. 24, the K. says, "Sitting before the gates of N. My horse's hoofs I stained in pagan gore."

NEAPOLITAN. See NAPLES.

NEAT HOUSE. Properly a cow-shed, but applied specially to the site of some old cow-sheds in Chelsea on the banks of the Thames, W. of Vauxhall Bdge., which were converted into market gardens for the sale of "asparagus, artichokes, cauliflowers, muskmelons, and the like useful things" (Strype). In Massinger's Madam iii. 1, Shavem complains: "The neathouse for muskmelons and the gardens Where we traffic for asparagus, are, to me, In the other world."

NEBO. One of the peaks in the mtns. of Abarim in the North of the land of Moab, abt. 10 m. E. of the North-East end of the Dead Sea. It was from this point that Moses was permitted to view the Promised Land before his death. Milton, P. L. i. 407, says that Chemos was worshipped "From Aroer to Nebo and the wild Of southmost Abarim."

NECKAR. A river in Germany, rising in Württemberg and flowing into the Rhine at Mannheim. In the lower part of its course it runs through a famous wine-producing district. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein v. 2, Newman says, "This Neckar wine hath a strange virtue in't."

NECOSIA (probably = NICOSIA). The capital of Cyprus, in the centre of the island, on the Pedia. In Davenport's Platonic iv. 4, Fredaline says, "I caused him sign this grant, The Provostship of Necosia, newly void."

NEGRO. A member of the African race, especially the part of it inhabiting the W. coast around Sierra Leone. The word was also applied to the Moors of North Africa, though they are in the main of Semitic race, and have not the woolly hair, thick lips, flat nose, and black skin that characterize the true n. The Nes. are represented as being of degraded character and licentious disposition. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles reports: "By the coast of Byather [Biafra] at last I came to Cubar, where the nes. dwell." In Lady Mother iii. 2, Thurston says, "I'll confer my fancy on a N." In Fair Women ii. 250, Browne says, "Let me be Held no more worthy to obtain her bed Than a foul n. to embrace a Queen." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Volpone, enumerating the different types of women, speaks of "Some quick N., or cold Russian." In Middleton's R. G. i. 1, Sir Alexander says of his graceless son: "I wash a n., Losing both pains and cost."

In Merch. iii. 5, 42, N. is synonymous with Moor: Lorenzo says to Launcelot, "I shall answer that better than you can the getting up of the n.'s belly; the Moor is with child by you." In Peele's Alcazar iii., Zareo exhorts Abdilmelec to "chastise this ambitious N. Moor." In Brome's Moor iii. 1, when Quicksands proposes that his wife should disguise herself as a Moor, she says, "Would you make a n. of me?" Dekker, in Bankroats Banquet (1613), calls the devil "the black k. of Neagers." In Mason's Mulleasses 731, Mulleasses compares Night to "a black N. in an ebon chair." In B. & F. Sea Voyage iii. 1, Tibalt speaks of "pearls, for which the slavish n. dives To the bottom of the sea." N. is also used for an American Indian. Fuller, Holy State (1642) ii. 22, tells how Drake "received intelligence from the Nes., called Symerons, of gold and silver which was to be brought from Panama."

NEMEA. A valley in Argolis in ancient Greece, 14 m. north of Argos. The first labour of Hercules was the killing of the Nn. lion, a fearsome beast, the offspring of Typhon and Echidna. Finding that his club and arrows were useless, the hero strangled the lion with his bare hands and carried off its skin, which he afterwards wore. In L. L. L. iv. 1, 90, Boyet, having read Armado's love-letter to Jaquenetta, says, "Thus dost thou hear the Nn. lion roar 'Gainst thee, thou lamb, that standest as his prey." In Ham. i. 4, 83, Hamlet says, "My fate cries out And makes each petty artery in this body As hardy as the Nn. lion's nerve." In Val. Welsh. ii. 2, Bardh says, "Gederus Fights like a Nn. lion." In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 3, Cæsar justifies his coming to Cleopatra by urging "Great Alcides when he did return From Nn. victories reposed himself In Deianira's arms." In T. Heywood's S. Age iii., the slaying of the Nn. lion by Hercules is described: "And the Nn. terror naked lies." The word is usually pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, though the Gk. is Nemeios. In Tiberius 1504, Tiberius says, "Nemia never saw a lioness Was half so furious as is Julia." In Sampson's Vow. iv. 1, 35, Clifton says, "From his sides, like Libian Hercules, I tore the rough Nn. lion's skin." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 5, 31, tells how Alcides "In Nemus gained goodly victory." The constellation Leo was supposed to be the Nn. Lion transferred to the Zodiac. In Mason's Mulleasses 765, the hero says, "Twice hath the Nn. Lion breathed forth fire . . . since the time I came to Florence," i.e. 2 years have passed. See under ARCADIAN.

NEMOURS. A town in France on the Loire, 40 m. S. of Paris. The ruins of the old ducal castle are still to be seen. The D. of N. is one of the characters in Massinger's Parl. Love, the supposed date of which is during the reign of Charles VIII of France, after 1494.

NEPTOLIS. Some ancient river is intended, but I suspect a misprint. Possibly we should read "Niphatis." Niphates was properly the name of the part of the Taurus range E. of Commagene, but it was used by the Roman poets as the name of a river (see Juvenal, Sat. vi. 409). The name "snowy river" suggests cold. In Marston's Insatiate v. 1, Sago says, "Although N. cold should flow through these guilty hands, yet the sanguinolent stain would extant be."

NERO'S FEN. A marsh near the city of Artaxata in Armenia, on the Araxes. The city was destroyed by Corbulo A.D. 58, and rebuilt under the name of Neronia by Tiridates, to whom Nero had given the kingdom of Armenia. Baiazet had many wars with Aladeules of Armenia, and Selim finally defeated and slew him. In Selimus 147, Baiazet says, "The vipers in great Nero's Fen Eat up the belly that first nourished them." There is doubtless a reference to Nero's murder of his mother Agrippina.

NERVII. A tribe in Gallia Belgica who inhabited the dist. round what is now Cambrai. In 57 B.C. Cæsar attacked them on the banks of the Sambre, and after a strenuous fight conquered and nearly destroyed them. In J. C. iii. 2, 177, Antony says of the robe in which Cæsar had been murdered: "I remember The first time ever Cæsar put it on; 'Twas on a summer's evening, in his tent, That day he overcame the N."

NETHERLANDS (= LOW COUNTRIES, FLANDERS). The modern Holland and Belgium. Fuller, Holy State (1642) ii. 19, says that the Netherlands stand "in daily fear of a double deluge—of the sea and the Spaniard . . . They have wonderfully improved all making of manufactures, stuffs, clocks, watches." In Err. iii. 2, 142, Antipholus, inquiring into the geography of Dromio's kitchen-vestal, asks, "Where stood Belgia, the N.?"—"Oh, Sir," says the modest Dromio, "I did not look so low." In Dekker's Northward iv. 2, Jenkin speaks of "all the Low Countries in Christendom, as Holland, and Zealand, and Netherland, and Cleveland too." In Larum B. 3, Hauury says, "Their private avarice [of the Antwerpers] will pull . . . destruction of this town To the disgrace of all the N." In Brome's M. Beggars i. 1, one of the Beggars says of another: "He has borne the name of a Netherland soldier till he ran away from his colours." Jonson certainly, and Chapman probably, served in the N. against the Spaniard. In Ed. III iii. 1, K. John of France says, "To think what friends K. Edward hath retained In Netherland among those frothy Dutchmen Doth aggravate mine ire." It is used, like Low Countries, for the lower part of the body. In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Romelio talks of a woman "with a spangled copper fringe at her n." See also LOW COUNTRIES, HOLLAND, BELGIUM, FLANDERS, DUTCHMAN.

NETTLETON'S ORDINARY. An eating-house in Lond. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Gregory says to Cunningham, "I have been seeking for you i' the bowling green; Enquired at Nettleton's and Anthony's ordinary."

NEWBURY. A town in Berks. on the S. bank of the Kennet. It was noted for its woollen manufactures. It was the scene of 2 battles in the Civil War, in 1643 and 1644. It was the home of John Winchcomb, the hero of Deloney's Newberie. In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Cutter says to Worm, "You said you had served stoutly in my regiment at Newbury." In Middleton's Mad World iv. 4, Sir Bounteous, after Folly-wit, in the disguise of a Courtezan, has stolen his jewels, says, "I have seen the same case tried at N. the last 'size.'"

NEW CARTHAGE (= CARTHAGO NOVA, NOW CARTHAGENA, q.v.). A fine spt. near the S. extremity of the E. coast of Spain. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 5, a messenger brings word (a little earlier than the fact warrants): "New Carthage, Sagunt; Locris; Terracon; All these are re-o'ercome by Scipio." See also under CARTHAGENA.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE. The county town of Northumberland, on the Tyne, 8 m. from its mouth. It was destroyed by William the Conqueror, and in 1080 a new castle was built by Robert, his son. Hence the name of the city. The present castle was erected on the same site by Henry II about 1172, and was the strongest fortress in the north. Its keep still remains. Around it are the great coalfields of Northumberland. Lond. began to import this sea-coal, as it was called to distinguish it from charcoal, about the end of the 14th cent.: it was at first used only for manufacturing purposes, and there was much opposition to it on the ground of its smoke. In Sampson's Vow. ii. 4, 158, Boote says, "Thy husband . . . this morn journeys to N." In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Warwick, on receiving the news of the capture of Mortimer by the Scots, says, "My lord of Pembroke and myself Will to N. here and gather head." This scene is laid at Tynemouth, where the king and Gaveston were in 1312. N. was the natural rendezvous of troops in the wars against Scotland. In Ed. III i. 1, Mountague brings word that "Barwick is won, N. spoiled and lost." This was in 1333. In Friar iv., Miles sings the northern ballad, "Cam'st thou not from N.?" In Eastward i. 2, Girtred begs: "Take me out of this miserable city! Carry me out of the scent of N. coal and the hearing of Bow-bell." In Shirley's Wedding ii. 3, Lodam reports: "There were four-and-twenty colliers cast away coming from N.; 'tis cold news." In his Ball iv. 3, Lucina says that the faults of women are discussed only "when the phlegmatic Dutch have ta'en no fisher-boats, and our coal-ships land safe at N." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 259, Tawnie complains that "your mask, silk-lace, washed gloves, carnation girdles, and busk-point suitable are as common as coals from N." Dekker, in Seven Sins, mentions, as part of the legion of sharpers, "the 2 degrees of colliers, viz. those of charcoals and those of N." In News from Hell, he says that Hell "lies lower than the coalpits of N." In Sharpham's Fleire iii. 156, Fleire says, "She's a wise woman that will go as far as new Castle to search the depth of a coal-pit for your truth." The sub-plot of Brewer's Lovesick King is the story of Roger Thornton, who was Mayor of N. in 1400. The play was evidently written for production in N., and contains many local references. In ii., we hear of one Randolph, who is "a famous merchant for N. coals." In the same scene Goodgift's wife talks of "one of those plays of Interludes that dwells at N."; and Thornton says, "O Monday! I shall love Monday's vein to poetize as long as I live"; the reference being to Anthony Munday, the playwright. In iii. 1, Grim says, "N. coals shall conquer Croydon." In v. 1, Alured says, "Thornton, as the first, We here create Mayor of N." A single play from the Mystery Cycle of N. has been preserved.

NEW COLLEGE. University of Oxford, founded by William of Wykeham in 1386. It stands on the S. side of Holywell St. at the back of Queen's and All Souls. Dramatic representations were given there from an early date, for in the statutes (1400) provision is made for the election of a boy-bishop and the carrying out of the ceremonies connected with his office on the days of the Holy Innocents and St. Nicholas.

NEW ENGLAND. The name given in 1616 by Capt. John Smith to the dist. which now includes the 6 north-eastern states in the United States of America. The territory had been granted to the Plymouth Company in 1606 under the name of North Virginia. The Mayflower sailed with the Pilgrim Fathers in 1620, and between that date and 1640 20,000 Puritans had emigrated thither to escape the persecution of Laud; so that, as Trevelyan says, "Laud was the founder of Anglo-Saxon supremacy in the New World." In 1635 a Proclamation was put forth prohibiting further emigration, and it is said that both Hampden and Cromwell would have gone to N. E. but for this. The playwrights, who hated the Puritans, satirized the emigrants, and gave circulation to rumours of their immorality and poverty in their new home. In Cartwright's Ordinary (1634) v. 5, Slicer, a rogue and swindler, says to his companions, "There is no longer tarrying here; let's resolve for N. E.," and they continue: "'Tis but getting a little pigeon-hole reformed ruff, forcing our beards into the orthodox bent, nosing a little treason 'gainst the king; bark something at the bishops; and we shall be easily received." They purpose to learn "a root or two of Hebrew" on the way, and conclude: "What Old England won't afford, N. E. will." In Mayne's Match ii. 2, Baneswright, finding that Mrs. Dorcas is a Puritan, says, "Had I known her mistress had so bred her, I would first have preferred her to N. E." In iv. 3, Aurelia says, "I do not mean to marry like ladies in N. E., where they couple with no more ceremony than birds." In Glaphorne's Wit v. 1, the watchman says that the Inquisition is a monster which "will swallow all the brethren in Amsterdam and in N. E. in a morsel."

In Brome's Antipodes iv. 8, Peregrine says, "What if I craved a counsel from N. E.?" The old will spare me none." In T. Heywood's Witches iii., Seely says, "You housewife, teach your daughter better manners; I'll ship you all for N. E. else." In Nabbes' Spring, when a company of beggars enter, Lent says, "These good fellows would get a better race under a hedge to people N. E. than the Separatists that possess it." In Cowley's Cutter iii. 1, Jolly says that when the bishops come back with the K. (Charles II) the Puritan widow Barebottle will "away to N. E." In Strode's Float. Isl. (1655) v. 11, Prudentius says, "Melancolico and Concupiscence Shall keep their State i' th' suburbs or n.-E." In the last passage, and in that from Witches, there seems to be an allusion to the transportation of convicts to the plantations, which was finally legalized in 1666, but which appears to have been practised at least 20 years earlier. See Bancroft, History of the United States i., pp. 174-176. See also Defoe's Moll Flanders.

NEWFOUNDLAND. An island off the E. coast of North America, at the mouth of the St. Lawrence river. It was discovered by John Cabot in 1497. The cod fisheries soon attracted a large number of European vessels, but it was not till 1583 that formal possession was taken of the island by Sir Humphrey Gilbert. Whitbourne's Discourse and Discovery of N. Trade (1622) called the attention of English emigrants to the island, but its progress was slow, and in 1650 there were only 350 families there. It was not till the end of the 18th cent. that its prosperity really began. Hycke, p. 88, says he has been "at Cape saynt Vincent and in the Newe Founde llonde." In Dekker's Satiromastix v. 2, 161, Sir Vaughan says, "I rejoyce very near as much as if I had discovered a New-found Land, or the North and E. Indies." In W. Rowley's New Wonder iv. 1, Speedwell says, "I am an adventurer still, Sir, to this new-found land." In Cartwright's Ordinary i. 4, Slicer, in his extravagant praise of the intelligence of the son of Credulous, says that he has in his mind a layer of "China counsels, covered with a lid of N. discoveries." Donne, Elegy xx. 27 (1614), apostrophizes his mistress: "Oh, my America, my N.!" Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 3, 134 (1605), mentions "new found land fish dried" as amongst the exports from England to France. The author of Discourse on Leather (1627) says, "We can live without . . . the whales of N."

NEWGATE. One of the gates of Old Lond., built in the reign of Henry I in consequence of the temporary blocking up of the thoroughfare to Ludgate by the rebuilding of St. Paul's. The Gate was used as a prison at least as early as 1200, and it continued to be the chief prison of Lond. all through its history. It was rebuilt and enlarged by Sir R. Whittington about 1425, and was further repaired in 1555 and 1628. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt in 1672, and was finally taken down in 1777. The Gate spanned N. St. a little E. of Old Bailey and Giltspur St., but there was an old Roman gate somewhat S. of it, the foundations of which were discovered in 1903 when the prison was pulled down. The Gate itself became quite insufficient for the proper accommodation of the prisoners as the city grew, and in 1770 the prison at the corner of N. St. and Old Bailey was built. It was pulled down in 1903 to make room for the new City Court. N. was used at first both for felons and debtors, though after 1815 it was employed for felons only. Those who were condemned to death were carted out to Tyburn for execution: the dismal procession passed by St. Sepulchre's ch., where a nosegay was given to the condemned man, up Giltspur St., across Smithfield to Cow Lane, and so to the bottom of Holborn Hill, or Heavy Hill, as it was nicknamed, and on to Tyburn.

In Chaucer's C. T. A. 4402, we are told that Perkyn Revelour, the London apprentice, was "sometime lad with revel to Newegate." In Hycke, p. 85, Imagynacioun says of himself and Hycke: "In N. we dwelled together; For he and I were both shacked in a fetter." Later, p. 103, Frewyll says humorously, "Once at N. I bought a pair of stirrups, A whole year I ware them so long, But they came not fully to my knee": of course, he refers to the fetters with which he was bound. Again, p. 108, Imagynacioun swears, "I was 10 year in N." In Bale's Johan 287, Sedition says, "Get they false witnesses, they force not of whence they be, Be they of N. or be they of the Marshalsea." In Poverty 335, Prosperity says to Peace, "Go! Out of my sight! or I shall lay thee fast in N." In Respublica v. 8, Avarice asks Insolence and Adulation: "Be there not honest men in N.?" In Youth (A. P. ii. 100), Riot says, "The Mayor of Lond. sent me forth of N. for to come for to preach at Tyburn," i.e. to be hanged. In J. Heywood's Gentleness, Pt. I, the Ploughman sarcastically says to the Knight and the Merchant, "Fare ye well, both, I dare say, as true As some that be tied in N." In W. Rowley's Wonder v., Stephen gives order to the keeper of Ludgate, "See your prisoners conveyed From Ludgate unto N. and the Counter." This was on 1 June, 1419, but so many of them died by reason of the foul atmosphere and the over-crowding that Ludgate was reopened as a prison on 2nd November and the prisoners taken back there. In Three Lords, Dods., vii. 488, Fraud says, "If any of my friends see me committed to N., I were utterly discredited."

The only Shakespearean reference is in H4 A. iii. 3, 104, where Falstaff asks: "Must we all march?" and Bardolph replies: "Yea, 2 and 2, N.-fashion." So, in Dekker's Satiro. iii. 1, 325, Tucca says, "Come, we'll walk arm in arm As though we were leading one another to N." In Fair Women ii. 1230, Browne says he has a brother who is kept "close prisoner now in N.": we learn from 1270 that he had committed "notorious felonies in Yorkshire." In Feverham ii. 1, Will says that his friend Fitten is "now in N. for stealing a horse." In Oldcastle ii. 2, Murley says, "N., up Holborne, St. Giles in the field, and to Tiborne; an old saw." In More i. 1, Williamson complains: "My Lord Mayor sent me to N. one day, because (against my will) I took the wall of a stranger"; and in ii. 3, the Messenger brings word: "The rebels have broke open N., From whence they have delivered many prisoners Both felons and notorious murderers." This was on May Day 1517, in the riots which were raised to expel foreigners from Lond. In Dekker's Edmonton iv. 1, Banks says, "Get a warrant first to examine her, then ship her to N.; here's enough to burn her for a witch." In Westward iii. 2, Monopoly threatens to so deal with the sergeants "that they should think it a shorter way between this [Shoreditch] and Ludgate than a condemned cut-purse thinks it between N. and Tyburn." Rosalind was thinking of this journey when, in As. iii. 2, 345, she tells how Time gallops with a thief to the gallows. In Middleton's Chaste Maid ii. 2, the Promoter says of the butcher who has been killing in Lent: "This butcher shall kiss N." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 1, the K. says, "Let false Audley Be drawn upon an hurdle from the N. To Tower-hill; there let him lose his head." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Wittypate says of Gregory: "He was even brought to Justice Aurum's threshold; there had flown forth a mittimus straight for N." In Ret. Pernass. iii. 5, Studioso says, "Yonder are pursuivants out for the French doctor, and a lodging bespoken for him and his man in N." In a song appended to T. Heywood's Lucrece, entitled The Cries of Rome, the 2nd verse runs: "Bread-and-meat-bread-and-meat, For the tender mercy of God To the poor prisoners of N., Four-score and ten-poor-prisoners." The debtors in prison were allowed to appeal in this way to the passers-by. In Field's Weathercock v. 2, Sir John Worldly, when Pouts is apparently convicted of murder, cries: "To N. with him!" In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Moll speaks of a Justice "that speaks nothing but 'Make a mittimus, away with him to N.!' " In Killigrew's Parson iii. 5, Jolly says, "They were taken and condemned, and suffered under a catholic sheriff, that afflicted them with a litany all the way from N. to the gallows." In iv. 2, Wild says, "Make his mittimus to the hole at N." Taylor, in Works i. 91, says, "The ocean that suretyship sails in is the spacious Marshalsea; sometimes she anchors at the King's Bench, sometimes at N. rd." Nash, in Pierce, says, "N. a common name for all prisons, as Homo is a common name for a man or a woman."

In Robin Goodfellow (1628), Grim says, "Sometimes I do affright many simple people, for which some have termed me the Black Dog of N." In Dekker's Edmonton iv. 1, Cuddy says of the Witch's dog: "Neither is this the Black Dog of N." The reference is to a tract by Luke Hatton called The Black Dog of N. Henslowe mentions a play by Hathway and others with the same title. Middleton, in Black Book, calls sergeants "black dogs of N." In Brome's Antipodes iii. 2, amongst other topsyturvydoms there, the poet tells how "12 hymns are sung by the quire of New-gate in the praise of City Clemency." Dekker, in Seven Sins, says that Shaving (i.e. swindling) came into the City through N., "because he knew N. held a number that, though they were false to all the world, would be true to him." In Fam. Vict., p. 330, when Prince Henry has been taken to the Counter for making a disturbance in East Cheap, the thief, who has been arrested for a highway robbery on Gadshill, says, "Let me go to the prison where my master is"; and John Cobler replies: "Nay, thou must go to the country prison, to N." The Counter was used for Lond. offenders, N. for those brought in from the country. In Shirley's Bird i. 1, the ladies are "committed to New-prison": the scene is Mantua, but I suppose the name was suggested by the Lond. N.

Vulgar and obscene language was called N.-terms. Nicholson, in Acolastus (1600) 15, says, "Naught but N. terms can store the tongue." In Puritan i. 3, Fraillie says of the drunken Corporal: "If the wind stood right, a man might smell him from the top of N. to the leads of Ludgate": abt. 220 yards.

The prisoners were called N.-birds. In Dekker's Edmonton iv. 2, Carter says, "Your trull shall to the gaol go with you; there be as fine N. birds as she that can draw him in." Dekker, in Jests ii. 343, says, "Our N.-bird, spreading his dragon-like wings, beheld a thousand sins." In Brome's Northern v. 8, Justice Squelch threatens the doctor, "I will translate you out of an Æsculapian cock into a N. bird."

Lady Alimony was "Printed by Tho. Vere and William Gilbertson and are to be sold at the Angel without New-gate." In Dekker's Satiromastix i. 2, 362, Tucca says to Horace, "Dost stare, my Sarsens-head at N. dost gloat?" See SARACEN'S HEAD.

NEWGATE-LANE. Lond. Probably N. St. is meant, which runs from the corner of Old Bailey, where N. Prison stood, to St. Martin's-le-Grand. In Lawyer i., Valentine laments that when he got back from his travels to Lond. he found his old friends in Bridewell and Bedlam and the Counters; "others walk N. L.," meaning that they are on their way to prison.

NEWGATE MARKET. Lond., on the site of the present Paternoster Sq., between N. St., Warwick St., Paternoster Row, and Ivy Lane. It was at first a meal market, but came to be a meat market. It was dismarked in 1869 and the site sold for £20,000. In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Quarolous tells how Zeal-of-the-land Busy "has Undone a grocer here in N.-m., That trusted him with currants." One of the taverns in the list in News Barthol. Fair is "Three Tuns, N. M." Armin, in Ninnies, tells a story of "a cobbler, next to Christ's Ch. gate in N. m." Barnes' Charter was "Printed by G. E. for John Wright and are to be sold at his shop in N.-m. near Christ ch. gate. 1607."

NEWHAVEN. A village in Scotland on the S. shore of the Firth of Forth, 2 m. north of Edinburgh. There is an excellent harbour at Granton, W. of the village. In Ed. III ii. 2, the K., being at Roxburgh Castle, says, "Thou, Prince of Wales, and Audley, straight to sea; Scour to N.; there some stay for me." Sir John Davies, in In Gerontem 10, represents the old man dating events from "The going to St. Quintin's and N." Probably the reference is to Winter's expedition to the Forth in 1560.

NEWINGTON. A suburb of Lond., formerly a separate vill. lying S. of Southwark, from St. George's to Camberwell. It was sometimes called N. Butts, from the butts for the practice of Archery which were erected there: the name is still retained by the st. running S. from the Elephant and Castle. The old parish ch. of St. Mary stood on the W. side of N. Butts, but was pulled down in 1876 to widen the road. Here Thomas Middleton was buried in 1627. His body was removed with hundreds of others when the church was pulled down, and interred with them in a vault specially constructed for the purpose. There was a Theatre here established about 1585 and pulled down about 1600, the site of which was probably on the S. side of the New Kent Road near the railway station, not far from where Spurgeon's Tabernacle was built. The vill. was a favourite place for afternoon jaunts by the citizens of Lond. In Oldcastle iii. 2, N. is mentioned by Acton as one of the places of rendezvous for the followers of Oldcastle. Harman, in his Caveat, tells of the pursuit of a crank who crossed the river and "crossed over the fields towards Newyngton." In B. & F. Pestle iv. 5, Ralph says, "March on and show your willing minds, by 20 and by 20, To Hogsdon or to N., where cakes and ale are plenty." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Careless professes his readiness to escort his aunt "any whither, to Islington, N., Paddington, Kensington, or any of the city out-leaps for a spirt and back again." Gosson, in School of Abuse, p. 37 (Arber), says of loose women: "They live a mile from the city like Venus, nuns in a cloister at N., Ratchiffe, Islington, Hogsdon, or some such place." In Field's Weathercock iii. 3, when Abraham perpetrates some fustian verses, Pendant cries: "O N. conceit!" i.e. idea worthy of the N. Theatre.

NEW ISLANDS. Probably the W. Indies are intended. In Shirley's Ct. Secret iv. 1, Pedro says, "Send me to the New Islands or Japan."

NEWKERK (= NIEUKIRK). A vill. in Rhenish Prussia, 20 m. North-west of Dusseldorf. In Webster's Weakest ii. 3, Bunch says, "I have but 20 stivers; that's all I have saved since I came here to Newkerk."

NEWMARKET. A town on the borders of Cambridgesh. and Suffolk, 56 m. north-east of Lond. The heath W. of the town was notorious for its highway robberies. It began to be used as a racecourse in the reign of James I, and is now one of the finest in the world. In J. Heywood's Four PP, p. 19, the Pardoner tells how he brought a woman from hell and "This woman thanked me chiefly That she was rid of this endless death, And so we departed on N. heth." In Ret. Pernass iii. 1, Sir Raderick asks Immerito, who is being examined for holy orders, "How many [miles] from N. to Grant-ham?" to which Immerito answers: "10, Sir." The actual distance is about 65: Immerito nevertheless passes. In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, Banasus says, "I have a rare device to set Dutch windmills upon N. Heath and Salisbury Plain to drain the fens."—To which Colax retorts: "The fens, Sir, are not there." In Thersites 222, Thersites says, "I will with a cushion stop her breath Till she have forgot N. Heath."

In Oldcastle i. 2, when Suffolk and Butler are each refusing money that is offered to them, Sir John, the reverend highwayman, says, "Were ye all 3 upon N. Heath, Sir John would quickly rid you of that care." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Sogliardo says of Shift: "He has been the only Bid-stand that ever kept N., Salisbury Plain, Hockley-i' the Hole, Gadshill." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 20, says of brokers: "Sometimes they are clerks of N. Heath, sometimes sheriffs of Salisbury Plain: they make many a man stand at Hockley-in-the-Hole." In T. Heywood's Maidenhead iii., the Clown speaks of "N. Heath that makes thieves rich." Nash, in Pierce A. 2, says, "I am vacuus viator and care not though I meet the commissioners of Newmarket-heath at high midnight." In Underwit iii. 3, Engine asks, "Does the race hold at N. for the cup?" In Shirley's Hyde Park iv. 3, Venture sings of "Bay Tarrall that won the cup at N."

NEWNHAM. Vill. 1 or 2 miles S. of Bedford, close to Elstow, where there was an abbey of monks of the Order of St. Austin. In Lawyer ii., Curfew masquerades as "the Abbot of Newnham"; and in iv. Vaster says, "Now the water's up that we cannot get over to the Abbey."

NEW PLACE. The house in Stratford-on-Avon bought by Shakespeare in 1597. It stood in Church St. and Chapel Lane, and was the finest house in the town. It had been built by Sir Hugh Clopton in 1485, but was in a state of disrepair. The poet renovated it and made it his home for the rest of his life. In his will he says, "I give unto my daughter Susanna Hall all that capital messuage called the New Place wherein I now dwell." It was demolished in 1759 by the Rev. Francis Gastrell, but the site was bought in 1861 for the Birthplace Trust, and is laid out as a garden.

NEWPORT (= NIEUPORT). A spt. in W. Flanders near the mouth of the Yser. It is strongly fortified and defended by seaward batteries. Here Count Maurice of Nassau defeated the Archduke Albert on 2nd July, 1600. In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 2, Sir Ruinous says, "I served in France, the Low Countries, lastly at that memorable skirmish at N., where the forward and bold Scot there spent his life so freely." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown, describing his travels in the Netherlands, says, "Much ado we had to find New-port." In Dekker's News from Hell, Charon says, "Bear with me till you hear of such another battle as was at N."; when he will get enough fares to enable him to pay his debt. In Armourers, he speaks of "that brave Roman tragedy acted in our time at the battle of Neuport." Hall, in Characters, describes the Vainglorious man as telling "what exploits he did at Cales or Nieuport."

NEW RIVER. An artificial river, originally nearly 40 m. long, projected by Sir Hugh Myddelton to supply Lond. with water, and completed by him after much delay and difficulty in 1613. It rose at Chadwell Springs in Herts., between Hertford and Ware, and drew further supplies from Amwell-Springs and the river Lea. It terminated at New River Head in Islington. Myddelton, who had spent all his fortune on the scheme, parted with his interest in it to the New River Company, which still holds it. Middleton's Triumphs of Truth was written for performance at the inauguration of the N. R. in 1613. In the title it is described as "the running stream from Amwell-Head unto the cistern at Islington, being the sole cost of Mr. Hugh Middleton of Lond." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Pompey says, "Direct him and his horses towards the N. R. by Islington: there shall they have me, looking upon the pipes and whistling." In v. 1, Pompey says, "I have been 7 miles in length along the N.-R.; I have seen a hundred sticklebags; 'twill ne'er be a true water." Later he says, "I will go walk by the N.-R.; if she sends, I shall be found angling." The play was produced in 1608-9; the work of constructing the N. R. was begun in 1608. In their Wit Money iv. 5, Valentine says, "You shall stay till I talk with you . . . Till waterworks and rumours of N. R. Ride you again, and run you into questions Who built the Thames." This play was produced in 1614. In Glapthorne's Holländer iv. 1, Sconce, after drinking, says, "I ha' made a N. R. in my belly and my guts are the pipes." In Scot. Presb. i. 2, Dipwell says, "Like to that river through which once Levites did bear the holy ark, N. R. flows."

NEW TROY. A name for Lond., derived from the legend which told how the Britons originally came from Troy after its capture by the Greeks (see TROYNOVANT). In Braithwaite's Barnabes Journal, we read: "7 hills there were in Rome, and so there be 7 sights in N. T." Peele, in Polyhymnia 161, speaks of Gresham, "That beautified N. T. with Royal Change."

NEW WELLS. There were many springs of mineralized water all round Lond., which were visited for the sake of drinking the waters and became fashionable resorts with the additional attractions of eating-houses, dancing-rooms, etc. These were called generically Wells: such were Bagnigge W., Sadler's W., Dulwich W., Sydenham W., Hampstead W., Islington W., White Conduit, and, a little further afield, Tunbridge W. and Epsom. Most of these were discovered and popularized in the 17th cent., and I have not been able to discover which is intended in the following passage: possibly Islington or Hampstead. In Jonson's New World, the Factor asks: "And they have [in the Moon] their N. W. too, and physical waters, I hope, to visit all time of year?"—To which the Herald replies: "Your Tunbridge or the Spaw itself are mere puddle to them."

NICHOLAS (SAINT) CLIFFS. The cliffs crowned by the ancient castle of St. N., built by the Knights of St. John to defend the E. harbour [the harbour of Gallies] of the city of Rhodes. In Davenant's Rhodes A. I., the Admiral says, "Behind St. Nic'las cliffs Shelter our brigants."

NICHOLAS (SAINT), NEWCASTLE. The principal ch., now the cathedral, in Newcastle-on-Tyne, built by Robert de Rhodes in the reign of Henry VI. It stands in St. N. Sq., a little North of the Castle: its noble tower 193 ft. high, with its open lantern, is the most striking feature in the city. Ben Jonson wrote a riddle on it. "My altitude high, my body four-square, My foot in the grave, my head in the air, My eyes in my side, 5 tongues in my womb, 13 heads upon my body, 4 images alone; I can direct you where the wind doth stay, And I tune God's precepts thrice a day. I am seen where I am not, I am heard where I is not; Tell me now what I am, and see that you miss not."

NICHOLAS (SAINT) SHAMBLES. A ch. in Lond. on the North side of Newgate St., near the Sh. The tradition of the Sh. was long preserved in Butcher Hall Lane, now K. Edward St., leading from Newgate St. to Little Britain. The ch. was pulled down at the Reformation, and the parish included in Christ Ch. In Wager's The Longer B. i., Moros says, "In S. Nicolas sh. there is enough [meat]." In Wise Men i. 1, Proberio says of Antonio's works: "We'll put them in print and set them up to be sold at the Hospital porch near St. Nicolas Sh." In Deloney's Reading vi., when the clothiers' wives came up to Lond. they viewed "at St. N. ch., the flesh sh." In Long Meg viii., Meg, being asked by a nobleman in the Strand where she was going, replies: "To S. N. sh. to buy calves' heads."

NICOPOLIS. A town in Bithynia on the shore of the Bosphorus, a little North of Chalcedon. In B. & F. Hum. Lieut. ii. 3, the maid says, "Thisbe! O, I have her; she lies now in N." But it is probable that the authors were thinking of one of the better-known Nicopolises: either the one in Cappadocia founded by Pompeius or that in Epirus erected by Augustus 31 B.C., though neither of these was in existence at the supposed date of the play, viz. the time immediately after the death of Alexander the Great.

NICOSIA. A town in Sicily, 65 m. S.E. of Palermo. In Brome's Concubine iii. 9, the K. says, "Come, my Alinda, I was calling you To our intended journey to Nicosia."

NIGER. A river in Africa, rising on the North side of the Kong Mtns., abt. 300 m. E. of Sierra Leone, and flowing first North-east and then S.E. into the Gulf of Guinea, abt. 150 m. W. of Old Calabar. Its length is abt. 2600 m. In Milton, P. L. xi. 402, Adam is shown all the kingdoms of Africa "from N. flood to Atlas mt." Donne, Funeral Elegy (1611) 41, says that the soul is affected by death "As the Afric N. stream enwombs Itself into the earth, and after comes . . . far greater than it was." Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 10, says that the Nile runs underground for some days' journey and emerges "at that spring which they call Nigris." Probably Donne was thinking of this Nigris, and not of the river N., unless, indeed, he confounded the two. N., "the Æthiops' river," is one of the characters in Jonson's Blackness.

NIGLINGTON. Named as the birthplace of one of the Gipsies in Jonson's Gipsies. He was "Born at Niglington, bred up at Filchington." To niggle meant to be over-elaborate (see N.E.D. s.v. 3, a). The names are obviously invented for the occasion.

NIGRA SYLVA. A dist. in the Russian province of Kherson, on the Bug, North of the Black Sea. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Theridamas says, "I crossed the sea [i.e. Black Sea] and came to Oblia [i.e. Olbia, at the mouth of the Bug] And N. S. where the devils dance." N. S. is also used for the Black Forest in Germany.

NILA. Probably a misprint for Nisa, which with a long "s" would look very like N. (see NYSA). In Mason's Mulleasses 1576, Timoclea speaks of "the vine-god's priests Running down N. or from Pindus' top." I think the Thracian Nysa is the one intended.

NILE (NILUS); Ns. = Nilus. The river which rises in Lake Victoria Nyanza in Central Africa and after a course of 3370 m. flows into the Mediterranean through Egypt: at its mouth it divides into a number of channels, usually reckoned as 7, which form the Delta. Little was known of its course beyond Meroe until comparatively recent times. Between Berber and Assouan the river forms a series of cataracts, 5 in number. Its most remarkable feature is its annual rising, by which Egypt is fertilized. The rise begins at Cairo about the end of June, attains its maximum about the end of September, and then gradually subsides until it reaches its minimum level about the end of March, leaving the land covered with a fertile mud or slime. A rise of 16 cubits was reckoned the best by the ancients, now from 24 to 27 ft. is counted the most serviceable: the height is registered on the Nilometer at Rodda in Cairo. It was generally believed that the slime left by the inundation produced serpents, rats, and other vermin spontaneously.

General References. In Brandon's Octavia 1329, Cæsar asks: "What angel queen rules these Nileian coasts?" i.e. Egypt. In Selinus 2342, Tonombey says to Acomat, "Great Tonombey hath left Egyptian Ns. and my father's court To aid thee." Tuman Bey became Sultan of Egypt in 1516. In Marston's Insatiate v. 1, Sago declares that though Ns. "should flow through these guilty hands . . . Yet the sanguinolent stain would extant be." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 2, Zenocrate says, "As looks the Sun through Ns.' flowing stream, So looks my lordly Love." Zenocrate was the daughter of the Soldan of Egypt, and had often seen the dazzling reflection of the sun in the waters of the overflowing N. In iv. 1, the Soldan cries: "You base Egyptians Lie slumbering on the flowery banks of N." In his Jew i. 1, Barabas speaks of Alexandria as "at the entry there into the sea Where Ns. pays his tribute to the main." Milton, P. L. i. 343, speaks of the plague of locusts called up by Moses, which "darkened all the land of N." In 413, he speaks of the march of the Israelites to Canaan "from N," i.e. Egypt. In iv. 283, Mt. Amara is said to be "under the Ethiop line By Ns.' head." In P. R. iv. 71, Meroe (q.v.) is called "Nilotic isle." In Nat. Ode 211, the Egyptian gods are called "The brutish gods of N."

The Cataracts of the Nile. In B. & F. Valentinian v. 4, Afranius says that the people are "in peace more raging Than the loud falls of N." In Massinger's Actor v. 1, the tribune says, "With less fury The waves rush down the cataracts of N." In Shirley's Fair One iii. 4, Fowler says, "I would rather take a nap . . . on the fall of deafening Ns. than endure the visitation of any of their tribe." In Daniel's Cleopatra v. 2, Chor., the Ns. is addressed, "Draw back thy waters' flow To thy concealed head; rocks, strangle up Thy waves; stop, Cataracts, thy fall." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 7, Memory says, "The Egyptian Catadupes never heard the roaring of the fall of Ns. because the noise was so familiar unto them." In Cockayne's Obstinate iv. 2, Falorus says, "I'd Be deafer than the people that inhabit Near the Egyptian cataracts of N." See CATADUPES.

The Inundation of the Nile. In Tit. iii. 1, 71, Titus says, "My grief was at the height before thou camest, But now, like Ns., it disdaineth bounds." In Ant. i. 2, 50, when Iras says of her own hand, "There's a palm presages chastity," Charmian replies sarcastically, "E'en as the o'erflowing Ns. presageth famine." In ii. 7, 29, Antony says, "They take the flow o' the N. by certain scales i' the pyramid: they know by the height, the lowness, or the mean, if dearth or foison follow; the higher Ns. swells, the more it promiseth." In B. & F. False One iii. 4, Ptolemy says to Cæsar, "We owe for all this wealth to the old Ns. . . . Within the wealthy womb of reverend Ns. All this is nourished." Davies, in Nosce, says, "We seek to know . . . the strange cause of the ebbs and floods of N." In Mason's Mulleasses 2244, Mulleasses says, "If thy warm blood . . . Desires with Nyle to rise above her banks, A carpet richer than the breast of Tempe . . . shall be spread."

The Spontaneous Productiveness of the Slime after the Inundation. In Ant. i. 3, 69, Antony swears "By the fire that quickens Ns.' slime, I go from hence thy soldier." In ii. 7, 30, Lepidus says, "Your serpent of Egypt is bred now of your mud by the operation of your sun; so is your crocodile." In Shirley's Traitor iv. 2, Sciarra says, "Oh, that my voice Could call a serpent from corrupted N.!" In Kyd's Cornelia iii., Cornelia prays: "Let fair Ns., wont to nurse your corn, Cover your land with toads and crocodiles." In B. & F. Maid's Trag. iv. 1, Evadne says, "I do present myself the foulest creature, Most poisonous, dangerous, and despised of men, Lerna e'er bred or Ns." Spenser, in F. Q. i. 1, 21, says of the Ns.: "Huge heaps of mud he leaves, wherein there breed 10,000 kinds of creatures, partly male And partly female, of his fruitful seed; Such ugly monstrous shapes elsewhere may no man reed." And again, in iii. 6, 8, "So after Ns.' inundation, Infinite shapes of creatures men do find Informed in the mud on which the sun hath shined." And in iv. 11, 20, "The fertile N., which creatures new doth frame," is in the river list. Linche, in Diella (1596) xxx. 4, says, "What strange and hideous monsters Ns. shows." W. Smith, in Chloris (1596) x. 2, asks, "Am I a Gorgon, that she me doth fly? Or was I hatched in the river N.?"

The Seven Mouths of the Nile. In Barnes' Charter iv. 5, Alexander calls asps "Cleopatra's birds Of 7-mouthed Ns." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar speaks of Pompey as "guarded with the unresisted power That Meroe or 7-mouthed N. can yield." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 3, Marsilius speaks of "7-fold Nylus." In B. & F. False One ii. 1, Cæsar says that Pompey's blood "Will weep unto the ocean for revenge Till Ns. raise his 7 heads and devour ye." In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar names amongst his conquests "The stony-hearted people that inhabit Where sevenfold Ns. doth disgorge itself." In Taming of a Shrew, Haz., p. 533, the Duke swears "By Merops head and by 7-mouthed N." Probably for Merops we should read Meroe's. See quotation above from Cæsar's Rev. Spenser, F. Q. i. 5, 18, speaks of "broad 7-mouthed N." In Milton, P. L. xii. 157, Michael predicts that the sons of Abraham will come "to a land hereafter called Egypt, divided by the river N.; See where it flows, disgorging at 7 mouths Into the sea."

The source of the Nile was not discovered till the 19th cent., and was considered an insoluble mystery. In Brewer's Lingua iii. 6, Anamnestes says, "When Phaeton ruled the sun, Ns. hid his head then—he could never find it since." In Tiberius 2931, Agrippina says, "First let the head of Ns. be revealed." Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603), iii. 5, says, "Nobility is . . . without birth, as the river Ns." The N. was represented in statues and paintings as an old and venerable man. In Marmion's Antiquary i. 1, Lionel says, "Could I appear with a face rugged as father Ns. is pictured on the hangings, there were hope he might look on me."

Egyptian Serpents, Crocodiles, Rats, Flies, etc. In Ant. i. 5, 25, Cleopatra imagines Antony murmuring: "Where's my serpent of old N.?" In ii. 5, 78, Cleopatra cries: "Melt Egypt into N. and kindly creatures Turn all to serpents!" In v. 2, 242, Cleopatra asks: "Hast thou the pretty worm of Ns. there, That kills and pains not?" and in 356, the Guard says, "These fig-leaves Have slime upon them, such as the aspic leaves Upon the caves of N." In Cym. iii. 4, 37, Pisanio says, "Tis slander, Whose tongue out-venoms all the worms of N." In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 4, Cæsar says of Pompey: "Well did the Cibill's unrespected verse Bid thee beware of crocadilish N." In Marston's Sophonisba iii. 1, Syphax says, "I'll trust her as our dogs drink dangerous N." The dogs were said to run along as they drank for fear of the crocodiles. In Webster's White Devil iv. 1, Flamineo tells a story of the bird that picks the teeth of "the crocodile which lives in the river Ns." In Lochrine iii., Prol. 2, Ate says, "High on a bank by Ns.' boisterous streams Fearfully sat the Egyptian crocodile." In Shirley's Traitor iii. 1, Rogero calls Depazzi "a viper, a rat of Ns.," and in his Love Tricks ii. 1, we read of "the rat of Ns. fiction."

Egypt is emphatically a land of flies: "the land of the buzzing of wings," as Isaiah calls it (xviii. 1). In Ant. iii. 13, 166, Cleopatra prays, if she be false, that she and all her Egyptians may "Lie graveless, till the flies and gnats of N. Have buried them for prey." In v. 2, 58, she says, "Rather on Ns. mud Lay me stark-naked and let the water-flies Blow me into abhorring." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, talks of "peaches by Ns. grown." The peach, however, is not indigenous to Egypt, but was brought to Europe from Persia and eastern Asia.

NIMMINGHAM (= NIJMEGEN, or NYMEGEN). A town in Holland in the province of Gelderland, 55 m. S.E. of Amsterdam on the left bank of the Waal. It was strongly fortified, and in 1590 successfully resisted an attack by Prince Maurice. In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "N. bid you look to your Skonce": the point being in the double meaning of sounce: (1) a fortification, and (2) a head. See also NUNWEGHEN.

NINEVEH. The ancient capital of the Assyrian Empire, lying on the E. bank of the Tigris, opposite the modern Mosul, abt. 500 m. North of the head of the Persian Gulf. It was destroyed in 608 B.C., and nothing remains of its former splendours but the mounds which cover its palaces, and which were explored by Layard and others during the 19th cent. N. was the scene of the preaching of Jonah after his ejection from the whale, as related in the book of Jonah. The scene of Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass is laid in N. at the time of Jonah's visit. A mythical K., Rasni, is described as "he that rules great N.," and the denunciation by the prophet of the sins of N. is applied to the corresponding offences of Lond. In Milton, P. R. iii. 275, the Tempter points out to our Lord "N., of length within her wall Several days' journey, built by Nines old."

Jonah's deliverance from the whale and his preaching at N. were the subject of a motion, or puppet-play, which enjoyed great popularity. In Jonson's Barthol. v. 1, Leatherhead says, "O the motions that I, Lanthorn Leatherhead, have given light to! Jerusalem was a stately thing, and so was N., and the city of Norwich, and Sodom and Gomorrah." In Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Sogliardo says, "There's a new motion of the city of N. with Jonas and the whale, to be seen at Fleet-bdge." In B. & F. Pestle iii. 2, after the citizen's wife has enumerated several popular shows, the citizen says, "Nay, by your leave, Nell, Ninivie was better." To which the lady replies: "Ninivie! oh, that was the story of Jone and the wall, was it not, George?" In Wit S.W. i. 1, when Sir Gregory enters, the Niece asks, "What motion's this? the model of N.?" quasi Ninny-veh. In Brewer's Lingua iii. 6, Phantasma says, "Visus, I wonder that, amongst all your objects, you presented us not with the sight of N., Babylon, London, or some Sturbridge Fair monsters." In Ev. Wom. I. v. 1, Getic says, "I have seen the Babones already, the city of New Ninivie, and Julius Cæsar, acted by the mammals." In Underwit v. 3, Engine says, "My story would draw more audience than the Motion of Ninivie or the horse that snorts at Spain." In Marston's Courtesan iii. 1, Crispwell mentions the motions of "N., Julius Cæsar, Jonas, or the destruction of Jerusalem." In Middleton's Gipsy iv. 1, Sancho sings: "For an ocean, Not such a motion As the city N." In Cowley's Cutter v. 11, Jolly says that the Puritan widow "ne'er saw any shew yet but the puppet-play of Ninive." In Middleton's Blurt i. 1, Hippolito says, "I now might describe the Ninevitical motion of the whole battle."

NIPHATES. A mtn. range in Armenia, on the North-West bank of Lake Van, now called Nimroud-Tagh. In Milton, P. L. iii. 742, Satan, on coming to the earth to seek for Eden, "Throws his steep flight in many an airy wheel, Nor staid till on Niphates' top he lights."

NISA. See NYSA.

NISIBIS. A very ancient city in North of Mesopotamia, on the Mygdonius, between the Euphrates and the Tigris, abt. 100 m. North-West of Nineveh. It was rebuilt under the Seleucid kings of Syria, and renamed Antiocheia Mygdonia. Its ruins are still to be seen near the modern Nisibin. In Milton, P. R. iii. 291, it is mentioned along with Seleucia as one of the great cities "Built by Emathian or by Parthian hands."

NOBODY. The sign of John Trundle's bookshop in Barbican, Lond. Nobody was "Printed for John Trundle and are to be sold at his shop in Barbican at the sign of No-body." The sign represented a man all head, legs, and arms, with no body. There is a reference to this sign, or to some similar picture, in Temp. iii. 2, 136, where Trinculo says of Ariel's tune: "This is the tune of our catch, played by the picture of Nobody." Taylor, in Works i. 123, says, "In Barbican kind Nobody is hanged."

NOLA. An ancient city in the interior of Campania, 125 m. S.E. of Rome. Here Augustus died A.D. 14, and the house in which he passed away was dedicated as a temple to him by his successor Tiberius. In Jonson's Sejanus iii. 3, Tiberius says that he is going into Campania to dedicate a temple "at Nola to Augustus."

NOMBRE DE DIOS. Spt. on the E. coast of the isthmus of Panama, near the mouth of the Chagres. It was raided by Drake in 1570. In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant says, "Nombre de Dios and the rest of those fair sisters By Drake and his brave ginges were ravished." Fuller, Holy State ii. 22, tells how Drake "made with all speed and secrecy to Nombre de Dios . . . which city was then the granary of the W. Indies."

NONACRIS. A town in North-East Arcadia, near which the river Styx has its source, the water of which was said to be a deadly poison. In Mason's Mulleasses 1772, Borgias says to Timoclea, "Quaff Stigian N., I will pledge thee."

NONSUCH. A palace built by Henry VIII at Ewell in Surrey, 13 m. S.W. of Lond. Hentzner speaks with enthusiasm of its architecture, its parks, gardens, statues, and fountains. It was pulled down by the Duchess of Cleveland, to whom it was presented by Charles II.

NONSUCH HOUSE. A wooden house, 4 stories high, brought over from Holland and set up over the 7th and 8th arches of old Lond. Bdge., in the reign of Elizabeth. Only wooden pegs were used in its construction. Lupton, in London Carbonadoed (1632), says of Lond. Bdge.: "His houses may well be called Nonsuch, for there is none like them."

NOREMBERG (= NUREMBERG, or NURNBERG). An ancient city in Bavaria, on the Pegnitz, 95 m. North-West of Munich. It was the centre of the silver-plate manufacture in Germany; and it held a first place in all sorts of artistic products, as well as in the music of which its master-singers were the exponents. The proverb ran: "Nuremberg's hand goes through every land." Heylyn calls it "the fairest and richest town of all Germany." Jonson, in Underwoods xcv., says to the Lord Treasurer, "I would present you now with curious plate Of N. or Turkey."

NOREMBERGA. See NORUMBEGA.

NORFOLK. The county on the E. coast of England immediately S. of the Wash. From it the Earls and Dukes of N. take their title. The Roger Bigot who appears in K. J. was made Earl in 1189 and died in 1220. The Earldom continued in the Bigot, or Bigod, family from the Conquest to the death of Roger Bigod in 1302. Thomas Mowbray was created D. in 1397: he was the great-great-grandson of Thomas of Brotherton, Earl of N., younger son of Edward I. He is the Mowbray of R2. He is challenged by Bolingbroke, in i. 1, for peculation and for having plotted the D. of Gloucester's death. In i. 3, he is banished for life; in iv. 1, 91, the Bp. of Carlisle reports that he has died at Venice. This was in 1399. In H4 B. iii. 2, 29, Shallow tells us that "Jack Falstaff, now Sir John, was then a boy, And page to Thomas Mowbray, D. of N." Sir John Oldcastle was actually so: an additional proof that he was the original Falstaff. His son was the Thomas Lord Mowbray of H4 B. In iv. 1, 111, Westmoreland says to him, "Were you not restored To all the D. of N.'s seignories, Your noble father's?" He was never D. of N. at all. His brother John, however, received the Dukedom, and the D. of N. in H6 C. was his grandson. He died in 1475. He is the D. of N. of R3 ii. 1, 101. He was the last male representative of his family, and in 1483 John Lord Howard, who was the grandson through his mother, of the Thomas Mowbray of R2, was created D. of N. He is the Jockey of N. of the distich quoted in R3 v. 3, 304: "Jockey of N., be not too bold, For Dickon thy master is bought and sold"—and was killed at Bosworth. His son was the Earl of Surrey of R3 v. 3, 2, etc. He was imprisoned by Henry VII for 3 years, but then restored to the Earldom of Surrey. He commanded the English at Flodden, and in 1514 was created D. of N. He is the D. of N. of H8 i. 1, and his wife is the Duchess who bore Q. Anne's train in iv. 1, and was godmother to the Princess Elizabeth in v. 3, 169. He died in 1524, and was succeeded by his son Thomas (d. 1554), who is the D. of N. of H8 iii. and iv., and of Cromwell, and is wrongly mentioned by Sampson in Vow as being at the siege of Leith in 1560. Shakespeare has confused father and son, and seems to regard them as only one person. Thomas Howard the younger was father of Henry Earl of Surrey, the poet, beheaded in 1547. The present D. is directly descended from these Howards, and is the premier D. and Earl of England. In Merry Devil i., the Host of the George uses the phrase, "I serve the good D. of N." as a kind of gag, meaning "I live a free, jolly life." In B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, one of the Fiddler's ballads is entitled "The D. of N." Probably it told the story of the execution in 1572 of Thomas, 4th D. In H6 C. i. 1, 156, Northumberland says to Warwick, "'Tis not thy southern power Of Essex, N., Suffolk, nor of Kent, Can set the D. up"; and in iv. 8, 12, Warwick sends Clarence to stir up in Suffolk, N., and in Kent, The knights and gentlemen to come with thee."

In Piers B. v. 238, Avarice says, "I can no Frenche in feith but of the ferthest ende of N.": N. being regarded as a rustic dist. where French would not be known. Chaucer's Reeve was "of Northfolk Biside a town men clepen Baldeswelle" (C. T. A. 619). In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 1, Cunningham is introduced as "a N. gentleman." He is represented as a discreet and long-headed person. In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 5, Capritus claims to be "of N." So, in Killigrew's Parson i. 3, when Jolly wants to get credit in Lond., he whispers to the mercer, "Do you know the Constants and the Sads of N.?" and at once secures it. The sub-title of Day's B. Beggar is The Merry Humour of Tom Strowd the N. Yeoman. In Brewer's Lovesick King i. 1, Alured exhorts Edmund, "Hie thee to Thetford, raise thy friends in N." In v. 1, Alured says to Canute that the Danes have planted themselves "In N., Suffolk, and in Cambridge-shire." In Merlin iii. 6, 117, Edol speaks of the settlement of the Angles in "N. and Northumberland" at the time of the English conquest of Britain.

N. dumplings were famous, and the N. people were consequently nicknamed N. dumplings. In Massinger's New Way iii. 2, Greedy complains, "There's a fawn brought in, and I cannot make him roast it With a N. dumpling in the belly of it." Taylor, in Works i. 82, says, "The Capt's name was Hercules Dumpling, a N. gentleman." Day, in B. Beggar ii. 2, says, "When mine hostess came up to call me, I was as naked as a N. dumpling." Armin, in Ninnies, says, "He looked like a N. dumpling, thick and short." In Day's B. Beggar i., Hadland says to Canby, "You make me your gull, your N. dumpling." In v., Strowd says, "Ere thou com'st into N. I'll give thee as good a dish of dumplings as e'er thou layd'st thy lips to."

The people of N. had a reputation for excellence in physical exercises and athletic feats. In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, Monopoly says, "You [catchpoles] are as necessary in a city as tumblers in N., sumners in Lancashire, or rake-hells in an army." In ii. 1, Honeysuckle says, "Now I'm as active as a N. tumbler." In Northward iv. 2, Jenkin affirms, "Your N. tumblers are but zanies to coney-catching punks." In Day's B. Beggar iv., Strowd says, "There were a sort of Tumblers at Windham Fair, and they have made that so stale in N. and Suffolk that every wench is turned tumbler." Dekker, in Raven's Almanac (1609), says that punks are "more nimble than N. tumblers." The N. people were credited with special love for lawsuits and skill in legal chicanery, and a N. lawyer is used for a clever swindler. Tusser, in Husbandry (1573), says, "N. wiles so full of guiles Have caught my toe." In Barry's Ram iv., Justice Tutchin calls Throate "A sumner's son and learned in N. wiles." In Mayne's Match iv. 7, Dorcas says, "Your distressed vestals long more earnestly for term than N. lawyers." An Act (33 H. VI, cap. 7) was passed to check the litigiousness of "the counties of N. and Suffolk." N. was famous for its breed of bullocks. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Young Strowd says, "I would not for all the bullocks in N. they had fallen out." In Brome's Moor iii. 1, Quicksands says, "O thou art a N. woman, where maids are mothers and mothers are maids." "Mother," or "mauther," is still used in the N. dialect for a young girl.

NORHAM CASTLE. An ancient border castle on the S. bank of the Tweed, 7 m. S.W. of Berwick. It was in the detached portion of County Durham, called Northumberland and Islandshire, which was incorporated in Northumberland in 1844. It was besieged by James IV of Scotland, acting in behalf of Perkin Warbeck, in 1497, but was relieved by the approach of the Earl of Surrey. In Ford's Warbeck, iii. 4 is laid "before the castle of Norham."

NORMANDY (Nn. = Norman). A province in North-West France, on the English Channel. Its capital was Rouen on the Seine. It derived its name from the settlement of the North-men there in the early part of the 10th cent. In 1066, William, the bastard son of Robert and Herleva, invaded and conquered England, and from that time to 1154 N. remained under the control of members of the English royal house. In 1154, by the accession of Henry II, it became a part of the English dominions, but in 1204 it was ceded by John to France, and continued a French province till Henry V in 1418 recovered it. It was finally lost to England in 1450.

Robert of N., the son of William the Conqueror, is one of the Christian leaders in the attack on Jerusalem described in T. Heywood's Prentices. In Trouble. Reign. Haz., p. 254, John says to the Bastard, "I gird thee with the sword of Normandie And of that land I do invest thee D." This is not historical. In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Mortimer reports: "The K. of France sets foot in N." This was in pursuance of his demand that Edward should do homage to him for Guienne and his other possessions in France in 1325. In Ed. III iii. 1, the K. of France, before the battle of Crecy, commits part of his forces to "My eldest son, the D. of N." In H5 iii. 5, 10, Bourbon denounces the English as "Nns., but bastard Nns., Nn. bastards." In H6 B. i. 1, 87, Gloucester speaks of the deep scars received in France and N. by the English generals; in 114, Salisbury calls Anjou and Maine "the keys of N."; and in 275, York says, "The state of N. Stands on a tickle point." In iv. 1, 87, the Capt. says to Suffolk, "The false revolting Nns. through thee Disdain to call us lord." In iv. 7, 30, Cade says to Lord Say, "What canst thou answer to my majesty for giving up of N. unto Mounsieur Basinecu, the Dauphin of France?" and in 80, Say replies: "I sold not Maine; I lost not N." In S. Rowley's When You A. 2, Wolsey says, "Admiral Hayward was sent To batter down the towns in N." The reference is to the invasion of France by Henry VIII in 1522. In Chapman's Chabot ii. 3, 73, the K. says to Chabot, "I made you . . . Lieutenant-General, likewise of my son, Dauphin and heir, and of all N.": a curious muddled translation of Pasquier's "Lieutenant-Général de Monsieur le Dauphin aux gouvernements de Dauphiné et de Normandie." One of the charges brought against Chabot was the imposition of an excessive tax "upon certain fishermen . . . upon the coast of N." (iii. 2, 81). In Davenport's Matilda i. 3, Fitzwater charges the K. with "the loss of N."

In L. L. L. ii. 1, 43, Maria tells how she saw Longaville at the marriage between "Lord Perigot and the beauteous heir Of Jaques Falconbridge solemnized in N." In Ham. iv. 7, 83, the K. tells of the magnificent horsemanship of "a gentleman of N.," whose name is stated by Laertes to be Lamond. Possibly La Mond is meant as a kind of translation of the name of Pietro Monte, who was an instructor in riding to Louis VII. In iii. 2, 36, where the Ff. have "pagan or Nn.," the right reading is "pagan nor man." In Marston's Parasitaster v., when Herod says to Sir Amorous, "'Tis in great Cupid's case; you may have no counsel," Sir Amorous replies, "Death a justice! are we in N.?" the reference apparently being to the proverbial litigiousness and captiousness of the Nns. "Great Cupid's case" means the Court of Love which is being held on Sir Amorous and others. As many of the noble English families came from N. with William the Conqueror, to have come in with the Conqueror meant to have an ancient title to nobility. In Davenant's Wits ii., Pallatine speaks of "a melancholy race of old Nn. spiders that came in with the Conqueror." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 6, the Herald says that the 3 lions in the English arms "are one coat, made of 2 French Dukedoms, N. and Aquitain." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 222, the Londoner says, "Give me leave to be conducted from Dieppe on my Nn. nag, which, though it has not as many legs as a caterpillar, yet by being well spurred makes shift to travel as fast." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 54, the Capt. relates that he attached Falconbridge "in a ship of Normandie." The scene of B. & F. Brother is laid in N. in the time of D. Rollo, i.e. Rolf, at the beginning of the 10th cent., but it is quite unhistorical.

NORRIGE. See NORWICH.

NORTHAM. Apparently Northampton is meant, q.v. In Peele's Ed. I x. 6, Sussex says, "Before your highness rid from hence to N., Sir Roger was a suitor to your grace Touching fair Elinor."

NORTHAMPTON. The county town of Northants., on the Nen, 65 m. North-West of Lond. The castle was built by the 1st Earl in the time of William the Conqueror. One of the battles of the Wars of the Roses was fought near N. in 1460, in which the Lancastrians were defeated. In R3 ii. 4, 1, the Archbp. says of the young K. Edward, who is on his way from Ludlow to Lond.: "Last night, I hear, they lay at N." In True Trag., p. 69, the young K. says, "My mother . . . thinks it convenient that we dismiss our train, for fear the town of N. is not able to receive us." In H8 i. 1, 200, the D. of Buckingham is described further as "Earl of Hereford, Stafford, and N." The title passed from him to the Howard family, and in 1618 was conferred on Sir William Compton, the ancestor of the present Marquis. In Three Ladies ii., Lucre mentions N. as one of the towns where, through their great trade, infinite numbers of people "great rents upon little room do bestow." In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 5, Agurtes says, "'Twas an affray, a sudden affray, directly against the statute of N., the decimo tertio of Harry the Fourth clears the doubt." Parliaments were held at N. in the reigns of Henry II, Edward II, and Edward III: possibly the reference is to the 1st section in the Assizes of N. of 1176, which prescribes the loss of hand and foot for certain crimes of violence.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE. The Midland county of England lying between Warwicksh. on the E. and Cambridgesh. on the W. It is chiefly occupied in agriculture and sheep-breeding. In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 2, Sanders says, "My lady talked what a goodly act it was of a Countess—N. breed belike—that to make Coventry a corporation rode through the city naked." Leofric, the husband of the Lady Godiva, was the Lord of Mercia, in which N. was included, and Coventry is in the adjacent county of Warwick. In K. J. i. 1, 51, Philip the Bastard describes himself as "a gentleman Born in N., and eldest son, As I suppose, to Robert Faulconbridge." He is introduced by the Sheriff of N., Sir Simon de Pateshull, and the scene is a room of state in Northampton Castle, which was a favourite resort of the Kings of England during the Plantagenet period. Only a few vestiges now remain of the building: iv. 1 and v. 1 were probably intended to be at the same place. In H6 C. iv. 8, 15, Warwick instructs Montague that he will find men well inclined to the Lancastrian cause in "Buckingham, Northampton, and in Leicestershire."

In Mayne's Match ii. 2, Aurelia complains that her Puritan waiting-woman "will urge councils for her little ruff, Called in N." Robert Browne, the founder of the Brownists, held a benefice in Northampton: he was committed to gaol over a dispute as to the payment of church rates, and died there in 1630. In Middleton's Michaelmas i. 2, Hellgill says to the country wench, "Why, N. lass, dost dream of virginity now?" In Shirley's C. Maid iv. 2, the countryman says, "You have a guest, one Startup of N."

NORTH COUNTRY. Applied to the counties of England North of the Humber, and the lowlands of Scotland. In Jonson's Barthol., one of the characters is "a Northern clothier" who talks a kind of dialect, thus: "I'll ne mare, I'll ne mare; the eale's too meegthy." In Dekker's Northward i. 3, Philip informs us that "the northern man loves white-meats, the southern man salads." In both cases the words are used as synonyms for paramours.

NORTH-EAST PASSAGE. A way of communication with India round the North coast of America, which was regarded as possible by the navigators of the 16th and 17th cents., and was sought for in vain by a large number of them. Its direction was, of course, North-West from England, but it was called North-East as being the passage to the East by the North. The chief adventurers in this quest were Martin Frobisher (1576-8); John Davis (1585-7); William Barents (1594-6); Waymouth (1602); Henry Hudson (1607-10); Thomas Button (1612-3); Robert Bylot and William Baffin (1615-6). In B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Bianca says, "That everlasting cassock that has worn As many servants out as the North-east passage Has consumed sailors." In Massinger's Madam ii. 3, Sir Maurice says, "I will undertake To find the north passage to the Indies sooner." In Mayne's Match i. 4, Bright says of Plotwell's merchant's habit: "This jacket surely was employed In finding the n. e. passage out." Milton, P. L. x. 291, speaks of "Mtns. of ice, that stop the imagined way Beyond Petsore eastward to the rich Cathaian coast." In Wilson's Inconstant iv. 1, the D. says, "'Tis more easy To plough the frozen North and force a way Unto the Eastern world."

NORTH POLE. In Tourneur, Atheist ii. 5, Levidulcia says of Fresco: "Faint-hearted fool! I think thou wert begotten Between the N. P. and the congealed passage." In Cowley's Riddle iv., Aphron says, "Where am I now? Under the Northern P. Where a perpetual winter binds the ground And glazeth up the floods?" NORTHUMBERLAND. The most Northerly county in England, extending from the Tyne to the Cheviot Hills. The old kingdom of N. extended, as the name implies, from the Humber to the Firth of Forth, and was ruled by a succession of Anglian kings from the middle of the 6th to the 9th cents. Chaucer's Man of Law's Tale relates how Constance was brought to the coast of N. in the reign of Alla, or Ælla, A.D. 560-567. It was conquered by the Kings of Wessex in the 10th cent., but they had to cede the Northern part of it beyond the Tweed to the Scottish Kings, whilst the Danes retained the lordship of the S. portion. In Merlin iii. 6, 117, Edol speaks of the settlement of the Angles in "Norfolk and N." In 1041, Siward the Strong, a Danish prince, reigned over this part of the old kingdom, and aided Malcolm in ousting Macbeth from the Scottish throne. In Mac. iii. 6, 31, we are told that Macduff "is gone To pray the holy king upon his aid, To wake N. and warlike Siward."

As a result of the wars of the Edwards, N., Durham, and Yorks. became finally attached to the English Crown, and in 1377 Richd. II granted the Earldom of N. to Henry Percy. He is the N. of R2 and H4. He joined Henry of Lancaster on his return to England, and after his coronation as Henry IV supported him for a time, but he and his son Henry Hotspur took the lead in the rebellion which forms the background of H4 A. and led up to the battle of Shrewsbury, in which Hotspur was killed. The Earl himself failed to come to the battle, and succeeded in avoiding the penalty of his revolt. But 2 years later he joined in the plot of Archbp. Scrope, as told in H4 B. i. 3, and finally perished in a new rebellion at Bramham Moor in 1408. His titles were forfeited, but were restored to his grandson Henry, 2nd Earl, by Henry V. In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 361, he is mentioned as being at the battle of Agincourt. He was killed fighting on the Lancastrian side at the 1st battle of St. Albans. In H6 C. i. 1, 4, York relates how in this battle "the great Lord of N. Cheered up the drooping army; and himself, Lord Clifford, and Lord Stafford . . . Were by the swords of common soldiers slain." In i. 1, 54, K. Henry says of York: "Earl of N., he slew thy father." He was succeeded by his son, who is the N. of H6 C. and is called "rough N." by York (i. 4, 27) and "Haught N." by Warwick (ii. 1, 169). He was present at Wakefield in 1460 when young Rutland was murdered. In R3 i. 3, 187, Buckingham, referring to this, says, "N. then present wept to see it." He was killed at Towton in 1461. His successor is the "melancholy Lord N." mentioned in R3 v. 3, 65 as cheering the troops before the battle of Bosworth; and in v. 3, 271 as saying that "Richmond was never trained up in arms." He was killed in quelling a rebellion in the reign of Henry VII. The "stout Earl of N." who is described in H8 iv. 2, 12 as arresting Wolsey was the 6th Earl and died childless. Dudley, Earl of Warwick, held the title 1551-1553. He is the N. of Webster's Wyatt, the father-in-law of Lady Jane Grey: he was beheaded in 1553. The Earldom was restored to the Percies by Elizabeth. The male line became extinct in 1670. For the next two generations there were only heiresses, the second of whom, Elizabeth, Baroness Percy, married Sir Hugh Smithson, who was created Earl of N. in 1750 and Duke of N. in 1766. From him the present Duke is descended. In Greene's James IV ii. 1, Eustace says, "The country Countess of N. Doth greet you well." This was the wife of the 5th Earl. In H5 ii. Prol. 25, one of the conspirators is described as "Sir Thomas Grey, Knight, of N." He was the son of Sir Thomas Grey of Berwick, Constable of Norham Castle.

In Peele's Ed. I v., the Messenger reports: "Trothless Baliol, their accursed K., With fire and sword doth threat N." In Respublica v. 6, Avarice says, "I would have brought half Kent into N., and Somersetsh. should have raught to Cumberland." In B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, Thomas says, "Now sing 'The D. of N.,'" and the Fiddler responds, "And clambering to promotion he fell down suddenly." In Hycke, p. 88, Hycke says he has been in "Northumberlonde Where men seethe rushes in gruel." I suppose he refers to the porridge which is the staple of north-country diet. In May's Old Couple iv. 3, Sir Argent plans: "I'll purchase all in parcels, far from home; A piece in Cornwall; in Hampshire some; some in N." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 3, the Sheriffs of Kent and of N. appear at Court to protest against the K.'s exactions: they are evidently chosen from the extreme S. and North to suggest the protest of the whole realm.

NORTHUMBRIA. One of the old Saxon kingdoms in England, lying North of the Humber and including the counties of Yorks., Durham, Northumberland, part of Lancs., and Lothian in S. Scotland. It was divided into Bernicia in the North and Deira in the South. The scene of Brome's Queen's Exch. is laid in N. during the reign of an imaginary K. Osrick, who married Bertha, Q. of the W. Saxons. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 39, records a prediction that "Cadwallin . . . shall an huge host into Northumber lead."

NORTON FOLGATE. A street in Lond., connecting Bishopsgate Street Without and High Street, Shoreditch. The Priory of St. Mary Spittle was founded on the E. side of the street near the corner of White Lion Street, in 1197, by William Brewen. In W. Rowley's New Wonder iv., Brewen says, "Near N. F. have I bought Ground to erect this house which I will call St. Mary's Hospital." An entry in Bodleian MS., Aubrey 8, 45, runs: "Mr. Beeston who knows most of him fr. Mr. Lacy he lived in Shoreditch at Hoglane within 6 doors f- N.-f." The reference is supposed to be to Shakespeare. See under HOG LANE.

NORUMBEGA. The name in the 17th cent. for the S. part of Canada and the States of New York and Maine. Milton, P. L. x. 696, describes the North winds blowing "from the north Of N., and the Samoed shore." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "At Norembega in 45 lat., all the sea is frozen ice."

NORWAY (Nn. = Norwegian). The country on the W. and North of the Scandinavian Peninsula. Its authentic history begins about the end of the 9th cent., when it became a united kingdom, and it continued to be governed by its own kings until the union of the Norwegian and Swedish crowns in 1319. In Clyomon, Thrasellus, K. of N., is one of the characters, but as the play takes place during the life of Alexander the Gt. it is obvious that Thrasellus is entirely mythical. In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iv. 2, we find on Arthur's side "Islandians, Goths, Nns., Albans, Danes." In Ham. i. 1, 61, Horatio informs us that the late K. of Denmark combated "the ambitious N.," whose name was Fortinbras, and slew him. We learn from ii. 2, 70 that he was succeeded by his brother, but his son, young Fortinbras, has "Sharked up a list of lawless resolute" to recover the lands lost by his father to Denmark (i. 1, 98). In i. 2, 35, Cornelius and Voltimand are sent as ambassadors to "old N." to protest, and return, in ii. 2, with news that the K. has rebuked his nephew and asks for him the right of passage through Denmark to fight the Polacks. In iv. 4, Fortinbras and his Nns. pass across the stage on their way to Poland, and they return in time for Fortinbras to be acclaimed K. of Denmark. All this is unhistorical. In Mac. i. 2, 49, Ross tells how in Fife "the Norweyan banners flout the sky", that Macbeth has defeated them, and "now Sweno, the Norway's K., craves composition." In i. 3, 112, we find that the Thane of Cawdor was "combined with those of N." The date is 1041, and Sweno is Svend Estridsen, the nephew of Canute, who was not actually K. of N. but was a claimant for the crown against the young Magnus, who succeeded in 1035. In Chettle's Hoffman F. 1, Fibs says to old Stilt, "Ye were but one of the common all soldiers that served old Sarloys in N." Milton, P. L. i. 203, speaks of a whale "haply slumbering on the N. foam," to which a skiff is anchored, mistaking it for an island.

The Nns., like the Danes, were supposed to be given to strong drink. In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Lucy says to Palatine, "Thou dost out-drink The youth of N. at their marriage feasts." Heylyn (s.v. NORWEX) says, "The people are much given to hospitality, plain dealing, and abhorring theft." In Davenant's Wits ii., Palatine says he has disciples among women "from your satin slipper To your iron patten and your N. shoe": evidently a peasant's shoe; possibly a wooden shoe or snow-shoe is meant.

N. has huge forests of fir and pine. In Jonson's Prince Henry's Barriers, he says, "The proud Armada styled by Spain The Invincible . . . that swam . . . as if . . . half of N. with her fir-trees came." Milton, P. L. i. 293, compares Satan's spear to "the tallest pine Hewn on Nn. hills to be the mast Of some great admiral." N., like Lapland, was supposed to be the home of witches that could command the winds. In Davenant's Plymouth ii. 1, Seawit says, "I wish thou hadst an old aunt in N. that would command the winds with a charm." The scene of Shirley's Politician is laid in N.

NORWICH. The county town of Norfolk, on the right bank of the Wensum, 114 m. North-E. of Lond. It was the Venta Icenorum of the Romans: the name Nordwic first appears in 1004. The Castle, of which the keep still remains and is used as a prison, was built by William Rufus; other notable old buildings are the noble cathedral, the parish ch. of St. Peter Mancroft, St. Andrew's Hall, and the Grammar School. A large Flemish colony settled here in the reign of Edward III, and established the cloth manufacture which was for long the staple trade of the city. It was one of the chief centres of Lollardism, and afterwards of Protestantism. In Three Ladies ii., Lucre mentions N. among the places where trade is so good that there are infinite numbers there who "great rents upon little room do bestow." In Bale's Laws iv., Pseudodoctrine claims "Rugge and Corbett of N." as supporters of the Pope against the Protestants. Rugge was made Bp. of N. in 1530, but resigned in 1549 because of his opposition to the alterations in church order. Corbett may be the Henry Corbett, a Dutch priest, for whom Cranmer tries to get a benefice from Cromwell in a letter of 1539. He was probably one of the Flemish colony at N. In Bale's Johan ii., p. 235, Wealth says of the Pope's Interdict: "The bp. of Norwyche and the bp. of Wynchester Hath full authority to spread it in England here." But the Bp. of N. was at this time one of the K.'s supporters, and was, in fact, his Lord-Lieutenant in Ireland.

In 1600 William Kemp, the actor, danced a morris all the way from Lond. to N. in 9 days, the record of which he has left in his Nine Days Wonder. He entered the city by St. Stephen's Gate, made his way to the Market Place, and was entertained by the mayor. Jonson, in Fam. Voyage, refers to "him who Did dance the famous morris unto N." Taylor, in Works ii. 73, says that Coryat's travels advanced him "Above Kemp's N. antick Morris dance." W. Rowley, in Search Intro., speaks of "the wild morris to Norridge." In Dekker's Westward v. 1, Linstock says, "We'll dance to N. and take [our supper] there." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 33, speaks of "Yar, soft washing Norwich wall." N. was the subject of a popular Motion, or puppet play. Probably the scene represented the market place, with the castle on the left and the cathedral on the right. What particular event in the history of the city was enacted does not appear: possibly it was Kett's rebellion in 1549. In Jonson's Barthol. v. 1, Leatherhead says, "O the motions that I have given light to! Jerusalem was a stately thing, and so was Nineveh and the city of N." In Day's B. Beggar iv., Strowd, a Norfolk man, being invited to see a motion, says, "Shall I see all Norwich in the corner of a little chamber?" In Davenant's Playhouse i., the Housekeeper mentions "the new motion-men of N." In preface to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Ben Jonson says that Coryat supplies a spectacle "grateful above that of Nineveh or the City of N." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the sights of Lond. "The fall of Nineveh with N. built in an hour."

Robert Greene, the dramatist, was born at N. about 1550. Thomas Deloney, the well-known ballad writer (died about 1600), is called by Nash "the ballading Silk-weaver of N." In Jonson's Devil v. 5, Meercraft says, "A boy of 13 year old made him [the Devil] an ass But t'other day." The reference is to a boy of 12 called Thomas Harrison, of N., who had fits and was suspected of being a demoniac in 1605.

NOSTEL. The seat of an ancient priory of St. Oswald, in W. Riding Yorks., about half way between Wakefield and Pontefract. It was the oldest Augustinian Priory in England, having been founded by the Lacies in the 11th cent. It was dissolved by Henry VIII, and the property ultimately passed to the Winn family. The canons of N. performed the famous Towneley Plays about the feast of the Assumption and the Nativity of the Virgin at the vill. of Woodkirk, near Wakefield.

NOTTINGHAM. The county-town of Notts., on the Trent and its tributary, the Leene, 108 m. North-W. of Lond. The castle, standing on a rock 133 ft. high, was built by William the Conqueror. It was dismantled during the Protectorate, and a mansion was built on its site by the D. of Newcastle in 1674. Sherwood Forest lies some 12 m. North of the town, and many of Robin Hood's adventures take place at N. In Downfall Huntingdon iii. 2, Scathlock says, "We were borne bound from thence [Mansfield] to N." In True Trag., p. 108, a Messenger brings word: "When the Peers of England and Scotland met at N. together, to confer about the marriage of your niece, it was determined that she should be married with the Scottish Earl." The scene of Massinger's New Way is laid in the country near N. In iii. 2, Greedy says, "I have granted 20 warrants to have him [Wellborn] committed to N. gaol."

In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 363, "The Earl of N." is mentioned as being at the battle of Agincourt. This was John, brother of Thomas Mowbray, who was beheaded in 1405 for being concerned in a conspiracy against the K. The scene of part of Sampson's Vow is laid at Clifton, near N.; and mention is made in the play of N. Castle and St. Mary's Ch. In i. 3, 76, Miles says a soldier in battle has not as much warning "as a thief at N. gallows." Drayton, in Barons' Wars vi. 15, calls N. "the North's imperious eye Which as a Pharus doth survey the soil, Armed by Nature danger to defy." In Jonson's Devil v. 3, Meercraft asks: "Did you ne'er read, Sir, little Darrel's tricks With . . . Sommers at N.?" Darrel was a Puritan parson who practised exorcising, but was exposed by Harnsnett in the case of one William Sommers of N., who had been his confederate in 1599. There were once 2 giants at the castle, like Gog and Magog at Lond., but they were allowed to fall into decay. Corbett, in Iter. Boreale, says, "O you that do Guildhall and Holmeby keep, You are good giants and partake no shame With those 2 worthless trunks of N."

NOTTINGHAM BRIDGE. The Trent Bridge over the Trent, about 1 m. S. of N. It crosses the river by 19 arches, and is of great antiquity. In Sampson's Vow ii. 1, 77, Joshua says, "Commend me to my learned brother Spritchall, the cobler of Nottingham brig."

NOTTINGHAMSHIRE. A county of England W. of Lincs. In Brome's Crew (the scene is laid in N.), Randal says, in v. 1, "Were you ever at my master's house in N.?" It is appropriate that the merry Beggars should be found in the neighbourhood of Sherwood Forest, the haunt of the old Robin Hood and his merry men. In Jonson's Love's Welcome, which was performed "at Welbeck in N.," Accidence says, "fetch the fiddles out of France To wonder at the hornpipes here Of Nottingham and Derbysh."

NOVA ALBION. The name given by Drake to the country round San Francisco, on the North-West coast of North America, discovered by him in 1578. Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "Quevira, or N. A., in America, bordering on the sea, was so cold in July that our Englishmen could hardly endure it."

NOVA HISPANIA (= MEXICO). Heylyn says "Mexico, giving name to half America, is now called N. H." In B. & F. Span. Cur. ii. 1, Leandro pretends to Lopez to have come "from N. H."

NUBIA. Now applied to the country in Africa on the Nile lying S. of Egypt and North of Abyssinia; formerly used for a vague region including the present N. and extending inland as far as Lake Tchad (Borno Lake). In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles tells how he visited the W. coast of Africa and then "made haste to N.;" There, having sacked Borno, the princely seat, I took the k." In v. 3, Tamburlaine says that he marched from Egypt "to N., near Borno Lake." In T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 101, The Souldan says that his army is drawn "From Sauxin eastward unto N.'s bounds."

NUIS, or NUIITS. A town in the Dukedom of Burgundy, a few m. S. of Dijon, 160 m. S.E. of Paris. It was taken by the Mareschal Biron in 1594. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy recalls how Byron "did take in Autun and Nuis in Burgundy, chased away Viscount Tavannes' troops before Dijon."

NUMANTIA. A city in Spain the site of which is marked by the ruins at Puente de Don Guarray, abt. 120 m. North-East of Madrid. It was destroyed by Scipio Africanus 134 B.C., and has never been rebuilt. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Brutus says, "Proud Zanthus, That didst sadly fall, as proud Numantia, To conquering Scipio's power."

NUMIDIA (Nn. = Numidian). The ancient N. was the dist. on the North coast of Africa immediately W. of Carthage. After the destruction of Carthage it was ruled by native kings. Massinissa was the first of these: his son Jugurtha was defeated and slain by the Romans 106 B.C. Juba I allied himself with the Pompeians, and on his death in 46 B.C. Julius Cæsar made N. into a Roman province. The Elizabethans used the word in a much wider sense: Heylyn gives the boundaries of N. as Egypt and the Atlantic Ocean on the E. and W., and the Atlas Mtns. and Libya on the North and South. In Tiberius 343, the Centurion recalls the exploits of "Marius in N.," i.e. in the Jugurthine wars. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar speaks of Pompey as "guarded with Nn. horse"; and in iii. 2, he says, "Juba, Backed with Nn. and Gætulian horse, Hath felt the puissance of a Roman sword." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 6, Bomilcar says, "Massanissa hath Forsaken Carthage; we must never more Expect Nn. aid." In May's Agrippina i. 614, Vitellius speaks of "warlike Syphax, the Nn. k., Stubborn Jugurtha."

In B. & F. Fair Maid I. ii. 3, Baptista says, "A wild Nn. that had sucked a tigress Would not have been so barbarous." In their Mad Lover iv. 5, Memnon says, "Fetch the Nn. lion I brought over; If she be sprung from royal blood, the lion He'll do you reverence." In Massinger's Emperor v. 2, Chrysapius says, "Like a Nn. lion . . . forced into a spacious cage he walks About his chamber." In Davenport's Matilda v. 3, Fitzwater claims for Matilda "Nn. marble to preserve her praise." The reference is to the "Onyx Marble" of Algeria, which was largely used at Carthage and Rome. In May's Agrippina iv. 470, Petronius says, "N. marble brings." Rabelais, Gargantua i. 53, describes "Nn. stone [as] yellowishly-streaked marble upon various colours." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., amongst other table delicacies, Sensuality promises Physander "hens of N.": guinea-hens presumably. In May's Agrippina iv. 368, Petronius mentions "Nn. hens" amongst table delicacies. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says he has "visited all Barbaria and all N." In Tiberius 1774, Germanicus says, "Were every man a furious elephant Ruled by a castle of Nns., Those German legions would encounter them."

NUNWEGHEN (NIJMEGEN). In Barnavelt, Barnavelt is charged with plotting to deliver over to Spain some Dutch towns, among which is N. See NIMMINGHAM.

NUSE (NEUSS). A town in the Rhine Province, near the left bank of the Rhine, opposite to Dusseldorf. Charles the Bold of Burgundy besieged it in vain for 11 months in 1474, and so was unable to assist Edward IV when he invaded France. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV. B. 92, Scales says of Burgundy: "He lingers still In his long siege of N."

NYSA. An island in Lake Tritonis, S. of Tunis, near the coast of the Lesser Syrtis. Here, according to Diodorus Siculus (iii. 67), Dionysus was concealed by his father Ammon to preserve him from the jealousy of his wife, Rhea. Other legends placed his birth at Nysa in Ethiopia, or at Nysa in Caria, or at Nysa in Thrace between the Strymon and Nestus. Milton, P. L. iv. 275, speaks of "that Nyseian isle, Girt with the river Triton, where old Cham, Whom Gentiles Ammon call and Libyan Jove, Hid Amalthea and her florid son, Young Bacchus, from his step-dame Rhea's eye." In Antonie ii. 315, Philostratus speaks of "howling noise Such as mad Bacchus priests in Bacchus feasts On Nisa make." See also NYLA.

OB. A river in W. Siberia, rising in the Altai mtns. and flowing in a general N. direction into the Gulf of Obi in the Arctic Ocean. Its length is abt. 2000 miles. In Milton, P. L. ix. 78, Satan is described as viewing the earth "From Eden over Pontus, and the Pool Mæotis, up beyond the river Ob."

OBLIA (a slip for OLBIA). A Greek colony in Scythia, on the Hypanis, abt. 30 m. from its mouth in the Black Sea. Its ruins still remain at Stomogil on the Bug. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Theridamas reports: "I crossed the sea and came to O. And Nigra Sylva, where the devils dance."

OCCIDENT (the West). Used both of the W. part of the sky and the countries of the W., i.e. Europe and America. In R2 iii. 3, 67, Bolingbroke speaks of clouds dimming the bright passage of the sun "to the o." In All's ii. 1, 166, Helena promises to cure the K. "Ere twice in murk and occidental damp Moist Hesperus hath quenched his sleepy lamp." In Cym. iv. 2, 372, Imogen says, "I may wander From East to O. . . . never Find such another master."

ODCOMBE. A vill. in Somersetsh, 3 m. W. of Yeovil, in the S.E. of the county. Here Thomas Coryat, the author of Cruities, was born, and when he returned from his tramp of 1975 m. through Europe he hung up his shoes in the church at O. In Jonson's Verses prefixed to the Cruities (1611), he says, "How well and often his shoes too were mended, That sacred to O. are now there suspended." In Nabbes' Bride v. 7, Horten says, "This stone of a strange form and colour was brought by the learned traveller of O. from the Great Mogul." Sydenham, in Verses prefixed to the Cruities, says of it that it is "A work that will eternize thee till God come, And for thy sake thy famous parish O."

CECHALIA. The place where Herakles conquered Eurytus shortly before his own death: 3 cities at least claimed to be the scene of this story; one in Messenia in the Plain of Stenyclerus, another in Eubœa in the dist. of Eretria, and a 3rd in Thessaly on the Peneus, not far from Ithome. Milton, P. L. ii. 542, tells the story of the death of "Alcides, from O. crowned with conquest." The 1st edition has Cælia, but it is an obvious misprint.

ENOPHRIUS. The reading is hopelessly corrupt. Mitford's conjecture—"Æthiopian"—may serve as well as another. In Peele's Ed. Ivii., Elinor says, "Should'st thou In deserts O. ever dwell, Thy Nell would follow thee."

ETA. A mtn. range in S. Thessaly, forming the N. boundary of Central Greece. The highest summit rises to about 7000 ft. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 4, 348, Cato asks: "Why would Jove throw them [his darts] down on O.'s mount," and not rain them on Cæsar and his Romans? In B. & F. Bonduca i. 2, Suetonius says, "A pine Rent from O. by a sweeping tempest, Jointed again and made a mast, defies Those angry winds that split him." Evidently the simile pleased the authors, for it is repeated in Valentinian v. 3, where Maximus says, "Goodly cedars, Rent from O. by a sweeping tempest, Jointed again and made tall masts, defy Those angry winds that split them." O. is in both cases pronounced as a trisyllable. In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Meleager says, "I Meleager, rich Ætolia's heir, Whose large dominions stretch to O. mt., And to the bounds of fertile Thessaly." It was on the summit of O. that Herakles built the funeral pyre on which he flung himself and perished.

In Nabbes' Hannibal v. 3, Hannibal says, "Would this were O.: That, like the furious Theban, I might build mine own pile and the flame transform itself into a constellation." In Fraunce's Victoria ii. 4, 832, Onophrius speaks of being burnt to death: "Tanquam Herculeum quondam in O." Spenser, F. Q. v. 8, 2, calls Hercules "the great Cætan knight." Milton, P. L. ii. 545, tells how Alcides "Lichas from the top of O. threw Into the Euboic sea" in his death agony.

OFFENCE, MOUNT OF (now JEBEL BATH EL HAWA). A hill abt. 2400 ft. high, lying S. of Mt. Olives and S.E. of Jerusalem. It received its name from the temples built there by Solomon for the gods of his foreign wives (I Kings xi. 7). Milton, P. L. i. 403, says that Moloch led Solomon to build his temple "right against the temple of God On that opprobrious hill." In 416, he calls it "that hill of scandal," and in 443, "the offensive mtn."

OLAVES (SAINT). An old Lond. ch. near the Tower, at the corner of Hart St. and Seething Lane. Its graveyard was much used during the visitations of the Plague. The registers contain a long list of names with the letter "P" added, to indicate that they died of the Plague. Dekker, in Wonderful Year, says in reference to the Plague: "The 3 bald sextons of limping St. Gyles, St. Sepulchres, and St. O. ruled the roast more hotly than ever did the Triumviri of Rome."

OLD BAILEY. The central criminal court of Lond, so called from the Latin "Ballium," the outer or base court of a feudal castle, because it lay behind the ancient Bailey of the city wall between Lud Gate and New Gate. It was next door to Newgate prison. The st. running S. from the corner of Newgate and the Holborn viaduct retains the name. In the True Report of the Arraignment of a seminary Priest (1607), it is stated that the trial was conducted "at the Sessions House in the O. B.," and again: "My Lord Mayor, maister recorder, and other of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, sitting at the Sessions House in the O. B., by virtue of his Highness commission of Oyer and Terminer, for gaol delivery, for Lond. and the county of Middlesex." In the Nursery Rhyme of Oranges and Lemons, one distich runs: "When will you pay me, Say the bells of O. B." Probably the bells of St. Sepulchre just opposite were intended, which were well known because they rang the passing knell for all executed felons. In Look about xxiii., the Sheriff says, "The gibbet was set up by noon in the O. B." In Peele's Jests, we read of an old gentleman who sojourned in "the O. B." who played a trick on George. Dekker, in Jests, speaks of thieves being "indighted for it at the black bar in the old bayly." In Bellman, he advises those who want to learn more of the ways of robbers to "step into the O. Baily at any Sessions." Middleton, in Hubbard, speaks of "the best hand that ever old Peter Bales hung out in the O. B." This Peter Bales was a famous chirographist who kept a school at the upper end of O. B. Davenant's U. Lovers was "Printed by R. H. and are to be sold by Francis Coles at his shop in the O. Bayley anno dom. 1643."

OLD CHANGE. A st. in Lond., running S. from the W. end of Cheapside to Knight rider St. It was so called because the King's Exchange for bullion and for the changing of foreign coins was here. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 3, Hammond says, "There is a wench keeps shop in the O. C.; To her will I." In Brome's City Wit i. 1, Josina applies to "Mrs. Collifloore, the herb-woman in the O. C.," to find her a young man as secretary. In Deloney's Reading vi., when the clothiers' wives came up to Lond., they viewed "at the end of the o. C., the fishmongers." This may mean the S. end, which was at the junction of Knighttrider St. and Fish St., or perhaps the Cheapside end, which was not far W. of Friday St., where the fishmongers had their stalls.

OLDENSELL (OLDENZAAL). A town in Holland, 85 m. due E. of Amsterdam. In Barnavel iv. 5, Orange asks: "Who was the cause no greater power was sent against the enemy when he took O.?"

OLD FORD. A vill. near Lond., $\frac{3}{4}$ m. N.E. of St. Paul's, at the end of the O. F. Rd. It marks the site of the old ford over the Lea by which the road from Essex entered Lond. before the bidge. at Stratford-at-Bow was built. There was an old mansion there, sometimes called King John's Palace, which is probably the O. F. House in which the Lord Mayor lived in Dekker's Shoemaker's. In ii. 1, Sybil, the maid of the Lord Mayor's daughter, says, "It is like one of our yellow silk curtains at home here in O. F. House." In iii. 4, Eyre says, "I am bidden by my lord mayor to dinner to O. F." In ii. 4, Warner and Hammon enter in pursuit of a buck, and Warner says, "'Tis best we trace these meadows by O. F." The scene of iii. 5 is a room in the Lord Mayor's house at O. F.

OLD JEWRY. A st. in Lond., running N. from the Poultry to Gresham (formerly Cateaton) st. It was made a Jews' quarter by William I, but when the Jews were expelled from England in 1291 it became a st. for merchants. Here were the Windmill and the Maidenhead Taverns. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Wellbred writes to young Knowell from the Windmill, and asks him, "Hast thou forsworn all thy friends i' the O. J.?" or dost thou think us all Jews that inhabit there yet?" The servant has just told old Knowell that Master Kately, "the rich merchant in the O. J.," married Wellbred's sister. The scene of iv. 4 is laid in the O. J. In Mayne's Match i. 4, when young Plotwell's uncle makes him a merchant, Bright says, "What, to take thee from the Temple to make thee an O. J. jurymen, a Whittington?" In Deloney's Reading vi., the clothiers' wives, visiting Lond., "came into the Jewes st., where all the Jewes did inhabit." Fuller, in Church History (1656) iii. 13, 33, says of the Jews: "Their principal abode was in Lond., where they had their arch-synagogue at the N. corner of the O. J., as opening into Lothbury." This synagogue afterwards became the Windmill Tavern, q.v.

OLD SARUM. The original site of Salisbury about $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. of the present city of Salisbury, or New Sarum. It dates back to British times, but its cathedral establishment was transferred to New Sarum in 1218 and the people followed it, so that O. S. was practically deserted. It gives its name to the musical form of the service of the Church known as the O. S. Use, which was the best of the various English uses. Hence O. S. Use comes to mean old-fashioned. Nash, in Lenten, p. 309, says that he has harped upon the history of Yarmouth "according to my o. S. plain-song." Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchett (Eliz. Pamph., p. 56), says, "For the winter nights the tales shall be told secundum usum S.; the Dean of Salisbury can tell so."

OLD STREET. Lond., running W. from the corner of Shoreditch, opposite the ch., to Goswell Rd. Here lived Samuel Daniel, the poet and dramatist. Dekker, in Rod for Runaways (1625), tells of a country fellow that "fell sick in some lodging he had in O.-st., and being thrust out of doors, lay upon straw under Sutton's Hospital wall and there miserably died."

OLD SWAN. See SWAN STAIRS.

OLD SYNAGOGUE. A cant name for the Temple in Lond., q.v. Specially used in reference to the Temple Ch. In Brome's Damoiselle ii. 1, the Attorney says, "I must up to the o. S., there shall I be fitted." In his Mad Couple i. 1, Careless says, "I will rather walk down to the Temple and lay myself down alive in the o. S. cross-legged among the monumental knights till I turn marble with them."

OLIMPUS (OLYMPUS, q.v.).

OLINTHUS (more properly OLYNTHUS). A city of ancient Greece, at the head of the Toronaic Gulf, between the peninsulas of Pallene and Sithonia, on the coast of Macedonia. In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "History accuseth Lasthenes for delivering of O." Demosthenes says that Lasthenes, a native of O., along with Euthykrates, betrayed the city to Philip of Macedon, 348 B.C.

OLIVER'S. The famous miniature painter, Isaac Oliver, who died in 1617, lived in Blackfriars. His studio was doubtless the resort of ladies of fashion. The reference, however, may be to some Ordinary, or Tavern. In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 5, Humphrey says, "Tomorrow night at O. I who shall be there, boys? Who shall meet the wenches?"

OLIVET (or the Mt. of OLIVES). The hill E. of Jerusalem, on the other side of the valley of the Kedron. The site of our Lord's Ascension on the summit of the hill was marked by a ch., which was visited by pilgrims amongst the other sacred places of the Holy City. In J. Heywood's Four PP i., the Palmer says, "To Josaphat and Olyvete on foot, God wot, I went right bare." In Peele's Bethsabe iii. 1, Jonathan says, if his friends should pour out their blood for David, "Then should this Mt. of Olives seem a plain Drowned with a sea." Spenser, F. Q. i. 10, 54, calls it "That sacred hill whose head full high, Adorned with fruitful olives all around, Is, as it were, for endless memory Of that dear Lord who oft thereon was found, For ever with a flowering garland crowned." In his Shep. Cal., July, 50, Morrell asks: "Wonne not the great God Pan [i.e. our Lord] Upon mt. O.?"

OLYMPIA (Oc. = Olympic, On. = Olympian). The place where the Olympian Games were celebrated. The site of the racecourse, gymnasium, etc., lies in the angle formed by the junction of the Alpheus and the Cladeus, near the city of Pisa, some 12 m. from the W. coast of the Peloponnesus. The name was derived from the On. Zeus, who was worshipped there. The games were founded by the Achæans in honour of Pelops, and were at first under the joint control of Pisa and Elis. After the destruction of Pisa in 570 B.C. the Eleans had sole control under the protection of Sparta. The official date of the 1st celebration was 776 B.C., and the games were held every 4th year, the interval being known as an Olympiad; and by the successive Olympiads the dates of Greek history were reckoned. The last celebration was in A.D. 393. The original contests were limited to tests of personal strength and skill, such as wrestling, footracing, and boxing, but, later, horse and chariot races were introduced, as well as competitions in music and poetry. The entries were limited to persons of Hellenic descent, and rigorous conditions of training and qualification were exacted. During the games a truce of God was proclaimed throughout Hellas. The prize was only a garland of wild olive, but the victors were honoured in their native towns even more than a successful cricketer or footballer is nowadays, and statues were often erected in their memory. The German exploration of 1875-81 has determined fully the sites of the various buildings and arenas.

In H6 C. ii. 3, 53, George of Clarence says, "If we thrive, promise them such rewards As victors wear at the On. games." In Troil. iv. 5, 194, Nestor says to Hector, "I have seen thee When that a ring of Greeks have hemmed thee in, Like an On. wrestling": where On. means a competitor at O. Daniel, in Ep. Ded. to Cleopatra 90, says of Sidney: "He hath th' Olympian prize of all that run Or ever shall." In Lyly's Endymion ii. 1, Tellus says, "Take heed, Endimion, lest like the wrestler in O. that, striving to lift an impossible weight, caught an incurable strain, thou fall into a disease without all cure." In Marlowe's Dido iii. 1, Ilioneus says of one of Dido's suitors: "This man and I were at O.'s games": an amusing anachronism. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Henry says, "The ancient Eleans . . . in the On. contentions . . . ever were the justest arbiters, If none of them contended." In Shirley's Imposture i. 2, Flaviano says, "Our active youth Shall bring again the old Oc. games." In Hyde Park iv. 3, Bonville says of a racer who has retired: "He hath left the triumph to his Oc. adversary." In Underwit i., we are told of the Clowns who "sell fish in the Hall and ride the wild mare, and such Ocs.," i.e. athletic feats. In T. Heywood's S. Age iii., the origin of the Oc. games is described, and one of the Kings speaks of them as "These honoured pastimes on Olympus mt.": which looks as if Heywood had confused O. with Olympus. In the old Timon v. 5, Timon says, "I as yet ne'er saw the Olympick games." In Nabbes' Totenham ii. 2, Changeable says, "Let's run then; 'tis a brave Olympicke exercise; I love it well." Milton, P. L. ii. 530, describes the fallen angels as contending in races "As at the On. games or Pythian fields."

OLYMPUS (Oc. = Olympic). Mtn. on the borders of Thessaly and Macedonia, N.W. of the Vale of Tempe, which divides it from Mt. Ossa. It is 9000 ft. high: the lower part is well wooded, but the top is bare rock, covered with snow for the greater part of the year. Its broad summit was supposed by the Greeks to be the seat of the Court of Zeus, and he is often called Olympius in consequence. In Troil. ii. 3, 11, Thersites appeals to Jupiter, "O thou great thunderdarter of O., Forget that thou art Jove, the K. of gods." In Jonson's Poetaster iv. 3, in the masque of the gods, Ovid, who represents Jupiter, says, "We will knock our chin against our breast and shake thee out of O. into an oyster boat." In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier ii. 2, Bellizarius says to Huneric, "You call Jove Thunderer, Shaker of O." Huneric was, however, a Christian, not a pagan. In Marlowe's Faustus vi., the Chorus says, "Learned Faustus, To know the secrets of astronomy Graven in the book of Jove's high firmament, Did mount himself to scale O.' top." In Cockayne's Masque for Twelfth Night 14, Ganyমেদ is called "O.' nectar and ambrosia keeper." In Greene's Alphonsus, prol. 3, Venus speaks of the seats of the goddesses "Placed on the top of high O. Mt." In Wilson's Cobler 1218, there is a proclamation "Given at O. by Jupiter and the celestial synod." Milton, P. L. vii. 3, says, "Above the On. hill I soar." In i. 516, he says that the gods of Greece "on the snowy top Of cold O. ruled the middle air." In vii. 7, he says to Urania, "Thou Nor of the Muses nine, nor on the top Of old O. dwellest."

In x. 583, he says that Ophion "had first the rule of high O."

O. is used in the sense of heaven. In Ev. Wom. I. i. 1, Acutus says, "The gates of a great man Are faster barred against necessity Than Dives' entrance at O. gate." Again, in ii. 3, he says, "She that loves true learning and pomp disdains Treads on Tartarus and O. gains." The last line of Shakespeare's Epitaph at Stratford runs: "Terra tegit, populus moeret, O. habet."

O. is used to denote anything of exceptional size, weight, or height. In Selimus 2428, Selim says, "The monstrous giant Monichus Hurl'd mt. O. at great Mars his targe." The same passage occurs in Lochrine ii. 5, 9. In Cor. v. 3, 30, Coriolanus says, "My mother bows, As if O. to a mole-hill should in supplication nod." In Tit. ii. 1, 1, Aaron says, "Now climbeth Tamora O.' top Safe out of Fortune's shot." In J. C. iii. 1, 74, Caesar says to Cinna, "Hence! wilt thou lift up O.?" In iv. 3, 92, Brutus says, "A flatterer's [eye] would not [see such faults] though they do appear As huge as high O." In Ham. v. 1, 277, Laertes bids the grave-diggers to pile their dust on him "Till of this flat a mtn. you have made To o'ertop old Pelion or the skyish head Of blue O." In Oth. ii. 1, 190, Othello says, "Let the labouring bark climb hills of seas O.-high." In B. & F. Bonduca v. 1, Caratach bids the Romans raise the funeral-pile of Pœnius "high as O." In Valentinian iv. 4, Maximus will build a pyre for Æcius "more and greater than green O. can feed with cedar." In Massinger's Actor iii. 1, Julia says, "If you but compare What I have suffered with your injuries, They will appear like molehills to O." In Shirley's Gent. Ven. iii. 4, Bernardo says, "Talk of terrors With words O.-high." In Bromé's Ct. Beggar iv. 3, Ferdinand says, "Heap yet more mtns., mtns. upon mtns., Pindus on Ossa, Atlas on O." In Massinger's New Way iv. 1, Lovell says, "He is no more shaken than O. is When angry Boreas loads his double head With sudden drifts of snow." Massinger is confusing double-peaked Parnassus with O. So in T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 96, Godfrey tells how Jove "Warred with the giant, great Enceladus, And flung him from O.' two-topped mount." See PARNASSUS.

Olympus is sometimes confused with Olympia, q.v. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 7, 41, speaks of "the marble pillar that is pight Upon the top of Mt. O. height. For the brave youthful champions to assay With burning chariot wheels it nigh to smite; But who that smites it mars his joyous play." Spenser confuses Olympus with Olympia (q.v.), but the idea of a chariot race on the top of a mountain is so absurd that one wonders how the poet made such a slip. There is the same confusion in Ruines of Rome ii., where he speaks of "Jove's great image in O. placed." The famous statue of Zeus was in Olympia. Linche, in Diella (1596) iii. 10, says of his mistress: "Her Ivory front . . . Looks like the table of O. Jove." Table means picture, but Linche must be thinking of the Chrys-elephantine statue of Zeus at Olympia. In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Chough apostrophizes Corineus: "When Hercules and thou Wert on the Oc. mount together Was wrestling in request."

OMER, SAINT. A fortified town in N. France on the Aa, 26 m. S.E. of Calais. The English Jesuits founded a Seminary here in 1592, in which some of the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot were educated. Its site is now occupied by the Military Hospital. In Massinger's Dowry ii. 2, Novall says of Charalois, who is dressed in black: "How he wears his clothes!—As if he had come this Christmas from St. O.'s To see his friends." In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater says, "I was offended

[in Paris] with a villainous scent of onions which the wind brought from St. O.'s." St. O.'s is 177 m. from Paris. He is thinking of the onions used on fast days at the Seminary.

OPHIR. The land from which the ships of Solomon brought gold and other Eastern products. The ships sailed from Ezion-Geber, at the head of the Gulf of Akaba; and O. must therefore be accessible from the Red Sea. The most probable view is that it was in S.E. Arabia on the Persian Gulf. But it has also been held to be on the E. coast of Africa opposite to Madagascar, where some remarkable ruins were discovered in 1871 abt. 200 m. inland, supposed to be the mines of Solomon. Others locate it in the Malay Peninsula. To the Elizabethans it simply stood for a land rich in gold. In Selimus 254, Selim speaks of "The Turkish crown of pearl and O. gold." In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Byron says of La Fin: "I'll make him malleable As th' O. gold." In Jonson's Staple ii. 1, Pennyboy junior speaks of the wealthy lady Pecunia as "the daughter of O." In Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon, introducing Surly to Subtle's laboratory, says, "There within are the golden mines, great Solomon's O." In Mariam iii. 2, Pheroras asks: "What's the condition? let me quickly know That I as quickly your command may act; Were it to see what herbs in O. grow." Milton, P. L. xi. 400, identifies Sofala in Mozambique with O.: Heylyn mentions this view, but rejects it. In Love's Garland (1624), the 8th Posy runs: "A constant heart within a woman's breast Is O. gold within an ivory chest." In Cowley's Cutter ii. 3, Puny says to Aurelia, "I have O. for thee if thou hast words of comfort for me." Milton, in Reformation in England (1641), p. 21, calls Philip II of Spain "that sad intelligencing tyrant, that mischiefs the world with his mines of O.," i.e. his wealth from the Spanish possessions in America.

OPHIUSA (i.e. the ISLAND OF SERPENTS). The most Southerly of the Balearic Isles, now Formentara. It abounded in serpents, whence its name. Milton, P. L. x. 526, says that when the fallen angels were turned into serpents, "not so thick swarmed once . . . the isle O."

OPORTO. A spt. in Portugal, on the right bank of the Douro, 2 m. from its mouth. In Stucley 2671, amongst those who were killed at the battle of Alcazar are mentioned "The D. of Averro and the Bish. of Cambra and Portua," i.e. Oporto. It gave its name to Port wine, but that beverage was not so called until the end of the 17th cent.

ORACLE. Another name for Jonson's club-room at the Devil Tavern, called the Apollo, q.v. In Shirley's Fair One iii. 4, Fowler says, "To the O., boys! Come, we'll have thy story in Apollo; come, to the O.!"

ORANGE, or ORENGE. A city in France, in the department of Vaucluse, 18 m. N. of Avignon and 340 m. S.E. of Paris. It is the old Roman Arausio, and contains a fine triumphal arch of the time of Tiberius and a magnificent Roman theatre. The first Prince of O. was Bertrand de Baux (1181). In 1530 René of Nassau inherited the title. He was made Stadtholder of the Netherlands by Charles V, and dying childless bequeathed it to William, his cousin. William of O. became the champion of the liberties of the United Provinces. In 1572 the States accepted him as Stadtholder, and he earned on the war of Liberation against Spain till his assassination in 1584 by Balthasar Gerard, who was executed with cruel tortures. He was succeeded by his 2nd son Maurice, a youth of 17, afterwards famous as the Grave (i.e. Graf) Maurice. He died in 1625, and was succeeded by his brother Frederick Henry. On his death in 1647 his son William II followed him: he had married Mary, the daughter of Charles I of England, and his son William became William III of England by the Revolution of 1688.

References to William I. In Larum A. 3, Cornelius says, "The Antwerpians Have remained ay neutral, neither aiding The Prince of O. nor offending you [the Spaniards]." In Tuke's Five Hours ii. 1, Octavio says, "He did wonders at the siege of Mons"; and Antonio replies: "You mean at the pursuit of the German army led by the Prince of O." This was in 1572. In B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Bianca says, "His infliction, That killed the Prince of O., will be sport To what we purpose." Puttenham, Art of Poesie iii. 16 (1589), says, "The Prince of Orange for his devise of Arms in banner displayed against the D. of Alba used 'Pro rege, pro lege, pro grege.'"

References to Prince Maurice. In B. & F. Pestle iii. 5, the citizen's wife says of the boy at the theatre: "The little boy's come again; methinks he looks something like the prince of O. in his long stocking, if he had a little harness about his neck." No doubt the reference is to some well-known portrait of young Maurice. In Barnavelt i. 1, Modes-Bargen says to Barnavelt, "This Grave Maurice, this now Prince of O., Was still by you commanded." The title is used punningly in B. & F. Brother ii. 2, where the Cook says, "I'll bring you in the Lady Loins-o-Veal With the long love she bore the Prince of O." Veal was usually served up with an o. in the mouth of the calf.

ORCADES. The groups of islands to the N. of Scotland known as the Orkneys and the Shetlands. Chaucer, in Troilus and Cryseyde v. 971, says, "Men Shal finde as worthy folke withinne Troye toun As ben betwixen O. and Inde." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. v. 1, Arthur claims to have won "the Scots and Picts and O." In Wilson's Pedler, 1180, the Pedler asks: "Did you never hear of an island called Thewle near to the O.?" In Nash's Summers, p. 100, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to the O. for geese." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxv. 6, exhorts his verses: "Take you wing unto the O.; There let my verse get glory in the north." In his Ep. from Mortimer to Isabel, he says, "Bruce shall bring on his Redshanks from the seas, From the isled Orcads and the Eubides." In S. Rowley's When You i. 1, K. Henry speaks of England as "Bordering upon the frozen O."

ORCUS (a synonym for HELL). Properly the name of the God of the Lower World, who punishes those who break their oaths: "orkos" being the Greek for an oath. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, Bajazeth says, "Then shall our footmen . . . with their cannons mouthed like O.' gulf Batter the walls." In Richards' Messallina ii., Lepida says to Messallina, "Descend To dreadful O. cell." In T. Heywood's S. Age v., Theseus tells how Orpheus had power "To charm the cur, pierce O., Pluto please." Donne, Elegy xiv. (1600) 23, calls Julia's mind "that O., which includes Legions of mischief." In Mason's Mulleasses 1758, Borgias says, "Fetch up the snaky-curl'd Eumenides From O. bottom." In Be-guiled 1976, Sophos talks of "the burning vaults of Orke."

ORDOVICES. The tribe inhabiting the N.W. part of Wales. In Fisher's Fuinus ii. 1, Cassibelanus speaks of "Guerthed, whose command Embraces woody Ordo- vic's black hills."

OREB. See HOEB.

ORENOQUE (i.e. ORINOCO). A large river in Venezuela, S. America, rising in the Andes and flowing in a general E. direction to the Atlantic, which it enters by a delta just N. of British Guiana, after a course of 1352 m. Hall, in Satires iv. 3, 30, says that Fortunio "gads to Guiane land to fish for gold, Meeting perhaps, if O. deny, Some straggling pinnace of Polonian rye." The allusion is to Raleigh's famous voyage to Guiana and the Orinoco in 1596.

ORIENT. The E. part of the sky, and also the lands of the E., specially Asia. Shakespeare's Sonnet vii. begins: "Lo in the O. when the gracious light Lifts up his burning head." In H4 B., Ind. 3, Rumour says, "I from the O. to the drooping W. . . still unfold The acts commenced on this ball of earth." In Tiberius 894, Drusus says, "The O. doth shine in warlike steel." Hence o. means shining, precious, like an eastern gem, specially a pearl. In Pass. Pilg. x. 33, we have: "Bright o. pearl, alack, too timely shaded." In M. N. D. iv. 1, 59, Oberon speaks of dew-drops "like round and o. pearls." In R3 iv. 4, 322, Richd. says that Elizabeth's tears shall be "transformed to o. pearl." In Ant. i. 5, 41, Alexas brings Cleopatra "this o. pearl" from Antony. In Venus 981, Venus "sometimes falls an o. drop." In Partiail i. 4, Florabella offers her lover "a chain of oriental pearl."

ORKE. See ORCUS.

ORLEANS (Oe. = Orleanse). A city in France on the right bank of the Loire, 75 m. S.W. of Paris. From 498 to 613 it was the capital of the Merovingian kingdom: it was then brought into union with Paris, but remained one of the chief cities of the French monarchy. Its university was founded in 1305. It was besieged by the English, but the siege was raised by Joan of Arc, the Maid of O., on 7 May, 1429. The 1st D. of O. was Louis, 2nd son of Charles V. He was murdered in 1407, and succeeded by his son Charles, who married Isabella, widow of Richd. II of England. He was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt in 1415, and lived a prisoner in England till 1440. He died in 1465. His son was K. Louis XII, and with his accession the title merged in the crown. The Bastard of O. mentioned in H6 A. was John Count of Longueville and Dunois, natural son of Louis, the 1st D., by the wife of the Lord of Caunty.

In H6 A. i. 1, 60, news is brought of the loss of O.; and in i. 1, 110, a Messenger tells of the defeat of Lord Talbot on 10th August, "Retiring from the siege of O." i. 2 is before O.: the defeat of the French and the arrival of Joan La Pucelle are described; i. 4, 5, 6, and ii. 1 and 2 continue the story of the raising of the siege by Joan, though ii. 1 and 2 really took place at Manns. The D. of O. in H5 is Charles, 2nd D.: he is described as being at the battle of Agincourt, and in iv. 8, 80, "Charles D. of O., nephew to the K., is mentioned as one of the prisoners of good sort. In H6 A. iv. 3, 69, La Pucelle says to Burgundy, "Was not the D. of O. thy foe? And was he not in England prisoner? But when they heard he was thine enemy They set him free without his ransom paid." This is inaccurate, as he was not set free till 1440. In H6 B. i. 1, 7, he is mentioned as being present at the betrothal of Henry VI to Margaret of Anjou in 1445. The Bastard of O. is welcomed by Charles at the siege of O. in H6 A. i. 2; and in iv. 6, Talbot describes how he fought him "after he had drawn blood from young Talbot." In H8 ii. 4, 174, the K. speaks of "the debating A marriage 'twixt the D. of O. and Our daughter Mary." This was Henry, the 2nd son of Francis I of France. There is a fictitious O. in Dekker's Fortunatus, the date of which is during the reign of K. Athelstan in England. There is another D. of Oe. in Chivalry, the date being about 1260: he is also imaginary. In Massinger's Parl. Love, the D. of O. is Louis, who succeeded his cousin Charles VIII on the throne of France as Louis XII: he is also mentioned in Barnes' Charter ii. 1, where Guicchiardine, as Chorus, says, "The D. of Oe., Lewis XII, Conjointly knitting force, doth march in arms With Ferdinand of Spain." The D. and Duchess of O. in B. & F. Hon. Man are not historical persons. In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, Bellamont proposes to have his tragedy, Astyanax, acted "at the marriage of the D. of O." But there was no D. of O. at this time (1605). The title was in abeyance, and was not revived till 1626.

In Chapman's Consp. Byron i. 1, Roiseau describes Picote as "a Frenchman and in O. born." In B. & F. Wild Goose v. 2, the Young Man says that Leverdure "is now at O. about some business." In Massinger's Dowry v. 1, the Bailiff says of Liladam: "He was a prentice to Le Robe at O." In Greene's Friar iv., the Emperor says that Vandermast has been "To Paris, Rheims, and stately O."; and in ix., Vandermast boasts that he has given the non-plus "to Frankfort, Lutetia, and O.": the reference in both cases being to the University. Dallington, in Method of Travel (1598), says that O. is the best place for learning the French language. Dekker, in Lanthorn, says that before the confusion of tongues "there was no Frenchman to parley in the full and stately phrase of O."

O. was in the midst of a fine wine-growing country. In B. & F. Gentleman ii. 1, Jaques says of Marine's father: "He lived And died in O., where he had his vines As fruitful as experience could make. He had his presses for 'em and his wines Were held the best." In Peele's Old Wives 400, Sacrapant has "a cup of neat wine of O., that never came near the brewers of England." In Middleton's R. G. i. 1, Neatfoot asks Mary: "Will you vouchsafe to kiss the lip of a cup of rich O. in the buttery?" Nash, in Wilton K. 1, says, "They know a cup of neat Gascoigne wine from wine of O." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 114, the K. says of Conte: "Receive him to your tent and let him taste A cup of Oe. wine." In Davenport's New Trick iii. 1, Friar John says, "My spirit whispers Oe. grape's the best; What says mine host to a pure cup of Oe.?" In Sampson's Vow v. 1, 70, Ball says, "One cup of brisk Oe. Makes him i' the temper he was when he leaped into Leene." In B. & F. Elder B. i. 1, Angellina says she would not feast her guests "with imagined nectar; Pure O. would do better."

ORMINIUS. A mtn. range in S.E. Bithynia, on the borders of Paphlagonia. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, Frederick says, "Natolia hath dismissed the greatest part Of all his army pitched against our power Betwixt Cutheia and O.' mt."

ORMUSA (probably ORMUZ is meant, q.v.). It is, however, "sufficiently known" not to be in Cyprus, but near the mouth of the Persian Gulf. In Bacchus, the 18th guest was "one Baudwin Barrel-belly from Ormusa, a place sufficiently known in the Ile of Cyprusse."

ORMUZ (properly HORMUZ). An ancient city on the N. shore of the Straits of Ormuz at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. It was the chief mart of the province of Kirman, and had a large trade with India. About 1300 the inhabitants were driven by the raids of the Tartars to abandon their city and cross over to the neighbouring island of Jerun, to which also the name O. was transferred. A new city sprang up on the N. of the island, which in the 15th cent. had an immense trade in spices, drugs, silks, and pearls. In 1514 it was seized by the Portuguese, and the K. was subordinated to their officers. In 1622 it was besieged by the ships of an English company that had been formed for trading with Persia, and taken after a defence of 10 weeks. The Persian merchants, however, transferred themselves to Gombroon on the mainland, and O. quickly sank into insignificance.

In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Subtle tells Druggier "There is a ship now coming from O. that shall yield him such a commodity of drugs." In Mayne's Match v. 4, Cypher tells Warehouse, "Your 2 ships that were now coming home from O. are both cast away. The wreck was valued at some 40,000 pound." In B. & F. Women Pleased i. 2, Lopez says, "These diamonds of O., bought for little, Here vented at the price of princes' ransoms." The scene of Greville's Alaham is laid in O. In Milton, P. L. ii. 2, Satan's throne "far Outshone the wealth of Ormus and of Ind."

ORONTES. A river in N. Syria, rising in the Anti-Libanus range, and flowing past Antioch into the Mediterranean. Juvenal uses it as a synonym for Syrian luxury and vice: "in Tiberim defluxit O.," he complains. In B. & F. Bonduca i. 2, Petilius, reporting the discontent of the soldiers, says: "The British waters are grown dull and muddy, The fruit disgusting; O. must be sought for, And apples from the Happy Isles." Milton, P. L. iv. 273, speaks of "that sweet grove Of Daphne by O." In ix. 80, Satan surveys the earth "West from O. to the ocean barred At Darien."

OROS (Côte d'or). A mtn. in Burgundy. In Chapman's Consp. Byron iii. 2, 155, Byron says to the D. of Savoy, "I will have the famous mtn. O. That looks out of the duchy where I govern Into your Highness' dukedom" carved into a likeness of himself so that "every man shall say 'This is Byron.'" The idea is taken from the story of Stacirates, who proposed to carve a statue of Alexander the Gt. out of Mt. Athos. Byron was Governor of Burgundy.

OSBRIDGE (OSPRINGE). A vill. in Kent, on the old Pilgrims Rd. to Canterbury, a mile or so S.W. of Feversham. Here Chaucer's Pilgrims spent the 3rd night of their journey. In Feversham, the Epilogue informs us "Greene was hanged at O. in Kent." It was usual for the execution to be carried out near to the scene of the crime.

OSSA. A mtn. on the E. of Thessaly, now called Kissavo. It stands S.E. of the Vale of Tempe, opposite to Olympus, and is about 5000 ft. high. In the war between the Giants and the Gods the Giants piled O. on Olympus and Pelion on O. in order to scale the heavens. In Ham. v. 1, 306, Hamlet says, "Let them throw Millions of acres on us, till our ground, Singeing his pate against the burning zone, Make O. like a wart." In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Bussy says, "My sun is turned to blood, in whose red beams Pindus and O., hid in drifts of snow . . . from their veins Melt like a hungry torrents." In Nero iii. 2, Nero says, "They tell of Orpheus, when he took his lute . . . O. then first shook off his snow and came To listen."

In Val. Welsh ii. 2, the Bard says, "Gederus Fights like those giants that, to cope with Jove, Hurled O. upon Pelion." In Kyd's Solyman i., Basilisco says, "Wouldst thou have me a Titan to bear up Pelion or O.?" In T. Heywood's Traveller iv. 3, Geraldine, finding Delaville with Mrs. Wincott, cries: "To suppress Your souls yet lower, without hope to rise, Heap O. upon Pelion." In Wilson's Swisser iii. 1, Asprandus says, "Set Pelion upon O., and there place him; The justness of our cause would fetch him down Into the lowest depth." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 3, Ferdinand cries: "Heap yet more mtns., mtns. upon mtns., Pindus on O., Atlas on Olympus." Beaumont, in Salmacis, uses the form Osse: "That glittering crown whose radiant sight did toss Great Pelion from the top of mighty Osse." In Richards' Messallina v. 2182, Saufellus, when the ghosts of his victims appear, cries: "Pindus and O. cover me with snow!" Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 3, speaks of "the ruins of great O. hill, And triumphs of Phlegraean Jove." The author of Zepheria (1594) xxxvi. 8, says, "This is to heap O. on Pelion." In Mason's Mulleasses 2356, Borgias says, "Make me stand as firm as oaks on O."

OSSORY. A bishopric in Ireland, including King's and Queen's Counties and Kilkenny. It has now been transferred to Kilkenny. John Bale, the indefatigable playwright (1495-1563), was Bp. of Ossory.

OSSUNA. A town in Spain in the province of Andalusia, 41 m. E. of Seville. Act i. of B. & F. Pilgrimage is laid in the Inn at O., and ii. 2 is in a forest near O.

OSTEND. A spt. in Belgium, 70 m. N.W. of Brussels. It was strongly fortified by the Prince of Orange in 1583. It was invested by the Spaniards under the Archduke on 5th July, 1601, and taken on 14th September, 1604, by Spinola. The Spaniards were computed to have lost 100,000 men in the siege. In Tourneur's Atheist ii. 1, the Servant announces Borachio as "one i' the habit of a soldier, newly returned from O.," and he gives a long and interesting description of the siege, where he reports that Charlemont was drowned, and D'Amville orders him: "Away! . . . or . . . You'll find me a more fatal enemy Than ever was O." In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, 7, Janin says, "Count Maurice [is] already entered Brabant . . . to relieve O., And the Archduke full prepared to hinder him." In Ret. Pernass. iv. 2, Sir Radericke says, "What have we here, 3 begging soldiers? Come you from O. or from Ireland?" In B. & F. Cure i. 1, Vitelli says of Alvarez: "His extreme wants enforced him to take pay I' the army, sat down then before O." In Dekker's Westward iv. 2, Justiniano speaks of "the Book of the siege of O., writ by one that dropped in the action." Burton, A. M., Intro., says, "At the siege of O. . . 120,000 men lost their lives."

Its stubborn defence made it proverbial for anything very hard to capture, especially a good woman's virtue. In Ret. Pernass. iii. 3, the Page says of Amoretto, "by the time his contemplation is arrived at his mistress' nose-end, he is as glad as if he had taken O." In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Birdlime says to the Merchant's wife, "How long will you hold out, think you? Not so long as O." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. iv. 1, the servant says that the constancy of a woman "is harder to come by than ever was O." In Shirley's Ball ii. 3, Winfield says, "O. was sooner taken than her fort is like to be." In B. & F. Prize i. 3, Sophocles, who has been driven from Maria's room, says, "The chamber's nothing but a mere O.: In every window pewter cannons mounted." In the Coxcomb ii. 2, Valerio says, "When they [the constables] take a thief, I'll take O. again." In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Truewit says, "Penelope herself cannot hold out long. O., you saw, was taken at last." Taylor, in Works ii. 234, says, "The world runs on wheels like Pompeie's Bdge. at O." This was apparently a movable bidge. over some part of the harbour. In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "O. bid you beware the Cat": cat being apparently used in the sense of a prostitute.

OSTERLEY. A lordship concerning which a quarrel arose between Gresham and Ramsey. It lies a little over 1 m. N.W. of Brentford in Middlesex. Gresham had a mansion there where he entertained Q. Elizabeth in 1577. One of the first paper mills in England was established here in the 2nd half of the 16th cent. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 265, Lady Ramsey says, "There is a lordship called O. that M. Gresham hath bought and built upon; which O. my husband here did think to buy and had given earnest for it."

OSTIA. The port of ancient Rome, situated at the mouth of the Tiber on its S. bank. It was replaced during the early years of the Empire by a new port some 2 m. N. of the old O. In Peele's Alcazar v. 1, 162, Stucley says, "I with my companies embarked at O.": the quarto has "Austria." In Richards' Messallina i. 512, the Empress says, "Cæsar despatched to O., We'll find fit time to make you shine in glory." Later, line 523, the Emperor says, "The season of the year Calls us with speed from Rome to Hostia."

OTHRIS. A range of mtns. in S. Thessaly, running E. from the Pindus range to the sea. The highest peak is 5669 ft. above the sea. In Brandon's Octavia 1718, Octavia says, "I will fly where Pyndus hides his head Among the stars, or where ambitious O. The clouds' swift motion bars." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 2, Frederick, in his mad raving, says, "Carry me up to Hymettus' top, Cytheron, O., or Pindus where she [Diana] affects to walk and take the air." In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Medea goes to gather the simples that grow "in Tempe of Thessaly, mt. Pindus, Othris, Ossa, Appidane." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 2, Himilco says that his sword shall now be "touched With trembling fingers, white as O. snow."

OTRANTO. A spt. in the heel of Italy at its most E. point, in the province of Terra di Otranto. It was taken by the Turks in 1480. In Gascoigne's Supposes i. 2, Cleander says, "I came out of O. when the Turks won it." In Davenant's Favourite i. 1, Saladine says, "Our politicians to join O. to his crown Did force him to this match."

OTTOMAN. The name of the founder of the Turkish Empire, pronounced Osman by the Turks themselves. He established his power in Asia Minor in 1301, and in 1453 one of his successors, Muhammed II, took Constantinople and made it the capital of the O. Empire. The Elizabethans use the word O. for the Turks in general. In Oth. i. 3, 33, a messenger brings word: "The Ottomites . . . Steering with due course towards the isle of Rhodes, Have there injoined them with an after fleet." In i. 3, 49, the D. informs Othello: "We must straight employ you Against the general enemy O." and in line 235, Othello undertakes "These present wars against the Ottomites." In ii. 3, 171, Othello says, "Are we turned Turks and to ourselves do that Which heaven hath forbid the Ottomites?" In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 3, Prospero says, "Some ships of Malta met the O. fleet And gave me freedom."

The word is also used for O. himself, and for his successors, more usually called "the Great Turks." In Selimus 2193, Mustapha says of Selim: "His cruel soul will never be at rest Till none remain of O.'s fair race But he himself." In Val. Welsh ii. 5, Juggler says, "He shall subdue the Turk and pluck great Otoman from off his throne." In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 5, Albumazar says of his machine for perpetual motion: "Deliver it safe to a Turkey factor and bid him present it from me to the house of O." In Ital. Gent. ii. 2, the Pedant parodies Medusa's list of devils with "Ottomman, Sophye, Turke, and the Great Cham." In Day's Travails, Bullen, p. 15, the Bashaw says, "Let the sun of Ottaman take strength." In Cockayne's Obstinate iv. 2, Carionil says, "The O. emperors In their immense seraglio never saw Your matchless features." The word is also used for Turkey, or perhaps Constantinople. In Marlowe's Jew v. 3, Barabas says, "Calymath, when he hath viewed the town, Will take his leave and sail towards O." The O. standard was the crescent moon. In Shirley's Servant iv. 5, Belinda says, "The silver moon of O. looks pale Upon my greater empire."

OUSE. The name of four rivers in England. The Yorkshire O. is formed by the junction of the Swale and Ure near Boroughbridge, and flows in a S.E. direction past York into the estuary of the Humber. Its length is abt. 60 m. Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 6, says, "York many wonders of her O. can tell."

The Great O. rises in the S. of Northants. and flows in a N.E. direction into the Wash at King's Lynn after a course of abt. 160 m., during which it receives many affluents. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 34, says, "Next these the plenteous O. came far from land By many a city and by many a town, And many rivers taking underhand Into his waters as he passeth down."

The Little O. is a tributary of the Gt. O. The Sussex O. is a small river in that county.

OUTTALIAN. A clown's mistake for Italian. In Contention, Haz., p. 501, when Say says of Kent it is bona terra, Dick says, "He speaks French."—"No," says the Miller, "'tis Dutch"; and Nicke says, "No, 'tis outtalian, I know it well enough."

OUZE. Another name for the Isis, q.v. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 24, says that the wife of the Thame is "The O., whom men do Isis rightly name."

OXFORD. The capital of Oxfordsh., at the junction of the Thames (here called Isis) and the Cherwell, 45 m. N.W. of Lond. The older name was Oxenford, and the abbreviation of the Latin form of the name—Oxon—is often used. It is the seat of one of the great English Universities. The colleges existing in our period, with the dates of their foundation, are as follows: University (1249); Balliol (1263); Merton (1264); Exeter (1314); Oriel (1326); Queen's (1340); New (1386); Lincoln (1427); All Souls (1437); Magdalen (1456); Brasenose (1509); Corpus Christi (1516); Trinity (1554); St. John's (1557); Jesus (1571); Wadham (1613); Pembroke (1624). The Church of St. Mary the Virgin dates from 1400; the Bodleian Library was founded in 1602. The Castle was built in the 11th cent.

General Allusions to the City. The Miller's Tale, in Chaucer's C. T., concerns a carpenter who lived at Oxenford. In Thersites 220, Mater mentions "Mother Brice of O. and great Gib of Hinksey" in a list of witches. In Downfall Huntingdon iv. 2, the Bp. of Ely says, "I dwell in Oxon, Sir." A plot was made against Henry IV immediately after his accession by Huntingdon, Salisbury, Aumerle, and others: a tournament was to be arranged at O. and the K. was to be invited, and then "suddenly slain." It was discovered in time, and several of the conspirators were beheaded. In R2 v. 2, 52, York asks Aumerle: "What news from O.?" Hold these jousts and triumphs?" and in line 99, he tells the Duchess: "A dozen of them here . . . have set down their hands To kill the K. at O." In v. 3, 13, Percy says that he has told Prince Henry "of those triumphs held at O." In line 141, the K. sends powers to O. to arrest the traitors; and in v. 6, Fitzwater announces the execution at O. of Brocas and Seely, two of them. The headquarters of Charles I were at O. from 1643 to the defeat of Naseby in 1645. In Cowley's Cutter i. 4, Jolly says, "My own estate was sold for being with the K. at O."

O. gave their title to the Earls of O., the first of whom was Aubrey de Vere, created in 1135. In R2 v. 6, 8, the Qq. read: "I have to London sent The heads of O., Salisbury, Blunt, and Kent"; but this is a mistake, as O. was not implicated in the plot at all: the slip is due to the fact that the plot was to have been carried out at O. The Earl of O. of H6 C. is John de Vere, the 13th Earl. His father John and his elder brother Aubrey were beheaded by the Yorkists in 1461. In H6 C. iii. 3, 100, when Warwick appeals to him to call Edward king, O. replies: "Call him my k. by whose injurious doom My elder brother, the Lord Aubrey Vere, Was done to death, and more than so, my father, Even in the downfall of his mellow years? No, Warwick; no; while life upholds this arm, This arm upholds the house of Lancaster." In iv. 8, 17, Warwick, who had by this time changed sides, addresses him as "brave O., wondrous well-beloved," and sends him to collect forces in O.-shire. In v. 1, he joins Warwick at Coventry: he fought at Barnet, and after the battle fled to Q. Margaret (v. 3, 15). In v. 5, 2, after the battle of Tewkesbury, Edward says, "Away with O. to Hames Castle straight"; but this is not quite accurate: it was not till 1473 that O. was taken and sent to Ham Castle, where he was kept prisoner for 12 years. In R3 ii. 1, 112, K. Edward recalls how "in the field by Tewkesbury When O. had me down, he [Clarence] rescued me." He escaped from Ham in 1485, and commanded the van of Richmond's army at Bosworth. In R3 iv. 5, Urswick brings word that O. has resorted to Richmond; and in v. 3, 27, Richmond says, "My Lord of O., stay with me." He defeated Lambert Simnel at Stoke in 1487, and died in 1514. He is one of the characters in Ford's Warbeck, where he appears as a staunch supporter of the K., Henry VII. The Earl of O. is one of the K.'s supporters in Davenport's Matilda. This was Robert de Vere, 3rd Earl. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy iii. 1, Clermont says, "I overtook, coming from Italy, In Germany a great and famous Earl Of England, the most goodly-fashioned man I ever saw; . . . He was beside of spirit passing great, Valiant and learned, and liberal as the sun, Spoke and writ sweetly; . . . And 'twas the Earl of O." This was Edward de Vere (1562-1604), 17th Earl, a traveller, musician, poet, and dandy. Puttenham, in Art of Poetrie, praises him for his excellence in "comedy and interlude." Mr. Looney has recently claimed him as the author of Shakespeare's Plays and Poems!

The University of Oxford. Roger Bacon began his studies at O., and after a residence in Paris returned to O., where he lived from 1250 to 1257 and from 1268 to 1278. Greene's Friar is largely concerned with him, and scenes ii. v., vi., vii., ix., xi., xiii., and xv. take place at O., some of them in Bacon's cell, or study, which is wrongly located in Brasenose College (not yet founded), some in other parts of the University. In ix. the Emperor says, "Trust me, Plantagenet, these O. schools Are richly seated near the river side; The mtns. full of fat and fallow deer, The battling pastures lade with kine and flocks; The town gorgeous with high-built colleges, And scholars seemly in their grave attire, Learned in searching principles of art." Greene was thinking of O. as he knew it, when he was incorporated there in 1588. In sc. xi., we have the famous legend of the Brazen Head, constructed by Bacon, which uttered the 3 sentences: "Time is, Time was, Time is past." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Openwork says, "I'll ride to O. and watch out mine eyes But I'll hear the Brazen Head speak." Bacon missed hearing it by falling asleep. In Peele's Ed. i. iii. 66, Baliol says, "We will erect a college of my name; In O. will I build." It was his widow, the Lady Dervorgilla, who carried out his pious intention. In Marlowe's Ed. ii. 2, Baldock says, "My gentry I fetch from O., not from heraldry." In Haughton's Englishmen i. 1, Anthony says, "When first my mother O., England's pride, Fostered me, pupil-like, with her rich store, My study was to read philosophy." Dr. Baxter, who is described as "Chancellor of O.," is one of the characters in Wilkins' Enforced Marriage; and in ii. 2, John Scarborough says, "From O. am I drawn from serious studies." In H4 B. iii. 2, 12, Shallow says, "I dare say my cousin William is become a good scholar: he is at O. still, is he not?" In H8 iv. 2, 59, Griffith says of Wolsey: "Ever witness for him Those twins of learning that he raised in you, Ipswich and O.!" and goes on to speak of Christ Ch. as "though unfinished, yet so famous That Christendom shall ever speak his virtue." Wolsey founded Christ Ch. in 1525. One cannot forget Chaucer's Clerk of Oxenford (Prol. 285), nor that other Clerk of Oxenford, jolly Jenkyn, who was 5th husband of the Wife of Bath (D. 524). In Ret. Pernass. i. 4, Philomusus speaks of "the hide-bound brethren of Cambridge and O.," and in iii. 2, Sir Radericke says, "'Tis a shame there should be any such privilege for proud beggars as Cambridge and O. are." In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Gilthead sends his son to live with a Justice, Sir Paul Eitherside, where "you shall learn that in a year shall be worth 20 of having staid you at O. or at Cambridge." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 26, praising O. and Cambridge as "ye double nursery Of Arts," adds: "But O., thine doth Thame most glorify." Raleigh, in Epitaph on Sir P. Sidney 21, says, "Kent, thy birthdays; and O. held thy youth." In Jonson's Magnetic i. 1, Ironside, after quoting a logical proposition, says, "This is a piece Of O.'s science, Stays with me ere since I left that place." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 127 (Croll), satirizes O. under the pseudonym of Athens. He speaks of the riot and drunkenness of the students, their fashionable dress, their general pride and filthiness, and lying and irreligion. "Is it not become a byword amongst the common people," he says, "that they had rather send their children to the cart than to the University?"

The University played an important part in the development of the drama in England. Plays were acted in the various colleges, at first in Latin, afterwards in English too. The earliest recorded performance is at Magdalen in 1486. Other recorded plays are Hoker's Piscator (Magdalen 1535); Grimald's Christus Redivivus (Brasenose 1542); Grimald's Archipropheta (Christ Church 1547); Campion's Nectar et Ambrosia (St. John's 1564); Marcus Germinus, Calphill's Progne, and Richard Edwards' Arcyte (in English) played at Elizabeth's visit in 1566. In the same year Gascoigne's Ariosto (Trinity); Terence's Eunuchus (Merton); and Gammer Gorton's Needle (Christ's). From this time to the Q.'s death there were some 20 plays brought out, including a Latin Julius Cæsar by Geddes, acted at Christ Church in 1582. Several of these were in English. Amongst them were Narcissus (St. John's). In the reign of James the practice was continued, about 15 plays being acted between 1605 and 1640. Nor must the work of John Lyly, George Peele, Robert Greene, Thomas Lodge—all Oxford men (Greene was at first at Cambridge)—be forgotten. These "University Wits" did excellent preparatory work in English drama. In Shirley's Fair One iv. 2, Treedle says, "What makes so many scholars come from O. and Cambridge, like market-women, with dossiers full of lamentable tragedies and ridiculous comedies, which they might here vent to the players, but they will take no money for them?"

OXFORD

O. gloves were made at the neighbouring Woodstock, and had a great reputation. In Dekker's Dead Term, he says, "Conscience goes like a fool in good colours, the skin of her body hanging so loose that, like an O. glove, thou wouldst swear there were a false skin within her."

Sir William Davenant was born at O., but there is little or no evidence for his boast that he was a natural son of Shakespeare, begotten on one of the great Master's journeys to Lond. from Stratford.

OXUS. A river of central Asia, rising in the Hindoo Koosh mtns., and running N.W. into the S. end of the Sea of Aral. There is a consensus of opinion among the ancient writers that the O. flowed into the Caspian Sea, and modern travellers have shown that this was probably the case and have discovered traces of the old river-bed. In Milton, P. L. xi. 389, "Samarchand by O." is one of the capital cities of the world shown in vision to Adam. Samarchand is abt. 150 m. E. of the river.

PACHINNE (PACHYNUS). Now Cape Passaro, the extreme S.E. point of Sicily. In T. Heywood's S. Age iii., Pluto, describing the burial of Typhon under Sicily, says, "Upon his left spacious P. lies."

PACIFIC OCEAN. The ocean lying W. of America. It was first seen from the Isthmus of Darien by Vasco Nunez de Balbao in 1513: Magellan entered it through the stormy straits S. of Cape Horn which bear his name, and called it, from the calm weather he experienced there, Mar Pacifico. Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "The Atlantic O. is still subject to storms, but in Del Zur, or Mare Pacifico, seldom or never any." Donne, in Hymn to God, my God (1630), asks: "Is the P. sea my home?" In Cowley's Cutter ii. 5, when Worm says he won't murder anyone, Puny replies: "Why, now ye speak like the Pacifick Sea." Fuller, Holy State (1642) ii. 22, tells how Drake in 1578 "Passed the Magellan Straits and then entered Mare Pacificum."

PACTOLUS. A river in Lydia, now the Sarabat, flowing from Mt. Tmolus N. into the Hermus. It was reported to have carried a good deal of gold-dust in its mud; and this gave rise to the legend that Midas, wishing to get rid of his power of turning all that he touched into gold, was ordered by the oracle to bathe in the P., which consequently acquired something of the same power. There is no gold in the river now. In Lyly's Midas ii. 2, the oracle sent to Midas is quoted: "In P. go bathe thy wish and thee: Thy wish the waves shall have, and thou be free." In iii. 3, Martius reports: "He no sooner bathed his limbs in the river but it turned to a golden stream, the sands to fine gold, and all to gold that was cast into the water." Nash, in Lenten, explains the legend in this way: Midas had eaten the golden fish, the red-herring, and "Silenus bade him but go and wash himself in the river P., that is, go wash it down with cups of wine." In Greene's Alphonus v. 2, 1617, Alphonus says, "Rich P., that river of account, Which doth descend from top of Tmolus mt., Shall be thy own." In Alimony iv. 8, the Merchant says, "Rich rix-dollars are sown like P. sand." In Shirley's Honor iv. 1, Squanderbag says, "Would I were in P. streams or Tagus! That were a lasting element." In Brome's Lovesick Ct. iv. 2, Philargus says to Philocles, "Be not prodigal of that blood, More precious than P.' golden Streams." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 6, 20, refers to "the golden sand The which P. with his waters shere Throws forth upon the rivage round about him near."

PADAN-ARAM (i.e. the field, or plain, of Aram or Syria). Applied in Gen. xxviii. 6 to N. Mesopotamia, otherwise called A.-Naharaim, i.e. A. of the 2 rivers. Milton, P. L. iii. 513, tells of the vision seen by Jacob "when he from Esau fled To P.-A."

PADDINGTON. A small vill. lying W. of Edgware Rd., a little over 3 m. in a direct line W. of St. Paul's, Lond. The population did not exceed 200. There were a number of springs there which were used for the water-supply of Lond. It was noted for its old taverns, amongst which were the Wheatsheaf, the White Lion, the Red Lion, and the Pack-horse. In W. Rowley's New Wonder v., Stephen says, "The plumbers and workmen have surveyed the ground from P.; whence I'll have laid pipes to Lond. to convey sweet water into Ludgate." Stephen Forster in 1463 had water brought from P. for the supply of the prison in Ludgate. In Jonson's Tub. ii. 1, Hitts says to Puppy, "He shall find out my captain lodged at the Red Lion in P." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Pompey speaks of his "solemn walks 'Twixt P. and Pancridge." In Shirley's Ball iv. 1, Barker speaks of a lady "tumbling in a coach towards P. To see the pheasants." Taylor, in Works i. 77, says, "I have seen many looking through a hempen window at St. Thomas Waterings or the three-legged instrument near P." The Tyburn gallows stood at the corner of Oxford St. and the Edgware Rd., some half a mile S.E. of P. In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Careless speaks of P. as one of "the City out-leaps" to which citizens went "for a spirt and back again." In his Academy ii. 1, Valentine says to Hannah, "Shall we cross o'er the water, or take coach to Kensington or P., or to some one or other o' th' City outleaps for an afternoon?"

PADUA, or PADOVA (the old PATAVIUM). A city in N. Italy on the Bacchiglione, 25 m. W. of Venice. The Palazzo della Ragione has the largest roof unsupported by columns in Europe. The ch. of St. Antony contains the bones of the saint, and was built in the 13th cent. The University, one of the most famous in Europe, was founded by Frederick II in 1238, and was specially renowned for its medical school. It had 1500 students when Coryat was at P. in 1611. In 1259 P. became independent and conquered Vicenza; from 1311 to 1318 it fell under the power of the Can Grande della Scala of Verona; from 1318 to 1405 it enjoyed independence under the Carraresi; from that time onward it was under the rule of Venice. It was said to have been founded by Antenor after the Trojan War. Livy was born there, and his bones were credulously reported to have been discovered in 1413. In Ado i. 1, 35, Hero informs us that Signor Benedick is "of P." In Shrew i. 1, 2, Lucentio describes it as "P., nursery of arts." In Gascoigne's Supposes i. 2, Cleander, who is a doctor, says that, after being driven from Otranto by the Turks, he "first came to P." and then to Ferrara. In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Flamineo says that Francisco "came along from P. I' the train of the young prince." In Jonson's Cynthia i. 1, Amorphus considers whether he will feign to have seen Asotus "in Venice or in P." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faustus tells how he has been "to Venice, P., and the rest, In one of which a sumptuous temple stands That threatens the stars with her aspiring top." This may mean St. Antony's at P., or St. Mark's at Venice. In the Faust Buch (1587), P. is described, and the author says, "A ch. is there, called S. Anthonii, the like whereof is not to be found in all Italia." In Nine Worthies of London (1592), Sir John Hawkwood says, "I, stooped with age, in Padua palace died." In Chaucer's C. T. E. 27, the Clerk of Oxford says that he learned his tale "at Padwe of a worthy clerk, Fraunceys Petrak, the lauriat poete." Petrarch lived for some time at P., but left it for Arquà in 1370, where he died 4 years later. Chaucer was in Italy in 1373, and possibly met Petrarch at P. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of it as "Strong-walled P., which Antenor built, the Trojan prince, and Titus Livius famed For his nativity and sepulture." In Trouble. Reign, p. 255, the Papal Legate says, "I Pandulph of Padoa . . . pronounce thee accursed."

The University. In Merch. iii. 4, 49, Portia gets her lawyer's robes from her cousin Bellario "at P.," and in iv. 1, 120, Nerissa professes to have come "from P., from Bellario." Bellario is evidently a Doctor of Laws in the University. In Marlowe's Jew iii. 1, Bellamira says, "From P. Were wont to come rare-witted gentlemen, Scholars I mean, learned and liberal." In Chapman's All Fools i. 1, Gostanzo says to Marc, "You have a younger son at P.: I like his learning well." In May Day ii. 1, Lodovico calls Giovanello "a Freshman come from P." In Usher i. 1, 199, Sarpego says, "When I in P. schooled it, I played in one of Plautus' comedies, Namely, Curculio." Greene, in Mamilius (1583), speaks of "The city of P. renowned for the antiquity of the famous University." In Chivalry B. 3, Pembroke says he was conversant with Ferdinand, son of Navarre, "in P.": evidently at the University. In Barnes' Charter v. 4, Caraffa says, "I would I were as young as when I was a scholar at P." In Shirley's Courtier ii. 2, when Giotto is asked: "You are a scholar?" he answers: "I have lost time in P." In Webster's White Devil i. 2, Flamineo says, "You brought me up At P. where . . . For want of means (the University judge me) I have been fain to heel my tutor's stockings At least 7 years; conspiring with a beard Made me a graduate." In Day's Humour i. 1, when Florimel urges the D. of Venice to found "a garrison for wit" and a sort of tournament of scholarship, he replies: "Have we not P.?" and in iv. 3, Hortensio says, "When I was student at P. we used A most ingenious pastime": which turns out to be "blindman's buff." In Greene's Friar iv., Vandermast is described as "A German born, passed into P.," and in ix. he boasts, "I have given non-plus to the Paduans." In Tomkis' Albunazar i. 5, Albunazar directs Ronca: "The bunch of planets new found out, Send them to Galilæo at P." Galilæo was appointed a professor at P. in 1592, and whilst there invented the telescope in 1609 and by its help discovered the satellites of Jupiter, the ring of Saturn, etc. In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Contarino says to Ercole, "We were students at P. together."

The Medical School. In Ford's 'Tis Pity ii. 1, Richardetto disguises himself as "A learned doctor lately come from P., Much skilled in physic." In Shirley's Courtier v. 1, Carintha says, "He'll recover me; I do like him infinitely for my body, the best in P." In Fair One iii. 4, Aimwell says to Manly, who is disguised as a doctor, "Doctor! art a Parisian, a Paduan, or a Leaden [Leyden] doctor?" In The Ball v. 1, Freshwater says, "P., famous for the pads, or easy saddles, which our physicians ride upon, and first brought from thence where they commenced Doctor."

In Marmion's Antiquary ii. 2, the Antiquary exhibits amongst his collection "The portraiture of the Sibyls, drawn, five hundred years since, by Titianus of P., an excellent painter and statuary." This is a tissue of absurdities; Titian, though he was at P. for about a year in 1511-12, lived and worked mostly at Venice; he had been dead less than 100 years when this play was written; and it was not he, but Michel Angelo, who painted the famous Sibyls.

The scenes of the following plays are laid, wholly or in part, at Padua: Yarrington's Two Tragedies (the second one); Taming of the Shrew; Webster's White Devil (certainly from the marriage of Vittoria to Brachiano onwards: possibly some of the earlier scenes); the localities are very vaguely marked throughout the play.

PADUS. The Latin name for the river Po, in N. Italy (see Po). According to one form of the legend, Phaethon, falling from the chariot of the sun, was drowned in the P. In Antonie ii. 360, the Chorus says, "Nor they, of Phoebus bred, In tears can do so well They for their brother shed Who into P. fell."

PÆSTUM. An ancient Greek colony on the W. coast of Italy, on the Gulf of the same name, abt. 170 m. S.E. of Rome. The ruins of the city are very interesting, the fine Doric temple, called the Temple of Poseidon, being one of the best-preserved specimens of its kind. The place was famous for its roses, which bloomed twice a year and had a peculiarly exquisite fragrance. In Cowley's Riddle iii., Florellus asks: "Would she . . . ransack P. of her choicest roses To adorn your cheeks?"

PALASTINE. See PALESTINE.

PALATINATE (German PFALZ). The name was applied to 2 separate provinces: (1) the Rhenish P. on the banks of the Rhine, southwards from Mainz and Bingen to the middle Neckar, with Heidelberg as its capital; (2) the Upper P., N. of Bavaria and under the rule of a branch of the ducal family of Bavaria. The former is the more important, and is that commonly meant by P. It was governed by a succession of Counts Palatine, or Palsgraves. Frederick V married the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of James I of England, in 1613, and the marriage was the occasion of Campion's Lords' Masque, Chapman's Middle Temple Masque, and Beaumont's Masque of the Inner Temple. It also suggested Wentworth Smith's Hector, or The Palsgrave Prince Elector, printed in 1615: the Palsgrave in that play being Ruprecht II, who died 1398.

In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 1, George says, "A Friend of his went over to the P." In Glaphorne's Wallenstein i. 1, Wallenstein says, "'Twas myself That from the Swede, the Palatine, and Dane rescued his eagles." This Palatine seems to be Frederick V, husband of the Princess Elizabeth (see above): he was elected K. of Bohemia in 1618, but was speedily defeated by Ferdinand II, Emperor and D. of Austria: he was stripped both of the crown of Bohemia and of the rule of the P. These were the events that began the Thirty Years' War. Wallenstein, however, did not come to the front until some years later, so that the dramatist is in error on that point. The Swede is Gustavus Adolphus, and the Dane, Christian K. of Denmark, who took up the defence of the Protestant cause after the death of Gustavus (1632). In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 96, Orlando describes himself as "the County Palatine." The County Palatine, with his "bad habit of frowning," is one of Portia's suitors in Merch. i. 2, 40. The reference may be to a Polish Count Palatine, Albertus Alasco, who visited England in 1583.

PALATINE. One of the 7 hills of Rome on which tradition agrees that Romulus built his first city. It lies S.W. of the Capitol and W. of the Colosseum. On it stood the Temple of Jupiter Stator, built by Romulus, and the palaces of Tiberius, Caligula, and Nero. In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 3, Caesar says, "Mt. P., thou throne of Jove, Are all your deities fled?" In Tiberius 2661, Tiberius says, "Post, post away, some to the Capitoll, Some to port Esquiline, mt. Pallatine." Spenser, in Ruines of Rome iv., says of Rome that Jove heaped "Upon her belly th' antique P." In Milton, P.R. iv. 50, the Tempter points out to our Lord "Mt. P., The imperial palace, compass huge, and high The structure, skill of noblest architects."

PALE, ENGLISH. See ENGLISH PALE.

PALERMO (the Latin PANORMUS). The capital of Sicily, on the W. part of the N. coast, on the Gulf of P., S. of the picturesque mtn. mass of Monte Pellegrino. Originally a Phœnician city, it has been successively the residence of the Saracen Emirs (who took it in 835), the Norman kings of Sicily, the Suabians, the Angevins, and the Arragonese. The Cathedral and the beautiful chapel in the King's Palace date from Norman times. In the 16th cent. P. was famous for its razors and its wine. It was the chief scene of the exploits of Garibaldi and "the thousand," which added Sicily to United Italy in 1860.

In Coicaigne's Supposes v. 5, Philogano relates how some Italian seamen after the battle of Otranto boarded a Turkish merchant vessel "and brought the goods to P." In Davenport's Nightcap v. 1, Antonio says, "Thou art my slave, I took thee, then a Turk, In the fight thou knowst we made before P." In Davenant's Platonic i. 1, Fredaline says, "This is Theander whose sway P. owes allegiance in." In Brome's Concubine iv. 9, Pedro says to the K. of Sicily, "Your province of P. submits in duty to your Highness." In Edwards' Damon xiii., p. 91, Jacke says, "It is a razor, and that a very good one: It came lately from P., it cost me 20 crowns." In Lodge's Wounds v. 1, Curtall says, "Sharpen the edge-tool of your wits, that your words may shave like the razors of P." In King Lear, p. 337, the Messenger says, "My tongue being well whetted with choler is more sharp than a razor of P." Nash, in Saffron Walden, Dedication, exhorts the barber "Gird thy keen P. razor to thy side." In Lyly's Campaspe i. 2, a song begins: "O for a bowl of fat Canary, Rich P., sparkling sherry." In Massinger's Maid Hon. iii. 1, Antonio says, "I shall ne'er believe I am a free man till I set my foot In Sicily again and drink P., And in P. too." In Old Law iv. 1, the cook says, "The mad Greeks of this age can taste their P. as well as the sage Greeks did before them." In Marston's Moultbank's, Paradox speaks of "wine of Chios, P., or Zaunte." Massinger lays the scene of A Very Woman and a large part of Maid Hon. in the Palace of P.

PALESTINE. Properly the maritime plain in S. Syria occupied by the Philistines during the early part of the 12th cent. B.C., but subsequently extended to include the whole of Syria S. of the Hermon range between the Jordan and the Mediterranean: divided later into the provinces of Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa. It was occupied by the Hebrews after their exodus from Egypt in the 14th cent. B.C., and became successively a province of the Neo-Babylonian, Persian, and Egyptian empires, and of the Syrian kingdom. During the 1st cent. B.C. the Romans took possession of it, and in A.D. 632 it was conquered by the Mohammedans. It was the scene of the Crusades for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre from the Arabs, and from 1099 to 1187 a Christian kingdom was established at Jerusalem. Finally it fell into the hands of the Turks, who held it until 1919. Its sacred sites, especially Jerusalem, attracted hosts of pilgrims during the Middle Ages.

Milton always uses the word in its original sense: for the maritime plain occupied by the Philistines. In Nat. Ode 199, he calls Dagon "that twice-battered god of P." (I Samuel v. 1-5). In P. L. i. 465, the same god is said to be "dreaded through the coast of P." In S. A. 144, the Chorus speak of the Philistines slain by Samson: "So had the glory of prowess been recovered To P., won by a Philistine." In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius says, "From the conquest of proud P. have we marched along." This was in 44 B.C. In K. J. ii. 1, 4, Philip speaks of "Richard Who fought the Holy Wars in P." In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 2, 66, Isabella says of Richd. of Cornwall: "Alas! I know my brother Richd.'s heart affects not Empire, he would rather choose To make return again to P. And be a scourge unto the infidels." Richd. was for a short time in P. (at Acre) in 1240. In Marlowe's Tamburlaine B. iii. 5, the K. of Jerusalem announces to Callapine, "From Palestina and Jerusalem Of Hebrews threescore thousand fighting men Are come" to help him against Tamburlaine. This is quite mythical: there was no K. of Jerusalem at this time. In Davenport's Matilda v. 3, Fitzwater swears "by the blood I lost in holy P. with Richd." In Webster's Weakest i. 1, the K. of France, Louis IX, says, "Till I return from P. again Be you joint governors of this my realm." Louis was crusading in P. 1248-1254. In Oth. iv. 3, 39, Emilia says of Lodovico: "I know a lady in Venice would have walked barefoot to P. for a touch of his nether lip." In Chivalry G. 1, Katharine protests: "Say I shall tread a tedious pilgrimage To furthest P. and I will do it." In Mariam i. 5, Salome says, "I would not change my Palestine for Rome." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Prudentilla asks Geraldine about his travels "Through Spain and the Empire, Greece and P." Hall, in Satires i. 8, 2, ridicules the sacred poetry "That Sion's muse from P. brings." In iv. 6, he speaks of "the antique tombs of P." In Lyly's Gallathea v. 2, Hæbe says, "It is thought wickedness to pull roses from the stalks in the garden of P. for that they have so lively a red."

P., as being the Holy Land, is used figuratively for heaven. In Devonshire iv. 2, the Friar says, "We come to set Your feet on the right way to P., The New Jerusalem."

PALLAS, TEMPLE OF. The Parthenon at Athens, the magnificent temple of P. Athene, on the S. side of the Acropolis, built by Pericles 438 B.C. The architects were Callicrates and Ictinus, and the famous sculptor Phidias superintended the erection and executed the statue of the goddess. Its ruins are still the greatest glory of Athens. In the old Timon iii. 5, Timon says to Callimela, "I'll plight to thee my troth in P. temple."

PALLATINE. See PALATINE.

PALLENE (now KASSANDRA). The Westernmost of the 3 peninsulas of Chalcidice, on the E. coast of Macedonia. In Mason's Mulleasses 2376, Borgias, in death, exclaims: "Sink, sink, Cytheron; high P., tremble." The passage is imitated from Seneca, Herc. Fur. 979: "Labat Cithæron, alta P. tremit."

PALMER'S ORDINARY. An eating-house in Lond., in the neighbourhood of the Temple. In Stucley 204, the Page informs Stucley's father that he dines "at Palmer's ordinary."

PALMICA. A misprint for PALMYRA, q.v.

PALMYRA. A city in the Syrian desert, 140 m. N.E. of Damascus. The Hebrews called it Tadmor, i.e. the City of Palms. It was built by Solomon (I Kings ix. 18). It was an independent city during the early Roman Empire, and in the 3rd century its king, Odenathus, was granted the title of Augustus by the Emperor Gallienus. On his murder in A.D. 267 his widow Zenobia assumed the sovereignty and reigned with brilliant success for 5 years. She was then defeated by Aurelian and taken to Rome as a prisoner, and from that time P. declined until now it is merely a heap of ruins. In Tiberius 3295, Livia refers to "Zenobia, Palmicæ's noble q.": where Palmicæ is an obvious misprint for Palmyræ. The anachronism of the reference will be noted.

PALTOCK'S INN. Proverbially used for an inn or other place where only the poorest entertainment could be had. The origin of the phrase has not been ascertained

In Wise Men vi. 4, Camerado says of Antonio: "Here is a customer for P. I." Gosson, in School of Abuse 52, says, "Coming to Chenas, a blind vill. in comparison of Athens, a Paltockes Inne." Stanyhurst, in his translation of the Æneid iii. 61, renders "pollutum hospitium" by "P. I."

PAMPELONIA, PAMPELUNA. The capital of the kingdom of Navarre, on the Arga, 197 m. N.E. of Madrid. In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 235, Pleshe promises Henry of Navarre: "Our army shall discomfit all your foes And at the length in Pampelonia crown (in spite of Spain) . . . Your majesty her rightful lord and sovereign."

PANAMA. A city at the head of the Gulf of Panama, on the S. coast of the isthmus joining N. to S. America. It was founded by Davila in 1518. The opening of the P. Canal has given it a new importance. In Davenant's Playhouse iii., Pedro is described as "a slave employed by the Moorish k. to conduct Sir Francis Drake towards P." Fuller, Holy State (1642) ii. 22, says that in 1595 "the English had a design to march by land over this Isthmus from Porto Rico to P., where the Spanish treasure was laid up."

PANCHAI. A fabulous island in the Erythræan Sea off the S. coast of Arabia, mentioned by Strabo as famous for its spices. In Jonson's Penates, Maia speaks of "Spice that from P. comes." In Marston's Insatiate iii., Isabella speaks of "scents Sweeter than all the spices in P." In Nero iv. 1, the Emperor says to Poppæa, "For thee shall . . . P. breathe the rich delightful smells." In Nabbes' Hannibal iii. 5, he says that a grove of balsam shall spring from Sophonisba's grave, "Led by whose ravishing odour the new issue Of every Phœnix shall neglect P." Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat 133, says, "Ne Frankincense he from Panchæa buyth." Barnes, in Parthenophil Ode xvii. 36, speaks of "Panchaian incense And rich Arabian odours." Herrick, in Noble Numbers (1647), says of our Lord's sepulchre: "How sweet this place is! As from thence Flowed all P's frankincense." Habington, in Castara (1640), Arber, p. 59, speaks of "a more precious breath than that which moves The whispering leaves in the Panchayan groves."

PANCRAS, SAINT (Pe. = Pancredge, Pie. = Pancridge). Pronounced and usually spelt Pancridge, or Pancrudge, in the 16th and 17th cents. A large parish in N. Lond. covering an area of 2672 acres, and including Somers Town, Camden Town, Kentish Town, part of Highgate, and the Gray's Inn, Tottenham Court, Euston, and Hampstead Rds. It now has a population of over 250,000, but in the 16th cent. was a very sparsely inhabited country dist. Norden, writing in 1593, says it was forsaken of all, "yet it is usual haunted of rogues, vagabonds, harlots, and thieves." The Fleet river flowed through it, and it was often flooded by its overflow. The old ch. stands on the E. side of P. Rd. just S. of the workhouse. There was a ch. here from very early times, and the present building dates from the middle of the 14th cent.: it consisted of a nave and chancel, with a tower at the W. end, but during the last cent. it was restored both inside and out in a ruthless fashion. Norden says of it: "P. Ch. standeth all alone, as utterly forsaken, old and weather-beaten, which, for the antiquity thereof, is thought not to yield to Paules in Lond." It seems to have been often used for hasty and irregular marriages, and the term "a Pie. parson" was used in a jeering way for one who would lend himself to business of this kind without scruple. It is said to have been the last ch. in Lond. in which mass was performed after the Reformation, and it was perhaps for this reason that it became a favourite place of burial for Roman Catholics. It is also given as a reason for this preference that mass is regularly said in the ch. of St. P. at Rome for those who are buried here. The churchyard was taken over in 1863 by the Midland Railway Co., who carried a viaduct across it and a tunnel below it, and in 1889 they acquired the S.E. corner as well. What was left of it was turned into a public garden, opened in 1877. The new St. P. ch. in the Euston Rd. was modelled on the Erechtheion at Athens, and was consecrated in 1822. In Arthur's Show, a pageant exhibited annually in Lond. by a toxophilite society, 2 of the burlesque characters were the Earl of Pie. and the D. of Shoreditch.

Nash, in Almond for a Parrot, says, "Brother Kemp, as many all hails to thy person as there be haycocks in July at Pe." In Liberality v. 5, the Clerk says to Prodigality, "Thou art indicted that thou at Highgate in the county of Middlesex didst take from one Tenacity of the parish of Pie. £1000." In Oldcastle iii. 2, Acton mentions "Pe." as one of the villages around Lond. where the rebels are quartered. In Nash's Lenten, p. 327, he says of the lawyers that they little remember "their own privy escapes with their laundresses, or their night walks to Pie." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, the clown Pompey speaks of his "solemn walks Twixt Paddington and Pie." The scene of Jonson's Tub is laid in various parts of the parish of Pie. One of the characters is Canon Hugh, Vicar of P. In iii. 1, Tub tells Turfe that Justice Bramble means to marry his daughter Awdrey "at P.-ch." In Glapthorne's Hollander v. 1, Urinal says that Poppingale will not be married at Pencridge: "there's no drink near it but at the Pinder of Wakefield, and that's abominable." This tavern was on the W. side of Gray's Inn Rd., N. of Guildford St., q.v. In Cooke's Good Wife iii. 3, the parson of Fenchurch and the parson of Pie. are introduced. In Field's Weathercock ii. 1, Scudmore calls Nevill, who is disguised as a parson and pretends that he is going to marry Bellafront to Count Frederick: "Thou Pie. parson!" In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Fitzallen says, "This is my own child . . . for we were wedded by the hand of heaven Ere this work was begun"; Chough strikes in: "At Pie., I'll lay my life on't." In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Frescobaldi calls Bagnoli "Profane arch-patriarch of Pie. steeple." In Nabbes' Totenham v. 6, when Sam says that Cicely is his wife, his Uncle cries: "Yet more plots! Sure the Parson of P. hath been here"; and the play concludes: "Why then to P., each with his loved consort, and make it holiday at Totenham Court." In his Spring, Lentsays, "I couple more than the Parson of P.: I mean city woodcocks with suburb wagtails." In T. Heywood's Royal King i. 1, the Clown says, "Our organ of Powles is much bigger and better than yours of Rixam by as much as Powles Ch. is bigger and better than St. Pie."

Nash, in Pierce, says of certain Roman Catholics: "It were to be hoped St. Peter would let them dwell in the suburbs of heaven: whereas otherwise they must keep aloof at Pie." In Davenant's Playhouse i., the Housekeeper says, "I told 'em [the French fencing masters] of P. Ch., where their scholars when they have killed one another in duel have a churchyard to themselves." Nash, in Prognostication, says it will be so hot that "the worms of St. Pe. Ch. build their bowers under the shadow of Colman hedge." In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Meercraft says, "Here's a plain fellow has his black bag of papers there in buckram, will not be sold for the earldom of Pie." In Tub i. 3, Turfe says, "Next our St. George, Who rescued the k.'s daughter, I will ride: Above Prince Arthur." Clench adds: "Or our Shore-ditch D."; and Medley: "Or Pie. Earl." In his Epigram to Inigo Jones Would-be, Jonson says, "Content thee to be Pie. Earl the while: An Earl of show." In Histrio ii. 157, when Furcher and Vourchier enter dressed up as sportsmen, Velure greets them: "Gentlemen, well met! What! Pancrace knights?" i.e. knights in dress only, like the Earl of Pie. in the show.

PANDATURIA, or PANDATARIA. A small island in the Tyrrhene Sea, off the W. coast of Italy, abt. 50 m. due W. of Naples. It was used during the earlier days of the Empire as a place of confinement for political prisoners, amongst whom were Julia, the daughter of Augustus; Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus; and Octavia, 1st wife of Nero. In Tiberius 2911, the Emperor says to Agrippina, "Yet know that I have P. There babble to the wind thy foolish moans."

PANEAS (now BANIAS). An ancient city in N. Palestine, on one of the sources of the Jordan, at the foot of Mt. Panium, abt. 30 m. due E. of Tyre. It was rebuilt by Herod Philip and named Cæsarea Philippi. The town of Dan, the most N. limit of Israel, was some 4 m. W. of P. The name is derived from the cave sacred to Pan from which the Jordan flows. Milton, P. L. iii. 535, says of God: "His eye [passed] with choice regard From P., the fount of Jordan's flood, To Beersaba."

PANGEUS. A mtn. range in Thrace, bounding the basin of the Strymon on the E. and that of the Hebrus on the W. In Nero iii. 2, the Emperor says, "They tell of Orpheus, when he took his lute, Hebrus stood still, P. bowed his head." Gold mines were worked in ancient times in the Pangæan range. In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Hercules speaks of "a ship Crammed with Pangeous gold."

PANGO (COUNT OF). A translation of the Latin Comes de Panico. Chaucer, C. T. E. 589, calls it Panik; Boccaccio makes it Panago. Skeat suggests that it may be a variant of Panaro, a river in N. Italy flowing between Modena and Bologna. In Phillips' Grissill 1026, Gautier says, "To Bullin Lagras it convey to the Countess of Pango my sister."

PANNIER ALLEY. See PANYER ALLEY.

PANNONIA. A province of the Roman Empire lying in the angle to the W. and S. of the Danube, N. of Illyricum, corresponding roughly to western Hungary and Styria. It was partially conquered by Augustus 35 B.C., and finally made a province by Tiberius A.D. 8. The Pns. were a brave and turbulent people, and often gave trouble to the Roman emperors. In Nero iv. 1, Nero is prouder of a kiss from Poppæa than "If I had The fierce Pn. 10 times overcome." In Cym. iii. 1, 74, Cymbeline says, "I am perfect that the Pns. and Dalmatians for Their liberties are now in arms." Again, in iii. 7, 3, a Senator says, "The common men are now in action 'Gainst the Pns. and Dalmatians." This is taken from Holinshed, who says that Augustus was called away from a purposed expedition into Britain by a rebellion of the Pns. and Dalmatians. In B. & F. Prophetess ii. 2, Apep says, "The Pn. cohorts, That are my own and sure, are not come up." This was after Apep had murdered the Emperor Numerianus A.D. 284. In T. Heywood's Iron Age ii., Achilles speaks of Hector as "He whose sword hath conquered kingdoms, P., Illyria, Samothrace."

PANTHEON. The famous temple in Rome, between the Corso and the Piazza Navona. It was built by Agrippa A.D. 27, possibly as the Sudatio of his Baths, but in any case he added the noble portico to the original Rotunda and made it into a temple. In 608 it was consecrated as a Christian ch. by Boniface IV under the name of Sta. Maria ad Martyres. The painter Raphael is buried there, and later K. Victor Emmanuel and his successor found their last resting-place within its walls. In Tit. i. 1, 242, Saturnine says, "Lavinia will I make my Empress . . . And in the sacred P. her espouse." In line 333 he addresses her: "Ascend, fair Queen, P." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Mrs. Wincott says that Geraldine has told them of his visit to Rome, "Of their P. and their Capitol." In Cooke's Pope Joan (1625), the Papist says, "The Ch. which is now called Sancta Maria Rotunda, and in old time P., built by one Agrippa, was before that the house of one Cybele." In Webster's A. & Virginia ii. 3, Marcus cries: "All you Pantheon gods confound me if my soul be accessory to your distractions!" Hall, in Satires iv. 7, 19, speaks of "the famous P.'s frame Turned to the honour of our Lady's name." Herrick, in Temple, says, "He of godheads has such store As Rome's P. had not more." Note the accent is on the 2nd syllable.

PANYER ALLEY. A passage running N. from 4 Pater-noster Row into Newgate St., Lond. It was so called from the sign of a pannier, or basket, which occurred there on the back of a naked boy, with the inscription: "When you have sought the city round, Yet still this is the highest ground." In More iii. 2, when the Sheriff reports that Paternoster Row was choked up with carts in the riot, Fawknor says, "My noble Lord, Panier Allie's throat was open." From the following passages it would seem that the buff leather of which catchpoles' coats were made was sold there. In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, Monopoly says, "If I could meet one of those varlets that wear P. A. on their backs, serjeants, I would make him scud." In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Quarulous taunts Winwife with courting widows: "scrubbing a piece of buff as if thou hadst the perpetuity of Pannier-a. to stink in."

PAPHLAGONIA. A country on the N. coast of Asia Minor, between Bithynia and Pontus. It is a rugged and difficult country, and, though it passed under the power of the various empires that in turn subjugated Asia Minor, it was usually governed by native princes down to the time of the Roman Empire. In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, 133, Remilia says, "'Tis Alvida, the fair wife to the King of P." In Ant. iii. 6, 71, "Philadelphos, k. of P.," is mentioned as one of the kings allied with Antony. The list is taken from Plutarch. In Sidney's Arcadia ii., a story is told of a Prince of P. which is the original of the Gloster subplot in Lear. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says that he has "visited Pamphlagonia and Silesia," i.e. Cilicia. In the old Tim. ii. 1, Gelasimus says, "Upon the mtn. P. There is a stone, which when the sun doth rise Shineth like gold; at setting of the same Is suddenly made black": a bit of Euphuistic natural history. In Alimony ii. 6, Julippe says, "These Pn. birds, these heartless partridges, shall never nestle under my feathers." The partridge is said by Pliny often to crush its own eggs, but it has no connection with P. Possibly Pn. is used for unnatural, ungrateful, in allusion to the story of the Prince of P. in the Arcadia. Pn. is used in the sense of stupid, unintelligent. Nash, in Saffron Walden O. 2, speaks of Hervey's writings as "a number of Pn." things." Barnes, in Charter 2797, says, "The slaves are busy, reading their Pn. papers"

PAPHOS (Pn. = Paphian). The original, or Old, P. was a town in Cyprus, on the Bocar, a little over a mile from the W. coast, where was the world-famed Temple of Aphrodite. It was originally a Phœnician temple, dedicated to Astarte, the goddess of generation, who was represented by a conical phallic stone. It was then transferred to the Greek Aphrodite, and later to her Latin counterpart, Venus. A flock of sacred doves hovered about the shrine, and hard by was a grove, also dedicated to the goddess. New P. was about 10 m. inland, but it is Old P. to which all our quotations refer. At the end of Venus and Adonis, the goddess "yokes her silver doves," who hold "their course to P." In Temp. iv. 1, 92, Iris says of Venus: "I met her deity Cutting the clouds towards P. and her son Dove-drawn with her." In Marlowe's Dido iii., Æneas, the son of Venus, swears "by P. and the purple sea From whence my radiant mother did ascend." In Peele's Arraignment v. 1, Venus swears "By all the honour and the sacrifice That from Cithæron and from P. rise." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar says that when Cleopatra is at Alexandria, "Pn. temples and Cytherian hills And sacred Gnidus bonnet vail to it." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 61, Mandrecarde boasts: "P. and brave Cypres laid aside, With me sweet lovely Venus would abide." In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 4, 132, Pompey speaks of Venus as "the Pn. Queen." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 6, 29, mentions P. as one of the places dear to Venus. In B. & F. Woman Hater i. 1, the D. invokes Venus as "Bright Pn. Queen." In the old Tim. ii. 1, Pseudolus brags: "Once I kissed Venus in P. Ile, but I forget her favour." In Brome's Antipodes i. 6, Dr. Hughball says, "I have bin on P. isle, where I have kissed The image of bright Venus." In Mariam iv. 8, Mariam calls Venus "P. Queen." Daniel, in Sonnets after Astrophel (1591) xii. 2, says, "The tablet of my heavy fortunes here Upon thine altar, Pn. Power, I place." Content, in the same volume (ii. 26), talks of going on a pilgrimage "Towards Love's Holy land, fair P. or Cyprus." The author of Zepheria (1594) xiii. 7 says: "Venus, at P. keep! No more be seen!"

Hence P. stands for all the delights of love. In Jack Drum iii. 298, Katharine calls Pasquil "P. of my delight!" In B. & F. Prize i. 2, Maria says, "P. revels should uprouse old Night." Taylor, in Works ii. 240, calls love "the Pn., or Priapean, game." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii., Moll speaks of one of her admirers as "this coal of P." In Per. iv., prol. 32, Gower says, "So with the dove of P. might the crow Vie feathers white." In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 6, Hirildas says, "Such whiteness only Pn. doves do wear." In Nash's Summers, p. 100, Christmas says, "I must rig my ship to Samos for peacocks, to P. for pigeons." The scene of B. & F. Mad Lover is laid at P.

AQUIN, or PEKIN. The capital of the Chinese Empire, in the N.E. of the country, between the rivers Pei-ho and When-ho, abt. 100 m. from the head of the Gulf of Petchili. The circuit of the walls is about 30 m., and it has a population of 1,000,000. It dates back to very ancient times, but its greatness began when Kublai-Khan made it his capital at the end of the 13th cent. under the name of Khanbalik, or Cambaluc. The court was subsequently transferred for a time to Nankin, but from the beginning of the 15th cent. P. has been the capital.

In Milton, P. L. xi. 390, Adam sees amongst other great cities "P., of Sinzan kings." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, if he could fly, he would soon find out "whether the city of Cambalu be that new Peking."

PARADISE. Used by the LXX as the translation of "garden" in Gen. ii. 8. "God planted a p. in Eden eastward": the garden where, according to the Hebrew story, God placed the first man and woman. The legend is doubtless Babylonian in origin, and the site must be looked for somewhere in Babylonia. In Err. iv. 3, 16, Dromio calls the sergeant Adam: "not that Adam that kept the P., but that Adam that keeps the prison." In Youth O. P. ii. 113, Charity says, "Adam out of P. exiled was." In Glapthorne's Argalus ii. 1, Argalus says of his mistress: "Her breath expires Odours more sweet than issued from the trees Of balm in P." Milton uses it as synonymous with Eden, q.v. The word comes to be used for heaven, and also for any place of supreme happiness. A fool's p. means a place of supposed but false security and happiness. In Brome's Northern v. 8, Nonsense says, "I am subdoodled thus in, I protest and vow, a kind of fool's P." Milton, P. L. iii. 478, ridicules those "who, to be sure of P., Dying put on the weeds of Dominic." In Beguiled 1142, Churms says, "I have brought the scholar into a fool's P."

PARIS (Pn. = Parisian). The capital of France, on the Seine, 110 m. from its mouth. In Cæsar's time the town was called Lutetia Parisiorum, and stood on the Ile de la Cité. In 508 A.D. Clovis made it his capital. During the Merovingian period the churches of St. Vincent, now St. Germain-des-Près, St. Vincent le Rond, now St. Germain l'Auxerrois, and Notre Dame were founded. P. ceased to be the capital under Charlemagne, but in 987 it was restored to that position by Hugh Capet. Philip Augustus did much for P.: he founded the Louvre and initiated the University on the left bank of the river in 1200. It became the most famous and frequented of the universities of Europe. St. Louis rebuilt the Louvre, and founded the Palais de Justice with its beautiful Sainte Chapelle. The fortification of the Bastille was erected by Charles V to protect the gate of St. Antoine. From 1420 to 1436 the city was in the hands of the English, and Henry VI was crowned in Notre Dame in 1431. Here in 1572 the massacre of St. Bartholomew was perpetrated. Henri IV took the city in 1594 after a siege of 4 years, and was assassinated there by Ravalliac in 1610. During our period P. was growing rapidly, and it became the greatest European school of finished manners and the leader of fashion in dress. It was divided into 3 portions: the City on the island in the Seine, La Ville N. of the river, and L'Université to the S. In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater says, "P. was built by the youngest son of Priam [i.e. P.], and was called by his name; yet some call it Lutetia, because the gentlewomen there play so well upon the lute." The 2 derivations are equally valuable.

General allusions. For a general description of P. from the English point of view see the Londoner's account of it in Davenant's Rutland. In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Grace mentions a ballad: "I was a lady's daughter in P." In B. & F. Pestle v. 3, Michael says, "I can sing none, forsooth, but 'A Lady's Daughter of P. properly.'" It was a Protestant ballad. The 1st verse runs: "It was a lady's daughter Of P. properly; Her mother her commanded To mass that she should hie." Howell, in Instructions (1642), calls P. "that huge though dirty theatre of all nations." In Londinopolis (1657), p. 391, he says, "The dirt and crott [i.e. excrement] of P. may be smelt ten miles off." In B. & F. Pestle ii. 4, Humphrey says, "When I came hither, would I had gone to P. with John Dory." The reference is to a ballad published in 1609, the hero of which, John Dory, a French privateer, is conquered by Nichol, a Cornishman. The 1st verse runs: "As it fell on a holiday And upon a holy tide-a, John Dory bought him an ambling nag, To P. for to ride-a." Bunch, in Webster's Weakest i. 2, sings it thus: "John Dorrie bought him an ambling nag, to P. for to ride-a, And happy are they that can seek and find, for they are gone to hide-a." In B. & F. Chances iii. 2, Antonio asks that "John Dorrie" should be sung, and calls it "a warlike tune." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faust mentions P. amongst the places he has visited. Monsieur Thomas, in B. & F.'s play of that name, "came from P." In T. Heywood's Witches iii., mention is made of someone who "flew to P. and back to Lond. in a day."

References to the History of Paris. In H6 A. i. 1, 61, the Messenger, arriving during the actual funeral of Henry V, announces: "P., Guysors, Poitiers, Are all quite lost." This is an anticipation of the fact. P. was under the command of the D. of Bedford from 1421 to 1436, when it was recaptured by the French under the Count of Richemont. In iii. 3, 30, Joan describes Talbot and his forces as "marching unto P-ward."; in iv. 1, the coronation of Henry VI in P. is described. This was in the latter part of 1431, after the death of Joan of Arc, though it is here put earlier. In v. 2, Charles is told "The stout Pns. do revolt And turn again unto the warlike French"; and Alençon therefore exhorts him, "March to P." The reference is to the unsuccessful attack made by Joan of Arc in 1429. In H6 B. i. 1, 94, Gloucester recalls how Henry was "crowned in P. in despite of foes," and in line 215, York exclaims: "P. is lost." As the date of this scene is 1445, it had been lost 9 years before. In i. 3, 175, York blames Somerset for having kept him dancing attendance on his will "Till P. was besieged, famished, and lost." It was during York's regency that P. was taken, but there is no ground for this charge against Somerset. In R3 ii. 3, 17, the Citizen says, "So stood the state when Henry VI was crowned in P. but at 9 months old." He was 9 years old, as a matter of fact, when he was crowned in P., but only 9 months old when he came to the throne of England and France. In Chivalry B. 2, it is implied that P. is the capital: "If we were in P.," says K. Lewis, "we might say Your viands shall be costly." The Massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572 was the theme of Marlowe's Massacre, and the play ends with the capture of the city by Henri IV in 1594.

The Arms of P. show a ship in full sail in the base of the shield under a chief semée with Fleurs-de-lis. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 229, there is a song: "Though a ship her scutcheon be, Yet P. hath no ship at sea." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary i. 2, 188, says, "K. Philip Augustus in the year 1090 . . . gave the city for arms a ship adorned with lillies."

Language. French was, of course, the language spoken at P., but the Norman-French as spoken in the English Court gradually diverged from it, so that Chaucer, in C. T. A. 126, says of the Prioress: "Frenssh she spak ful faire and fetisly After the scole of Stratford-atte-Bowe, For Frenssh of Parys was to hire unknowe."

Public Buildings. In H5 ii. 4, 132, Exeter says of the K.: "He'll make your P. Louvre shake for it, Were it the mistress-court of mighty Europe" (see LOUVRE). In Bale's Laws iv., Hypocrisy says, "In P. we have the mantle of St. Louis, which women seek much for help of their barrenness." This relic was preserved in the

Ch. of the Grey Friars. Montaigne (Florio's tr. 1603), ii. 12, pictures a philosopher hung up in a wire cage "on the top of our Ladies Ch. Steeple in P.," i.e. the tower of Notre Dame.

The University. In Chapman's M. d'Olive iv. 2, D'Olive says, "P., or Padua, or the famous school of England called Winchester, are but belfries to the body or school of the Court." In Greene's Friar iv. 50, the Emperor claims that Vandermast passed "To P., Rheims, and stately Orleans, And . . . put down The chieftest of them all in aphorisms." In Shirley's Fair One iii. 4, Aimwell asks Manly, who is disguised as a physician, "Art a Pn., a Paduan, or a Leaden [i.e. Leyden] doctor?" In Club Law iv. 5, Mounsier says, "Me tell you see a scholar de P. beat very prave shentleman, so silk and velvet."

The P. printers, especially Robert Estienne, were famous for their excellent type and fine workmanship. In B. & F. Captain iv. 4, Angelo says, "Would her faults Were all in P. print upon her face, Cum privilegio to use 'em still."

P. was the best place for a young gentleman to complete his training in polite manners. In Ham. i. 2, 51, Lærtas asks leave of the K. to return to France; from ii. 1, 7, we learn from the direction of Polonius to Reynaldo: "Inquire me first what Danskers are in P." that it was to P. that he went. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 220, the Pn. says, "Your sons come to P., the school of Europe, where they may learn honour." In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, the Capt. says, "I see you have never been abroad, else you would know how to put a value upon those whose careful observation brought home the most exquisite garb and courtship that P. could sell us." Paris was the leader of Europe in dress and fashion. In Davenant's U. Lovers iii. 3, Rampino says to his tailor, "You can travel to P. and instruct yourself in the newest model and best cut." In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Lady Cressingham says she will have "agents at P. and at Venice and at Valladolid in Spain for intelligence of all new fashions." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 2, Adorni says, "Your English wear long Pn. breeches with 5 points at knees." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Carlo says that Puntarvolo has travelled "as far as P. to fetch over a fashion."

Articles produced at Paris.—P. Balls (Tennis Balls). In H5 ii. 4, 131, the Dauphin says of Henry: "As matching to his youth and vanity I did present him with the P. balls." Fans.—In Davenant's Favourite iv. 1, the lady says, "For essences to Rome, and for fans to P." Thread.—Lydgate, in Lickpenny, says that in Cheap he was asked to buy "P. thread, the finest in the land." P. jewellery was already famous. In Philotus 28, the Macrell promises Emily a chain "of Pareis wark wrought by the laif." Powder of P. was some sort of face-powder. In Mankind 25, Titivallus says, "Take a little powder of Paris and cast over his face." In Davenant's Wits ii. 2, Lucy says that Mother Spectacle, the curate's wife, "thinks powder of P. more profane than the ashes of a Romish martyr."

Plaster of Paris.—A preparation of gypsum, which sets quickly after being mixed with water, and is used for making casts, busts, etc., and also for plastering and repairing walls. It was first made from the gypsum of Montmartre at P. In Day's Humour ii. 1, Octavio says, "I am lime and hair; plaster of P. kneaded together with rye-dough and goats' milk." In Middleton's Trick to Catch ii. 1, Lucre describes the rooms of his house "ceiled with plaster of P., and all hung about with cloth of Arras." In Massinger's Old Law iv. 1, Gnotho says of Helen of Troy: "She was wounded there herself and cured again by plaster of P.; and ever since, that has been used to stop holes." There is a pun on the name of Helen's paramour P. In T. Heywood's Traveller ii. 1, the Clown says of the meat and poultry that have been cut up for the feast: "There was no salve for those scars, which all the plaster of P. cannot cure." Plaster is also used for a medicament spread on a wound: hence the joke. In Shirley's Sisters ii. 1, Giovanni says, "I have seen a lady blush through a plaster of P.": where clearly some cosmetic preparation is intended, as thickly laid on as plaster of P. on a wall. In Sampson's Vow iii. 2, 9, Miles says to Joshua, the painter-stainer, "Thy colours were better bestowed on coarse waiting-women, Madam Makerones, that sell paintings and stop holes with plaister of P." Puttenham, in Art of Poesie (1589) iii. 19, quotes from his own Partheniade: "Her bosom sleek as P. plaster Held up 2 balls of alabaster."

The scenes of the following are laid in P. in whole or in part: Chaucer's Shipman's Tale; Shakespeare's All's Well; Shirley's Chabot; Webster's Weakest; Shakespeare's Henry VI A.; Massinger's Parl. Love; B. & F. Little French Lawyer, Wildgoose Chase, Noble Gentleman, Honest Man, Lover's Progress; Chapman's Humorous Day's Mirth; Marlowe's Massacre at Paris; Chapman's Bussy d'Ambois and Byron plays; and Day and Dekker's lost play, The Bellman of Paris.

PARISH GARDEN, or PARIS GARDEN (P. = Paris, Ph. = Parish). A manor on the S. bank of the Thames, W. of the Liberty of the Clink, corresponding generally to the present Ph. of Christchurch. It was surrounded by a stream, called the P. G. Ditch, and was in the 16th cent. "so dark with trees that one man cannot see another" (Letter of Fleetwood 1578). In 1113 it was given by Robert Marmion to the Convent of Bermondsey. In 1537 it became Crown property, and was subsequently held by Q. Jane Seymour, Lord Hunsdon, and Thomas Cure. It was approached from the Thames by way of the P. G. Stairs, a few yards E. of the present Blackfriars Bdge., from which a ferry plied across to Blackfriars. Blount, in Glossographia (s.v.), says, "It was anciently so called from Robert de P., who had a house there in Richard II's time." Taylor says it was called "from brave Ilion's firebrand, from P." But the old spelling is Ph., not P., and it may be questioned whether Blount's derivation is not as mythical as Taylor's. The Manor was bought by Francis Langley in 1589, with the intention of building a playhouse there, and he ultimately erected the Swan Theatre about 1596 in what is now Holland St. In Yarrington's Two Trag ii. 6, Merry proposes to throw the body of the man he has murdered "into P. G. Ditch." In Cromwell ii. 2, Hodge says, "At Putnaie I'll go you to Ph.-G. for two-pence without any wagging in my guts, in a little boat too."

Ph. G. was best known through the huge amphitheatre erected there for bull- and bear-baiting early in the reign of Henry VIII. It was a wooden building open to the sky, and accommodated at least 1000 spectators. It seems to have stood between Park St. and Bankside, just E. of Horseshoe Alley, and very near to the Globe. It was already in existence in 1526, when the D. of Northumberland is recorded to have gone there to see the bear-baiting. Crowley, the printer-poet, writing about 1550, tells us that Sunday was the day of the performances, and that the price of admission was $\frac{1}{4}$ d. John Bradford, in a sermon preached before Edward VI, tells how "certain gentlemen upon the Sabbath day going in a wherry to P. G., to the bear-baiting, were drowned." On Sunday 12th January, 1583, the seats collapsed and many were killed and hurt: an event which was "improved" in a sermon by John Field, the father of the dramatist Nat. Field. The Sunday performances were prohibited by James I. Henslowe and Alleyn leased it in the early part of the reign of James, and gave plays there as well as bear-baitings. In Dekker's Satiro. iv. 1, 151, Tucca asks: "Thou hast been at Parris G., hast not?" and Horace (Ben Jonson) replies: "Yes, Capt., I ha' played Zulziman there" (Zulziman is Soliman in Kyd's Soliman). It was closed in 1642; reopened after the Restoration; and finally shut up in 1687. Dekker, in News from Hell, makes Charon say, "If Parris g. would but fall down again, I should hope to make me a new boat." Lupton, in London Carbonadoed (1632), describes P. G. as "a foul den. Here come few that either regard their credit or loss of time; the swaggering roarer, the cunning cheater, the rotten bawd, the swearing drunkard, and the bloody butcher have their rendezvous here." In H8 v. 4, 2, the porter says to the crowd, "You'll leave your noise anon, ye rascals; do you take the Court for Ph.-g.?" In More iii. 2, Faulkner says to the Sheriff, "Tug me not, I'm no bear. 'Sblood, if all the dogs in P. G. hung at my tail, I'd shake 'em off." In Downfall Huntington ii. 1, Much speaks of "a little curial sib to the ape's only beast at P. G." In Jonson's Epicoene iii. 1, Otter says, "Tom Otter's bull, bear, and horse is known all over England, in rerum natura"; and Mrs. Otter rejoins: "Fore me, I'll nature them over to P. G." In iv. 2, Morose speaks of "Lond. Bdge., P.-G., Billingsgate, when the noises are at their height and loudest." Nash, in Wilton 159, says, "All the colliers of Romford, who hold their corporation by yarking the blind bear at P. garden, were but bunglers to him." There are other references to this cruel sport of whipping the blind bear. Greene, in Quip, p. 232, says, "The rakehell will be so eager to catch him as a dog to take the bear by the ears in Ph. G." Dekker, in Hornbook c. i. says, "How wonderfully is the world altered! So that it is no more like the old Theater du Monde than old P. G. is like the K.'s Garden at P." Jonson, in Vulcan, says that the burning of the Globe Theatre "was a threatening to the bears And that accursed ground, the P. G." In the Famous Voyage, he says of the Fleet Ditch: "The meat-boat of bear's college, P. G., Stunk not so ill." In Augurs, Slug says that Urson has "very sufficient bears as any are in the ground, the P. G." In Middleton's Changeling ii. 1, De Flores says, "Like a common Garden-bull I do but take breath to be lugged again." In Dekker's Edmonton iv. 1, Cuddy says that the witch's dog "is no P.-G. ban-dog neither that keeps a bow-wow-wowing to have butchers bring their curs thither." In Marston's Courtesan ii. 1, Cockledemoy tells a dream he has had of 24 bears "which are to be yet seen in P. Gs." In B. & F. Maid in Mill ii. 2, Bustopha, acting the part of P., says, "No roars so fierce, no throats so deep, No howls can bring such fears, As P. can, if garden from He call his dogs and bears": and references follow to bull-baiting and the whipping of the blind bear. Sir John Davies, in Epigrams, tells of the young law-student, who "leaves his books and for his recreation To P. G. doth himself withdraw To see old Harry Hunks and Sackerson." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 2, Sawit says, "You would be suitors, yes, to a she-bear, and keep your marriage in P. g." Dekker, in News from Hell, says that Cerberus "lies howling to be sent to P. G." In Dekker's Satiro. iv. 1, 168, Tucca says to Horace (Jonson), "Thou turn'st ban-dog and ever since bitest, therefore I ask if thou'st been at Parris-g., because thou hast such a good mouth." Dekker, in Jests, mentions "Ph. G." as a favourite haunt of pick-pockets. Hall, in Satires iv. 1, says that his poetry pleases him "Much better than a P.-g. bear." Davies, in Meditations of a Gull, says, "Of a journey he deliberates To P. g., cocke pit, or the play." Lyly, in Pappe with an Haichett, p. 67, says, "I will make him [Martin] mump, mowe, and chatter, like old John of P. g." I take this to be the name of one of the monkeys which were trained to ride on the bears' backs and perform tricks. See also BEAR-GARDEN.

PARIS TAVERN. Lond., apparently in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden. In Broome's Covent G. it is often mentioned. Act iv. 2 takes place there: Mihil says, as he enters, "A P. ill ya ben veni. Here's no bush at this door, but good wine rides post upon't, I mean, the sign-post." When Mihil says to Gabriel, "You are welcome to P., brother Gabriel," Gabriel replies, "It is nevertheless a tavern, brother Mihil." In i. 1, Antony says, "I heard an inkling at the P. T. last night of a she-gallant that had travelled France and Italy."

PARK CORNER. The N.E. corner of Hyde P., Lond., at the junction of Oxford St. and Edgware Rd. Close by stood the Tyburn gallows, and the loneliness of the neighbourhood made it a favourite resort of highwaymen. In Webster's Wyat xiv., p. 57, Winchester says to Wyatt, "At the P. C. is a gallows set, Whither make haste to tender Nature's debt." In Mayne's Match iii. 4, Plotwell says, if his uncle marries, "the sleight upon the cards, the hollow die, P. C., and Shooter's Hill are my revenue."

PARKER'S ORDINARY. An eating-house in Lond. The first use of O. in this sense is in Payne's Description of Ireland (1590). A table d'hôte dinner was served at these houses at a fixed price, and after dinner the company usually turned to gambling games, facilities for which were provided. Dekker, in Hornbook v., describes how a young gallant should behave himself in an O. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Goshawk asks: "Where shall's all munch?" and Jack Dapper replies: "I am for Parker's O."

PARLIAMENT HOUSE. The English Parliament until the reign of Edward I met in various royal palaces and castles throughout the country, wherever the K. might please to summon it. In his reign the place of meeting became the Westminster Palace, and in the 17th year of Edward III the Chapter House of the Abbot of Westminster was assigned to the House of Commons. In the reign of Edward VI the old Court of Requests was made the meeting-place of the House of Lords, and the Chapel of St. Stephen, which was built by K. Stephen, was given to the Commons. Between the 2 was the Painted Chamber, which was used for conferences of the 2 Houses. All these buildings were burnt down in 1834, with the exception of the crypt of St. Stephen's Chapel, which may still be seen at the S.E. corner of Westminster Hall. The present building was erected from Barry's design, and the first stone was laid in 1840. In H6 C. i. 1, 71, the K. says, "Far be the thought of this from Henry's heart To make a shambles of the P. H." Hall, in Characters, says of the Distrustful Man: "He dares not come near the P. H. because it should have been blown up," i.e. in the Gunpowder Plot of 1605.

PARLOUS POND. A pool of water lying behind St. Luke's Hospital off City Rd., Lond.: the site is now covered by the buildings of Peerless St. and Baldwin St., W. of City Rd. at the point where it bends round to the W. It was a favourite bathing-place, and was first called Perilous P. because of the number of people who were drowned there. The name was changed to Peerless Pool by one Kemp, in 1743. He bought it and made it into a swimming bath and a fish-pond. Duck-hunting was carried on there in the old days, as the quotation shows. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Gallipot says, "Let your boy lead his water-spaniel along, and we'll show you the bravest sport at P. P. Hey, Trug! here's the best duck in England."

PARMA (Pn. = Parmesan). A city of N. Italy, and capital of the Duchy of the same name, some 30 m. S.W. of Mantua. The old Æmilian Way ran through the city. The cathedral, baptistry, and ducal palace are fine buildings. After passing successively under the control of the families of the Correggii, Visconti, and Sforzi, it became a Papal possession in 1512, and in 1543 Paul III (Farnese) gave it to his son Pier Luigi: 7 dukes of the Farnese family followed him, the 3rd of whom, Alessandro, was the D. of P. who, as general of Philip II of Spain, carried on war in the Low Countries against the United Provinces from 1579 to 1592. P. was famous for the manufacture of a fine variety of cheese called Pn., but it is now made better in Lodi. A particular sort of drinking was called Pn.: why, it does not appear, unless the idea was that the cheese provoked thirst. Pn. sugar is also mentioned. In Shirley's Courtier, Foscari, D. of P., is one of the characters. In Davenant's Love Hon. v. 3, Leonell says, "I am Leonell, the D. of P.'s son." In Massinger's Lover i. 2, Uberti, Prince of P., has "left fair P." to court the daughter of the D. of Mantua. A Prince of P. is one of the characters in T. Heywood's Maidenhead. In Cockayne's Trapolin iv. 2, the D. of Florence says that his sister has "refused The youthful dukes of Modena and P."

In Marlowe's Faustus i., Faust says, "I'll levy soldiers And chase the Prince of P. from our land." In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 242, Guise says, "Philip and P., I am slain for you." The reference is in both cases to Alessandro Farnese, and in the following passage a play upon the word is intended, in reference to the siege of Antwerp by the D. of P. In Middleton's No Wit i. 3, Savourwit says, "The boy says they never came near Antwerp, a quite contrary way, round about by P." In Nash's Lenten, p. 306, he says, "The Transalpiners with their lordly Pn., so named of the city of P. in Italy where it is first clout-crushed and made, shoulder in for the upper hand." In Ford's 'Tis Pity i. 4, Poggio says, "He loved her almost as well as he loved parmesant; and swore that she wanted but such a nose as his was to be as pretty a young woman as any was in P." In B. & F. Pilgrimage ii. 4, Incubo inquires: "You have no cheese of P.?" In Davenant's Wits iv., "Pn. of Lodi" is mentioned in a list of table dainties. In Middleton's Changeling i. 2, a Welsh madman cries out: "Her parmasant, her parmasant!" and Lollio says, "There's no hope of recovery of that Welsh madman; a' was undone by a mouse that spoiled him a parmasant." In Webster's Law Case v. 4, Julio tells of "what a deal of P. cheese" a certain Welshman ate. In Chapman's Chabot v. 2, 181, the Advocate compares the Chancellor to "the mouse in the fable, that, having offended to deserve death, begged he might be banished into a Pn." Dekker, in Hornbook Proem., speaks of "the Switzer's stoop of Rhenish, the Italian's Parmisant, the Englishman's healths"; and in Seven Sins, he says, "They were drunk according to all the rules of learned drunkenness, as Upsey-freeze, crambo, Parmizant." In Shirley's Ball iii. 3, Freshwater says, "He can present you with Venice glasses, Pn. sugars, all from Antwerp." P. is the scene of Ford's 'Tis Pity; Shirley's Sisters, Duke's Mistress, and The Fatal Marriage.

PARNASSUS. Mtn. in ancient Greece, in Phocis, N. of the famous shrine of Apollo at Delphi. It has 3 peaks, the highest of which reaches 8000 ft.: between the 2 lower ones rises the fountain of Castalia. As these 2 only are visible from Delphi, P. was usually spoken of by the Greeks as the two-peaked P. The highest peak was sacred to Dionysus; the 2 lower ones to Apollo and the Muses. Hence it was constantly associated with poetry, and to drink of the fountain of Castalia was supposed to confer poetical inspiration. In Phillips' Grissill 489, Grissill invokes: "Ye Muses nine that on Pernasso rest." In Lyly's Maid's Meta. iv., Phœbus addresses "You sacred Muses of P. hill." In Pilg. Pernass. ii. 1, Madido says, "There is no true P. but the 3rd loft in a wine tavern, no true Helicon but a cup of brown bastard." In Day's Parl. Bees v., Poetaster says, "Persius taught his pupils to pilfer clouds from off P.' top." In Chapman's Usher i. 1, when Poggio indulges in the remark, "Will his antiquity never leave his iniquity?" Cyanche cries, "Why, how now, nephew? Turned P. lately?" i.e. have you become a poet? In Brome's Ct. Beggar i. 1, Gabriel says of Frederick, who is reported to be mad: "He was a poet that turned his brain in climbing of P." In v. 2, Courtwit says he has fetched his speeches "from the forked top of high P." In Shirley's Riches i., Gettings says, "I had rather be a Jew than christened in P.' pump." In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, Tucca says of the poetaster Demetrius (Dekker): "My P. here shall help him, if thou wilt." In Greene's Alphonsus, prol. 99, Venus says to the Muses, "Let us bend our steps Unto the top of high P. hill." Spenser, F. Q. vi. prol. 2, addresses the Muses as "Ye sacred imps, that on Parnasso dwell." Sidney, in Astrophel (1581) lxxx. 5, addresses Stella as "The new P., where the Muses bide." In lxxxiv. 1, he calls the highway "my chief P." W. Smith, in Chloris xlv. 10, asks his lady to "add such courage to my Muse that she shall climb the steep P. hill." In Mason's Mulleasses, prol., the poet speaks of transferring "Pernassus into Brittany." In Philotus 65, Emily, after listening to a long poetical effusion from Flavius, thinks that he must have been "fosterit in P. forkit hill." In Marmion's Antiquary iii. 2, Lionel says to Petrucio, "Have you lately drunk of the horsepond, or stept on the forked P. that you start out so sudden a poet?" The word occurs in the titles of several poetical works and collections. Two plays were called The Pilgrimage to P. and The Return from P. In 1600 was published Allot's England's P., or Choicest Flowers of Our English Poets.

PAROS. The largest island of the Cyclades, in the Ægean Sea, 6 m. W. of Naxos. It was famous for its fine white marble, which was second only to that of Pentelicus. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 5, Cassius vows: "On thine altar, built of Parian stone, Whole hecatombs will I offer." In Davenant's Love Hon. ii. 2, Alvaro asks: "What, Less hard than marble of the Parian rock Canst thou believe my heart?" In Cowley's Riddle v., Aphron says of Clariana: "She was as pure and white as Parian marble." In Randolph's Muses iii., Colax says, "Since Parian marble . . . Entered her [i.e. Rome's] gaudy temple, soon she fell To superstition." Habington, in Castara (1640), Arber, p. 26, addresses the glorious wits "who find than Parian stone A nobler quarry to build trophies on." In T. Heywood's Dialogues 6353, Apollo says, "Delphos is mine, Pharos and Tenedos." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 36, recalls the old legend that Parius, the son of Paris by Enone, "Gathered the Trojan reliques saved from flame, And with them sailing thence to th' isle of P. came." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 100, says, "Dost thou not know that the tree Silvacenda beareth no fruit in Pharos?" This is a curious mistaken translation of Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi. 47: "In Paro silva cædua . . . nihil fert."

PARRIS GARDEN. See PARIS GARDEN.

PARROT. The sign of a tavern in the market-place at Marseilles. In T. Heywood's Captives i. 3, Raphael says, "My lodging is at the Parratt in the market place."

PARTHENIANS. A tribe of Illyrians living near Epidamnus. Their principal town was Parthus, which was taken by Cæsar in his war against Pompeius. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 1, Cassius says to Brutus, "Thou hast commanded the Illyrian bands, P. proud, and Thrasians born in war."

PARTHENY (i.e. PARTHENIUM). Mtn. on the frontiers of Arcadia and Argolis, 15 m. S.W. of Argos; now Mt. Ronio. It was sacred to Pan. Royden, in Elegy for Astrophel (1591) 93, says of Sidney: "On the mtn. P. . . The Muses met him every day."

PARTHIA (Pn. = Parthian). The country S.E. of the Caspian Sea, corresponding roughly to the Persian province of Khorassan. In 250 B.C., or thereabouts, Arsaces I won their independence for the Pns., and established a dynasty which lasted, under a succession of 31 kings, all called Arsaces, until A.D. 226, when they were conquered by the Persian Sassanidæ. It is the great glory of the Pns. that they were able to resist the attempts of the Romans to annex them to the Empire. Pompeius found it wiser to leave them alone when he was in Asia. Crassus, however, attacked them in 53 B.C., but he was defeated and slain by Surenas, the general of Arsaces XIV. Cassius defeated them and defended Syria from their attacks in 51 and 50 B.C. In J. C. v. 3, 37, he reminds Pindarus: "In P. did I take thee prisoner." After the battle of Philippi, Labienus, who had been sent to P. by Brutus and Cassius to make alliance with the K., remained there; and in 40 B.C. led the Pn. troops to the conquest of W. Asia. In Ant. i. 2, 103, word is brought to Antony: "Labienus hath with his Pn. force Extended [taken possession of] Asia from Euphrates." In ii. 2, 15, Antony proposes to go to P.; and in ii. 3, 32, he resolves to send Ventidius thither. Ventidius defeated Labienus at Mt. Taurus in 39, and in the next year defeated and slew Pacorus, the son of the K., on the anniversary of the defeat of Crassus. In iii. 1, Ventidius returns in triumph, exclaiming: "Now, darting P., art thou struck." In iii. 6, 13, Cæsar says that Antony has given to Cleopatra's son Alexander "Great Media, P., and Armenia." Other allusions to the history are as follows:

In Massinger's Believe i. 2, Flaminius says to the Carthaginians (the time is about 200 B.C.), "You rather chose to pay homage and fealty to the Pn., the Egyptian Ptolemy, or indeed any, than bow unto the Roman." In B. & F. False One i. 1, Labienus says that when Pompey was fleeing after the defeat of Pharsalia, "the K. of P., famous in his defeature of the Crassi, offered him his protection." In Kyd's Cornelia i., Cicero, lamenting the defeat of Pompey at Pharsalia, exclaims: "Now, P., fear no more for Crassus' death." In Tiberius 1084, Germanicus speaks of "Crassus' scourge, dissembling Partheans." In Ev. Wom. I. ii. 1, Flaminus says, "'Tis since the siege of P.; I was lusty then." Apparently the expedition of Crassus is meant. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 1, Cassius says that Brutus commands "The Pn., fighting when he seems to fly." Brutus sought help from P., but it did not come in time. In Brandon's Octavia 489, Octavia expostulates with Antony: "What caused my lord in Syria make such stay, Since he 'gainst P. did his forces bend?" In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 2, Horace says, "Nor is't a labour fit for every pen to paint . . . wounded Pns., tumbled from their horses. Great Cæsar's wars cannot be fought with words." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. ii. 1, Cosroe speaks of the K. of Persia "That now is marching near to P." P. was at this time (circ. 1400) part of Persia. Milton, in P. R. iii. 290, speaks of "The great Seleucia, Nisibis, and there Artaxata, Terebon, Ctesiphon" as cities "Built by Emathian or Pn. hands"; and adds: "All these the Pn. (now some ages past by great Arsaces led, who founded first That empire) under his dominion holds." He goes on to say: "now the Pn. k. In Ctesiphon hath gathered all his host Against the Scythian," but this is a poetic fiction introduced for the sake of giving the poet an opportunity of describing the component parts of the imaginary army. In 362, the Tempter points out to our Lord the difficulty of maintaining a kingdom in Judæa "Between two such enclosing enemies, Roman and Pn.," and advises him first to make sure of the Pn. In iv. 73, he describes embassies coming to Rome "From the Asian kings and Pn. among these"; and in 85, he says of Rome and P. our Lord may justly prefer the Roman "Before the Pn." In B. & F. Valentin. i. 3, Æcius says, "Let the son of war, steeled Mithridates, Lead up his winged Pns. like a storm, Hiding the face of heaven with showers of arrows." But the date is A.D. 454, when the Pns. had been for 2 cents. subject to the Sassanidæ, the actual k. being Yezdijird II. In iv. 1, Valentinian speaks of "Corbulo, That broke the heart-strings of the Pns." Corbulo defeated the Pns. in A.D. 54 and again in A.D. 63.

The Pns. were fine horsemen and archers, and were specially feared by the Romans because even in flying they were able to shoot their arrows backwards with deadly aim. Hence "a Pn. shaft" is used for an unexpected attack by an apparently defeated and flying foe. In Ant. iv. 14, 70, Eros, when asked to kill Antony, says, "Shall I do that which all the Pn. darts, Though enemy, lost aim, and could not?" In Cym. i. 6, 20, Iachimo says, "Like the Pn., I shall flying fight." In Fisher's Fuinus iii. 5, Nennius says, "Death like a Pn. flies and, flying, kills." Habington, in Castara (1640), Arber, p. 119, asks, "Shall I 'gainst the swift Pns. fight And in their flight Receive my death?" In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar exclaims: "O beauteous Tiber, with thine easy streams That glide as smoothly as a Pn. shaft." In Glaphorn's Argalus i. 1, Demagoras says, "To be repulsed wounds my soul Worse than a quiver of sharp Pn. shafts Could prejudice my body." In Antonie i. 107, Antony says, "Thou car'st no more for Parth nor Pn. bow." The Pns. were represented by the Romans as implacably fierce and ruthless. In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 5, Cato says, "No Pa. Would with such cruelty thy worth repay." In Nero iii. 3, Seneca says, "O should the Pn. hear these miseries, He would, his bow and native hate apart, Sit down with us and lend an enemy's tear." They were admired for their success in maintaining their freedom. In Marston's Companion i. 3, Careless says, "Coin will make a man live as free as a Pn." In May's Old Couple ii. 1, Theodore says that a virtuous and contented man "enjoys A greater freedom than the Pn. k." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar speaks of "the proud Pn." Tofte, in Laura (1597) ii. 29, 1, says, "Amongst the Pns. is a kind of ground Of nature such as, though it far doth stand From fire, yet fire to take it straight is found; And flying thither burns it out of hand."

PARTRIDGE ALLEY. Lond., on the S. side of Holborn near the N.W. corner of Lincoln's Inn Fields. It shared the bad reputation of the dist. lying between Lincoln's Inn Fields and Holborn as a haunt of loose women. In Massinger's Madam v. 2, Luke says of the gentlemen apprentices: "When we look To have our business done at home, they are Abroad in the tennis-court, or in P.-a., In Lambeth Marsh, or a cheating ordinary."

PARUHAIEN (obviously a misprint). I suggest Peruvian, or Panchæan, as possible emendations. In Barnes' Charter iii. 2, Alexander speaks of "That seemly nose breathing P. odours."

PASIACA (PHASIACA). The country around the river Phasis at the extreme E. end of the Black Sea. In Goosecap v., Clarence says, "What was spoken of the most chaste Q. of rich P. may be said of her: Antevenit sortem moribus, virtutibus annos."

PATAGONIA. The country in the extreme S. of S. America. The inhabitants were reported to be giants, and are really above the average height, being for the most part over 6 ft. Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "I would see whether there be . . . gigantic Patagones in Chica."

PATAY. A vill. in France, 14 m. N.W. of Orleans. Here Joan of Arc defeated the English troops under Sir John Fastolfe on June 18th, 1429, and took Talbot prisoner. Fastolfe is said to have fled without striking a blow, and to have been deprived of his Garter for his cowardice. In H6 A. iv. 1, 19, Talbot tears the garter from Fastolfe's leg and says, "This dastard at the battle of P., Before we met . . . did run away." The old editions read Poitiers, an obvious mistake.

PATERNOSTER ROW. A narrow st. in London, running W. from the junction of Cheapside and St. Martin's-le-Grand to Warwick Lane, to the N. of Paul's Churchyard. It was probably named from the makers of paternosters, or beads, who lived there; later it was occupied by stationers and textwriters, who sold copies of the Paternoster, Ave, Creed, etc. In the 16th cent. it was taken possession of by the mercers, and was the fashionable shopping st. for the ladies. After the Gt. Fire the mercers went further W., and after some time the booksellers and publishers came into the st. Tarleton, the clown, kept the Castle Ordinary here on the site now occupied by the Oxford University Press Warehouse. In More iii. 2, the Sheriff says, "There was a fray in P. R., and because they would not be parted the st. was choked up with carts." In Tarleton's Jest (1611), it is told how 2 tailors "foxed [i.e. made drunk] Tarleton at the Castle in P. R."

PATRIA (probably PATARA is meant). A spt. of Lycia, near the mouth of the Xanthus, abt. 60 m. due E. of Rhodes, the scene of the play. It may have been suggested to the authors by the verse (Acts xxi. 1), where it occurs in close connection with Rhodes. In B. & F. Maid's Trag. i. 1, Melantius, who has just come home to Rhodes, says to Diphilus, "I sent for thee to exercise thine arms With me at P.; thou can'st not, Diphilus." Later on in the same scene he says, "I did receive Letters at P. from my Amintor."

PATRICK'S (SAINT) PURGATORY. A cave on an island in Lough Derg in Co. Donegal, Ireland. It was a famous place for pilgrimages in the Middle Ages, and though it has been closed and demolished 3 times—in 1497, 1632, and 1780—it still continues to attract great crowds. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i., the Palmer says he has visited "Saynt Patrike's purgatory." In Dekker's Fortunatus iv. 2, Andelocia throws off his disguise as an Irish costermonger, exclaiming: "Here end my torments in St. P. P." In Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Carolo accounts for the fact that all chimney sweepers are Irishmen because "St. Patrick keeps purgatory: he makes the fire, and his countrymen could do nothing if they cannot sweep the chimneys." In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, Knavesby, pointing to a map of Ireland, says, "Here runs the Kernesdale, admirable feed for cattle; and hereabout is St. P. P." Burton, in A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "I would have a convenient place to go down . . . at St. P. P. . . . to descend and see what is done in the bowels of the earth."

PAUL, SAINT (St. Pol). A town in Artois in N. France, 110 m. N. of Paris. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron boasts: "Only myself, married to Victory, Did people Artois, Douay . . . St. Paul, Bapaume, and Courcelles, With her triumphant issue."

PAUL'S (SAINT) (P. = Paul's, Pas. = Paules, Pos. = Poules, Pow. = Powles). The cathedral ch. of Lond., situated at the E. end of Ludgate Hill and the W. of Cheapside. The first ch. on the site was built in 610 by Ethelbert of Kent. Drayton, in Polyolb. xi. 201, says that he "That mighty fane to Paul in Lond. did erect." A new ch. was erected by Bp. Maurice in 1087, but it was destroyed by fire in 1136. The rebuilding went on slowly, the steeple being finished in 1221 and the whole ch. in 1283. It was a Gothic building, chiefly in the early English style. Its length was 596 and its breadth 104 ft. It had a central tower and spire and 2 angle towers at the W. end. A fire in 1561 injured the ch. and destroyed the steeple, which was never rebuilt, though money was collected for the purpose of a complete restoration of the ch. In Nobody 754, Nobody promises: "I'll build up Pas-steeple without a collection." In Mayne's Match iii. 3, Plotwell says of Seathrift: "He wore out more pavement with walking than would make a row of new stone saints, and yet refused to give to the reparation." This was the reparation scheme inaugurated by Laud and Charles I. In Shirley's Ball iii. 3, Gudgeon asks: "Is P. alive still?" and Solomon says, "Yes, yes; a little sick of the stone, but she is now in physic and may in time recover." In 1633 the repairs were commenced under the direction of Inigo Jones, but were put a stop to by the Civil War. In Shirley's Honoria ii. 1, Phantasm promises to "Rebuild the great cathedral of St. P. With porphyry." In Cartwright's Ordinary ii. 3, Caster promises, out of his imaginary gains, to send "Some 40,000 unto P." It was finally destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. From the slow and unsatisfactory way in which the attempts at restoration were carried on in the early 17th cent. came the proverbial expression "to make P. work of any thing," i.e. to make a botch of it. In Dekker's Satiro. ii. 2, 55, Horace (Jonson) says of Crispinus (Marston) and Fannius (Dekker): "They cut an Innocent Moore i' the middle to serve him in twice; and when he had done, made Pos.-work of it." The reference appears to be to the patching up of Stucley by Dekker out of Peele's Alcazar and other plays. It was written for the boys of P. School, which gives more point to the joke. In Tom

Tell Troath (1622), we read: "The perpetual walkers of P. do now despair to see their material ch. ever repaired."

Paul's Walk. Also called Duke Humphrey's Walk (q.v.), from the tomb of Sir John Beauchamp, which stood in the middle aisle on the right-hand side approaching the altar. He was buried there in 1358, but by some strange freak his tomb became known as D. Humphrey's. The Walk was the middle aisle, or nave, of the ch., and from 1550 to 1650 it was used as a common meeting-place for all kinds of people. Here lawyers met their clients, men of fashion came to show their clothes, citizens thronged to hear and tell the news of the day, servants stood to be hired and posted up their qualifications on the Si Quis door, bawds looked out for victims, pickpockets plied their trade; and a crowd of cast captains of the Bobadil type haunted the place and were known as P. Men. Earle, in his Microcosmography xli. (1628), speaks of it as "the land's epitome, or you may call it the lesser isle of Great Britain," and describes its noise "like that of bees, a strange humming or buzz, mixed, of walking, tongues and feet." The whole chapter should be read. Chapter iv. of Dekker's Hornbook is headed: "How a Gallant should behave himself in Pow. walkes," which he calls "your Mediterranean Ile." Spurs were not allowed to be worn there, and the choir boys had the right to claim spur-money from offenders. In earlier days it was called the Parvys, an abbreviation of Paradise, and already in the 14th cent. was a meeting-place for men of business, especially lawyers. Chaucer's Sergeant of the Law "often hadde been at the Parvys" (C. T. Prol. 310).

In H4 B. i. 2, 58, Falstaff says of Bardolph: "I bought him in P." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "She searched the middle aisle in P. and pressed 3 knaves to man her." Act iv., sc. 6 of Middleton's Five Gallants is laid "in the middle aisle of St. P." In Swetnam iii. 1, when a number of people enter, Vaster says, "Our walk's turned Pos., I think." Riche, in Faultes Faults (1606), fol. 7, says of the State-ape: "You shall meet him in the middle walk in Pas. at ten of the clock and three of the clock"—where he proceeds to talk politics. Awdeley, in Fraternity of Vagabonds, says that the trade of the Cheatour or Fingerer is "to walk in such places where as gentlemen and other worshipful citizens resort, as at Pos. or at Christes Hospital." Fleetwood, writing to Lord Burghley, tells how he arrested in P. "22 cloaked rogues that there used to keep standing." In Greene's Thieves Falling Out (1637), Stephen says the gentleman foyst (pickpocket) "must walk Pas., Westminster, the Exchange, and such common haunted places." In Jonson's Ev. Man i., Bobadil is described in the list of the characters as "a P. Man," i.e. a frequenter of the Middle Aisle. Act iii., sc. 1 of Ev. Man O. is laid in "the middle aisle of St. P." Shift has come "for the advancement of a si quis or two," and succeeds in setting up his bills without discovery. Clove and Orange "come to walk a turn or two i' this scene of P." Then Carlo enters to "take up a man or two [i.e. hire them]" for Sogliardo. Fastidious Brisk comes in, exclaiming: "Come, let's walk in Meditteraneo." Puntarvolo sees and reads aloud Shift's two Si Quis's: one offering his services as gentleman-usher to a lady; the other setting forth his qualifications as a teacher of fashionable smoking. Carlo finds Shift, and describes him as "the most strange piece of military profession that ever was discovered in Insula Paulina." The whole scene should be read. In Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit describes himself as "one of the pretty wits of P." In Haughton's Englishmen i. 2, Anthony says, "Make him answer, you three came from P., And in the middle walk one you espied Fit for his purpose." A teacher of French and music was what was wanted. In Feversham ii. 2, Arden says, "Now, Master Franklin, Let us go walk in Pas." In Barry's Ram iv. 1, Sir Oliver advises Smallshanks, "Get thee a grey cloak and hat and walk in P. among thy cashiered mates." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Dapper sends his man Gull to get his dinner, and says, "Meet me an hour hence in P." In Mayne's Match iii. 3, Plotwell says, "Your penurious father Was wont to walk his dinner out in P."—"Indeed," says Newcut, "they say he was a monument of P."; and Timothy adds: "Yes, he was there as constant as D. Humphrey's." In Tomkis' Albumazar v. 2, Cricca, looking for Pandolfo, says he is "neither in P., at home, nor in the Exchange: He's lost." In Jonson's Staple i. 1, Thomas says that the 4 cardinal quarters of the city for news are "The Court, P., Exchange, and Westminster Hall." He then mentions "Master Ambler [as] emissary P., a fine-paced gentleman, as you shall see walk the middle aisle." In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 1, Frisco says of P.: "D. Humphrey dwells here and keeps open house, and a brave sort of Cammilleres [i.e. Cavaliers] dine with him every day." Lupton, in London Carbonadoed (1632) iii. 12, says, "The middle ile is much frequented at noone with a company of Hungarians, not walking so much for recreation as neede." Nash, in Pierce, speaks of "the masterless men that set up their bills in Pas. for services." Dekker, in Raven's Almanac (1609), speaks of extreme poverty as "St. Paulus Plague," and adds: "How many that walk in the middle Ile of Pas. in reasonable good clothes will be struck with this plague!" In Day's Law Tricks iv. 2, Joculo tells a cock-and-bull story of a flood in Lond. so great that "the scullers that use to work in the Thames rowed over houses and landed their fares in the middle Ile of Pas." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 9, speaks of those who "with their heavy trot and iron stalk have worn off the brass in the Middle Walk." Hall, in Satires ii. 5, 1, asks: "Saw'st thou ever Siquis patched on Pos. ch. door To seek some vacant vicarage before? Who wants a churchman that can service say . . . Come to the left-side alley of St. Pos." In iii. 7, 6, he says, "Trow'st thou where he dined to-day? In sooth I saw him sit with D. Humfray." In v. 3, 20, he speaks of the worshipper "that rounds Pos. pillars in the ear, Or bends his hams down in the naked quire." Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 4, 2, says, "He that buys a horse in Smithfield, and hires a servant in P., as the proverb is, shall likely have a jade to his horse, a knave for his man." In Penn. Parl. 6, it is enacted: "What day soever St. P. ch. hath not, in the middle isle of it, either a broker, masterless man, or a pennyless companion, the usurers of Lond. shall be sworn by oath to bestow a new steeple upon it." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the sights of Lond. "The Tomb of Beauchamp." W. Rowley, in Search Intro., says to the reader, "I know the walks in Pas. are stale to you; ye could tell . . . how many paces there between the quire and the W. door." In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 1, Oldcraft calls Cunningham "a D. Humphrey spark, He had rather lose his dinner than his jest."

There was a fine tomb of Lord Chancellor Christopher Hatton, of dancing fame, between the choir and the S. aisle: it was very conspicuous, and altogether dwarfed the adjacent tombs of Sir Philip Sidney and Sir Francis Walsingham. A contemporary epigram runs: "Philip and Francis have no tomb, Great Christopher takes all the room." Corbett says, "Nor need the Chancellor boast, whose pyramis Above the Host and Altar raised is." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 3, Macilente asks: "How long should I be, ere I should put off [i.e. take off my hat] to the Lord Chancellor's tomb?" Dekker, in Hornbook iv., advises the visitor to St. P., "Your next worthy work is to repair to my Lord Chancellor's tomb; and, if you can but reasonably spell, bestow some time upon the reading of Sir Philip Sydney's brief epitaph; in the compass of an hour, you may make shift to stumble it out."

There was a clock, the hours being struck by a pair of Jacks. In Dekker's Hornbook iv., he says, "If Pow. Jacks be once up with their elbows and quarrelling to strike 11, as soon as ever the clock has parted them, let not the D.'s gallery contain you any longer." Later, the Gull is advised to look at the great Dial: "observe the sauciness of the Jacks that are above the man in the moon there; the strangeness of the motion will quit your labour." Middleton, in Hubburt, p. 54, says, "what is mirth in me is as harmless as the quarter Jacks in P. that are up with their elbows 4 times an hour" and yet never strike anybody. There were beautiful rose-windows in the transepts and Lady Chapel, and they gave their name to a sort of open leather-work used for ornamenting shoes. Chaucer, in C. T. A. 3318, tells how Absolon has "Pow. wyndow coven on his shoon." The organ was built by William Beton. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. The present organ was built by Willis in 1874 to replace Father Smith's instrument, erected in 1697. In T. Heywood's Royal King i. 1, the Welshman says, "It was told us in Wales that you have a great pigge organ in P., and pigger by a great deal than our organ at Rixam [Wrexham]." Paul Hentzner says that P. possessed a "very fine organ which at evening prayer, accompanied with other instruments, is delightful." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 3, Macilente declares that he will not take off his hat to Lord Chancellor Hatton's tomb in St. P., any more than he will "commend the chapel organ for the gilt without." Dekker, in Hornbook iii., speaks of the first lesson in St. P. being "read in a voice as big as one of the great organs." A halfpenny seems to have been charged for a seat in the church. In Nash's Summers, 342, Will says, "Hur come to Powl, as the Welshman says, and hur pay an halfpenny for hur seat, and hur hear the preacher talge."

There were numerous chapels connected with the old cathedral. At the E. end was the Lady Chapel, with chapels to St. George and St. Dunstan to the N. and S. of it respectively. In the crypt was the ch. of St. Faith; at the S.W. corner the ch. of St. Gregory. On the N. side was a charnel-house with a chapel over it called Pardon Ch. In these chapels various chantries were established—35 in all—giving employment to 54 priests. Under the choir was the Jesus Chapel; on the N. side of St. P. School there was a stone belfry with 4 large bells belonging to Jesus Chapel, and known as Jesus' Bells. Fuller, Holy State v. 14, says, "Sir Miles Partridge . . . played at dice for Jesus's bells with K. Henry VIII and won them of him."

The old ch. had a tower at the crossing surmounted by a wooden spire, covered with lead, and crowned by a weathercock in the shape of a golden eagle. The tower was 285 ft. and the spire 208 ft. high: something like 100 ft. higher than the top of the present dome. It was completed in 1221: the steeple was burnt down in 1561, and never restored. Visitors were allowed to ascend the tower on payment of a penny, and many tried to immortalize themselves by carving their names on the leads. At the coronation procession of Q. Mary a Dutchman, called Peter, stood on the weathercock and waved flags. In Rychardes' Misogonus iii. 2, Cacurgus says, "That old lizard has no more wit than the weathercock of Pas." Skelton, in Colin Clout 336, speaks of a man saying in mock that "a butterfly were the weathercock of the steeple of Pos." In Respublica iv. 3, People says, "That lie ere this is flown as far hence as Poule steeple." In Phillip's Grissill 51, Politick Persuasion fell out of the clouds and says, "The weathercock of Pas. aided me in my flight." In Treasure A. 4, Inclination says, "I can remember when Noe's ship was made; the same year the weathercock of Pas. caught the pip." In Day's B. Beggar ii., Stroud says, "I know no more how to please him that I know how to build up Pas. steeple." In Chaunticleer i., Bristle says, "Like the cripple, I'd run up P. steeple." In Roister ii. 4, Trupenny says, "I looked as far beyond the people As one may see out of the top of Pas. steeple." In Shirley's Riches iii., Gettings, the Lond. merchant, swears "By our thrice-burnt famous steeple That doth overlook the people." The steeple was burnt down in 1136, 1444, and finally in 1561. In Lodge's Wounds of Civil War v. 1, Curtall exclaims: "O base mind that being in the P. steeple of honour hast cast thyself into the sink of simplicity." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1641), says, "For a penny you may be advanced to that height that you shall be above the best in the city: that is, to the top of Pas." Dekker, in Hornbook iv., advises the Gull to pay tribute "to the top of Pow. steeple with a single penny," but he bids him be careful how he looks down, "for the rails are as rotten as your great-grandfather." Before he comes down he must talk about the horse that went up, and carve his name on the leads: "indeed, the top of Pow. contains more names than Stowes Chronicle." In Dekker's Satiro iv. 3, 198, Sir Vaughan says, "Your Muse leans upon nothing but filthy rotten rails, such as stand on Pos. head." In Jonson's Exercitation on Vulcan Underwoods lxi., he says, "Pox on your flameship! if it be To all as fatal as . . . to P. steeple . . . which remains yet unrepaired." In Dekker's Satiro iv. 3, 186, Tucca says that his sword is "as blunt as the top of Pos.," i.e. after the steeple had been burnt and only the tower was left. In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity says, "I will fetch thee a leap from the top of P. steeple to the Standard in Cheap." In Epicoe ii. 1, Truewit marvels that Morose does not commit suicide "with such a delicate steeple in the town as Bow to vault from; or a braver height, as P." In Dekker's Shoemaker iv. 5, Firk says, "Am I sure that P. steeple is a handfull higher than Lond. Stone?" In the Book of Riddels (157), we have: "What is that, round as a ball, longer than P. steeple, weathercock and all?" The answer is: "It is a round bottom of thread when it is unwound." The riddle must be earlier than 1561. In T. Heywood's Hogsdon v. 1, Charley says, "This 7 years I have not seen P. steeple or Cheap Cross." In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, Moll is said to be "heir to some 19 mtns., all as high as P." In Abingdon iv. 3, Nicholas says, "I'll take no wrong, if he looked as high as P. steeple." In Tomkis' Albumazar iii. 5, Trincalo boasts: "I could descend from the top of P. to the bottom And on each step strew parting compliments." In iii. 9, Trincalo, when exhorted to drop from a window, protests: "'Tis as high as St. P." In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 4, Lance suggests as an attractive news item "Whirlwinds that shall take off the top of Grantham steeple, and clap it on P." In Dekker's Dead Term (1608), P.

Steeple says, "The mariner called me his seamarke, for to him I stood as a watchtower to guide him safely to our English shore." In Brome's Sparagus ii. 2, Rebecca longs "to be on the top of P. Steeple when it is new built, but that must not be yet; nor am I so unreasonable that I can stay the time." The date is 1635, when projects for restoration had been for a couple of years in the air, but had come to nothing. Banks' dancing horse Morocco is said to have climbed to the top of the tower in 1601. In Owles Almanack (1618), we find: "Since the Dancing Horse stood on the top of Pow. whilst a number of asses stood braying below, 17 years." The horse and his trainer were ultimately burned alive in Rome for witchcraft. In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, the Capt. asks: "Could the little horse that ambled on the top of P. carry all the people?" In Middleton's Black Book, the Devil asks: "May not the devil walk in P. as well as the horse go a-top of P.?" In Dekker's Satiro i. 2, 157, Horace says, "I have heard of the horses walking a' the top of Pas." W. Rowley, in Search Intro., calls this "the transforming of the top of Pas. into a stable." Dekker, in Wonderful Year (1603), says, "He that dares to be a man in print must make account that he shall stand like the old weather-cock over Pow. steeple to be beaten with all storms." In his Seven Sins, he says that Sloth is young: "he was not in the shell when Pas. steeple and the weathercock were on fire." In his Dead Term (1608), in the complaint of Pas. Steeple, he gives the whole history of it from its first building to the fire which destroyed it in 1561. In his Westward ii. 1, Honeysuckle asks: "What news flutters abroad? do Jackdaws dung the top of P. steeple still?" To which Justiniano replies: "The more is the pity, if any daws do come into the temple, as I fear they do." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 2, Randall, attacked by highwaymen at Coombe Park, cries: "If they take Randalls, then Randalls shall see Pauls steeples no more." In Cuckqueans i. 2, Shift says, "P. steeple stands in the place it did before." The supposed date is 1588. In Deloney's Reading vi., the clothiers' wives, visiting Lond., "came to St. P. Ch., whose steeple was so high that it seemed to pierce the clouds, on the top whereof was a great and mighty weathercock, of clean silver . . . which was afterwards stolen away by a cunning cripple." With the proceeds of this theft "he builded . . . Cripple-gate." The supposed date is the reign of Henry I. Sir John Davies, in In Gerontem 13, represents an old man dating events from the "burning of P. steeple." Dekker, in Hornbook iii., says that the ears "have crooked windings like those that lead to the top of Pow. steeple."

St. Paul's Cross. A pulpit cross of wood, on a stone foundation and roofed with lead, from which sermons were delivered. It stood on the N. side of the ch., near the E. end. The exact site was discovered in digging up the churchyard some years ago, and marked by a pavement. A cross has now been erected near the old site. In Piers C. xii. 56 and xvi. 70 are references to preaching "at Saint Pauls": doubtless from the Cross. In Skelton's Colin Clout 1175, the Prelates complain: "At P. Cross or elsewhere they set not by us a whittle." In John Evangel. 352, Eugenio says to John, "Methink I have heard you preach or this at Pas. Cross." In Wapull's Tarrieth F.1, Greediness says, "Towards Pow. Crosse from hence I do go." Courage asks him: "To Pow. Crosse, what there will you do? Do you the preacher's words so well like?" But Greediness explains that he is going there to find his debtors. In Yarrington's Two Trag. iv. 5, Merry says, "I met Williams coming home from

Pow. Crosse where he had been to hear a sermon." In Massinger's Madam iii. 1, Shave'em threatens to have Rumble arrested "for the purse you cut In P. at a sermon." In True Trag., p. 84, the Page says, "Dr. Shaw hath pleased my lord that preached at Pas. Crosse yesterday, that proved the 2 princes to be bastards." Ascham, in Scolemaster (1570), says, "10 sermons at P. Cross do not so much good as one of those books do harm." In Mayne's Match i. 3, Warehouse tells his nephew that he means him to be a city father "to sit at sermon in his chain and scarlet . . . and be remembered at the Cross." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 143, Shaw says to Lovell, "Be but at P. Cross on Sunday next; I hope I have it here shall soundly prove K. Edward's children not legitimate." In his J. K. M. B. v., the Q., after the victory over the Armada, says, "Give commandment to the Dean of P. He not forget in his next learned sermon To celebrate this conquest at P. Cross." Earle, in Microcosmography xliii., says of the bold, forward man: "He never defers St. Mary's [i.e. his sermon in the University ch.] beyond his regency; and his next sermon is at P. Cross, and that printed." In Middleton's Black Book, p. 41, the Devil says of the Cutpurse: "You shall not stick to give a shave of your office at Pauls-Cross in the sermon-time." Burton, A. M. Intro., says, "Had I been as forward as some others, I might have haply printed a sermon at P. Cross." St. Faith's Ch. was in the crypt at the E. end, just S. of the Cross. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 5, Firk swears "by my Faith's Ch. under P. Cross." An official was employed to visit the church and drive out the dogs. Nash, in Pierce (1592), says, "It were verie good the dog-whipper in Pas. would have a care of this in his unsaverie visitation everie Saturday."

There were a few lamps round the ch., which were lighted at nightfall: they were the only attempt at street-lighting in Lond. at this time. Hall, in Satires iv. 2, advises Lolio's son: "Gin not thy gait . . . until the lamps of Pauls be light."

As is obvious from Vischer's View of Lond. (1616), St. P., even after the destruction of its lofty spire, was the most conspicuous object in the city, and its bulk made it a common symbol of size and immobility. In H4 A. ii. 4, 575, the Prince says of Falstaff: "This oily rascal is known as well as P." In H8 v. 4, 17, the Porter's man says of the crowd: "We may as well push against Powle's as stir 'em." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. i. 1, Sordido, the regrater of grain, says that until he has no place to hide it in, "each corn I send [to market] shall be as big as P." i.e. he will send none at all. In Tomkis' Albunazar i. 3, Ronca shows a perspective with which he can read a page of a minute edition of the Iliad "12 long m. off as plainly as you see P. from Highgate." In B. & F. Wit S. v. iv. 1, Pompey says, "I ha' got a stomach 6 times and lost it again, as often as a traveller from Chelsea shall lose the sight of P. and get it again." In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 1, Frisco says, "My master would say, Would I had P. full of gold; my young mistress would wish she had P. full of needles. I once asked my master half a yard of frieze to make me a coat, and he cried it was big enough to make P. a night-gown."

General Allusions. In J. Heywood's John, Tyb and Sir John 71, John says, "Thou wast praying in the church of Pos." In Mankind 98, Bodily Lust, who has been knocking at Margery's door, says, "A man might have heard the noise from Pos. to the farthest end of Cheap." In Three Ladies F.2, Diligence testifies that "Simony was seen this day walking in P. having conference with some of the clergy." In Nobody 1137, Nobody says, "Coming through Pos., there Nobody kneeled down To say his prayers." After the banquet on Lord Mayor's Day it was customary for the Corporation to attend a sermon at St. P. In Shirley's Riches i., Clod says, "You march [on Lord Mayor's Day] to the Guildhall, where you look upon the Saracen giants, and feed like Saracens, till you have no stomach to P. in the afternoon." Proclamations were often read at St. P., either in the cathedral or at the Cross. In R3 iii. 6, 3, the Scrivener has engrossed the indictment of Hastings "that it may this day be read o'er in P." In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Face says to Subtle, "I will write thee up bawd in P." Apparently there was some festival at St. P.'s on St. George's Day; at which the knights, dressed in blue coats, kept order in the crowd. In Barry's Ram iv. p. 314, Face says, "I will be knight, Wear a blue coat on great St. George's day, And with my fellows drive you all from P.'s For this attempt." The children of P., i.e. the choir-boys, used to act plays behind the Convocation House; amongst others were Histrionastix (1599), to which allusion is made in Jack Drum v. 192, where Sir Edward says, "I saw the children of Pow. last night, And troth they pleased me pretty, pretty well." Lyly's Campaspe, Sapho, and Love's Meta. were written for them and the children of the Chapel Royal. In R3 i. 2, 30, Anne says to the bearers of the body of Henry VI, "Come, now, towards Chertsey with your holy load Taken from P., to be interred there." Henry's body lay in state in St. P. An unsavoury exploit of a certain Spaniard in the cathedral is often alluded to. In Webster's Wyat, p. 45, Brett says, "There came but one Dondego into England, and he made all P. stink again." In T. Heywood's Maid of West iv. 4, Clem addresses the Spaniards: "Now, you Don Diegos, you that made P. to stink." In Middleton's Blurt iv. 2, Blurt says, "If you be kin to Don Diego that was smelt out in P., you pack." In Ford's Warbeck i. 3, "Worseley, the Dean of P.," is mentioned as one of the supporters of Perkin Warbeck.

PAUL'S CHAIN. A lane running S. from the S. side of St. P. Churchyard, Lond., to Carter Lane. A chain used to be stretched across the carriage way at this point during divine service to prevent the disturbance from passing vehicles. In Middleton's Triumphs of Truth, the Angel and Zeal conduct the Lord Mayor "to P. C." Cocker, the arithmetician, lived "on the S. side of St. P. Ch., over against P. C." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 39, tells of the gaolers taking the prisoners a walk "between P. Ch. and Ludgate." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says that on Coryat's return "P. C. for joy did stretch and yawn."

PAUL'S CHURCHYARD. The area surrounding St. P. Ch., Lond., the side towards the S. being called the Bow and the N. side the String. It was enclosed by a precinct wall, and had 6 gates, viz. one leading from Ludgate Hill; the next to Paternoster Row; the 3rd, in Canon Alley, to the N. Door; the 4th the little gate into Cheapside; the 5th, or Austin Gate, to Watling St.; and the 6th to P. Chain. It was, and is, surrounded by shops, which in Elizabethan times were mostly in the occupation of booksellers, though trunk-makers were also found there. The Bishop's Palace stood at the N.W. corner and the Chapter-house on the S. side. After the Gt. Fire the booksellers mostly migrated to the neighbouring Paternoster Row. On the N. side of the ch. yard was the Mitre Inn, a noted coaching inn, afterwards known as the Swan and Lyre, and then, by a curious perversion, as The Goose and Gridiron. It is probably to this inn that Dekker refers in Northward iv. 1, where Mayberry says, "Wife, on with your riding suit and cry Northward Hoe! as the boy at P. says."

In J. Heywood's Four PP., p. 20, the Pedler says, "If each man's tale In Paule's c. were set on sale," they would have to be sold by weight. In Ret. Pernass. i. 2, Judicio speaks of "the paper ware in Paules C." In iii. 3, the Page says, "This great linguist, my master, will march through Paule's c.; come to a bookbinder's shop, and ask for these books in Spanish and Italian." In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 4, Valentine says, "Who looked on you but Prentices in P. c. that scented your want of Breton's books?" In the same play (ii. 3), Isabella asks, "Where lies this learning, Sir?" and Shorthose answers: "In P. C., for sooth," i.e. in the booksellers' shops. In Brome's Covent G. ii. 1, Crosswill says, "Take up these books, sirrah, and carry them presently into P. c., d'ye see, and change them all for Histories." In T. Heywood's F. M. Exch. 47, the Cripple says of a certain poet: "His library was just nothing But rolls and scrolls and bundles of cast wit Such as durst never visit P. C." Nash, in Pierce I. 2, says, "Who can abide a scurvy peddling poet to pluck a man by the sleeve at every 3rd step in Paules C., and when he comes in to survey his wares, there's nothing but purgations and vomits wrapped up in waste paper?" Dekker, in preface to Satiro., says, "Neither should this ghost of Tucca have walked up and down Poules C., but that he was raised up (in print) by new exorcisms." In Strange Horse Race (1613) preface, he says, "He is tied to a stake, like a bear to be baited, that comes into Paules C. to be read." In Jonson's Staple i. 5, Cymbal describes a decayed Stationer as "True P. bred I' the C." The author of Zepheria (1594) xxxvi. 14, says to his lady, "This penance I award Clad in white sheet, thou stand in P. c.," i.e. as the subject of his poems. In Pilg. Pernass. ii. 1, Madido says, "Ere long not a post in P. C. but shall be acquainted with our writings." In Dekker's Hornbook iv., he says, "John in Powles c. shall fit his head for an excellent block." Presumably John was a fashionable hatter. Middleton, in Hubburt, p. 53, swears "by John of Pauls c." The C. was used for executions: 4 of the Gunpowder Plot conspirators suffered there. From T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 269, we learn that Dean Nowel lived "in Powles C." Taylor, in Works i. 61, speaks of "trunk-makers in Pauls C."

PAUL'S (Sr.) PLAYHOUSE. A private playhouse in the choir singing-school of St. P.'s, Lond., established by Sebastian Westcott, the master of the boys, about 1575: it was suppressed for some years after 1590, but was not finally closed until 1608. The price of admission was 4d., twice the regular fee. In Cuckqueans i. 2, Shift says that "P. steeple stands in the place it did before, and you may see a play for 2d." The supposed date is 1588. But in a marginal note to Lyly's Pappe with an Hatchet (1589), it is stated that if a tragedy "be showed at P., it will cost you 4d., at the Theatre 2d." In Ind. to What You Will, acted at P. in 1600, the speaker says, "Let's place ourselves within the curtains, for, good faith, the stage is so very little, we shall wrong the general eye else very much." Nash, in Saffron Walden, says that he desires to have "the plays at P. up again." This was during their temporary suppression after 1590: there is proof that the boys were acting again in 1600, for in Marston's Jack Drum, Sir Edward says, in v. 102, "I saw the children of Powles last night And troth they pleased me pretty, pretty well: The apes in time will do it handsomely." Planet praises the quality of the audience, but Brabant criticizes the plays they are producing as "musty fopperies of antiquity."

PAUL'S (St.) SCHOOL. A school founded by John Colet in 1512, on the E. side of the Churchyard of St. P., Lond. It was intended for the education of 153 poor children, and its first master was Lilly, the grammarian. The building was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt immediately; a more modern building was erected in 1823, and in 1880 the school was removed to W. Kensington and the buildings pulled down to make room for warehouses. The boys were nicknamed P. Pigeons. In Underwit ii. 2, Thomas says, "That I took upon the Stationer's word, who had been a pretty scholar at P." Laneham, in his Letter (1575), says, "I went to school forsooth both at Pollez and also at St. Antoniez." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iii. 2, Maudlin says to Tim, "I'll make your tutor whip you; You know how I served you once at the free-school In P. churchyard." The boys performed plays from time to time: amongst others, the Menæchmi of Plautus in 1527 and Phormio in 1528. A performance of a Latin tragedy on Dido, written by the headmaster, John Rightwise, is recorded for 1532.

PAUL'S (SAINT), COVENT GARDEN. A ch. on the W. side of Covent Garden, Lond., built from the designs of Inigo Jones. It was begun in 1631 and consecrated in 1638. The portico is seen in Hogarth's Morning. It was burnt down in 1795 and rebuilt on the original plans. In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Crosswill says to his Puritanical son Gabriel, "Come, Sir, what do you gape and shake the head at there? I'll lay my life he has spied the little cross upon the new Ch. yond, and is at defiance with it." Later on in the scene, Nicholas expresses the hope that the builder Rookesbill "will be the first to lay his bones in the new ch."

PAUL, SAINT, MONASTERY OF. A monastery in Madrid. In Noble Soldier iv. 1, Medina says, "The child shall forthwith be conveyed To the monastery of St. Paul."

PAUL'S WHARF. A landing-place on the Thames, at the end of P. W. Hill, where St. P. Pier is now. In the True Account of the Treasons of Frances Throckmorton (1584), it is said that he was arrested "at his house by Poules Wharf." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 3, Touchwood says, "I'll Take water at P. W. and overtake you."

PAUSILIPO, POSILIPO. A mtn. on the N.W. of Naples. A tunnel is cut through it 70 ft. high, 21 wide, and 2244 long. The road to Pozzuoli runs through it, and above its E. archway is the reputed tomb of Vergil. It is said to have been constructed in the reign of Tiberius, but in the Middle Ages it was supposed to have been magically fashioned by Vergil. Davenant, in Spolia Salmacida, has in his scene "a rock cut through by art as the P. near Naples." A lost play of Massinger's was entitled The Fair Anchoress of Pansilippo (1640). In Marlowe's Faustus vii. 13, Faust tells that at Naples "There saw we learned Maro's golden tomb, The way he cut, an English mile in length, Thorough a rock of stone, in one night's space."

PAVIA (the ancient TICINUM). A city in N. Italy on the left bank of the Ticino, 2 m. above its junction with the Po, 22 m. S. of Milan. The Basilica Reale of San Michele was the place of coronation for the Lombard Kings. In the cathedral of San Stefano are the tombs of St. Augustine and Boethius, and the lance of Roland is suspended from the roof. The palace of the Visconti dates from 1360. The university was constituted in 1361. It was taken by the Lombards in 573 and became the capital of their kingdom, and after its capture by Charlemagne in 774 it continued to be the capital of the Caroling Kings in Italy. In 1360 it came into the hands of the Visconti, and henceforward was part of the Duchy of Milan. In 1525 it successfully defied Francis I of France, and he was taken prisoner and "lost all but honour"; but it was, 2 years later, sacked by the French under Lautrec. It suffered much in the wars of the 18th cent., and was finally, with the rest of Lombardy, incorporated with the Sardinian kingdom in 1859. The scene of Wilson's Swiss is laid in P. during the Lombard rule in the 7th cent. In Davenant's Albion, which is laid in the early Lombard period (iv. 1), Hermauld says, "The Q. expects You will return from P." Massinger's Milan (Act iii) is laid in part in the imperial camp near P. In Chapman's Chabot ii. 3, 185, K. Francis I says to the Chancellor, "I send for you about a service Of equal price to me, as if again My ransom came to me from Pn. thralldom." The date is 1540. The scenes of Marston's Insatiate and Ford's Sacrifice are laid at P. during the early 16th cent.

PAWN (from the Dutch PAND). A covered walk, or arcade, in which articles were exposed for sale: applied specifically to a part of the Royal Exchange in Lond. Drayton, in Heroic Epp. xvii. 95, says, "Walk into the Pawne To buy thee cambric, calico, or lawn." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says to Judith, "You must to the Pawn to buy lawn." In 'Tis Merry when Gossips Meet (1609), the Wife says, "In truth, kind coz, my coming's from the Pawn, But I protest I lost my labour there. A gentleman promised to give me lawn And did not meet me, which he well shall hear." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Glareanus Vadianus says, "Gald-breech Fame rode post bare-ridge To spread the news on Antwerpe Pawne."

PEACOCK. A tavern in Lond. on the W. side of Aldersgate St., near the end of Long Lane. In Shirley's Wedding ii. 1, Cardona says to Isaac, "When thou art at the Peacock, remember to call for the sprig."

PEAK, THE. A dist. of rugged mtns. and deep valleys in N.W. Derbyshire, forming part of the Pennine Range. The highest point is about 2000 ft. above sea-level. There are many remarkable caverns and other natural curiosities: in Cotton's Wonders of the Peake (1683), 7 of these are enumerated, viz. Pool's Hole, St. Anne's Well at the Buxtons; Weeding Well, or Tydes-Well; Elden Hole; Mamtor; Peake's Arse, or the Devil's Arse; and Chatsworth. In Drayton's Dowdabell, he describes the lady as "white as snow on Peakish hull." In Underwit iii. 3, the Capt. says, "My mother came of the Overmuchs by the P." In Jonson's Devil i. 2, Pug says he comes "of Derbyshire about the P.," and admits that the hole called Devil's Arse belonged to his ancestors. In his Gipsies, Jack sings: "From the famous P. of Derby And the Devil's Arse there hard by, There the Egyptians throng in clusters." Later, the Patrico, or Gipsy chief, calls himself "a Devil's Arse-a-Pekian." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 7, says, "The P. [vaunts] her Dove, whose banks so fertile be." In his Odes (1606), the 7th is "written in the P.," and he speaks of being in "the utmost P. . . . Amongst the mountains bleak, Exposed to sleet and rain." Hall, in Satires v. 1, 66, speaks of "A starved tenement . . . such as shiver on a Peake hill-side." Becon, in Jewel of Joy (1560), p. 420, says that the P. "is a marvellous and a barren country,

. . . that neither hath learning nor yet no spark of godliness."

PECKHAM. A vill. in Surrey abt. 3 m. S. of St. Paul's, Lond.: now one of the suburbs of the metropolis. In Prodigal ii. 4, Lancelot finds that Flowerdale's uncle is "of great demesnes and wealth at P."

PEGASUS. The sign of a tavern in Cheapside, Lond. In Ret. Pernass. i. 2, Ingenioso says, "Meet me an hour hence at the sign of the P. in Cheapside." Randolph, in Jealous Lover, speaks of "a pottle of elixir at the P." Shakespeare, in Shrew iv. 4, 5, makes the Pedant speak of having lodged "in Genoa at the P."

PEKIN, or PEKING. See PAQUIN.

PELAGIA, PELAGUS. An oak-grove in S.E. Arcadia between Mantinea and Tegea. The nymph Calisto was an Arcadian. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5395, Juno says, "Thebes afforded an Alcmena and a wanton Semele; P. a Callisto." According to tradition, the name of Arcadia was originally P. In T. Heywood's Gold. Age ii., Jupiter says to Calisto, "Live Pelasge's Q.," and in Act iii. he says, "Archas, we make thee of P. king, As the son of fair Calisto. Let that clime Henceforth be called Arcadia."

PELHAM'S MOUNT. A hill close to Leith in Edinburghshire. In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 49, Grey says, "Pelham from P. Mt. plays on the town," i.e. Leith. In iv. 1, 15, Clifton says, "Howard with his launcetiers quarters 'Twixt Mt. Pelham and the sea by west."

PELICAN. A sign in Lombard St., Lond. The Pelican Life Insurance Co. may be found still at No. 70, next to Change Alley. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 64, the K. says, "Here's Lombard St. and here's the P." There was a P. Tavern at Oxford. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel reminds Floradin of "our last breakfast we made in Oxford at the Pellican."

PELION. Mtn. in Thessaly near the coast of the Ægean, N. of the Pagasæan Gulf. It is connected with Mt. Ossa by a low ridge, and its flat top contrasts with the conical peak of the other mtn., so as to suggest the possibility of placing Ossa upon it, as the Giants were said to have done in order to scale Olympus, when they were at war with the gods. It was said to have been the home of the centaur Cheiron, the instructor of Achilles, and his cavern may still be seen between the 2 summits of the mtn. The mtn. is richly clothed with timber, and the Argo was said to have been built with wood cut from it. Here Acastus left Peleus to be devoured by the beasts, but he was rescued by Cheiron and married Thetis. According to one account, after the battle of the gods with the giants one of the latter was buried beneath P. In M. W. W. ii. 1, 82, Mrs. Page says, "I had rather be a giantess and lie under Mt. P." than marry Falstaff. In Ham. v. 1, 276, Lartès cries, "Pile your dust upon the quick and dead Till of this flat a mtn. you have made To o'ertop old P." In Chapman's Bussy iv. 1, Tamyra says, "Innocence rescued Peleus From all the savage beasts in P.," and in v. 1, Montsurry says, "Men are not stayed Till they embrace within their wife's two breasts All P. and Cythæron with their beasts."

In T. Heywood's Traveller iv. 3, Geraldine, finding Delavil with Wincott's wife, exclaims, "To suppress Your souls yet lower, without hope to rise, Heap Ossa upon P." In Kyd's Soliman i., Basilisco says, "Wouldst thou have me a Titan to bear up P. or Ossa?" In Val. Welsh. ii. 2, the Bardh says, "Gederus Fights like those giants that to cope with Jove Hurl'd Ossa upon P." In Wilson's Swisser iii. 1, Asprandus says, "Set P. upon Ossa and there place him, The justness of our cause would fetch him down." In B. & F. Philaster v. 3, Philaster says, "No monument, Though high and big as P., shall be able To cover this base murder." The author of Zepharia (1594) xxxvi. 8 says, "This is to heap Ossa on P."

PELLA. A city of ancient Macedonia, W. of the Axios, abt. 15 m. from the coast. It occupied a strong position and its citadel was almost impregnable. It was made the capital by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. It is now uninhabited. In Fisher's Fuimus i. 2, Cæsar, speaking of Alexander, says, "Once the Pellean D. did eastward march." Milton, P. R. ii. 196, calls Alexander "that Pellean conqueror."

PELOPONNESUS. The peninsula in S. Greece, now called THE MOREA. In Ant. iii. 10, 31, after the battle of Actium, Canidius says of Antony and Cleopatra: "Toward P. are they fled."

PELORUS (now CAPO DI FARO). The cape at the extreme N.E. point of Sicily. In T. Heywood's S. Age iii., Pluto, giving directions for the burial of Typhon under Sicily, says, "On his right hand the mt. P. hurl." Milton, P. L. i. 232, compares the surface of Hell to the appearance presented "when the force Of subterranean wind transports a hill Torn from P., or the shattered side Of thundering Ætna." In Marston's Ant. Rev. iv. 3, Pandulpho says, "We'll sit as heavy on Piero's heart, As Ætna doth on groaning P."

PELUSIUM. A city and fortress of ancient Egypt, on the easternmost mouth of the Nile, now silted up. Its ruins are at the modern Tineh. As the frontier fortress it was repeatedly attacked by invaders from Asia, and famous battles were fought in its neighbourhood—by Cambyses in 525 B.C., by the Persians in 309 B.C., by Antiochus Epiphanes in 173 B.C., and by Mark Antony in 55 B.C. It was under the walls of P. that the army of Sennacherib was stricken by plague 701 B.C. After the battle of Actium, Octavian went at once to P. and was admitted within its walls. In Brandon's Octavia 2221, Byllius says of Octavian, after Actium: "Unto P. hastily he speeds." In Antonie i. 21, Antony charges Cleopatra with having "Yielded P. on this countries shore," sc. to Octavian. In B. & F. Mad Lover v. 4, Memnon says, "Sing me the battle of P. In which this worthy [Chilax] died." The whole play is unhistorical, including this supposed battle.

PEMBROKE. The county town of Pembrokesh., the most W. county of S. Wales. It stands on the S. side of Milford Haven. The castle, with its fine round keep, is on a ridge surrounded on 3 sides by water, and is one of the most interesting ruins in Wales. It was built by Arnulph de Montgomery in 1094. Here Henry VII was born in 1456, his uncle Jasper Tudor being then Earl of P. When he returned to England in 1485 he landed in Milford Haven and marched thence to Bosworth. In R3 iv. 5, 7, Urswick informs Derby that Richmond is "At P. or at Harford-west in Wales." The Earl of P. in K. J. was William Marshall, who became Earl through his marriage with Isabel de Clare, daughter of Richard Strongbow, the previous Earl. He is wrongly represented in the play as having gone over to the side of the Dauphin when he invaded England. His son William, who succeeded him in the title in 1219, did so, but the old Earl remained faithful to the King throughout. He was the guardian of the young K. Henry III after the death of John, and it was through him that the affairs of the kingdom were brought into order. He died in 1219. The Earl of P. in Marlowe's Ed. II was one of the nobles confederated against Gaveston, who was committed to his custody and, probably by his connivance, taken by Warwick and beheaded. This was Aylmer de Valence, whose father, William de Valence, was created Earl of P. in 1264.

In H6 C. iv. 1, 130 and iv. 3, 54, the Earl of P. is mentioned as a supporter of Edward of York. Jasper Tudor, uncle of Henry VII, was created Earl of P. in 1453, and was a zealous Lancastrian; after his death William Herbert was created Earl in 1468 by Edward IV, whom he had vigorously supported. He was sent with Stafford to fight against the Lancastrians in the North, but Stafford quarrelled with him and he was left to meet the enemy alone near Banbury, where he was taken prisoner and executed in 1469. His illegitimate son, Sir Richard Herbert, of Ewyas, was the ancestor of the present Earl. He was succeeded in the title by his son William, who is the P. of R3 iv. 5, 11 and v. 3, 29. In 1532 Henry VIII raised the Lady Anne Boleyn to the peerage under the title of Marchioness of P. In H8 ii. 3, 63, the Lord Chamberlain tells her, "The K.'s majesty does purpose honour to you, no less flowing Than Marchioness of P." The title was revived in 1551 and conferred on Sir William Herbert, grandson of the William who was executed at Banbury. He is one of the characters in Webster's Wyat. His son Henry, the 2nd Earl, married Mary, sister of Sir Philip Sidney, to whom his Arcadia is dedicated. She was a poetess and a patron of poets: to her is dedicated Daniel's Cleopatra, and Jonson wrote her epitaph: "Underneath this marble hearse Lies the subject of all verse, Sidney's sister, P.'s mother." Her son was William, the 3rd Earl, who has been by some supposed to be the W. H. the only begotter of Shakespeare's Sonnets, but with very slender reason. The 1st Folio of Shakespeare was dedicated to him and to Philip Herbert, Earl of Montgomery. There is a fictitious Duke of P. in Chivalry, the supposed date of which is about 1250. There is an Earl of P. in Munday's John Kent, but he is not an historical personage. Anselm Marshall, with whom the title became extinct in 1245, may be the man intended. Fuller, in Church History iv. 15, 13, says that Henry VII was "born in the bowels of Wales, at P."

PEMBROKE COLLEGE. University of Cambridge, founded by Mary de St. Paul in 1247 in memory of her husband, Aylmer de Valence, Earl of P., who was killed at a tilting held in honour of his wedding, so that Mary was "maid, wife, and widow" in one day. She was the daughter of Sir Guy de Chastillon and grandniece of Edward I. The College was at first called Valence-Mary, but very soon became known as P. Hall. The poet Spenser was a member of the college. It stands at the corner of P. St. and Trumpington St. Willis, in Mount Tabor (1639), speaks with gratitude of his old schoolmaster: "one Master Gregory Downhale of P. Hall in Cambridge." Nash, in Pierce, tells a story of "T. N., the master butler of P. Hall, a far better scholar than thyself."

PENERIAN (I suspect a misprint for PYRENEAN; see Brereton's Eliz. Drama, p. 161). In Bristowe E. 2, Anabell asks, "Will Vallenger in silence lose his son And harder than the Penerian rocks Never be pierced?"

PENEUS. The chief river of Thessaly, rising in the Pindus range and flowing through the Vale of Tempe to the Ægean Sea. Daphne was, according to Greek legend, the daughter of the river-god P. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar says, "The flying Pompey to Larissa hastes,

And by Thessalian Tempe shapes his course Where fair P. tumbles up his waves." In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5240, 10 says, "Here, Daphne, by your father P.' streams, Which, falling from the top of Pindus mt., Waters Hæmonian Tempe, let us sit." In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Spring speaks of "That self-same bay-tree into which was turned Peneian Daphne." W. Drummond of Hawthornden, in Summons to Love, apostrophizes Phoebus: "Thou two sweeter eyes Shalt see than those which by P.' streams Did once thy heart surprise." The reference is to the story of the love of Phoebus for Daphne. Spenser, in Prothalamion 78, says of the streams of the Thames: "Like old P.' waters they did seem, When down along by pleasant Tempe's shore Scattered with flowers, through Thessaly they stream." Drummond pronounces it as a tri-syllable, Spenser as a dissyllable. In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises Physander "shalt sleep upon a bed of purest down, driven from white necks of Cayster's swans and P.' sparrows." I do not see the special appropriateness of the epithet. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 21, calls it "slow P."

PEN-MAEN-MAUR. A mtn. on the coast of Caernarvon in N. Wales, rising abruptly from the sea to a height of 1540 ft. In Jonson's Wales, Jenkin asks, "Is not P. and Craig-Erri as good sound as Adlas every whit of him?" In Shirley's St. Patrick iii. 1, Rodomant says, "An 'twere as deep as the root of P. My love should bear it." Drayton, in Polyolb. x. 3, says, "The Muse her former course doth seriously pursue From Penman's craggy height to try her saily wings." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iii. 2, 182, when Hugh says he is a Welshman, Barnaby replies, "You know Penvenmower."

PENNYLESS BENCH. A seat under a wooden canopy at the E. end of the old Carfax ch. in Oxford, notorious as the resort of idle loungers and paupers. In Massinger's Madam iv. 1, Luke says, "Bid him bear up; he shall not Sit long on P. B." In Greene's James IV iv. 3, Andrew says, "We will teach him such a lesson as shall cost him a chief place on p. b. for his labour." Middleton, in Black Book vii. 27, says, "The time was at hand like a pickpurse, that Pierce should be called no more pennyless, like the Mayor's bench at Oxford." Greene, in Groatworth of Wit xii. 133, says, "In this sorrow he sat down on p. b." Lyly, in Euphues England ii. 29, says, "Every stool he sat on was peniles b. . . his robes were rags." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1641) ad fin., satirizes those who have once had overmuch money, but "in no long time have been fain . . . to take a nap on p. b."

PENNYRICH STREET. Lond., possibly Pencritch St. is intended. It was the E. part of the present Pancras Lane, which runs from Queen St. to Bucklersbury, parallel to Cheapside. It was named from the old ch. of St. Pancras, which stood on its N. side and was not rebuilt after the Gt. Fire. In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas sings: "Then Offering, he, With his dish and his tree, That in every great house keepeth, Is by my son, Young Little-worth done, And in P. st. he sleepeth."

PENON (more fully, P. DE VELEZ). A roadstead on the N. coast of Morocco, about half-way between Ceuta and the Gulf of Melilla. In Stuckey 1261, "Aginer, Zananra, Senta, P., Melilla" are mentioned as towns in Morocco held by the Portuguese at the time.

PENRYN. An ancient borough in S. Cornwall, at the head of a branch of Falmouth harbour, 2 m. N.W. of Falmouth. In Cornish M. P. i. 2589, Solomon says to the Carpenter that he will give him "coys P. yn tyen," i.e. "the wood of P. wholly." In iii. 673, Pilate gives P. to one of the soldiers who has guarded the sepulchre of our Lord, as the price of his silence.

PENSANS (PENZANCE). A spt. town in Cornwall on the N.W. side of Mount's Bay, 24 m. S.W. of Truro. In Brome's Ct. Beggar ii. 1, Swaynwit says, "Pray tell your lady I came not from P. to grow here." In his Damoiselle ii. 1, Amphilus laments the death of his mare, "That would have carried me on this little iron From P. to S. Columb on a day." The distance by road is about 40 m.

PENSHURST. A vill. in Kent on the Eden, near its junction with the Medway, 19 m. S.W. of Maidstone. P. Place is an extensive castellated building, famous as the residence of the Sidney family. Here Sir Philip Sidney was born in 1554. Jonson wrote an Ode to P. in The Forest, beginning: "Thou art not, P., built to envious show Of touch or marble."

PENTAPOLIS. The dist. on the N. coast of Africa between the Great Syrtis and the boundary of Egypt formed by the Romans into the province of Cyrenaica. It is now the most E. part of Tripoli. The 5 Greek colonies from which it takes its name were Cyrene, Barca, Teucheira, Hesperides, and Apollonia. Cyrene was governed by a dynasty derived from its founder Battus, but this was overthrown in the 5th cent. B.C. and a republic established. In Per., Simonides, the father of Thaisa and grandfather of Marina, is called the K. of P., which is an anachronism, as the date of the play is the early part of the 2nd century B.C. Act ii. (except sc. 4) takes place at P., on the coast of which Pericles is wrecked, and where he wins the hand of Thaisa in a tournament. In v. 3, 4, he says, "I did wed At P. the fair Thaisa," and in line 73, "This prince, the fair betrothed of your daughter, Shall marry her at P."

PENUEL, or PENIEL (i.e. FACES of God). In Gen. xxxii. 30, it is stated to have been so called by Jacob after his wrestling with the angel, because he had there seen the face of God. It was an important strategic point, and was fortified (Judges viii. 17) and rebuilt by Jeroboam (I Kings xii. 25). It was clearly E. of the Jordan, not far from Succoth and near the Jabbok. 2 sites have been suggested: Jebel Osha, 8 m. S. of the Jabbok and 11 E. of Jordan, and Tulul edh-Dhahab, on the Jabbok, 4 m. S.E. of Succoth. In Milton, S. A. 278, the Chorus calls to mind "How Succoth and the fort of Penuel Their great deliverer contemned, The matchless Gideon." See Judges viii. 8-17.

PENVENMOWER. See PEN-MAEN-MAUR.

PENZANCE. See PENSANS.

PEPPER ALLEY. A passage leading from the Borough, Southwark, to P. A. Stairs, a landing-place just W. of Old Lond. Bdge.: the site is covered by the present Bdge. In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 1, the Wise Woman, in a list of fortune-tellers and astrologers, mentions "one Hatfield in P. A., he doth pretty well for a thing that is lost." The imprint on the title page of Nash's Return of Pasquil (1589) runs: "If my breath be so hot that I burn my mouth, suppose I was printed by P. A."

PERÆA. The dist. in Palestine, E. of the Jordan, extending from Machærus in the S. to Pella in the N., and from the Jordan to Amman or Philadelphia. In Milton, P. R. ii. 24, the disciples seek for Jesus "On this side the broad lake Genezaret, Or in Peræa."

PERCIA. See PERISA.

PERGAMUM, or PERGAMUS. Properly the citadel of ancient Ilium, or Troy, on a hill S.E. of the city. It is used as a synonym for Troy, q.v. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 3, Rollano says, "P. again shall sink in dust." In Kyd's Span. Trag. i. 2, Horatio says, "She herself, disguised in armour's mask, As Pallas was before proud P." Pallas fought on the side of the Greeks in the Trojan War. In T. Heywood's Iron Age ii., Ajax cries, "Let the thunder of our drums Strike terror to the city P." In Lochrine iii. 1, 49, Guendoline says, "Not Hecuba, the q. of Ilium, When she beheld the town of P. Her palace burnt with all devouring flames . . . Shed such sad tears as I."

PERGAMUM. An ancient city in the province of Mysia in Asia Minor, on the river Selinus, 15 m. from the coast. Under the Attalids it became the capital of a large kingdom, which was made into a Roman province in 130 B.C. Pliny calls it far the most distinguished city in Asia, and it was the seat of one of the Seven Churches of Asia addressed in the Apocalypse. It claimed the honour of being the 1st city to erect a temple to Augustus Cæsar. In Jonson's Sejanus i. 2, Tiberius says, "Deified Augustus hindered not A temple to be built at Pergamum In honour of himself and sacred Rome."

PERIGORT. The title of a lord mentioned in L. L. L. ii. 1, 41, who was married in Normandy to the beautiful heir of Jaques Falconbridge. The title was probably derived from the Province of Perigord in S.W. France in Guienne and Gascony.

PERIWIGGANA. An imaginary country. In Shirley's Gamster iii., the Nephew talks of "Periwiggana, a fruitful country: the moon shines all day and the sun at night." The point being that elderly periwig-pated gentlemen sit up all night gaming and sleep all day.

PERNASSUS. See PARNASSUS.

PERSEPOLIS. The capital of the Persian Empire under the Achæmenidæ. The city has long ceased to exist, but the ruins of the palaces of Darius I, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes III are still to be seen at Takhti Jamshid, 40 m. N.E. of Shiraz in Persia; and 8 m. to the N.E., at Nakshi Rûstam, are the rock-hewn tombs of the Kings of this dynasty. The city was taken and the palaces burnt down by Alexander the Gt. In Marlowe's Tamb., P. is spoken of as being still the capital of the Persian Empire, though it had long been a heap of ruins. In A. i. 1, Meander speaks of Tamburlaine, "Who robs your merchants of P.," and in ii. 5, Meander promises Cosroe, "Your Majesty shall shortly have your wish And ride in triumph through P.," and Tamburlaine exclaims, "Is it not passing brave to be a k. And ride in triumph through P.?" In Milton, P. R. iii. 284, the Tempter, speaking of Cyrus, says, "P., His city, there thou seest."

PERSIA (Pn. = Persian). The country N. of the Pn. Gulf and S. of the Caspian Sea, between Turkestan, Afghanistan, and Beloochistan on the E., and Turkey-in-Asia on the W. It includes the older provinces of Persis, on the N. of the Pn. Gulf, Media, Parthia, and others of less note. Its history begins with the Median dynasty named after its supposed founder Achæmenes, circa 730 B.C. Cyrus of Anshan, who was a Pn., united the Median and Pn. kingdoms, conquered Croesus of Lydia 547 B.C., took Babylon in 539, and established the Medo-Pn. Empire. His son Cambyses invaded and conquered Egypt, and was succeeded by Darius in 521. Darius attacked the Greeks, but was defeated at Marathon in 490. Xerxes, his successor, marched with an enormous army to avenge the disgrace of Marathon, but his fleet was destroyed at Salamis in 480 and his land forces at Plataea in the following year. Cyrus the Younger and his Greeks (under Xenophon) showed the way in 401 to the heart of the Empire, though his death at Cunaxa postponed its fall. But Alexander of Macedon crossed the Hellespont in 334 and in 331 shattered P. by the victory of Gaugamela over Darius, the last of the Achæmenid kings. After Alexander's death in 323 the Seleucids took over the E. part of his empire, but they soon lost all but a nominal control over P., and when Arsaces I founded the Parthian kingdom in 250 P. was included in its dependencies, though it had kings of its own who seem to have gradually gained an independent position. In A.D. 211 Ardashir founded the Sassanian Empire, of which P. was the centre, which lasted until it was overthrown by the Arabs at the battle of Nehavend in A.D. 641. The Pns., who had been all through their history Zoroastrians, or Fire-worshippers, were compelled to embrace Mohammedanism, and formed part of the Eastern Caliphate of the Omayyads and then the Abbassids, until the Mongols took Bagdad in 1258 and brought it to an end. The Mongol dynasty thus established gave way in 1335 to the Ylkhaniens, who in turn were conquered by Timur (Tamburlaine) in 1387. At the close of the 15th cent. the Usbeks of Khiva added Eastern P. to their dominions, but in Western P. Ismail established a new dynasty, conquered the Usbeks in 1511, and though defeated by the great Sultan Selim in 1514 was able to hold his own and maintain the integrity of his kingdom. Shah Abbas the Gt. reigned from 1585 to 1628, and opened up relations with the European powers. In 1598 Robert Shirley visited his court and remained in his service, being sent by him as ambassador to England in 1607. He arrived in England in 1611 and stayed for 2 years. In 1623 he returned once more to England as ambassador, and finally died in P. in 1628. The dynasty of Ismail was overthrown in 1736 by a robber chief, Nadir Shah.

Historical Allusions. In Respublica ii. 1, Respublica musing on the mutability of things, exclaims, "What is the great Empire of the Medes and Pns.?" In Kyd's Cornelia i., Cicero asks, "Were they [the Romans] the heirs to P. or the Medes, First monarchies?" Percia appears as one of the characters in Darius. In Chapman's D'Olive iii. 1, Vandome says, "So the Pn. king Made the great river Ganges run distinctly In an innumerable sort of channels." This was Cyrus (see under GANGES). In Preston's Cambises prol., we have: "In Percia there reigned a k. Who Cyrus might by name Who did deserve, As I do read, The lasting blast of fame." In Cyrus i. 1, Cyrus addresses his men as "Ye Pns., Medes, and Hircanians." In Greene's James IV i. 645, Oberon says, "Cyrus of P., Mighty in life, within a marble grave Was laid to rot." The alleged tomb is still extant at Meshed-Murghab. In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xvii., Magnificence mentions in his list of heroes "Daryus, the doughty chieftain of Perse." Cambises deals with incidents in the history of the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses, the successor of Cyrus. In Wilson's Cobler 186, the Soldier says, "In the conflict of Arbaces, general of P., at Marathon I rescued the colours of Beotia." In B. & F. Custom ii. 1, Duarte says, "Were the Pn. host that drank up rivers added To the Turk's present powers, I could direct them." The reference is to the army of Xerxes. In Chapman's Cæsar iii. 1, 125, Pompey says that the Genius of Rome is not "Slowly stirred up, like the Pn. angel." Cf. Daniel x. 13, where "the Prince of P." means an angel. In Lyly's Campaspe

iii. 4, Hephestion says to Alexander, "Behold all P. swelling in the pride of their own power. All these, Alexander, are to be subdued." In Chettie's Hoffman ii., Mathias says, "Their caparisons exceed the Pn. monarch's when he met destruction from Philip's son." In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron says, "The great Macedon Was said . . . To teach . . . The incestuous Pns. to reverence Their mothers." Milton, P. L. xi. 393, describes Adam as seeing in vision "where The Pn. in Ecbatan sat." Ecbatana was the summer capital of the Achæmenian kings of P. B. & F. Prophetess takes place during the reign of Carinus about A.D. 284. Act iv. 4 and 5 are laid in P. during the war between the Romans and Bahram II, one of the Sassanid kings, who is called Cosroe in the play. In Kirke's Champions ii. 1, the K. of Tartary speaks of the "hot Pn. host that seeks to name Tartary new P." There is probably some vague reminiscence of the wars between the Turks and the Pns. in the 6th cent., but the whole play is wildly unhistorical. An equally imaginary war between Arabia and P. forms the background of Chapman's Rev. Hon.: in i. 1, 194, Tarifa speaks of "the proud Pn. monarchy, the sole Emulous opposer of the Arabic greatness." In Marlowe's Tamb. A., an account is given of the deposition of Mycetes, K. of P., by his brother Cosroe, who in i. 1 exclaims, "Unhappy P. that in former age Hast been the seat of mighty conquerors That . . . Have triumphed over Afric and the bounds Of Europe . . . Now Turks and Tartars shake their swords at thee." In ii. 5, Tamburlaine invests Cosroe as K., and is by him appointed Regent of P. In ii. 7, however, Tamburlaine defeats and kills Cosroe and seizes the crown for himself. In Selimus 46, Baiazet complains, "The Pn. Sophi, mighty Ismael, Took the Levante clean away from me." This was Baiazet II, the father of Selim. The title Sophy was given to Ismail and all his successors: it is the Arabic "Safi-ud-din," meaning purity of religion. In Kyd's Soliman i., Haler says, "I hold it not good policy to call Your forces home from P. and Polonia. Strive not for Rhodes by letting P. slip." Suleyman I, the Magnificent, had wars with Poland, P., and Rhodes. In Chettie's Hoffman D. 1, Austria says of Rodorick: "He lost his life Long since in P. by the Sophies wars." In B. & F. Span. Carr. i. 1, Leandro says, "Tis now in fashion to have your gallants set down in a tavern whether his [the Turk's] moony standards are designed for P. or Polonia." Apparently the reference is to Suleyman the Magnificent, who had wars with both. In Merch. ii. 1, 25, Morocco swears by "this scimitar That slew the Sophy and a Pn. prince That won 3 fields of Sultan Solyman." In Soliman i. 3, 51, the Turkish general boasts, "Against the Sophy in 3 pitched fields Under the conduct of great Soliman Have I put the flint-heart Perseans to the sword." In Wise Men iii. 2, Insalito says, "This lady hath received a book from a friend of hers that went over with Sir Robert Sherley into P." Day's Travails tells the story of Sir Robert's visit to the court of "the Pn. Sophey," Shah Abbas, in 1598. Cartwright's Slave takes place at Sardis in the reign of a Pn. K., Arsannes, whose q. was Atossa. Atossa was the q. of Darius Hystaspis, and the time seems to be that of the old Medo-Pn. Empire, but the play has no historical value. The scene of Suckling's Aglaure is also laid in P., but the time is even more indeterminate. A war between P. and Turkey is the background of Greville's Mustapha. In Club Law i. 6, Spruce says, "In the ancient Pn. commonwealth you shall find very often that the weal-public flourished in the time of the monarchy."

General References. In Marlowe's Dido iii. 1, Sergius recognizes one of Dido's suitors as "a Pn. born." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Volpone says to Celia, "I will have thee Attired like unto the Pn. Sophy's wife." In B. & F. Pestle iv. 1, the Citizen says, "Let the Sophy of P. come and christen him a child." The allusion is to an incident in Travails, which had recently been performed at the Red Bull Theatre. In T. Heywood's Royal King v., Audley tells "a Pn. history" of a falcon that killed an eagle and was executed for it by the Sophy, as being a traitor to the K. of Birds. In Taming of Shrew prol., Haz., p. 496, Will speaks of "winged Pegasus . . . That ran so swiftly over the Pn. plains." This is ignorant rhodomontade: Pegasus had nothing to do with P.

There was considerable trade with P. in Elizabethan times, chiefly in silks, carpets, and shawls; and in pearls and precious stones. In Err. iv. 1, 4, the Merchant is "bound to P." In Marlowe's Jew i. 1, Barabas is informed that his argosy doth ride in Malta-road laden with "exceeding store Of Pn. silks, of gold, and orient pearl." In Cyrus i. 1, the horse of Croesus has "the reins of Pn. silk." In Massinger's Actor ii. 1, Parthenius tells the miser Philargus that his superfluous means could clothe him "in the costliest Pn. silks, Studded with jewels." In Glapthorne's Argalus i. 1, Philarchus says, "Mars wrapt his battered limbs in Pn. silks." In Davenant's Italian i. 1, Altamont says, "The soft entrail of the Pn. worm Shall clothe thy limbs." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, the Lady promises her Soldier "Pn. mantles, richly embroidered." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 8, Gaselles speaks of "Pn. silks or costly Tyrian purples." In B. & F. Cure i. 2, Eugenia orders her maid to "hang up the rich Pn. arras Used on my wedding night." In Davenant's U. Lovers iii. 4, Altophil speaks of "Rich hangings of the antick Pn. loom." In Jonson's Magnetic iv. 3, Compass describes Lady Loadstone "cast on a feather-bed and spread on the sheets under a brace of your best Pn. carpets." In Davenant's Wits iii., Palatine describes the Mogul's daughter sitting "on a rich Pn. quilt." In Massinger's Bondman i. 3, Timagoras says, "Adorn your walls With Pn. hangings wrought of gold and pearl." In Nabbes' Hannibal ii. 4, Syphax says, "Cover the pavement which her steps must hallow With Pn. tapestry." In his Microcosmus iii., Bellanima talks about "Pn. aromats," i.e. spices.

The dress of the Pns. was quaint and rich, and they wore on their heads fine lawn turbans, the Cydaris being the jewelled turban used as one of the insignia of royalty. In Lear iii. 5, 86, Lear says to the ragged Edgar, "I do not like the fashion of your garments; you will say they are Pn. attire, but let them be changed." In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon says, "For all my other raiment It shall be such as might provoke the Pn." In Heywood's Lacree iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The Turk in linen wraps his head, The Pn. his in lawn too." In Jonson's Hymen, certain of the figures wore on their heads "Persic crowns," i.e. jewelled turbans. In Spenser's F. Q. i. 2, 13, Duessa "like a Pn. mitre on her head She wore, with crowns and ouches garnished." In Strode's Float. Isl. ii. 4, Fancy says, "This Pn. cydaris hath made some Sophies That scarce were wise before": with a play on the word.

The Pns. were regarded as very wealthy and luxurious. In Massinger's Madam v. 1, Sir John says, "I will prepare you such a feast As P. in her height of pomp and riot Did never equal." In Ford's Trial iii. 1, Banatzi exclaims, "A Pn. cook! Dainty!" In his Fancies iv. 2, Romano says, "I keep no rich Pn. surfeits." In Greene's

Friar viii., Prince Edward promises Margaret "Frigates overlaid With plates of Pn. wealth." In May's Heir iii., Philocles speaks of "all the pomp That the vain Pn. ever taught the world." In Rutter's Shepherd Hol. i. 4., Mirtilus asks, "Would you for all the wealth of P. change one lock of your mistress' hair?" In Massinger's Guardian ii. 4., Calipso promises Laval "a retiring bower So furnished as might force the Pn.'s envy." Spenser, in F. Q. i. 4, 7., calls P. "the nurse of pompous pride"; and in iii. 4, 23., speaks of "the pomp of Pn. Kings." The Pn. courtiers were reputed to be expert in flattery and sycophantism. In Massinger's Actor i. 3., Paris says of the stage: "We show no arts of Lydian panderism, Corinthian poisons, Pn. flatteries." In B. & F. Valentin. i. 3., Æcius asks, "Were . . . our princes Pns., Nothing but silks and softness?" Kyd, in Soliman iii., speaks of putting "the flint-heart Persians to the sword." The general idea, however, was that the Pns. were soft, luxurious, and cowardly; and I am disposed to accept Brereton's emendation, "faint heart." The Pns. castrated youths, to use them in their harems as eunuchs. In May's Agrippina iv. 479., Petronius says of the Romans: "After the Pn. rite . . . they cut away Manhood from growth-spoiled youths." The Pns. were Zoroastrians, or Fire-worshippers, until they were forced to become Mohammedans. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1., Byron says, "I will ask it As the ancient Pns. did when they implored Their idol fire to grant them any boon, And threaten there to quench it if they failed." In Massinger's New Way ii. 2., Furnace the Cook swears "By Fire! for cooks are Pns. and swear by it." In Shirley's Bird ii. 2., Rolliardo, looking at a diamond, says, "A row of these stuck in a lady's forehead Would make a Pn. stagger in his faith And give more adoration to this light Than to the sun-beam."

Various objects specified as Pn. Persian Coursers. The Pn.-Arabian horse, though not quite equal in value to the pure Arabian, was highly esteemed. In Barnes' Charter i. 4., Alexander gives to Caesar "6 Pn. coursers, armed and furnished With rich caparisons of gold and pearl." —Persian Crab. Probably some sort of apple. In Davenant's Cr. Brother iv. 4., Foresta speaks of "The unctuous lhasis and the Pn. crab" as aphrodisiacs. Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit. p. 44., speaks of "the apple in P. whose blossom savoureth like honey, whose bud is more sour than gall." Probably he means the peach. —Persian Junk. A Pn. merchant-vessel. The word was at first used of Javanese and Malay vessels, but was also applied to eastern vessels of other countries. In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1., Seawit says, "Imagine we meet a Pn. junk or Turkish carrack, board her, take her, and force a Bashaw prisoner." —Persian Lock. A sort of kiss-curl affected by fashionable men about town. Dekker, in Hornbook vi., speaks of "good clothes, a proportionable leg, white hand, the Pn. lock, and a tolerable beard [as] the best and most essential parts of a Gallant." —Persian Louse. In Marston's What you iii. 1., Noose speaks of "the Pn. louse that eats biting and biting eats." —Persian Leopard. In Sampson's Vow ii. 2, 78., Young Bateman says, "Had I been . . . spotted like the Pn. leopards . . . I am thy Bateman, Nan." In Jonson's Magnetic i. 5., Polish makes an atrocious pun, and says, "The Pns. were our Puritans, Had the fine piercing wits."

PERSIAN GULF. A gulf of the Arabian Sea lying between Persia and Arabia. In Massinger's Guardian v. 4., Severino says that Iolante is "the daughter of a noble captain who, in his voyage to the P. Gulf, Perished by shipwreck." In Milton, P. R. iii. 273., the Tempter says to our Lord, "Here thou behold'st . . . to south the P. bay."

PERSICK HAVEN, or PONTUS PERSICUS. An imaginary harbour in the country of the Teleboians, q.v. In T. Heywood's S. Age ii., Ganimed says, "Was not our ships launched out of the Persick Haven?" The whole passage is literally translated from the Amphitruo of Plautus.

PERU, or PERUANA. A country on the N.W. coast of S. America extending from Chili in the S. to Ecuador in the N., but formerly the name was used for the whole W. coast from Chili to the isthmus of Panama. Pizarro, when he landed there in 1527, found a country remarkably civilized, under the rule of sovereigns called Incas. He returned in 1532 and defeated and treacherously murdered the Inca Atahualpa: by degrees the whole country was conquered, and the 1st Spanish Viceroy was appointed in 1542. From that time onward it was governed by a succession of viceroys until 1823, when it achieved its independence. The capital, Lima, was founded by Pizarro in 1535. The gold and silver mines of P. were the source of great wealth to the Spaniards, and P. came to be used as a synonym for immense wealth. Its birds and animals were brought to Europe and aroused great curiosity from the novelty of their shape and plumage. It was regarded as the most W. country of the world, and the phrase "from England to P." meant the whole of the globe. Fuller, Holy State ii. 22., compares America to an hour-glass "which hath a narrow neck of land betwixt the parts thereof . . . Mexicana and Peruana."

In B. & F. Span. Cur. iii. 2., Lopez says to Arsenio and Milanes, "You look like travelled men; ye came not from P.?" In Davenant's Playhouse iii., one of the characters bears as his cognizance "the figure of the Sun, which was the scutcheon of the Incas, who were Emperors of P." The Incas were supposed to be the children of the Sun, who was the chief God of the Peruvians. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1., Mammon says of Subtle's laboratory, where he is making the philosopher's stone: "Here's the rich P." In B. & F. Gentleman i. 1., Clerimont says, "Have you ships at sea To bring you gold and stone from rich P.?" In Davenant's Distresses v., Basilonte says, "That kiss I will requite With the best jewel that P. did yield." In Shirley's Honorii ii. 1., Alamode asks Fulbank, "Are you master of this rich P.?" meaning the wealthy Lady Aurelia. In his Pleasure iii. 1., Lord A. says, "'Twere less laborious to serve a prenticeship in P. and dig gold out of the mine." The gold mines were worked by slave labour, and the Spaniards treated their unfortunate captives with great cruelty. In Cockayne's Obstinate v. 6., Falorus says, "I envy not His wealth that holds the inexhaustible mines Of famed P." Heylyn (p. 12) quotes from Du Bartas: "From P. [come] pearl and gold." In Mayne's Match iii. 1., Plotwell says, "The birds brought from P. could never draw people like this." In Shirley's Bird ii. 1., Rolliardo suggests that Bonamico should stick his skin with feathers "and draw the rabble of the city, for pence apiece, to see a monstrous bird brought from P." Spenser, F. Q. ii. prol. 2., asks, "Who ever heard of th' Indian P.?" In Brewer's Lingua ii. 4., Memory speaks of "all the libraries in every city betwixt England and P." Cf. Johnson's phrase in Vanity of Human Wishes: "from China to P." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 6., says that Britomart would seek her lover, "Though beyond the Africk Ismael Or th' Indian P. he were." Milton, P. L. xi. 408., makes Adam see in vision "Rich Mexico, the seat of Montezume, And Cusco in P., the richer seat of Atabalipa," the last of the Incas. Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, speculates whether Ophir was "Peruana, which some suppose, or that Aurea Chersonesus"; he also refers to "the Titicacan [lake] in P." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Cruities (1611), Hoskins says, "Fame is but wind, thence wind may blow it . . . From Mexico and from P. To China and to Cambalu." In Wilson's Inconstant i. 2, Aramant says, "The rich P. is but a sunny bank compared to her." The author of Discourse on Leather (1627) says, "We can live without the gold of P."

PERUGIA (the ancient PERUSIA). The capital of the Province of P. in central Italy, lying on the Tiber, 82 m. N. of Rome. It is a walled city, with a university and a strong citadel built by Pope Paul III. In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi says, "My mother was of consanguinity With the Princess of P." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "bloody Peruggia," in reference probably to the defeat of the Romans by Hannibal at Lake Trasimene close by.

PE'RYN (PENRYN). A town in Cornwall, 2 m. N.W. of Falmouth at the head of a branch of Falmouth Harbour. In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Pe'ryn is mentioned as one of the places at which Chough called on his way from Cornwall to Lond.

PESARO. A town in Italy on the coast of the Adriatic, at the mouth of the Foglia, abt. 40 m. N.W. of Ancona. It was famous for the fine quality of its figs and other fruits. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "Pesaro, a garden of best fruits."

PESCARA. A town in Italy, the ancient Aternum, at the mouth of the Aterno on the Adriatic, 100 m. E. of Rome. In Massinger's Milan i. 3, Francisco says to Sforza, "Your constant friend, the Marquis of P., Hath business that concerns your life and fortunes." P. then enters and plays a part in the rest of the drama. A Marquis of P., one of the generals who defeated Francis I at Pavia (1525), also plays a secondary part in Webster's Malfi. In Barnes' Charter i. 3, Barbarossa says, "John Sforza, now Lord Marquis of P., Was and husband to this jolly Dame," i.e. Lucrezia Borgia.

PETER'S (SAINT). An ancient ch. in Bedford on the N. side of the Ouse. In Hon. Law iii. 1, Curfew says "I am the new parson of St. Peter's in Bedford."

PETER'S (SAINT), FRANKFORT. A ch. in Frankfort-on-Main, in the N.E. of the old city, at the junction of the Alten Gasse and the Schafer Gasse, near the Friedberg Gate. In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 77, Prince Edward says, "Th' Archbp. of Collen . . . Joined us together in St. Peter's ch."

PETER (SAINT) LE-POOR. A ch. in Lond. on the W. side of Old Broad St., a little N. of Throgmorton St. The old ch. was next to Paulet House, and escaped the Gt. Fire, but it projected into the street, and so was taken down in 1788 and the present building erected further back. In Curates' Conference (1641), Master Poorest says, "I was offered a place in the city of Lond., but the name of it frightened me: it was at St. Peter's-poor."

PETER'S (SAINT) PALACE. The Vatican, q.v. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, the Pope says to Charles VIII, "The conclave thought it fit To make your welcome in St. Peter's Palace."

PETER'S (SAINT), ROME. The metropolitan ch. of the Christian world: "the most glorious structure that ever has been applied to the use of Religion" (Gibbon). It stands on the Vatican across the Tiber, N.E. of the city. An oratory containing the body of St. Peter was erected on the site of the present ch. by Anicetus in A.D. 90. In 306 Constantine replaced it by a basilica. This having become ruinous, Pope Nicolas V began the present building in 1450. The work proceeded slowly, and about 1550 its completion was entrusted to Michel Angelo, whose plans were on the whole faithfully carried out, though Maderno's façade, finished in 1614, somewhat dwarfs the effect of the dome. The dedication took place on November 18th, 1626; the noble colonnades surrounding the Piazza were added in 1667. The length of the ch. is 613 ft., about 100 ft. longer than St. Paul's, Lond.; the dome is 448 ft. high, 64 ft. higher than St. Paul's. A peculiar feature is that the high altar over the shrine of St. Peter is at the W. end of the ch. On the N. of the Piazza is the Vatican Palace, the residence of the Popes. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, the Palmer says, "Yet have I been also And gone the stations all a-row, St. P. shrine and many mo." In Trouble. Reign, Haz., p. 292, the K. addresses Pandulph as "The holy vicar of St. P. ch." In Barnes' Charter iv. 1, Bernardo, asked the time by the Pope, says, "Very near 6 by St. P. bell." In v. 5, Caraffa says, "His [the Pope's] corpse shall be conveyed to St. P." In Tarlton's Purgatory, we read of Pope Pius: "His body was carried from Castle Angelo to St. P. Ch. and there intombed." Boorde, in Intro. to Knowledge xxiii., says, "St. P. Ch., which is their head ch. and cathedral ch., is fallen down to the ground, and so hath lyen many years without re-edifying."

PETER (SAINT) AD VINCULA. San Pietro in Vincoli, a ch. in Rome in the Via di S. Pietro in Vincoli, on the N. of the Esquiline Hill, near the baths of Titus. It was first built in 442 to contain the chain with which St. Peter was bound: in its present form it dates from 1705. Its greatest treasure is the "Moses" of Michel Angelo. The Cardinal of St. Peter ad Vincula is one of the characters in Barnes' Charter. There is a ch. with the same name in the Tower of Lond. at the N. end of Tower Green. Here are buried Queens Anne Boleyn and Katherine Howard, Sir Thomas More, Thomas Cromwell, Lady Jane Grey and her husband, the Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh, and many other distinguished victims of the headsman's axe.

PETER'S (SAINT) CHURCH, VERONA. An ancient ch. in Verona, on the left bank of the Adige, in the N.E. of the city. It was constructed from the materials of the old Castel San Pietro, which stood on the site of the palace of Theodoric. In R. & J. iii. 5, 115, Lady Capulet says to Juliet, "Marry, my child, early next Thursday morn . . . The County Paris at St. P. Ch. Shall happily make thee there a joyful bride."

PETER (SAINT) STREET. Westminster, running E. from Horseferry Rd. to Marsham St. It is now called Great P. St. An inscription was until recently to be seen on one of the houses: "This is Saint P. St., 1624." There was another P. St., near Clare Market, between Vere St. and Stanhope St., now called Denzell St.; yet another, running W. from Wardour St., Soho; and a 4th, within the Mint in Southwark. It is not easy to say which is intended in the quotation, but I incline to the last-named. In Davenport's New Trick i. 2, Slightall tells Roger to find him a prostitute, and to search, amongst other places, "White Fryers, Saint Peters st., and Mutton Lane."

PETERBOROUGH. A city and the seat of a bishop in Northants., on the Nen, 76 m. N. of Lond. The cathedral was founded by Penda, K. of Mercia, in 655. It was destroyed by the Danes in 870 and burnt down in 1116. The present building dates from that time, but was not finished till the 16th cent. Its W. front is particularly fine. It was not made a Bp.'s See until the Reformation. The diocese was then carved out of that of Lincoln. Catharine of Arragon was buried there, and Mary Q. of Scots in the first instance, though her body was afterwards removed to Westminster Abbey by James I. In Darius 50, Partiality says, "He is such a fellow as is not hence to P." Richard Fletcher, the father of the dramatist, was for a time Dean of P.

PETERHOUSE, or ST. PETER'S COLLEGE (commonly called PORHOUSE by the undergraduates). The oldest College in the University of Cambridge, founded by Hugh de Balsham, Bp. of Ely, in 1284. It stands in the angle formed by Trumpington St. and St. Mary's Lane, next to the Fitzwilliam Museum. In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 1, Sencer, disguised like a Pedant, answers Sir Harry: "Petrus dormit securus: I was, Sir, of P." William Cartwright affirms that Heywood was himself a Fellow of P., but no trace of his name is discoverable in the records of the College or of the University. In Merry Devil i. 3, Fabel says, "Have I so many melancholy nights Watched on the top of P. highest tower?" This Peter Fabel is said to have been a practiser of the Black Art, who was educated at P. and flourished in the reign of Henry VII. He sold his soul to the Devil, but managed to cheat him of his bargain. His tomb is at Edmonton. Fynes Moryson begins his Itinerary by saying that he was "a student of P. in Cambridge."

PETRASALIA (defined as in CALABRIA). Apparently a variant for Monte Sila, a mountain mass in N. Calabria. Pietra Sila (the Rock of Sila) must have been in the author's mind. Monte Alto is the highest point in the Aspromonte range in the extreme S. of Calabria. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander allots to Cæsar "those sweet provinces even to Monte Alto, Naples, Policastro, and Petrasalia in Calabria."

PETSORA. A river, more commonly spelt PETCHORA, in N.E. Russia, rising in the Ural mtns. and reaching the Arctic Ocean at the head of the Gulf of Petchora after a course of abt. 900 m. Milton, P. L. x. 292, speaks of "Mtns. of ice that stop the imagined way Beyond Petsora eastward to the rich Cathaian coast." The reference is to the N.E. passage to China and India, q.v.

PETTICOAT LANE. A st. in Lond., now called Middlesex St., running N. from High St., Whitechapel, a little E. of Houndsditch, to Wentworth St. Stow says that its original name was Hog L., and that within 40 years it was a pleasant country lane with elm-tree hedges, but that in his time it was made a continual building throughout of garden houses and small cottages. Strype says that Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador in the court of James I, lived on the W. side of it and his own father on the E. During the reign of James a number of French refugees, mostly silk-weavers, settled there, and later their place was taken by Jewish second-hand clothes dealers, who still occupy it. As the quotations show, the garden-houses to which Stow refers were used by women of bad character, and the L. was regarded as one of their usual haunts. In Beguiled, Dods., ix. 304, Cricket says, "He looks like a tankard-bearer that dwells in P. L. at the sign of the Mermaid." Nash, in Prognostication, says, "If the Beadels of Bridewell be careful this summer it may be hoped that Petticote L. may be less pestered with ill airs than it was wont; and the houses there so clear cleansed that honest women may dwell there without any dread of the whip and the cart." In Penn. Parl. 35, it is enacted: "Many men shall be so venturously given as they shall go into Petty-coat L. and yet come out again as honestly as they first went in." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity says, "We will survey the suburbs and make forth our sallies Down P. L. and up the Smock-alleys, To Shoreditch, Whitechapel, and so to St. Kathern's."

PETTY FRANCE. A st. in Westminster running W. from the junction of Tothill St. and Broadway to St. James's St., parallel to the S. side of St. James's Park. It was so called from the French merchants who lived there when they came over to trade at the Woolstaple. The name was changed in the 18th cent. to York St., in honour of Frederick D. of York, the son of George II. Here John Milton lived from 1652 to 1660 at what was afterwards No. 19 York St. The house was preserved until quite recently, and a sketch of it, with a mural inscription "Sacred to Milton," may be seen in Old and New London iv. 18.

PETTY JUDAS. A place or dist. in Salisbury, possibly the old Jewry there. In Hycke, p. 102, Frewyll says, "At Salisbury There were 5 score save an hundred in my company, And at Pety Judas we made royal cheer."

PHAENZA. See FAENZA.

PHAROS. An island off the coast of Egypt close to Alexandria, with which it was connected by a causeway. Here Ptolemy Philadelphos erected the first lighthouse known to history, at its N.E. point: hence Pharos came to be used generically for any lighthouse. In Pembroke's Antonie i. 118, Antonie calls Cleopatra's eyes "another P." Laneham, in Letter (1575), compares Kenilworth Castle, lit up at night, to "the Egyptian P. reluctant unto all the Alexandrian coast." In Fisher's Faimus v. 3, Eulius says to Landora, "Be thy bright eyes my P." In T. Heywood's Dialogues 3, Earth asks, "Where's P. isle? Where's the Tarpeian mass?"

Pharian is used in the sense of Egyptian. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 3, Earth speaks of Argus as "he who watched the Pharian cow," i.e. Io, who was connected with Egypt in one group of legends. Milton, Psalm cxiv. 3, calls Egypt "Pharian fields." P. is used in the sense of a lighted wharf. Dekker, in News from Hell, says of a certain rich miser: "He built a P., or rather a Block-house, beyond the gallows at Wapping, to which the black fleet of coal-carriers that came from Newcastle were brought a-bed and discharged."

PHAROS. See PAROS.

PHARPHAR. One of the rivers of Damascus, according to II Kings v. 12. It is probably to be identified with El Awaj, a river which waters the S. suburbs of Damascus but is 6 m. S. of the city itself. Milton, P. L. i. 468, speaks of "Fair Damascus, on the fertile banks Of Abbana and Pharphar, lucid streams."

PHARSALIA (more properly PHARSALUS). A town in Thessaly on the left bank of the Enipeus, 25 m. due S. of Larissa. In the plain to the N. of the town was fought the great battle in which Julius Cæsar defeated Pompeius, August 9th, 48 B.C. In Kyd's Cornelia i., Cicero says, "The father and the son Have fought like foes P.'s misery." Pompeius was the son-in-law of Cæsar, having married his daughter Julia. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 1, Discord says, "Mars Runs madding through P.'s purple fields." In B. & F. False One i. 1, Achilles reports that Pompeius is "In Thessaly, near the Pharsalian plains"; and later in the scene Labienus gives a full description of the battle. In Ant. iii. 7, 32, Canidius says that Antony has challenged Octavian "To wage this battle at P., Where Cæsar fought with Pompey." In Mas-singer's Virgin v. 2, Artemia says, "Great Julius . . . with dry eyes Beheld the large plains of P. covered With the dead carcasses of senators And citizens of Rome." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine says, "Nor in P. was there such hot war As these, my followers, willingly would have." In Machin's Dumb Knight i. 1, Phyllocles says, "Methinks Cæsar's P., nor Scipio's Carthage, Were worthy chairs of triumph": where chairs means chariots. In Chapman's Cæsar iii. 1, 1, Pompey cries, "Now to P.," and in the 4th Act the battle is described. In Tiberius 1158, Germanicus says of his victory over the Germans: "Not Cannas nor the fields of Pharsalie So dyed in blood as was Danubius." In Pembroke's Antonie ii. 610, Charmion says, "Frame there Pharsaly and discoloured streams Of deep Enipeus."

PHASIACA. An imaginary kingdom in the dist. round the river Phasis, q.v. In Chapman's Blind Beggar ix., "Bion, k. of rich Phasiaca," is mentioned as one of the allies who are marching against Ptolemy.

PHASIS (a river falling into the Black Sea at its extreme E. end; now the Rioni). The Pheasant derives its name from the story that it was introduced into Europe from the plains of the P. In Nash's Summers, p. 100, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to P. for pheasants." In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline, inveighing against the luxury of the Romans, says, "The river P. Cannot afford them fowl, nor Lucrine Lake Oysters enow." Spenser, in the river-list in F. Q. iv. 11, 21, calls it "tempestuous Phasides." P. seems to be used also for the Crimean peninsula. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Medea says of Jason: "Such a bold spirit and noble presence linked Never before were seen in P. isle." Through its connection with Medea, P. was supposed to produce specially deadly poisons. In Nabbes' Hannibal iii. 4, Masinissa says that a tear of Sophonis-ba's "Hath in 't sufficient virtue to convert All the Thessalian, Pontick, Phasian aconites Into preservatives."

PHILERMUS. A hill in the island of Rhodes. In Davenant's Rhodes A., Pioneers from Lycia in Solymán's army are commanded to work "upon Philermus Hill."

PHILIPPI. A city in Macedonia, 20 m. N. of its port Neapolis. It was originally called Crenides, but was re-named in honour of Philip, the father of Alexander the Gt. In its neighbourhood was fought the battle in which Antony and Octavian defeated Brutus and Cassius in 42 B.C. It was made a Colonia by Augustus; and here Paul first preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ in Europe in the course of his 2nd missionary journey (Acts xx. 6) and addressed an epistle to the ch. there from his prison at Rome. In J. C. iv. 3, 170, Brutus informs Cassius that "Young Octavius and Mark Antony Come down upon us with a mighty power, Bending their expedition toward P." Brutus proposes to march thither; Cassius objects, but in the end Brutus prevails. In line 283, the Ghost comes to tell Brutus "Thou shalt see me at P." Act v. is laid in the plains of P., and describes the battle and the deaths of Brutus and Cassius. In Ant. ii. 6, 13, Pompey says, "Julius Cæsar . . . at P. the good Brutus ghosted." In iii. 2, 56, Agrippa says, "Antony wept When at P. he found Brutus slain." In iii. 11, 35, Antony says of Octavian: "He at P. kept His sword e'en like a dancer [i.e. in its scabbard] while I struck The lean and wrinkled Cassius; and 'twas I That the mad Brutus ended." From ii. 5, 23 it appears that Antony called the sword with which he fought there Philippan. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, his Genius predicts to Antony, "Yet must P. see thy high exploits." In May's Agrippina iii. 209, Seneca says there are no armies now afoot "To stain with Latian blood P. plains." In Pembroke's Antonie ii. 694, Diomed says, "Is 't not pity that this firebrand so Lays waste the trophies of P. fields?" In Conf. Cons. iv. 5, Conscience says, "The first to the Philippians doth witness herein bear." The reference is to St. Paul's Epistle. In Gascoigne's Government i. 4, Gnomaticus says, "By hearkening unto Paul and Syllas, Lidia and the gailor of Phylippus were baptized." See Acts xvi.

PHILISTINES (Pe. = Philistine). The people who lived in the S.W. dist. of Palestine, between the foothills and the coast. They are held to have come there from Crete during the 12th cent. B.C., bringing with them the knowledge of iron-working and other results of the Ægean civilization. Their superior civilization made itself felt, and they proved formidable enemies to the Hebrews, who had recently settled in Palestine. The story of this struggle is found in Judges and in the later historical books of the O.T. It is significant of their predominant influence that the land still bears their name (Palestine). They formed 5 free city-communities, viz. Gath, Ashdod, Ekron, Gaza, and Askelon. As the P. were the enemies of God's people, the word comes to be used in an abusive sense for one's enemies generally, and for drunken, dissolute folks. In Chaucer's Monk's Tale, the story of Samson and the P. is told. In Bale's Promises v., David says of Israel: "They did wickedly consent to the P. and Canaanites, ungodly idolaters." Milton, P. L. ix. 1061, says, "So rose . . . Herculean Samson from the harlot-lap Of Philistean Dalilah, and waked Shorn of his strength": where the "e" is long and the accent is on the 3rd syllable. In S. A. 39, Samson says, "promise was that I Should Israel from Philistian yoke deliver": where the accent is on the 2nd syllable. This form is used 9 times in S. A., and always with this accentuation. The form Pe. occurs 10 times, and is always accented on the 1st syllable, as also in Psalms lxxxiii. 27: "The P. and they of Tyre Whose bounds the sea doth check." Milton usually calls the land of the P. Palestine (q.v.), but in Psalms lxxxvii. 14, we have: "I mention Babel to my friends, Philistia full of scorn." In Chivalry, Bowyer says, "Zounds, what a Pe. is this!" In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Barabas commands Abigail to use Lodowick, her lover, "as if he were a Pe.: Dissemble, swear, protest, vow love to him; He is not of the seed of Abraham." In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 3, Mathea speaks of her foreign suitors as "These whoreson cannibals, these P., these Tango-mongoes." In Merry Devil iv. 1, Blague says, "The P. are upon us, be silent." In Dekker's Westward v. 3, Monopoly says, "Bestir your stumps for the P. are upon us." The phrase is taken from Judges xvi. 14. Dekker, in Jests, says, "They promised to deal with his P. [his creditors] that are now come upon him." Milton, in Reformation in England, p. 13, says of the Bishops: "Have they not been as the Canaanites and P. to this kingdom?" In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Eyre calls his apprentices "you mad P." He means nothing but merry, jolly fellows. Nash, in Saffron Walden, has something like an anticipation of the use made popular by Matthew Arnold when he calls Parthenophil and Parthenope "that Pe. poem."

PHLEGETHON, or PHLEGETON. One of the rivers of Hades, first mentioned in Homer, Od. x. 513. It was a river of fire and fell ultimately into the Acheron. The word is used sometimes as equivalent to Hell. In Span. Trag. iii. 1, the Viceroy, commanding Alexandro to be burnt alive, says, "Those flames shall pre-figure Those unquenched fires of P. Prepared for his soul." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faust swears "By the kingdoms of infernal rule, Of Styx, of Acheron, and the fiery lake Of ever-burning P." In Greene's Friar xv., the Devil says, "Every charmer with his magic spells Calls us from ninefold-trenched P." The epithet seems to be suggested by the Vergilian "movies interfusa" (winding 9 times round Erebus), applied to the Styx in the Georgics iv. 480. In Wilson's Cobler 677, Charon says that to accommodate the crowds that are coming to hell "Cocytus, Lethe, P., shall all be digged into Styx." In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Brutus addresses Cæsar's ghost as "Fury, sent from Phlegitonic flames." In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, 867, Medea says, "I conjure thee . . . By stinking Styx and filthy Flegeton." In Brewer's Lovesick iv., Grim says of his colliers: "If you would rake hell and Phlegitan, Acaron and Barrathrum, all those Low Countries cannot yield you such a company." In Nero v. 3, Nero cries, "Methinks I see the boiling P." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 43, calls Tobacco "That rare Phoenix of P." Milton, P. L. ii. 580, names the 4 rivers of Hell: Styx, Acheron, Cocytus, and "Fierce P., Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage." See also PIOPHLEGITON.

PHLEGRÆAN PLAINS. The name given by the Greeks of Cumæ in Campania to the part of Campania adjoining that city, on account of its volcanic character. Legend told that the battle between the Gods and the Giants was fought out here, and accounted for the volcanic manifestations by the falling of the thunderbolts of Jupiter on the heads of the rebels. Another form of the legend placed them in Thessaly. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says, "From P. fields The K. of Gods with conquering spoils returned." In B. & F. Prophetess ii. 3, Drusilla says of Diocles: "With such a grace, The giants that attempted to scale heaven When they lay dead on the P. plain, Mars did appear to Jove." In Massinger's Actor i. 4, Cæsar says, "Jupiter, the Giants lying dead On the P. plain, embraced his Juno." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 3, speaks of "the ruins of great Ossa hill And triumphs of P. Jove"; and in v. 7, 10, he affirms that wine is "the blood of Gyants, which were slain By thundring Jove in the P. plain." Milton, P. L. i. 577, speaks of "all the giant brood Of Phlegra."

PHOCIS. A dist. of ancient Greece lying N.W. of Bœotia. It was an inland country, but had a port on the Eubœan Sea, Daphnus. The surface was rugged and mountainous. Its chief glory was the possession of the oracle at Delphi, though, after the Dorian conquest of Delphi, its claim was denied. In Hercules iv. 3, 2256, Jove, in the character of Amphitruo, claims to have slain the pirates who "awed all Archæia, Ætolia, P.; the Ionian, Ægean, and Cretick seas." Drayton, in Odes i. 21, speaking of the power of the Muses, says, "The Phœcean it did prove Whom when foul lust did move Those maids unchaste to make, Fell as with them he strove, His neck and justly brake." The story is told of Pyre-neus, K. of P.

PHŒNICIA. The strip of coast-land in Syria between the Libanus range and the Mediterranean extending from the mouth of the Eleutherus to the promontory of Carmel, and including the cities of Tripolis, Berytus, Sidon, and Tyre. The Phœnicians were a great mercantile people, and carried on an extensive trade throughout the Mediterranean and even beyond as far as Cornwall. Their colonies were found in Sicily, N. Africa, and Spain, and their greatest gift to mankind was the alphabet, which the Greeks learned from them and gave in turn to the Romans, and so to the modern world. In Ant. iii. 6, 15, Cæsar says that Antony has assigned to Ptolemy "Syria, Cilicia, and P." In iii. 7, 65, a soldier says to Antony, "Let the Egyptians And the Phœnicians go a-ducking: we Have used to conquer standing on the earth." Milton, P. L. i. 438, says, "With these in troop Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians called Astarte, q. of heaven, with crescent horns."

PHŒNIX (another name for the COCK-PIT THEATRE on the E. side of Drury Lane, Lond.). The site was long preserved by the name of Cockpit Alley, afterwards Pitt Court, running from Drury Lane to Wild St. It was pulled down by the mob in 1617, but was rebuilt and continued to be used till about 1663, when the Drury Lane Theatre superseded it. In Randolph's Muses i. 1, Mrs. Flowerdew says, "It was a zealous prayer I heard a brother make concerning playhouses: that the Globe had been consumed, the P. burnt to ashes." T. Heywood's Mistress was "acted by the Queen's Comedians at the P. in Drury Lane" in 1636. In Leaguer prol., Marmion says, "The P. takes new life from the fire bright Poesy creates."

PHŒNIX. The sign of a Lond. tavern; also the sign of a shop in Lombard St. It is transferred to Ephesus by Shakespeare. The P. Fire Office may still be found in Lombard St. at No. 19, next to Abchurch Lane. In Jonson's Staple prol., he says, "Alas! what is it to his scene to know If Dunstan or the P. best wine has?" In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 64, the K. says, "Here's Lombard St. and here's the Pelican, And there's the P. in the pelican's nest." In Err. i. 2, 75, Dromio says to Antipholus, "My charge was but to fetch you from the mart Home to your house, the P., Sir, to dinner." It must be remembered that not only taverns, but houses and shops of all kinds were distinguished by signs at this time.

PHŒNIX ALLEY. A lane in Lond. out of Long Acre, next to Bow St. on the W.: now Hanover Court. Taylor's Journey into Wales (1652) is described as performed "by John Taylor, dwelling at the sign of the Poet's Head in Phenix Alley, near the middle of Long Aker, or Covent Garden." Taylor died here in 1653, and was buried at St. Martin's-in-the-fields.

PHRYGIA (Pn. = Phrygian). The Pns. appear to have been at a very early date predominant over the whole of the W. part of Asia Minor. The tomb of Midas and the monuments at Boghaz Keui give solidity to the Greek legends of the ancient kingdom of Midas and Gordius. But the incursions of the Cimmerians in the 7th cent. B.C. destroyed their power and limited them to the central plateau known as the Greater P. The Greek poets and historians, however, always speak of the Trojans as Pns., and a dist. on the Hellespont, known as the Lesser P., preserved the memory of their occupation of it. From them the Greeks took the worship of Cybele with its orgiastic rites, and the Dionysus cult seems to have the same origin. The scene of Lyly's Midas is laid in P. In iv. 2, Coryn says, "He that fishes for Lesbos must have such a wooden net as all the trees in P. will not serve to make the cod." In T. Heywood's Mistress i. 1, Midas says, "Yet was I sometime K. of P." In Chapman's Chabot i. 1, 119, the Chancellor describes the situation as "A Gordian beyond the Pn. knot." Gordium was the ancient capital of the Pn. kings. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, Callapine boasts an army "That from the bounds of P. to the sea Which washeth Cyprus with his brinish waves Covers the hills, the valleys, and the plains." After their conquest by the Cimmerians the Pns. were despised and regarded as an inferior race by the Greeks. In Conf. Cons. ii. 2, Tyranny quotes a proverb: "Sero sapiunt Phryges"—"Too late the Pns. are wise." At Ancyra in P. Epictetos (i.e. Mysia) there was a famous sybil. In Davenant's Platonic iii. 5, Theander speaks of "that mystic nursery of minds The Pn. sibyl taught." In Nash's Summers, p. 100, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to P. for woodcocks": woodcock being a usual name for a fool. Habington, in Castara (1640), Arber, p. 70, speaks of "The far fetched Pn. marble, which shall build A burden to our ashes."

But the Elizabethans almost always use the word as equivalent to Trojan. In Com. Cond. 441, Conditions says, "We may pass over the sea [from Thrace] to P. in one day." In Troil. prol. 7, the Greeks "put forth toward P." In i. 2, 135, Pandarus says that the smiling of Troilus "becomes him better than any man in P." In iv. 5, 186, Nestor speaks of Hector's "Pn. steed"; and in 223, Hector predicts "the fall of every Pn. stone will cost A drop of Grecian blood." In v. 10, 24, Troilus apostrophizes the Greek camp: "You vile abominable tents Thus proudly pight upon our Pn. plains." In Tw. N. iii. 1, 57, the Clown says, "I would play Lord Pandarus of P., Sir, to bring a Cressida to this Troilus." In Lucrece 1502, Sinon is described as one "That piteous looks to Pn. shepherds lent." In Fisher's Faunus iii. 6, Eulinius says, "So rejoiced The Pn. swain [sc. Paris] when he conveyed the fairest." In Lochrine ii. 1, 9, Humber speaks of Brutus and his Trojans as "a troop of Pns." Ganymede, who was rapt away to be Jove's cup-bearer, was the son of Tros, and is usually represented as wearing a Pn. cap. In T. Heywood's Dialogues vi. 3704, Juno calls him "this young Pn. lad Snatched from his sire." In Jonson's Poetaster iv. 5, Tucca says to Pyrgus, who is dressed as Ganymede, "Well said, my fine Pn. fry." In M. W. W. i. 3, 98, Pistol calls Falstaff "base Pn. Turk": with reference to his amours with Mistresses Page and Ford. He is a kind of Paris, but, like the Turk, has more than one Helen.

PHYLIPPOS. See PHILIPPI.

PIACENZA (the ancient PLACENTIA). A city in N. Italy on the S. bank of the Po, 2 m. E. of its junction with the Trebbia. It is mentioned in Middleton's R. G. v. 1, by Trapdoor as one of the places in Italy which he has "ambled over." Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, says, "In Italy some account them of Piacenza more jealous than the rest."

PIAZZA. The arcade or covered way built on the N. and E. sides of Covent Garden, Lond., by Inigo Jones in 1633-4. His intention was to carry the P. all round the square, but only these 2 sides were built, that on the N. being called the Great and that on the E. the Little P. The idea seems to have been taken from the colonnades in the P. di San Marco at Venice, but the name was wrongly applied, not to the whole square or Place, but to the colonnades themselves. Blount, in Glossographia (1656), s.v., says, "P., a market-place or chief street, such as that in Covent Garden, which the vulgar corruptly call the P. The close walks are not so properly the P. as the ground inclosed within the rail." He also notes that the word is to be pronounced Piazza. In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater says, "The Venetians are the valiantest gentlemen under the sun. 2 or 3 English spies had lain lieger for 3 months to steal away the P. and ship it to Covent Garden." In Killigrew's Parson v. 1, the Capt. says, "Who should I meet at the corner of the P. but Joseph Taylor: he tells me there's a new play at the Fryers to-day." Taylor was an actor, who died in 1654. In v. 4, the Parson says, "I'd pass my time in the P. with the mountebank, and let him practise upon my teeth and draw 'em too, ere he persuades the words of matrimony out of my mouth again." Killigrew himself lived in the P., in the N.W. angle from 1637 to 1643 and in the N.E. from 1660 to 1662. In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Cockbrain, speaking of Covent Garden, says, "Yond magnificent piece, the P., will excel that at Venice." In Nabbes' C. Garden ii. 1, Warrant says he has challenged Spruce: "the weapon single rapier; the place the P."

PIAZZA DI SAN MARCO. The great square at Venice, W. of the Cathedral of San M. On the N. side are the Procuratorie Vecchie and the Torre dell' Orologio; on the S. the Procuratorie Nuove and the Libreria Vecchia. Act ii. scene 1 of Jonson's Volpone is laid in "St. Mark's Place." Here Mosca, disguised as a travelling quack, sets up his stage, and Sir Politick says, "I wonder yet that he should mount his bank here in this nook, that has been wont to appear in face of the P." Volpone himself says, "It may seem strange that I, your Scoto Mantuano, who was ever wont to fix my bank in the face of the public P. near the shelter of the Portico to the Procuratoria, should now humbly retire myself into an obscure nook of the P." For reference in Shirley's Ball, see under PIAZZA. In Brome's Novella ii. 2, Paulo says, "The rich P. on her greatest mart Boasts not more nations" than are coming to court Victoria.

PICARDY. A province in N.W. France lying W. of Champagne, between Artois and the Ile de France. Its capital was Amiens. It was part of the possessions of the Counts of Flanders, and passed, by the marriage of Philip the Bold with Margaret of Flanders, to the Dukes of Burgundy at the beginning of the 15th cent. After the defeat of Charles of Burgundy at Nancy in 1477 it was added by Louis XI to the kingdom of France. The Squire, in Chaucer's C. T. A. 86, "hadde been somtyme in chyvachie In Flaundres, in Artoys, and Pycardie." In H6 A. ii. 1, 10, Talbot welcomes Burgundy: "By whose approach the regions of Artois, Wallon, and P. are friends to us." In Fam. Vict., p. 362, the Capt., enumerating the forces of the French at Agincourt, says, "Are not here Pickardes with their crossbows and piercing darts?" In H6 B. iv. 1, 88, the Capt. says to Suffolk, "Through thee P. Hath slain their governors, surprised our forts." This was in 1449. In World Child 170, Manhood says, "P. and Pontoise and gentle Artois . . . all have I conquered as a knight." In Webster's Weakest iii. 5, Lodowick speaks of Andres as a village "in P." It was part of the English dist. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron boasts, "Only myself Did people Artois, Douay, P. With her [Victory's] triumphant issue." In More ii. 2, amongst the foreigners attacked by the rioters on Black May Day 1513 is mentioned "Mutas, a wealthy P., at the Greene Gate." In Holinshed he is called Newton, a Picard born, and his house is Queen Gate. It is pleasant to record that the mob did not discover him. In Davenport's Matilda iii. 3, Chester asks the K. to grace him "with the Presidentship of P., fallen in this last rebellion from the Lord Bruce unto your crown."

PICCADILLY. A st. in modern Lond. running W. from the top of the Haymarket to Hyde Park Corner. The name is first recorded in 1623, when Robte. Baeker of Pickadilly Hall is mentioned in the accounts of the Overseers of the Poor of St. Martin's. This Hall was at the N.E. corner of the Haymarket. Blount, in Glossographia, mentions a famous Ordinary near St. James's called Pickadilly; and thinks it was so called from Pickadil, a sort of collar, because it was "the utmost or skirt house of the suburbs"; or because Higgins, who built it, was a tailor, and got his profit from the sale of Pickadils. I find no mention of it in our dramatists.

PICENUM. A dist. in Central Italy lying between the Apennines and the Adriatic, from the mouth of the Æsis to that of the Matrinus. In Jonson's Catiline iii. 3, Catiline says, "I have already sent Septimius Into the Picene territory, and Julius To raise force for us in Apulia."

PICKT-HATCH. An infamous resort of thieves and prostitutes in Elizabethan Lond. It lay at the back of Middle Row (formerly called Rotten Row) on the E. side of Goswell Rd., just S. of Old St. opposite the wall of the Charterhouse. The name was preserved for a long time in Pickax Yard, Middle Row. It properly means a half-door, surmounted by a row of spikes, such as was often used in brothels. It was stated by some authorities to have been in Turnmill St., but a survey of 1649 fixes the site as above described. In M. W. W. ii. 2, 19, Falstaff says to Pistol, "Go! A short knife and a throng! To your manor of P. Go!" The short knife was for cutting purses in a crowd: the implication being that Pistol was a cut-purse. In Field's Weathercock i. 2, Pendant says, if he were a woman, he would "scratch faces like a wild-cat of Picked-hatch." In his Amends ii. 2, Subtle says, "Your whore doth live in P., Turnbull St." In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, when Mammon boasts of the recuperative powers of the Elixir Vitæ, Surly says, "The decayed Vestals of Pict-Hatch would thank you, That keep the fire alive there." In Ev. Man i. i. 1, old Knowell, reading Wellbred's letter to his son, dated from the Windmill, says, "From the Bordello it might come as well, The Spittle, or Pict-Hatch." In the dramatis personæ of Ev. Man O., Shift is described as "A thread-bare shark. His profession is skeldring and idling, his bank Paul's, and his warehouse Picthatch." In Epigram xii. on Lieutenant Shift, Jonson speaks of him as "Not meanest among squires That haunt Pict-hatch, Marsh Lambeth, and Whitefriars." In Randolph's Muses iv. 3, Justice Nimis boasts of the revenues gained by him from "my P. grange and Shoreditch farm and other premises adjoining." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Cole calls Leatherhead "goodman Hogrubber of P.": meaning that he keeps a brothel. In Davenant's Plymouth i. 2, Seawit says, "Do you take this mansion for Pick'd-hatch?" Marston, in Scourge of Villanie i. 3, says, "His old cynic Dad Hath forced him clean forsake his Pickhatch drab." Randolph, in Hey Hon., speaks of "the whores of P., Turnbull, or the unmerciful bawds of Bloomsbury." In Davenant's New Trick i. 3, P. is mentioned in a list of disreputable localities. The scene of Middleton's Black Book is laid at P.; and on p. 11 the Devil begins his peregrinations there because it "is the very skirts of all brothel-houses." Nash is said to have died at P.

PICTS (the PICTI). A Celtic tribe who seem to have been settled in the Orkneys, N. Scotland, and N.E. Ireland. They called themselves Cruithne. After the Romans left Britain they spread southward as far as the Pentland Hills. They ultimately amalgamated with the Scots. In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iii. 1, Arthur describes Modred's army as made up of "sluggish Saxons' crew and Irish kerns, And Scottish aid and false red-shanked P." In Fisher's Fuimus i. 3, Cassibelan says, "Androgæus, hasten to the Scots and P., 2 names which now Albania's kingdom share." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 63, mentions the invasion of Roman Britain by "Those spoilful P. and swarming Easterlings." In vi. 12, 4, he says that Claribell was destined to be married "Unto the Prince of Picteland," i.e. the K. of Scotland.

PIE. A tavern sign in Lond., probably short for Magpie. There was a Magpie Tavern in Magpie Yard, between Fetter Lane and Castle Yard. In Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his song of Taverns, says, "The fiddler [goes] to the Pie." There was a Pie Tavern at Aldgate. In Book of New Epigrams (1659), we have "One asked a friend where Captain Shark did lie; Why, Sir, quoth he, at Algate at the Pie."

PIE CORNER. The corner of Giltspur St. and Cock Lane in W. Smithfield, Lond. It was so called from the cooks' shops which stood there, at which pigs were dressed during Bartholomew Fair. In a Tract on Bartholomew Fair (1641), it is called "the Pig Market, alias Pasty Nook or P. C.; where pigs are all hours of the day on the stalls piping hot, and would say (if they could speak) come, eat me." In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit says, "Win, long to eat of a pig, sweet Win, in the Fair do you see, in the heart of the Fair, not at P.-C." In Massinger's Madam i. 1, Anne says contemptuously of the cooks hired by Holdfast: "Fie on them! They smell of Fleet-Lane and P.-C." In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Face reminds Subtle that he first met him "at P.-C., Taking your meal of steam in from cooks' stalls." In Field's Amends iii. 4, Whorebang cries, "Let's have wine, or I will cut thy head off and have it roasted and eaten in P. C. next Bartholomew-tide." Dekker, in Raven's Almanac, mocks at those who "walk snuffing up and down in winter evenings through P.-c., yet have no silver to stop colon."

In Peele's Jests, we are told: "George was making merry with 3 or 4 of his friends in P.-C., where the tapster was much given to poetry." In Day's B. Beggar iv., Canby says, "You shall see the amorous conceits and love-songs betwixt Capt. Pod of Py-C. and Mrs. Rump of Ram Alley." This is the Capt. Pod who was a famous exhibitor of motions, or puppet-plays. In Jonson's Barthol. v. 1, Leatherhead says, "O the motions that I have given light to since my master Pod died"; and in Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Macilente says, "Let him be Capt. Pod and this his motion." There were many saddlers' shops in the neighbourhood of P.-C. In H. B. ii. 1, 28, Quickly says of Falstaff: "A' comes continually to P.-C. to buy a saddle." In Vox Borealis (1641), we read: "These men landed at P. C., where, after they had sold their saddles, they eat out their swords." There were also printing shops in the neighbourhood, where broadsides and other second-rate stuff were published. Randolph, in his Answer to Ben Jonson's Ode, says, "Thou canst not find them stuff That will be bad enough To please their palates; let 'em them refuse For some P.-C. Muse." The Merry-conceited Fortune Teller was "Printed for John Andrews at the White-Lion, near Py-C. 1662." The name lent itself to puns: Middleton, in Hubbard, speaks of a man "winding his pipe like a horn at the P. C. of his mouth, which must needs make him look like a sow-gelder." The Gt. Fire began at Pudding Lane and ended at P. C. The curious circumstance was commemorated by the figure of a naked boy set up at the corner of Cock Lane, with the inscription: "This boy is in memory put up for the late Fire of Lond. occasioned by the sin of gluttony, 1666." The boy, shorn of the wings he once possessed, may still be seen on the public-house called "The Fortune of War." There is another memorial in Pudding Lane (q.v.)

PIED BULL. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond. The 2nd quarto of King Lear was "Printed for Nathanael Butter and are to be sold at his shop in Pauls Churchyard at the sign of the Pide Bull near St. Austins Gate. 1608."

PIEDMONT. A region in N.W. Italy enclosed on 3 sides by the Alps and occupying the upper part of the valley of the Po. During our period it belonged to the Dukes of Savoy, the ancestors of the present K. of Italy. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander allots to the D. of Candy "those towns in P., And all the signories in Lombardy From Porta di Volane to Savona." In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater speaks of "P., where I had excellent venison." In Davenant's Love Hon. i. 1, 335, Leonell speaks of "The force of your Alvaro, Prince of P." In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 2, Horatio introduces himself as "2nd son unto the D. of Savoy and the P. Prince." The massacre of the Protestants of P. by the D. of Savoy in 1655 was the occasion of a sonnet by Milton On the late massacre in P., in which he prays God not to forget those who had been "slain by the bloody Piemontese."

PIERIA. A dist. in Thessaly along the W. coast of the Thermaic Gulf, at the foot of the Olympus range, between the mouths of the Peneus and the Haliacmon. It was reputed to have been the birthplace of the Muses. When their cult was transferred to Mt. Helicon in Boeotia the name went with them, and the fountain of Aganippe, near the grove of the Muses, was called the Pierian spring, to drink of which was supposed to confer the gift of poetry and song. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Henry says to Savoy, "Your wit is of the true Pierian spring That can make anything of anything." In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Cæsar, commending the poets, says, "For these high parts Cæsar shall reverence the Pierian arts." Spenser, in Ruines of Time 394, says, "So happy are they and so fortunate, Whom the Pierian sacred sisters love."

PIGEONS, THREE. See THREE PIGEONS.

PIGMIES. A race of men of small stature mentioned by Homer and Herodotus. They were long supposed to be fabulous, but the bas-reliefs on the temple of Q. Hatshepsut at Deir-el-Bahari, near Thebes, and the discoveries of Stanley prove that such a race does exist in Central Africa. In Ado ii. 1, 278, Benedick says, "I will do you any embassy to the P. rather than hold 3 words' conference with this harpy." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Carlo says of Fastidius Brisk's page: "He looks like a colonel of the P.' horse." There was also supposed to be a race of P. in N. India. Milton, P. L. i. 780, describes the fallen angels as shrinking in size till they were "like that pygmean race Beyond the Indian mt." Pliny, Nat. Hist. vii. 11, 26, places the P. "Beyond the source of the Ganges." Batman says "they dwell in mountains of Inde."

PIKE GARDENS. Certain gardens, with 4 fish-ponds in them, on the Bankside in Southwark, between the Thames and Summer St., E. of Love Lane. They were purchased at one time by Philip Henslowe. In Killigrew's Parson iii. 2, the Capt. says, "Let's go and cross the fields to P.'s; her kitchen is cool winter and summer."

I doubt, however, whether the reference is to P. G., from the fact that it was necessary to cross the fields to get there, and that P. is called "she." I should suppose that P.'s was a tavern kept by that lady somewhere in the N. suburbs of Lond.

PILLICOCK HILL. A hill in the land of Nursery Rhymes. In Lear iii. 4, 78, Edgar sings: "P. sat on P. Hill." The full version of the rhyme runs: "Pillycock, Pillycock, sat on a hill, If he's not gone he sits there still."

PIMLICO. A place of entertainment in Hogsdon much resorted to by the Londoners of the 17th cent. for the sake of the fresh air and the cakes and ale for which it was famous. The site is approximately marked by P. Walk, which runs E. from the corner of St. John's Rd. and New North Rd. to Hoxton St. Probably it got its name from its proprietor. Nares (s.v.) quotes from News from Hogsdon (1598): "Have at thee then, my merry boys, and hey for old Ben P.'s nut-brown." The name was transferred sometime during the 17th cent. to the dist. E. of Chelsea between the Thames and St. James's Park, possibly because there was a similar place of entertainment there. In all the passages quoted below it is the Hoxton P. that is intended.

A tract was published in 1609 entitled Pimlyco: or Runne Red Cap., 'Tis a mad world at Hogsdon. In Jonson's Alchemist v. 1, Lovewit says, "Gallants, men and women, And of all sorts of tag-rag [have] been seen to flock here In threaves . . . as to a second Hogsden In days of P. and Eyebright." In Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit, praising his wife's dress, says, "I challenge all Cheap-side to show such another; Moor-fields, P.-path, or the Exchange." In his Devil iv. 1, Wittipol says to Lady Tailbush, "Coach it to P.; dance the saraband." In iii. 1, Meercraft says, "I'll have thee, Capt. Gilthead, and march up and take in P. and kill the bush at every tavern." In Underwoods lxii., Jonson describes the Lond. citizens' wives telling of their husbands' exploits in the train-bands: "What a strong fort old P. had been; How it held out; how, last, 'twas taken in." In Lady Mother iii. 2, Clariana says to Crackby, "Match with Nan your schooffellow With whom you used to walk to Pimblcoe To eat plumcakes and cream." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Dapper says, "My Lord Noland, will you go to P. with us? We are making a voyage to that happy land of spice-cakes." In Mayne's Match ii. 6, Plotwell says, "We have brought you a gentleman of valour who has been in Moorfields often; marry, it has been to squire his sisters and demolish custards at P." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 556, Sir Lionel says, "I have sent my daughter this morning as far as P. to fetch a draught of Derby ale." In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, Mary speaks contemptuously of "Exchange wenches Coming from eating pudding-pies on a Sunday At P. or Islington." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Clare speaks of "a grocer's daughter With whom he has been used to go to P. And spend 10 groats in cakes and Christian ale." Dekker, in Armourers, says, "There is no good doings in these days but amongst lawyers, amongst vintners, in bawdy houses, and at P." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Mrs. Gallipot says of an archer at Bunhill: "When his arrows have lien toward Islington his eyes have shot clean contrary towards P."

PINDER OF WAKEFIELD. A tavern on the W. side of Gray's Inn Rd., Lond. between Harrison St. and Cromer St. The name is now transferred to No. 328, on the E. side of the road. It was a little over ¼ mile from St. Pancras Ch. It was named after the famous

George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield, whose exploits were the subject of the old play so entitled. In Glapthorne's Hollander v. 1, Urinal says that Poppingaie will not be married at Pancridge—"There's no drink near it but at the Pinder of Wakefield, and that's abominable."

PINDUS. A range of mtns. running S. from the Balkans and forming the boundary between Thessaly and Epeirus. The highest peak reaches about 9000 ft. In Richards' Messallina v. 2182, Saufellus prays: "P. and Ossa cover me with snow!" In Brandon's Octavia 1718, Octavia cries, "I will fly where P. hides his head Among the stars or where ambitious Othris The clouds' swift motion bars." In Fisher's Fuinus iv. 1, Cæsar says, "Stern Mars, roar as thou didst at Troy Which P. may re-beat, and Taurus lough the same." In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5240, Io says, "Here, Daphne, by your father Peneus' streams, Which, falling from the top of P. mt., Waters Hemonian Tempe, let us sit." In the old Timon v. 1, Pseudocheus bids Gelasimus, "Ætna being left, fly to P. hill." In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Bussy says, "My sun is turned to blood in whose red beams P. and Ossa, hid in drifts of snow, Melt like 2 hungry torrents." Spenser, in Prothalamion 40, says, "The snow which doth the top of P. strow Did never whiter show" than the two swans swimming down the Lee. In Bromes' Ct. Beggar iv. 3, Ferdinand says, "Heap yet more mtns., mtns. upon mtns., P. on Ossa." In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Achelous says that his mother was "the nymph Nais, born on P. mt., From whence our broad and spacious currents rise." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 4, 41, says that Pæon was born to Apollo and Liagore "upon high P. hill." Hall, in Satires vi. 1, says of old Catilla: "Her chin like P. . . . Where down descends the o'erflowing stream doth fill The well of her fair mouth." In Mason's Mulleasses 1576, Timoclea speaks of "the vine-god's priests Running down Nila [i.e. Nisa] or from P. top."

PIPER'S HILL. A hill 4 m. N.E. of St. Albans. In Misogonus iv. 1, Codrus says, "Were not P. H. then the rye-field?"

PIPIDIAUKE. A promontory in S. Wales. Fuller relates (Church History i. 5, 22) that Gildas Albanus "read liberal Sciences to many auditors and Scholars at Pipediauc, a promontory in Pembrokesh," but the school of Gildas was at Llan-caryn in Glamorgansh., 9 m. S.W. of Cardiff. There is a vill. called Horton in the promontory between Carmarthen Bay and Swansea Bay. In Jonson's Wales, Evan says, "Houghton is a town bear his name there by Pipediauke."

PIRENE (probably a mistake for PYRENEAN, q.v.). In Sweetnam i. 3, Iago says of Leonida: "Her fame hath gone beyond the Pirean mtns. and brought the chief Italian princes."

PIRENE. A fountain at Corinth where Bellerophon caught the winged horse Pegasus. It was sacred to the Muses. Hall, in Sat. (1597) i. 2, 20 says, "Cytheron's hill's become a brothel bed, And Pyrene sweet turned to a poisoned head Of coal-black puddle." In Marmon's Antiquary iii. 2, Petrucio says, "I leave your Helicons and your pale Pirenes to such as will look after them." Persius (prol. 4) calls it "pallida Pyrene." Quarles, in Feast for Worms (1638), p. 4, apologises for his Muse, because she has never bathed her feathers "in the Pyrenean flood."

PIREUS. See PYREUM.

PISA. An ancient city of Etruria, on the Arno, 44 m. W. of Florence. Formerly it was only 2 m. from the sea, but the distance has been increased by the silt deposited by the river. In the 11th and 12th cents. P. was at the height of its power: its fleets scoured the Mediterranean, and it gained possession of Sardinia and Corsica. The great buildings which are grouped together in the N.W. of the city date from this period. The Cathedral was consecrated in 1118, the Baptistry was begun in 1152; the Leaning Tower, or Campanile Pendente, in 1174; and the Campo Santo a few years later. A long struggle for maritime supremacy followed with Genoa, in which the Genoese finally prevailed, defeating the Pisans with immense loss at the battle of Meloria in 1284. A popular rising took place, in which Count Ugolino was taken and then starved to death in the Tower of the Seven Streets. His story has been immortalized by Dante. Next came a protracted contest with the Florentines, who took P. in 1409 and finally extinguished its independence a century later. Amongst its famous sons are Galileo and the Pisanos. In Shrew i. 1, 10, Lucentio says, "P., renowned for grave citizens, Gave me my being and my father"; and in ii. 1, 103, Baptista speaks of Vincentio, the father of Lucentio, as "a mighty man of P." In ii. 1, 369, Tranio speaks of "rich P." Fuller, Holy State iii. 10, says, "The Pisans, sited in the fens and marsh of Arnus, have excellent memories." In Massinger's Great Duke i. 1, Contarion says, "The service done our master in his wars 'Gainst P. and Sienna may with justice Claim what's conferred upon him." The period is the dukedom of Cosimo I. To the same period belongs Davenant's Siege, the scene of which is laid at P. In i. 1, the Col. says, "Our Signiory of P. scorned to implore justice of any state in Italy." In Davenant's Italian i. 1, Florello says, "Our pay rests in arrears and P.'s lost." In Dekker's Wonder i. 1, the D. of Florence says, "Hymen shall unite Florence and P. by the hands of Fyamenta and this Pisan Duke."

Swords were made at P., but they were of comparatively poor quality. In B. & F. Custom ii. 3, Duarte says, "I'll show you the difference now between a Spanish rapier and your pure P." In Ford's Trial ii. 1, Guzman asks, "Speaks thy weapon Toledo language, Bilbao, or dull P.?" In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "P. hanging": with reference to the famous leaning tower. A particular cut of beard was known as the Pisan beard. In B. & F. Corinth ii. 4, the Tutor instructs Onos, his pupil, "Play with your P. beard." In Day's Law Tricks i. 1, Polymetis talks of the "choicest gems Marcellis, P., or Ligorine could yield." In Shirley's Bird iii. 2, Fulvio appeals to the Ambassador "by that love we interchanged at P. when we grew Together in our studies." The University of P. is one of the most ancient and famous in Italy.

PISA. A town in Elis in the Peloponnesus, near to Olympia. The Pisatans were the original founders of the Olympic Games, but the city was destroyed by their rivals, the Eleans, in 572 B.C. In Nero i. 3, Nero relates how his glories amazed "the Greekish towns, Elis and Pisa and the rich Mycenæ."

PISCARIA. The fish-market of Venice, situated on the W. bank of the Grand Canal N. of the Rialto Bidge., behind the Fabriche Nuove, erected in 1555. In Jonson's Volpone v. 4, Volpone says, "I mean to be a suitor to your worship For the small tenement . . . at the end of your long row of houses By the Piscaria."

PISIDIA. A province in S.W. Asia Minor lying E. of Lycia and N. of Pamphylia. Its chief city was the Pisidian Antioch, where Paul preached. It was a hilly and well-wooded country. In Lyly's Midas iv. 2, Coryn says, "He that fishes for Lesbos must have such a wooden net as all the trees in Phrygia will not serve to make the cod, nor all the woods in P. provide the corks." In iv. 1, Midas speaks of "the petty kings Of Mysia, P., and Galatia." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 3, Ferdinand, who is mad, says, "I would but live to subdue the Pisidians and to bring the Lydians under tribute." Apparently he is under the delusion that he is Midas.

PISMÆ. The stream from the banks of which Persephone was stolen by Pluto. From the context it is plain that T. Heywood accepted the form of the legend which placed it in Sicily near Henna, but I have not been able to find his authority for the name. In his Mistress v. 1, Psyche adjures Proserpina, "By all the tears your grieved mother shed When you were stole from Pismæ's flowery bank."

PISSING ALLEY. Two passages in Old Lond. enjoyed this appellation: one running from Friday St. to Bread St., the other from the Strand into Holywell St. Probably the former is the one intended in the quotation. In Middleton's Family v. 3, Dryfat says, "The wise woman in Pissing Alley nor she in Do-little Lane are more famous for good deeds than he."

PISSING CONDUIT. See CONDUIT.

PISTOIA (the ancient PISTORIA). A city in N.W. Italy on the Ombrone, 21 m. N.W. of Florence. It has long manufactured iron-ware and fire-arms, and the word Pistol is derived from it. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor mentions P. as one of the cities in Italy which he has "ambled over." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "iron P."

PITTIE-WARD. In M. W. W. iii. 1, 5, Simple says he has looked for the coming of Dr. Caius and his party: "The p.-w., the Park-ward; every way; old Windsor way, and every way but the town way." Evans is waiting in a field near Frogmore: evidently the field E. of Moor St., for the party actually comes "from Frogmore, over the stile," across Moor St. The one way that is left unaccounted for is the Staines Rd., which joins the Old Windsor Rd. just S. of Frogmore. This road, leading through Staines and Hampton to Lond., might well be called the City-ward way, and I incline therefore to accept Capell's emendation "the cittie-ward."

PLACENTIA (the old name of PIACENZA, q.v.). In Shirley's Imposture i. 1, Flaviano says, "Thou left'st the princess Fioretta safe at Placentia?"

PLASHY. A vill. in Essex 7 m. N.E. of Chelmsford. The castle of P. was the residence of Thomas of Woodstock, Earl of Gloucester, and the ch. was part of a college founded by him in 1393. In R2 i. 2, 66, the Duchess of Gloucester sends an invitation to the D. of York to visit her "at P." In ii. 2, 90, York sends his servant "to P., to my sister Gloucester"; and in 120 he says, "I should to P. too." In Trag. Richd. II ii. 2, 187, Woodstock says, "I'll to P., brothers; If ye ride through Essex, call and see me." In iii. 2, 9, York says to Woodstock, "This house of P., brother, stands in a sweet and pleasant air, I faith; 'Tis near the Thames and circled round with trees."

PLEMOUTH, PLIMOUTH, PLIMWORTH. See PLYMOUTH.

PLOUGH. A tavern sign in Lond. There was a P. Inn on the S. side of Cary St., or Little Lincoln's Inn Fields; there was also a P. Inn beyond Kensal Green Cemetery which dated back to the 16th cent., and another, which still remains, at the top of Clapham Rise. But the one meant in the quotations was probably somewhere in the City. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his song of the Taverns, says, "To the P. [goes] the clown." In Wager's The Longer B. 1, Moros says, "There be good puddings at the sign of the P., you never did eat better sauserlings."

PLUMSTON PARK. A park near Kingsbury in N. Leicestersh., S. of Tamworth. In B. & F. Captain iii. 3, Jacobo, asked to sing, replies: "Thou know'st I can sing nothing but P. P." In Brome's Moor iii. 2, Buzzard makes his exit, singing: "Down P. P., etc." The reference seems to be to the Ballad of King Edward and the Tanner of Tamworth (Percy's Reliques ii. 1), in which the K. says, "For P.-p. I will give thee, With tenements fair beside." Puttenham, Art of Poesie iii. 22, says that the K. gave the tanner "the inheritance of Plumton parke" for his good sport.

PLYMOUTH. A spt. and naval station in S.W. Devonsh. at the head of P. Sound, at the confluence of the Plym and Tamar, 216 m. S.W. of Lond. Its importance as a spt. dates from the 16th cent., and it was the usual starting-point of expeditions to the W. Indies and America. The names of Drake, Hawkins, and Sir Humphrey Gilbert lend it lustre. It was the last English port touched at by the Pilgrim Fathers, and from it they named the place of their disembarkation in America, New P. "The Jhesus of P." was one of the fleet, sighted by Hycke, p. 88, conveying the "religious people" to Ireland. In Three Ladies ii., Lucre mentions P. as one of the English towns where, on account of the concourse of traders, "infinite numbers great rents upon little room do bestow." In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. i. 1, the scene of which is laid here, the Capt. says, "How P. swells with gallants! How the streets Glisten with gold! You cannot meet a man But tricked in scarf and feather, that it seems As if the pride of England's gallantry Were harboured here. It doth appear, methinks, A very court of soldiers." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Towerson announces that the ships, laden with the wealth of ample Spain, "arrived safely at P." In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant says, "Spanish galliasses being great with gold were all delivered at P., Portsmouth, and other English havens." In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough boasts, "I could have had a whore at P." A lost play of Dekker and Jonson was entitled Page of Plemouth, and described the murder of a rich merchant, called Page, of that city. In Cuckqueans v. 9, Denham speaks of "the spacious bay That is encompassed by the shore of P." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 31, says of the Tamar: "meeting Plim, to Plimmouth [it] thence declines." Drayton, in Polyolb. i. 229, asks, "What ship yet ever came That not of P. hears, where those brave navies lie, From cannons' thundering throats that all the world defy?"

A P. Cloak meant a cudgel; Fuller explains the phrase as follows (Worthies: Devon 248): "Many a man of good extraction, coming home from far voyages, may chance to land here [at P.], and is unable to recruit himself with clothes. Here they make the next wood their draper's shop, where a staff cut out serves them for a covering." Ray, in Proverbs 225, gives a more likely explanation: "We use when we walk in cuerpo to carry a staff in our hands, but none when in a cloak." It is still considered bad form in Oxford and Cambridge for a man in academicals to carry a stick or umbrella. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iii. 2, Mattheo says, "Shall I walk in a P. cloak, that's to say, like a rogue in my hose and doublet, and a crabtree cudgel in my hand?" In Massinger's New Way i. 1, Tapwell says, "If you but advance Your Plimworth cloak you shall be soon instructed There dwells within call . . . the constable." In Wandering Jew (1640) 22, we have: "A poor ale-house is your Inn, a P. cloak your caster," i.e. outer garment.

PO (Latin, PADUS, or ERIDANUS). The largest river in Italy, rising in the Cottian Alps and flowing E. to the Adriatic along the valley which separates the Alps from the Apennines. Its length is about 400 m. In K. J. i. 1, 203, the Bastard describes the English traveller "Talking of the Alps and Apennines, The Pyrenean and the river Po." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar boasts, "Proud Tyber and Lygurian Poe Bear my name's glory to the Ocean main." In Chapman's Consp. Byron i. 1, Picote describes the meeting of the Papal Legate and the D. of Savoy: "Where the flood Ticin enters into Po." The Ticino flows into the Po a few m. below Pavia. In B. & F. Lover's Prog. iv. 4, Lisander speaks of "the winds of mischief from all quarters: Euphrates, Ganges, Tigris, Volga, Po." In Peele's Old Wives, p. 212, Eumenides says, "For thy sweet sake leaving fair Po, I sailed up Danuby." In Day's Humour iv. 1, Octavio says, "When upon Po thou find'st a coal-black swan, Thou'st found a woman constant to a man." In Chapman's Usher iii. 2, Bassiolo swears that his friendship shall last "while the banks of Po Shall bear brave lilies." In Suckling's Brennoralt ii. 1, Villanor says, "I am a better drinker than a Po." Greene, in Bradamant's Madrigal in Perimedes, speaks of "The swans . . . Floating like snow down by the banks of Po."

Phaeton was said to have fallen into the Po after his attempt to guide the chariot of the Sun. In Pembroke's Antonie v. 1898, Cleopatra compares her sorrows to those of "Phœbus' sisters, daughters of the sun, Which wail your brother fallen into the stream Of stately Po." The Po is used for Italy in general, with special reference to its poetry; partly, perhaps, because it flows near Mantua, the birthplace of Virgil. In Kinsmen prol., the speaker says in reference to Chaucer, "A poet never went More famous yet 'twixt Po and silver Trent." Daniel, in Ep. Ded. to Cleopatra, says, "O that the music of our well-tuned Ile Might hence be heard to Mintium, Arn, and Po." In Ret. Pernass. iv. 3, Studioso speaks of "so many activeable wits [in England] That might contend with proudest birds of Po." In T. Heywood's Lacrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his list of Taverns and their patrons, says, "You that do the Muses love [go to] the sign called River Po." I can find no such sign in London. In Cockayne's verses on Massinger's Emperor, he prays that Massinger may "purify the slighted English tongue That both the nymphs of Tagus and of Po May not henceforth despise our language so."

PODOLIA (now PODOLSK). A province in S.W. Russia, until 1793 part of the kingdom of Poland, on the E. bank of the Dniester and immediately N. of Bessarabia. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 2, Theridamas reports, "By the river Tyras [i.e. Dniester] I subdued Stoka, Podolia, and Codemia."

POICTIERS, POITOU. A province of France lying on the Bay of Biscay, S. of Brittany and Anjou. It was originally the country of the Pictones. After the fall of the Roman Empire it came successively into the hands of the Vandals, the Visigoths, and the Franks, and in the time of the Carolings was ruled by Counts of its own, who were feudatories of the Frankish kings. It became an English possession by the marriage of Eleanor of Guienne to Henry II in 1152. It was conquered by Philippe Auguste in 1204, and ceded to England again in 1360. It was finally reunited to France by Charles VII in 1375. In Dist. Emp. iv. 2, Gabriella says to Eldegrad, "Richd. hath begged your offices: He's Count of Poyteers, Marquis of Saluca." The date is the reign of Charlemagne. In K. J. i. 1, 11, Philip of France claims P. on behalf of young Arthur. In ii. 1, 487, John offers P. along with Anjou, Touraine, and Maine as dowry to Blanche if the Dauphin will marry her. In H6 A. i. 1, 61, it is announced that P. is "quite lost" to the English; and in iv. 3, 45, York says, "Maine, Blois, Po., and Tours are won away." In iv. 1, 19, the Ff. read P. by mistake for Patay, q.v. In Davenport's Matilda i. 2, Fitzwater upbraids the K. with "the loss of Normandie, when Anjou, Brittain, Main, P., and Turwin were delivered up to Philip."

POICTIERS. The capital of the province of Poitou on the Clain, 206 m. S.W. of Paris. It is one of the most ancient towns in France, and has some important Roman remains and a fine old cathedral and palace. It is chiefly memorable for the 3 great battles fought in its neighbourhood: viz. the defeat of Alaric by Clovis in 507; of the Saracens by Charles Martel in 732; and of Jean II of France by Edward the Black Prince in 1356. In Ed. III iii. 5, the Prince announces that John of France is fled "towards P."; and in iv. 3-8 the battle is described. In Jonson's Prince Henry's Barriers, Merlin, speaking of the Black Prince, says, "Here at P. he was Mars indeed." In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 35, Lancaster speaks of "the warlike battles won At Cressey field, Poyteeres, Artoyse, and Mayne" by Edward the Black Prince. The battle is described in detail in ii. 1, 75, but the date is wrongly given as September 19th, 1363. It should be 1356. Drayton, in Odes xii. 41, says, "Poitiers and Cressy tell When most their pride did swell, Under our swords they fell."

POLAND, or POLONIA (Pe. = Pole, Pn. = Polonian, Pa. = Polonia, Pk. = Polack). A country in E. Europe lying N. of Hungary between Russia and Silesia, stretching to the Baltic. From the 10th cent. to the end of the 18th P. was an independent kingdom. In the 16th cent. it was at the height of its power under Sigismund I and II, and held its own against both the Russians and the Turks. To the early part of the cent. belongs Copernicus, the great astronomer. The kingdom of P. was nefariously divided between Prussia, Russia, and Austria in the three successive partitions of 1772, 1793, 1795. But P. recovered her independence in 1919. In Ham. ii. 2, 63, Norway is represented as being at war with P.; and in iv. 4, Fortinbras of Norway marches across the stage "against some part of P." to win a little patch of ground, which Hamlet thinks "the Pk. never will defend." In v. 2, 361, Fortinbras "with conquest comes from P.," and is elected K. of Denmark. All this is quite unhistorical. In i. 1, 63, "So frowned he once when in an angry parle He smote the skeddled Pks. on the ice" we should read Pole-axe: there is no indication of any war between Denmark and P. In Meas. i. 3, 14, the D. of Vienna has delivered his power up to Angelo, "And he supposes me travelled to P." In Bale's Johan 182, Sedition says, "I am the Pope's ambassador in Pe., Spruse, and Berne." The reference is probably to the rebellion of the nobility, who were mainly Roman Catholics, against Sigismund I. In Ed. III iii. 1, reinforcements come to aid the French K. "From lofty P., nurse of hardy men." In Selimus 540, Selim says of Samandria: "Here the Pn. comes hurtling in To fight in honour of his crucifix." In Kyd's Solyman i., Haler advises Soliman, "I hold it not good policy to call Your forces home from Persia and Pa." The reference is to the Treaty concluded between Soliman and P. in 1533, which was greatly to the advantage of P. In B. & F. Span. Cur. i. 1, Leandro specifies as one subject of conversation amongst pot-house politicians, "Whether his [the Turk's] moony standards are designed For Persia or Pa." Osman II had wars with Persia in 1617 and with P. in 1621. In Marlowe's Massacre, the scene is enacted in which the Lords of P. offer the crown to Henri of Anjou: he accepted the offer and was crowned in 1572, but in a few months he fled secretly from P. to take possession of the kingdom of France as Henri III. In Heywood's Witches ii. 2, the soldier says he has served "with the Russian against the Pk.: I was took prisoner by the P." The reference is to the war between Sigismund and Russia, which ended with the victory of Chodkiewich in 1622. In Chettle's Hoffman F. 1, Stilt says to his son, "Thou hast as rheumatique a tongue to persuade as any is between Pe. and Pomer." In Richard's Misogonus iii. 1, Eugonus, the brother of the hero, is sent away to his uncle "in Polona-land." In B. & F. Fair Maid i. iv. 2, the Tailor tells of a Scotch tailor who had "travelled far and was a pedlar in P." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 2, Brainworm, disguised as an old soldier, claims to have served "in all the late wars in Bohemia, Hungaria, Dalmatia, P., where not?" Presumably he means the war concluded by the Treaty of 1533, but he is simply lying audaciously.

National Character. Heylyn (s.v. P.) says, "The people are very industrious and studious of all languages, especially the Latin. They are according to their abilities rather prodigal than truly liberal, and are generally good soldiers. Proud they are and impatient, delicious in diet, and costly in attire, which last qualities are common also to the women who are for the most part indifferently fair, and rather witty than well-spoken." There was a general toleration of all varieties of religious belief in P., and secretaries of many kinds found a refuge there. Burton, A. M. iii. 4, 1, 5, says, "In Europe, P., and Amsterdam are the common sanctuaries." In later times, on the contrary, P. came to be reckoned exceptionally intolerant. Poverty was supposed to be rife in P. In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Flamineo says, "I'd rather be entered into the list of the 40,000 pedlars in P.," a sarcasm on the primitive trading arrangements of the Pes. The winter in P. is very severe. In Err. iii. 2, roo, Dromio says of his kitchen-wench: "Her rags and the tallow in them will burn a P. winter." In Beguiled, Dods. ix. 285, the Nurse says, "He does strut before her in a pair of Pn. legs as if he were a gentleman usher to the Great Turk." In Middleton's Five Gallants iv. 6, Pursenet asks, "Where's comely nurture? the Italian kiss, or the French cringe, with the Pn. waist? Are all forgot?" In Davenant's U. Lovers ii. 1, Rampion says, "Bring me but a pattern of a Polish coat, I'd wear it loose and short." Dekker, in Seven Sins, says of the English fashionable man: "Pa. gives him the boots." Rowlands, in More Knaves Yet (1611), talks of "Pa. heels"; and in Martin Marke-all (1610) of "a Polony shoe with a bell." In Trag. Richd. II ii. 3, 92, Richd.'s favourites are described as wearing "Pn. shoes with picks a hand full long Tied to their knees with chains of pearl and gold." The Pes. wore their heads shaved all but one lock. In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Brachiano says of the D. of Florence: "I scorn him like a shaved Pk."

Apparently some Pn. had been working a swindle throughout England about 1630. In Marmon's Leaguer ii. 3, Agurtes says, if he has luck he will not need to "trample up and down the country, To cheat with a Pn., or false rings." Sir I. Gollancz has recently given good reason for supposing that Shakespeare took the name of Polonius in Hamlet from his knowledge of a book called The Counsellor, written by Laurentius Grimalius Goslicus "to the honour of the Pn. Empire," as the title asserts. An English translation appeared in 1598. Hall, in Satires iv. 3, speaks of an adventurer going to Guiana for gold and capturing nothing but "Some straggling pinnace of Pn. rye." P. was one of the chief granaries of Europe.

POLICASTRO. A town in S. Italy at the head of the Gulf of P., on the Mediterranean coast abt. 85 m. S.E. of Naples. It was once an important city, but since its sack by the Turks in the 16th cent. it has remained insignificant. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander allots to Cæsar "Those sweet provinces Even to Monte Alto, P., And Petrasalia in Calabria."

POLONIA. See POLAND.

POMER, POMMERN, POMERLAND, or POMERANIA. A province extending some 200 m. along the coast of the Baltic, to the N. of Brandenburg and E. of the Danish peninsula. From 1062 to 1637 it was ruled by its own Dukes, and on the death of the last D. passed to the house of Brandenburg. Since 1815 the whole of it has belonged to Prussia. In Chettle's Hoffman, one of the characters is Ferdinand, lord of P. and D. of Prussia, and in the course of the play (F.1) old Stilt says to his son, "Thou hast as rheumatique a tongue to persuade as any is between Pole and P." In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 2, 16, the Archbp. of Mentz claims to be "By birth the D. of fruitful P." As a matter of fact, he had nothing whatever to do with P.

POMFRET (or, more fully, PONTIFRACT). An ancient town in the W. Riding, Yorks., near the junction of the Aire and Calder, 24 m. S.W. of York and 177 m. N.W. of Lond. The castle, of which considerable ruins still remain, was built by Ilbert de Lacy soon after the Conquest. It came into the possession of the D. of Lancaster in 1310, and it was here that he was beheaded for rebellion in 1322. It was the scene of the confinement and death of Richd. II, and of the execution of Lord Richd. Grey and Sir Thomas Vaughan in 1483. It was finally dismantled by the Parliament in 1649. In K. J. iv. 2, 132, the Bastard brings in a prophet, Peter of P., whom he had found in "the sts. of P. With many hundreds treading on his heels," predicting that the K. would deliver up his crown before noon on the next Ascension-day. The prophet was hanged at Warham, according to Holinshed. In R2 v. 1, 52, Richd. is ordered to be taken to P.; and sc. 5 relates his murder there. In H4 B. i. 1, 205, Morton says that the Archbp. of York "doth enlarge his rising with the blood Of fair K. Richd., scraped from P. stones." In H6 B. ii. 2, 26, York tells how Bolingbroke sent Richd. "to P., where . . . Harmless Richd. was murdered traitorously." In Oldcastle iii. 1, Cambridge says, "When young Richd. was at P. slain, In him the title of Prince Edward died." In R3 ii. 4, 42, word is brought that "Lord Rivers and Lord Grey are sent to P.; With them Sir Thomas Vaughan, prisoners." In iii. 1, 183, Gloucester sends word to Hastings that his dangerous adversaries "To-morrow are let blood at P.-Castle"; and in iii. 2, 50, Catesby brings him the message. In iii. 2, 85, Stanley says, "The lords at P., when they rode from Lond., Were jocund, and supposed their state was sure." In iii. 3, the execution of Rivers, Grey, and Vaughan takes place "in P. Castle," though Rivers was not executed till some months later than the others. Rivers exclaims, "O P., P. ! O thou bloody prison ! Within the guilty closure of thy walls Richd. the 2nd here was hacked to death." In iii. 4, 92, Hastings recalls with sorrow how he boasted that "they at P. bloodily were butchered"; and in v. 3, 140, the Ghost of Rivers speaks of himself as "Rivers, that died at P." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 162, Anselme says, "This day at P. noble gentlemen three, the Q.'s kindred, lose their harmless heads."

POMPEY'S THEATRE, or CIRQUE. The first permanent theatre in Rome, built by Cn. Pompeius Magnus at the S. end of the Campus Martius on the boundary between it and the Circus Flaminius. It was completed in 52 B.C. Seats were provided for 40,000 spectators, and at the back of the stage were spacious colonnades and gardens. Adjacent to it were the Curia Pompeii, where Cæsar was murdered, and the House of Pompeius. The remains of these buildings are to be seen in the Piazza of Sta. Maria di Grotta Pinta behind the ch. of San Andrea della Valle. It was burnt down in the reign of Tiberius, and 3 later conflagrations are recorded. The outer walls were still standing in the 15th cent. In J. C. i. 3, 147, Cassius orders the conspirators, "Repair to P. Porch where you shall find us"; and in 152, "That done, repair to P. T." In Jonson's Sejanus i. 2, Tiberius approves of the decree for setting up the statue of Sejanus in P. T., "whose ruining fire His vigilance and labour kept restrained In that one loss." In v. 1, Terentius reports to Sejanus that the people "run in routs to P. T. To view your statue which they say sends forth A smoke as from a furnace." In v. 10, Terentius tells how the people "filled the Capitol and P. C." to tear down the statues of Sejanus. In Daniel's Cleopatra i., Menester says, "In P. spacious t. I acted The noble virtues of true man." The same lines occur in Richards' Messalina i. 606. Nash, in Wilton 117, speaks of "the ruins of P. t., reputed one of the 9 wonders of the world." In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater, in his wholly fictitious account of his travels, says, "I went a pilgrimage to Rome, where I saw a play in P. T." In Dekker's Wonder iii. 1, Torrenti, speaking of his new palace, says, "I'll gild mine, like P. T., all o'er." In Massinger's Actor i. 1, Paris complains, "Our t., Great P. work, that hath given full delight Both to the eye and ear of 50,000 Spectators in one day . . . Is quite forsaken." In May's Agrippina i. 339, Vitellius speaks of "Agrippa's Baths and P. T." as amongst the finest buildings of Rome. Puttenham, Art of Poesie i. 17, speaks of it as "one among the ancient ruins of Rome, built by Pompeius Magnus, for capacity able to receive at ease fourscore thousand persons . . . and so curiously contrived as every man might depart at his pleasure without any annoyance to other."

PONTIC SEA (the Euxine, or Black Sea, q.v.). In Oth. iii. 3.453, Othello says, "Like to the Pontic Sea Whose icy current and compulsive course Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on To the Propontic and the Hellespont, E'en so my bloody thoughts shall ne'er look back." The immense quantity of water received by the Black Sea from the rivers that flow into it causes a constant westward current through the Dardanelles. Pliny

(Holland's translation) says, "The sea Pontus evermore runneth out into Propontis, but the sea never retireth back again within Pontus." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 37, says that Parus "built Nausicle by the Pontick shore."

PONT NEUF. In spite of its name the oldest bidge. over the Seine in Paris. It crosses the river at the N.W. end of the Ile de la Cité, and was built by Henri IV, whose statue stands on the embankment close by. It was begun in 1578, but not finished till 1604. It was notorious in the old days as the gathering-place of all the riff-raff of the city. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 227, the Londoner says to the Parisian, "You must needs acknowledge the famous dangers of Pont Neuf, where robbery is as constant a trade as amongst the Arabs." Montaigne, writing in 1580, says (Florio's Trans. 1603, ii. 6), "Fortune hath much spited me, to hinder the structure and break off the finishing of our new-bridge in our great city."

PONTOISE. A town in France at the junction of the Viosne and the Oise, 18 m. N. of Paris. In World Child 170, Manhood claims to have conquered as a knight, "Picardy and Pontoise and gentle Artois." The reference may be to the campaign of Edward III in 1346, when he advanced almost to the gates of Paris. In Skelton's Magnificence, fo. v., Fancy, who has brought a letter, says it was delivered to him "at Pountesse," where he was arrested as a spy and had great difficulty in making his escape.

PONTREMOLI. A city in N. Italy, 35 m. S.W. of Parma at the foot of the Apennines. It is a walled town and the seat of a Bp. In Barnes' Charter i. 1, Charles says to Montpansier, "March with your regiments to Pontremoli. There shall you find the Swiss with their artillery newly by sea brought to Spetia." Spezia is 20 m. due S. of Pontremoli. In i. 4, Alexander allots to Cæsar Borgia, "In Romania from Pontremolie and Prato to fair Florence."

PONT ROUGE. A bidge. over the Seine in Paris, built in 1627 to connect the Ile de la Cité and the Ile St. Louis. In order to avoid the Canons' Garden it turned in the river and ran for some distance parallel to the bank as far as the steps leading to the Hotel de Ville. It was made of wood and painted red: hence the name. It was swept away by a flood in 1790. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 223, the Londoner says to the Parisian, "I will pass into your Fauxbourgs by Pont Rouge, a bidge. built to show the strength of your river."

PONTUS (Pc. = Pontic). A dist. in Asia Minor on the S. coast of the Pontus or Black Sea, and extending from the Halys on the W. to the Phasis on the E. It was a satrapy of the Persian Empire, but in 363 B.C. the satrap Ariobarzanes assumed the title of King. He was succeeded by a number of kings, most of whom were called Mithridates. Of these the last and most famous was Mithridates VI (120-63 B.C.). He extended his power over the greater part of Asia Minor, but having come into conflict with Rome he was defeated first by Sulla 85 B.C. and then by Pompeius 65 B.C., when P. was made into a Roman province. In 36 B.C. Antonius made Polemon K. of the central part of the country, and his descendants continued to be called Kings of P. till A.D. 63, when it was finally absorbed into the Roman Empire.

In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, Byron refers to the conquest by Pompey of "Armenia, P., and Arabia." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 1, Discord says, "Asia field And conquered P. sing his lasting praise, Great Pompey." In Tiberius 836, Tiberius addresses Armenia: "Are all the stripes that strong Lucullus gave unto thy neighbour P. and thyself Quite healed up?" Lucullus prepared the way for Pompeius by his victories over Mithridates in 72 B.C. Milton, P. R. iii. 36, says, "Young Pompey quelled The P. K." But Pompey was 44 at that time. In B. & F. False One i. 1, Labienus, describing the battle of Pharsalia, says, "Pc., Punic, and Assyrian blood Made up one crimson lake." The East-supported Pompey in his war against Caesar. In Shirley's Honorio ii. 2, Honorio says, "Does he not look like mighty Julius bringing home the wealthy spoils of Egypt, P., and Africa?" In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline asks, "Was I marked out for the repulse Of her no-voice, when I stood candidate To be commander in the P. war?" The reference is to Catiline's rejection when he was candidate for the consulship in 65 B.C. In Ant. iii. 6, 72, "the K. of Pont" is mentioned as one of the allies of Antony. This was the Polemon whom Antony made K. of P. in 36 B.C. The K. of P. is one of the characters in Massinger's Virgin. In Tiberius 2475, Sejanus says, "Did not Mithridates, P. king, Forgive Phraates his rebellious son?" Pharnaces (not Phraates), the son of Mithridates VI, conspired against him in 63 B.C.: his fellow-conspirators were put to death, but Pharnaces was spared by his father.

Possibly through the story of Mithridates of P. having made himself immune to poisons by the quite modern method of taking small doses of them, P. was supposed to be specially productive of poisons. In Nabbes' Hannibal iii. 4, Massanissa says that a tear of Sophonisba's "Hath in 't sufficient virtue to convert All the Thessalian, Pc., Phasian aconites Into preservatives." In Microcosmus iii., Bellanima speaks of an air breathing perfumes "no Persian aromats, Pc. amomus, or Indian balsam can imitate." Amomum is a somewhat indeterminate kind of spice. Later on in the next act, Temperance mentions "Pc. nuts" amongst table delicacies: they were reputed the best sort of filberts.

PONTUS (used for the P. EUXINUS, or BLACK S., q.v.). Milton, P. L. v. 340, says that Eden produced all the fruits "Whatever Earth, all-bearing mother, yields In India E. or W., or middle shore In P. or the Punic coast." In ix. 77, Satan surveys the earth "From Eden over P. and the pool Maotic." In P. R. ii. 347, Satan provides for our Lord's banquet "All fish . . . of shell or fin And exquisitest name, for which was drained P., and Lucrine Bay, and Afric coast." The middle shore of the P. was famous for its fruit and nut trees: the cherry came thence, and the best filberts were known as "Pontic nuts"; and the sea was plentiful in fish. In Mason's Mulleasses 2099, Timoclea says, "Nor was the diadem of the Pontic q. Made as a fatal instrument of death, And yet it was the engine stopped her breath." The reference seems to be to the poisoned coronet sent by Medea, "the Pontick q.," to her rival Glauce, or Creusa, the daughter of the K. of Thebes. But it was the instrument of Glauce's death, not of her own.

PONT VALERIO. In Jonson's Case v. 1, Angelo tells Rachel, who is at Milan, that her lover Ferneze "is returned from war, lingers at P. V.," and has sent for her to meet him there. A horse is provided for her, and Angelo promises "At P. V. thou thy love shalt see." In scene 3 Rachel and Angelo are discovered "in the open country." P. V. is therefore a town within riding distance of Milan on some river, as the name implies, and on the way from Vicenza, where the war seems to be going on. I cannot find any P. V., but Valeggio answers the conditions pretty closely. It is on the Mincio, abt. 75 m. E. of Milan, on the way to Vicenza. There was a fortified bidge. there, connecting it with Borghetto, which was built in 1393. It is an important military position commanding the passage of the Mincio. Hence I would suggest that V. is a mistake for Valeggio; unless, indeed, it is a purely imaginary place.

POOL, THE. The part of the Thames between Lond. Edge. and Limehouse Point. In Massinger's Madam i. 1, Goldwire says, "The ship is safe in the Pool then." In Prodigal i. 1, Flowerdale asks, of his ship the Catharine and Hugh, "What, is't in the P. can you tell?"

POOLE'S HOLE. A cavern near Buxton in N. Derbyshire, so called from an outlaw of that name who made it his residence. It was reckoned the first of the 7 Wonders of the Peak. In Jonson's Love's Welcome it is mentioned as one of "the written or reported wonders of the Peak."

POOVIES' BUILDINGS. Possibly Powis House is meant at the N.W. corner of Lincoln's Inn Fields in Gt. Queen St., Lond. In Middleton's Trick to Catch iii. 4, Dampit says, "In anno '89 when the great thundering and lightning was, I prayed heartily then to overthrow Poovies' new buildings."

POPE'S HEAD ALLEY. A lane in Lond. running S. from 18 Cornhill to Lombard St. At its corner in Cornhill was the P. H. Tavern, which is mentioned as early as 1464, and may have been part of K. John's Palace; at all events it had on its walls the arms of England quartered with those of France. In 1615 the tavern was left by Sir William Craven to the Merchant Taylors, and they still draw the rents of the houses built on the site. The tavern itself existed until 1756. The A. was occupied early in the 17th cent. by booksellers' shops, and a large number of pamphlets was issued from it. In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas says "I am old Gregory Christmas still, and though I come out of P. H. A., as good a Protestant as any in the parish." In Vulcan, Jonson dedicates to him "Capt. Pamphlet's horse and foot that sally Upon the Exchange still, out of P. H. A." In T. Heywood's J. K. M., B 268, Gresham says "Let's step in to the P. H.: we shall be dropping dry if we stay here." In the same play, B 272, Quicke says "We'll arrest him to the P. H. call for the best cheer in the house, first feed upon him, and then, if he will not come off, carry him to the Computer."

Larum was "Printed for William Ferbrand and are to be sold at his shop in Popes-h. A. over against the Tavern door, near the Royal Exchange. 1602." Machin's Dumb Knight was "Printed by Nicholas Okes for John Bache and are to be sold at his shop in P.-h. Palace, near to the Royal Exchange. 1608." Ev. Woman I. was "Printed for E. A. by Thomas Archer and are to be sold at his shop in the P.-h.-palace near the Royal Exchange. 1609." Middleton's R. G. has also Thomas Archer's imprint at P.-h.-palace. 1611. Webster's Wyat (1607) and White Devil (1612) were published at the same place.

POPPERING (POPERINGHE). A town in W. Flanders, 7 m. W. of Ypres. It gave its name to a variety of pear that was grown there. The Hero of Chaucer's Tale of Sir Thopas was born "at Poperyng, in the place." In R. & J. ii. 1, 38, Mercutio says of Rosaline: "O, Romeo, that she were an open etcetera, thou a poperin pear." The joke, such as it is, depends on the popular name for the medlar, and the double entendre in poperin.

PORCHMOUTH

In Ev. Wom. I. iv. 1, we have: "No plums nor no parsnips, no pears nor no Popperins." In Tourneur's Atheist iv. 1, Sebastian speaks of "a popping pear tree growing upon the bank of a river." In W. Rowley's New Wonder, one says, "I requested him to pull me a Katherine pear, and, had I not looked to him, he would have mistook and given me a Popperin."

PORCHMOUTH (the old spelling of PORTSMOUTH, q.v.).

PORTA DI VOLANE. A town on the W. coast of the Adriatic Sea at the mouth of the Po di Volano, 30 m. due E. of Ferrara. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander allots to the D. of Candy "all the signories in Lombardy From Porta di Volane to Savona."

PORTER'S HALL. A building in the precinct of Blackfriars, near Puddlewharf, also called LADY SAUNDERS HOUSE. Rosseter got a licence to turn it into a playhouse in 1615. After much difficulty he managed to get it opened in 1617, when the players from the Hope came over and performed Field's Amends. But an order from the Privy Council almost immediately directed that it should be dismantled, and this was the end of the venture.

PORT LE BLANC. Stated in R2 ii. 1, 277, to have been the starting-point of Bolingbroke's expedition to recover his estates in England. It is called there "a bay in Brittany." The authority for the statement is Holinshed, who appears to have followed Les grands croniques de Bretagne (1514). It is said that there was a port of this name on the N. coast of Brittany near Treguier. It is pretty certain, however, that Henry started from Vannes in the bay of Morbihan in Lower Brittany, and Marshall has suggested that Port Le Blanc is a mistake for Morbihan.

PORT PHEASANT. A harbour discovered by Drake in July, 1571, and named by him P.P. from the number of these birds that he found there. It is the modern Puerto Escondido, on the E. side of the Bay of Campeachy in the Gulf of Mexico, abt. 100 m. S. of Campeachy. In Davenant's Playhouse the scene of Act iii. is thus described: "A harbour is discerned which was first discovered by Sir F. Drake and called by him P. P."

PORT REAL (PUERTO REAL). A spt. on the harbour of Cadiz in the S.W. of Spain, 5 m. E. of Cadiz. In Devonshire ii. 1, a soldier reports: "Don Bustament and all his company are put over to Port Real upon the mainland because they shall not succour the city," viz. Cadiz.

PORTSMOUTH. A spt. and naval station in Hants. opposite the E. end of the Isle of Wight, 74 m. S.W. of Lond. It was a naval station of some importance at the beginning of the 13th cent., but its value as a national dockyard was first properly recognized about the middle of the 16th cent. It now includes Landport, Portsea, and Southsea. It was here that Buckingham was assassinated in 1628. The harbour is one of the best in the United Kingdom. In Three Ladies ii., Lucre mentions "Porchmouth" as one of the towns where she has infinite numbers that "great rents upon little room do bestow" on account of the great resort thither of traders. In Wilson's Pedler 376, the Pedler tells of a great monster "in breadth from Donwiche to Porchmouth." In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant says, "Spanish galliasses, being great with gold, were all delivered at Plymouth, P., and other English havens."

PORTUA. See OPORTO.

PORTUGAL (often spelt PORTINGALE. Pse. = Portuguese, Ple. = Portingale). The country on the W. coast of the Iberian peninsula, S. of Galicia. Its own writers call it Lusitania, but that Roman province included far more than P. The founder of the kingdom of P. was Alfonso Henriques (1112-1185), the Count of Portucale, or Portus Cale (Gaya, the port of Oporto). In the famous battle of Orik in 1139, he routed the Moors, and his exploits were a favourite theme of the chivalrous romances of the Middle Ages. During the latter part of the 15th cent. and the early part of the 16th the Pse. took the lead in exploration and colonization: in 1486 Bartholomew Dias rounded the Cape of Good Hope, and later Vasco da Gama got to India by that route and founded the Pse. dominion there. Large numbers of Pse. emigrated to Madeira and Brazil. The young K. Don Sebastian attempted the subjugation of the Moors in Africa, but was defeated and slain at the battle of Alcazar in 1578. Philip II of Spain then claimed the crown of P., and it was united to the Spanish kingdom until 1640, when the house of Braganza was restored to the throne.

General Allusions. Hycke, p. 88, boasts to have been "in Spayne, Portyngale, Sevyll, also in Almayne." In Horestes D. 3, the Vice says to Fame, "Whither dost thou think for to go? to purgatory or to Spayne? to Venys, to Pourtugaul, or to the isles Canarey?" In B. & F. Custom ii. 4, Donna Guionar says to Rutilio, "If you were 10,000 times a Spaniard, the nation We Ps. most hate, I yet would save you."

Allusions to the History. In Nero v. 1, Tigellinus reports: "Spain's revolted, Ple. hath joined." The reference is to the proclamation of Galba as Emperor in Spain in A.D. 68, but, of course, there was no such name as P. then: Lusitania is intended. In B. & F. Pestle i. 3, Ralph reads from the romance of Palmerin of England, "I wonder why the kings do not raise an army as big as the army that the Prince of Portigo brought against Rosicleer"; and the citizen's wife comments, "They say the K. of P. cannot sit at his meat but the giants and the ettins will come and snatch it from him." In Span. Trag. i., Hieronimo says, "English Robert, Earl of Gloucester . . . when K. Stephen bore sway in Albion, Arrived . . . In Ple. and . . . Enforced the k., then but a Saracen, To bear the yoke of the English monarchy." The reference is to the capture of Lisbon in 1147 from the Moors, in which some English Crusaders took part, but Robert of Gloucester was certainly not there. He goes on: "Edmund, Earl of Kent, in Albion, When English Richd. wore the diadem came likewise and razed Lisbon walls And took the K. of Ple. in fight." The Earl of Kent made an expedition to P. in 1381 to help the K. against the Spaniards, but the K. played him false, and he returned to England in 1382. The background of Jeronimo and the Span. Trag. is a war between Spain and P. in which Balthazar, the Prince of P., is defeated and ultimately murdered. The supposed date is subsequent to the conquest of Rhodes by Solymán, as is shown in Act v. of the Tragedy; therefore during the reign of John III; but the details are quite unhistorical. According to T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 335, "12 mighty galleons of P." were part of the Spanish Armada. In Kyd's Soliman i., Brusor says, "I have marched conqueror through Asia Along the coasts held by the Portuiguize." The Pse. had settlements along the Malabar Coast from Goa, through Cochin and Calicut to Colombo in Ceylon.

The expedition of Sebastian against the Moors had special interest for the English because of the part played in it by Thomas Stukeley. It formed the subject of Peele's Alcazar and of Stucley. In the latter (1544)

Philip of Spain expresses the desire, which he afterwards realized, that "Portugal and fruitful Castille had been the subject of one sceptre." In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Byron says, "Spain, When the hot scuffles of barbarian arms smothered the life of Don Sebastian . . . Gave for a slaughtered body, held for his, 100,000 crowns; caused all the state Of superstitious P. to mourn . . . And all made with the carcass of a Switzer." No fewer than 4 impostors appeared claiming to be Don Sebastian. The most important was Gabriel Espinosa, who was executed in 1594, and is probably the one referred to here. In Wit S. W. i. 2, Sir Ruinous says, "The first that fleshed me a soldier was that great battle at Alcazar in Barbary, where that royal P. Sebastian ended his untimely days." He goes on to speak of the rumour that Sebastian was still alive. The scene of T. Heywood's Challenge is laid in P. during the reign of Sebastian. In Dekker's Northward iv. 4, the Bawd says, "I was a dapper rogue in Ple. voyage"; and in his Hornbook v. he advises the Gull, "If you be a soldier, talk how often you have been in action; as the Ple. voyage." Nash, in Saffron Walden Q. 4, advises Chute, "Ever remember thy P. voyage under Don Anthonio." This was an expedition sent in 1589 under Drake and Norris to help the Prior of Crato, who was a claimant to the throne against Philip II, but it accomplished nothing. The scene of B. & F. Princess is laid in Tidore, one of the Pse. possessions in the E. Indies, and the actors are mostly "Ps." The Amazons in their Sea Voyage are "women of P." who have fled to a desert island to escape "the cursed society of men": the husband of one of them is called Sebastian. In Shirley's Ct. Secret, one of the characters is Antonio, "a Prince of P." B. & F. Four Plays in One states in the Induction that it was presented at the marriage of K. Emmanuel of P. to the Infanta Isabella of Castile in 1497.

The Pse. had the reputation of being good riders. In B. & F. Princess i. 1, Piniero speaks of the pleasure "we Ps. or the Spaniards [take] in riding, in managing a great horse, which is princely." Heylyn says of the Pse.: "They are of more plain and simple behaviour than the rest of Spain, and none of the wisest. They have a natural antipathy to the Spaniards. They are excellent seafaring men and happy in foreign discoveries." P. produced good wines: port takes its name from Oporto. In Bale's Johan 268, Dissimulation says, "A better drink is not in P. or Spain." The spices from the Pse. Indies produced exquisite perfumes. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 217, the Parisian says [in comparison with tobacco] "your sea-coal smoke seems a very P. perfume." A p. posset seems to have been some kind of stimulating soup. In B. & F. Thomas iii. 1, Thomas says, "Hang up your juleps and your P. possets: give me sack." Grain of P. is used by Chaucer (B. 4649) for cochineal.

P. gave the name to the Portague, a gold coin, otherwise known as the great crusado, of the value of from £3 to £5. They were fine coins, and were often preserved as keepsakes or transmitted as heirlooms. In Jonson's Alchemist i. 3, Druggier says, on being asked if he has any gold about him, "Yes, I have a portague I ha' kept this half year." In Lupton's All for Money D. 3, Nichol says, "Here is a dozen Portagewes if you will help me." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Hodge says, "Here be the Pse. to give earnest." In B. & F. Rule a Wife v. 5, Altea says, "He has given my lady a whole load of portugues." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 1, Cable tells of "2 strangers each with a bag of Portugez under his left arm."

In Spenser's Mother Hubbard 212, the Ape is dressed as a soldier: "His breeches were made after the new cut, Al Portuguese, loose like an empty gut." In Deloney's Craft ii. 6, the shoemaker says, "Our best cork comes from P." In B. & F. Princess v. 3, a townsman says, "Are these the P. bulls? How loud they bellow!" Further on in the scene another says, "If I come in again . . . I will give 'em leave To cram me with a P. pudding": meaning in this case a cannon ball.

PORTUGAL, BAY OF. The sea off the coast of P. between Oporto and the Cape of Cintra. The water is very deep, attaining 1400 fathoms within 40 m. of the coast. In As iv. 1, 213, Rosalind says, "My affection hath an unknown bottom like the B. of P." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine says that his fleets shall "keep in awe the b. of Portingale And all the ocean by the British shore." In T. Heywood's Captives i. 3, the clown says there are "more vessels than were able to fill the huge great B. of Portingall." In Massinger's Very Woman iii. 5, Antonio says, "'Tis strong, strong wine. Here's that will work as high as the B. of P."

POTTER'S HIVE. The name at first given to the S. side of Lincoln's Inn Fields, built in 1657. A theatre was opened here in 1662 on a part of the present site of the College of Surgeons. It was occupied by the Duke's Company under Sir William Davenant, who lodged in the Row. In Playhouse, Epil. Davenant says, "Therefore be pleased to think that you are all Behind the R. which men call P." In i. the Housekeeper says of one of the applicants: "He would hire the throne of our Solymán the Magnificent and reign over all the dominions in P. R."

POTTER'S HIVE (corruption of P. HYTHE; another name for QUEEN HYTHE, q.v.). In Peele's Ed. I part of the contents of the play is described on the title-page as "The sinking of Q. Elinor who sunk at Charing Cross and rose again at Potters hith, now named Queen hith." The scene was enacted on the stage, and a Potter and his wife are introduced, no doubt to account for the name which is not otherwise attested. When the Q. rises up the Potter's wife says, "It is the Q. that chafes thus, who sunk this day on Charing Green and now is risen up on P. H."

POULES, SAINT. See PAUL'S (SAINT).

POULTNEY. See LAWRENCE (ST.) POULTNEY.

POULTRY, THE. A st. in Lond. connecting Cheapside and Cornhill. It was so called from the poulterers who had their stalls there. The Rose Tavern, afterwards The King's Head, stood at the corner of the Stocks Market, near the present site of the Mansion House. St. Mildred's Ch. was on the N. side on the site now occupied by the Gresham Life Assurance Society. One of the two City Compters was in the P., the other being in Wood St. It stood 4 houses W. of St. Mildred's, a little E. of Grocers' Hall Court, and was approached from Chapel Place. It was partially concealed by houses in front of it, as the quotation from The Puritan shows. The site was afterwards occupied by the P. Chapel—the precursor of the City Temple. Middleton's Blurt was "Printed for Henry Rocytt and are to be sold at the long shop under St. Mildred's ch. in the P. 1602." Like was "Imprinted at the long shop adjoining unto St. Mildred's Ch. in the Pultrie by John Allde. 1568."

In Shirley's Love Maze iii. 3, Lady Bird says, "Go to Master Kite that lives i' the P." Probably a play on the words is intended. In The Puritan iii. 4, Puttock says,

"These maps are pretty painted things; they say all the world's in one of them, but I could ne'er find the Counter in the Poultry." "I think so," says Raven, "how could you find it? for you know it stands behind the houses." Gascoigne, in Steel Glass, says, "These merchants read arithmetic once every day In Wood St., Bread-St., and in Poultry, Where such schoolmasters . . . keep their birds full close in catliff's cage." Nash, in Prognostication, says, "The stones in Cheapside should be so hot that divers persons should fear to go from Poules to the Counter in the P." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii. 1, Ilford says, "I, Frank Ilford, was inforced from the Mitre in Bread St. to the Compter in the P." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Dapper says, "Was it your Meg of Westminster's courage that rescued me from the P. puttocks?" i.e. the serjeants. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii., Tim, being told that Capt. Carvegut was a serjeant, asks, "Of the P. or of Wood-st.?" In Middleton's Phenix iv. 3, the Officer says, "In Lond. stand 2 most famous Universities, P. and Wood St., where some have taken all their degrees from the Master's side down to the Mistress' side, the Hole." In W. Rowley's New Wonder iv., the Clown says, "Do you not smell P. ware, Sir Godfrey?" i.e. officers from the P. In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 3, Shortyard speaks of "the two city hazards, P. and Wood St." Taylor, in Works i. 91, says, "The ocean that Surety-ship sails in is the spacious Marshalsea: sometimes she anchors at Wood st. harbour, and sometimes at the P. harbour." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says of thieves: "P.-ware are more churlishly handled by them than poor prisoners are by keepers in the Counter i' the P." Middleton, in Hubbard, p. 52, says to the poetaster, "They have plotted to set one of the sergeants of Poetry, or rather, the P., to claw you by the back." Dekker, in Hornbook vi., says that if the Gull sits amongst the crowd in the theatre "the proportion of your body is in more danger to be devoured than if it were served up in the Counter amongst the P." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. i., a Prentice says, "I'll but drink a cup of wine with a customer at the Rose and Crown in the P. and come again presently." In Nabbes' Spring, Shrovetide says, "Thou art a prodigal Christmas, and Shrovetide hath seen thee many times in the P.": where the pun is obvious.

POUNTESS. See PONTOISE.

POWES, or POWYS. One of the 3 principalities into which Wales was divided before its union under Howel Dda in the 10th cent. It included parts of Montgomery, Shropsh., and Radnor. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iv. 1, 303, Barnaby says that Sir Hugh is "a Welch Prince, and son to the K. of Powes in S. Wales."

POYCTIERS, POYTEERES. See POICTIERS.

POYLE, PUGLIA (the ancient APULIA). A province on the S.E. coast of Italy between the Apennines and the Adriatic. In Hycke, p. 88, the hero boasts that he has been in "Calabre, Poyle, and Erragoyne."

PRADO. The boulevard running N. and S. on the E. side of Madrid. It is the fashionable promenade of the city. Properly the P. is the meadow and indicates the whole quarter. In Middleton's Gipsy i. 4, Louis says to Diego, "Walk thou the st. that leads about the P.; I'll round the W. part of the city." In Sir W. Raleigh's Ghost (1626), it is said that Gondomar "caused his attendants to bring him in his litter to the Prada, near unto the city of Madrid, being a place of recreation and pleasure for the nobility and gallantry of Spain."

PRÆNESTE (now PALESTRINA). An ancient city of Latium in Italy on a spur of the Apennines, 23 m. E. of Rome. It possessed a famous shrine of Fortune, where oracular answers known as Sortes Prænestinae were delivered. In Jonson's Catiline iv. 2, Cicero says to Catiline, "Hadst thou not hope beside, By a surprise by night to take Præneste?"

PRÆTORIAN CAMP. The barracks of the P. Guard at Rome. It lay on the E. of the city E. of the Viminal Hill, and was 500 by 400 ft. It was first constructed by Tiberius, and the 10 cohorts of picked men who occupied it were at once the strength and the menace of the Emperors. In May's Agrippina i. 538, Agrippina says to Cæsar, "Your strongest guard is the P. Camp."

PRAGUE. The capital of Bohemia on the Moldau, 150 m. N.W. of Vienna. During the reign of Charles IV (1346-1378) it became one of the most important towns in Germany, and its famous University was founded by him. Under the influence of John Huss and Jerome of Prague it became the centre of the reforming movement that led to the Hussite wars of the 15th cent. The Josephstadt was one of the most ancient Jewish quarters in Europe. On the Hradschin, or Castle Hill, stands the Imperial Palace, said to have been founded by the Princess Libussa. In the 16th cent. Copernicus and Tycho Brahe made their home in P., and the latter is buried in the Teyn Ch. in the Old Town. In Tw. N. iv. 2, 15, the Clown says, "The old hermit of P. that never saw pen and ink very wittily said to a niece of K. Gorboduc, 'That that is is.'" Douce identifies this hermit with a certain Jerome, born at P., who was called the hermit of Camaldoli in Tuscany, but the reference to Gorboduc is mere nonsense. In Bale's Johan 259, England says, "It is true as God spake with the Ape at Praga," i.e. it is a foolish lie. In Davenport's New Trick iii. 1, Friar John speaks of "P. in Germany while [? where] the Emperor's Court Lies for the most part." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii., Carvegut says that he served last "at the battle of P." This was the battle of 1620, in which the Elector Palatine was decisively defeated.

PRATO. A town in N. Italy, 15 m. N.W. of Florence on the way to Pistoia. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander allots to Cæsar "in Romania, from Pontremolie and P. to fair Florence."

PRICKINGHAM. An imaginary place, the name indicating perhaps that the prior was as fond of hunting as Chaucer's Monk. In Republica iii. 6, Avarice says, "If e'er I bestow them it shall be the next Lent To the Prior of P. and his covent."

PRINCE'S ARMS. A bookseller's sign in Lond. There was a P. A. in Chancery Lane, which was probably transferred from the P. A. over Inner Temple Gate at No. 17 Fleet St. in 1610, when the Gate was rased. At all events the old P. A. was the sign at which Thomas Marsh published Stow's Chronicles, whilst Middleton's Quiet Life was "Printed by Tho. Johnson for Francis Kirkman and Henry Marsh and are to be sold at the P. A. in Chancery Lane. 1662." Merlin has the same imprint. There was another P. A. in St. Paul's Churchyard. Shirley's Poems were "Printed for Humphrey Moseley and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the Princes Armes in St. Pauls Church-yard. 1646." Middleton's No Wit has the same imprint in 1657. Webster, in Monuments, speaks of the P. A. as "the Three Feathers," i.e. the 3 ostrich feathers which are still the cognizance of the Prince of Wales.

PRINTERS PRESS. A bookseller's sign in Fleet Lane, Lond. Tournour's Revenger was "Printed by G. Eld and are to be sold at his house in Fleete-lane at the sign of the Printers-press. 1607."

PRINTING PRESS. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond. May's Old Couple was "Printed by J. Cottrel for Samuel Speed at the sign of the P. P. in St. Paul's Churchyard. 1658."

PROCURATORIA. A building at Venice for the accommodation of the Procuratori of San Marco. The Procuratorie Vecchie was erected on the N. side of the Piazza di San Marco in 1517, and stands on a portico of 50 arches: the Procuratorie Nuove was added on the S. side of the Piazza in 1584. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Volpone, disguised as a travelling quack, says, "It may seem strange that I, your Scoto Mantuano, who was ever wont to fix my bank in the face of the public Piazza, near the shelter of the Portico to the P., should now humbly retire myself into an obscure nook of the Piazza."

PROMISED LAND. Palestine, because it was promised to Abraham and his descendants (see Gen. xii. 7: Hebrews xi. 9). Milton, P. L. iii. 531, calls it "the P. L. to God so dear." In xii. 172, he speaks of the return of Israel from Egypt "back to their p. l." In P. R. iii. 157, Satan speaks of "Judea now and all the P. L. Reduced a province under Roman yoke." In 438, our Lord recalls the dividing of the Red Sea and the Jordan "When to the P. L. their fathers passed."

PROPONTIC. The sea of Marmora, lying between the Bosporus and the Dardanelles. In Oth. iii. 3, 453, Othello says, "The Pontic sea . . . Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on To the P. and the Hellespont." Holland, in trans. of Pliny's Nat. Hist., published in 1601, says, "The sea Pontus evermore floweth and runneth out into Propontis."

PROVENÇE. A province in the extreme S.E. of France, the capital of which was Marseilles. It was the old Roman Provincia Gallica, but after the subjugation of the whole of Gaul it was distinguished as Gallia Narbonensis. After the division of the Carolingian Empire it was governed by independent princes until the end of the 12th cent., when it became connected with the Arragonese kingdom of Naples. In 1486 it was united to the kingdom of France by Louis XI. Its language, known as the Langue d'Oc, reached its highest development in the 12th cent., when it became the vehicle of an extensive literature, including the poems of the Troubadours. In Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, Janin says, "The sea-army, now prepared at Naples, Hath an intended enterprise on Provence." In Davenant's Wits ii. 1, Engine says, "They'll feast with rich Provençal wines."

PROVINCES, UNITED. The 7 P. of Holland formed into a league by the Union of Utrecht in 1579 under the presidency of William the Stadtholder. In Barnavelt iv. 5, William charges Barnavelt with trying to "break the union and holy league between the P." In Puritan iii. 2, Nicholas says of Capt. Ydle: "He has travelled all the world o'er, he, and been in the seven and twenty Ps." This is a slight exaggeration, as there were only 17 of them, including the 7 U. P. and the rest.

PROVINS. A town in France in the department of Seine et Marne, 45 m. S.E. of Paris. It was, and is, famous for its roses, which were said to have been introduced by the Crusaders. The Rose de P., or Rosa Provincialis, is a species of Damask Rose. It was sometimes by a natural confusion called the Provence Rose, but it has nothing to do with Provence. In Ham. iii. 2, 288, Hamlet says, after the abrupt conclusion of the play within the play, "Would not this and a forest of feathers with two Provincial roses on my razed shoes get me a fellowship in a cry of players?" The reference is to the rosettes worn on the front of their shoes by actors. In Ford's Heart i. 2, Calantha says to Ithocles, "I myself with mine own hands have wrought, To crown thy temples, this Provincial garland."

PRUSSIA. Originally the E. part of what to 1918 was the kingdom of P., stretching along the coast of the Baltic from the Vistula to the Memel. The inhabitants were akin to the neighbouring Lithuanians. It was conquered and partly Christianized by the Teutonic knights in the 1st half of the 13th cent. In the early part of the 15th cent. the people expelled the Teutonic Knights and allied themselves with Poland. In 1511 the Knights chose Albert of Hohenzollern as their Grand Master, and in 1525 he established a secular and independent Duchy in P. In 1618 it passed into the hands of Johann Sigismund, the Elector of Brandenburg, and to 1918 was governed by the princes of that house. Chaucer's Knight (C. T. A. 53), "Ful ofte tyme hade the bord bigonne Aboven alle nacions in Pruce." In A. 2122, Palamon's knights are some of them armed with "a Pruce sheeld." In Piers C. vii. 279, Arveric says that he has often sent his apprentice "into Prus my profit to awaite." In Chettle's Hoffman, one of the characters is Ferdinand, lord of Pomer and D. of P. In B. 3 he is called "Duke of Brusia": an obvious misprint. In Bale's Johan 182, Sediton says, "I am the Pope's Ambassador in Pole, Spruse, and Berne." These were all Protestant countries at the time. Heylyn (s.v. P.) says that the Teutonic knights "found the Prussians to be tough meat, and neither easily chewed nor quickly digested."

PUCKERIDGE. A vill. in Herts., 23 m. N. of Lond. and about 6 m. N. of Ware. In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Bellamont says, "He very politickly imagines that your wife is rode to P., 5 miles further [than Ware]; either at P. or Wade's Mill, saith he, you shall find them." In B. & F. Pestle ii. 7, the Citizen thinks that Jasper, who has run off with Luce from Waltham, "is at P. with her by this." P. is some 16 m. N. of Waltham.

PUDDING LANE. Lond., running S. from the W. end of Eastcheap to Lower Thames St. It was formerly called Rother Lane, but got its later appellation from the "puddings" and other offal of the beasts slaughtered by the butchers in Eastcheap, which ran down the st. to the Thames. The Gt. Fire began in the house of Farryner, the K.'s baker, on the E. side of the L., on 22nd Sept. 1666, and the fact was long commemorated by a wall-tablet on the front of No. 25, which was built on its site. It is now preserved in the Guildhall Museum. It was noted as a curious fact that the fire began in P. L. and ended at Pie Corner in Smithfield. In Fam. Vict. i. 2, Lawrence says, "I think it best that my neighbour, Robin Pewterer, went to P. L. end, and we will watch here at Billingsgate Ward." In Jonson's Christmas, Venus says, "I am Cupid's mother: I dwell in P. L.; ay, forsooth, he is prentice in Love-l., which is close by. In Dekker's Northward i. 2, Philip, when arrested, says, "Come, sergeant, I'll step to mine uncle, not far off, hereby in P. L., and he shall bail me." In B. & F. Thomas iv. 2, the servant asks Thomas, "Did you not take 2 wenches from the watch, too, and put 'em into P. L.?"

PUDDLE-WHARF, or PUDDLE-DOCK. A landing-place on the N. bank of the Thames at the foot of St.

Andrew's Hill, abt. 100 yards W. of Baynard's Castle. Stow gives us a choice of derivations: either from one P. who kept a wharf there, or from the p. that was made by the watering of horses at this spot: probably the latter guess is correct. Shakespeare had a house "abutting upon a st. leading down to P. W. on the E. part, right against the King's Majesty's Wardrobe." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Littlewit says that in his motion of Hero and Leander he makes Leander "a dyer's son about P.-w." Leatherhead says, "He yet serves his father, a dyer at P.-w." In B. & F. Pestle ii. 6, the Citizen's Wife reminds her husband how their child "was strayed almost alone to P. W., and there it had drowned itself but for a sculler." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 2, Tim says, when his sister has eloped, "My mother's gone to lay the common stairs At P.-w., and at the dock below Stands my poor silly father." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv., Jarvis tells of a plot to carry Mrs. Coote "down to the water side, pop her in at P.-dock, and carry her to Gravesend in a pair of oars." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 217, the Parisian says, "I will put to shore again, though I should be constrained, even without my galoshes, to land at P.-dock." Sidney, in Remedy for Love, mocks at Mopsa "with her p.-dock, Her compound or electuary Made of old ling and young Canary" and other unsavoury meats and drinks.

PULCHRE'S, SAINT (a popular shortened form of SEPULCHRE'S, q.v.). A ch. in Lond. at the W. end of Newgate St. In Jonson's Devil v. 5, Shackles tells how Pug has blown down part of the prison at Newgate and "left such an infernal stink and steam behind you cannot see St. P. steeple yet." In Epicoene iv. 2, Truewill tells Daw that Sir Amorous was so well armed "you would think he meant to murder all St. P. Parish."

PULTERY. See POULTRY.

PUNIC (properly speaking, PHENICIAN, but is always applied specifically to CARTHAGE, q.v.). The Romans accused the Carthaginians of treachery: hence P. faith means perfidy. In Marlowe's Dido i., Venus says of Carthage: "It is the P. kingdom, rich and strong." In B. & F. False One i. 1, Labienus says of the battle of Pharsalia: "Pontic, P., and Assyrian blood Made up one crimson lake." Milton, P. R. iii. 102, recalls how "young African for fame His wasted country freed from P. rage." African is Scipio Africanus Major, who after the successes of Hannibal in Italy went over to Africa and totally defeated Hannibal at Zama 202 B.C. when he was 33 years of age. In Massinger's Believe ii. 2, Amilcar says, "Though the P. faith is branded by our enemies, our confederates and friends found it as firm as fate." In Florio's Montaigne i. 5, "Roman proceedings" are contrasted with "P. wiles." Milton, P. L. v. 340, says that Eden yielded "Whatever Earth . . . yields In Pontus or the P. coast." Carthage was specially famous for its figs.

PUNTALL (more fully PUNTALLANA). The chief town of Palma in the Canary Islands. In Devonshire iv. 3, Macada asks Dick, "Why did not your good navy, as it took Puntall, seize Cales?"

PUR ALLEY (probably PURS COURT on the E. side of Old Change, near Cheapside, Lond.). In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas sings: "Now Post and Pair, Old Christmas's heir, Doth make a jingling sally; And wot you who, 'tis one Of my two Sons, cardmakers in Pur-alley."

PURPOOLE, or PORTPOOL. The name of the piece of land in Lond. on which Gray's Inn stands (see under GRAY'S INN). The Lord of Misrule at the Gray's Inn revels was styled "The most high and mighty Prince of P." In Marston's Mountebank, presented at Gray's Inn in 1618, the Mountebank says, "I have heard of a mad fellow . . . who hath stolen himself, this festival time of Christmas, into favour at the Court of P."

PURYFLEGITON (a fuller name for PHLEGETHON, q.v.). In Lochine iii. 6, 18, Humber rants about the ugly ghosts that "Do plunge yourselves in P." In v. 1, 48, Lochine threatens to send the soul of Thrasimachus "to P."

PUTEOLI (the modern POZZUOLI). A spt. at the N.W. corner of the Bay of Naples on the E. side of the little Bay of Pozzuoli, opposite to Baia. To the E. of the town rises the volcano called Solfatara, and the whole dist. is volcanic in character. In Davenant's U. Lovers v. 4, a song contains the lines, "If you want fire, fetch a supply From Ætna and P." In his Favourite iii. 1, one of the captives redeemed from the galleys of Algiers is "a captain of P." Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 1, 1, quotes from Gellius a story how "a dolphin at P. loved a child," and died when the child died.

PUTNEY. A vill. in Surrey on the S. bank of the Thames opposite Fulham, 6 m. in a direct line S.W. of St. Paul's. It was the birthplace of Lord Thomas Cromwell and of Gibbon the historian. In Armin's Moreclacke C. 4, the boy says, "Your dame will meet you at P." Mortlake is about 2½ m. from P. In W. Rowley's New Wonder ii. 1, Stephen, playing at dice, ejaculates: "Fullam"—fulam being a slang word for a loaded die; and Dick chimes in, "Where's P. then, I pray you?" In Dekker's Westward iv. 1, Justiniano says, "If you will call me at P. [on the way to Brentford] I'll bear you company." Scenes 1 and 2 of Cromwell are at P. in front of old Cromwell's smithy; in ii. 2, Hodge says, "At Putnaie I'll go you to Parish-Garden for 2d. without any wagging or jolting in my guts, in a little boat too." In Middleton's Mad World iii. 3, Follywit says, "You shall carry me away with a pair of oars and put in at P." Herrick wrote an ode to The School or Pearl of P., the Mistress of all singular Manners, Mrs. Portman.

PYGMIES. See PIGMIES.

PYLOS. An ancient town on the W. coast of the Peloponnesus, on the promontory of Coryphasium at the N. extremity of the Bay of Navarino. It is famous for its capture by the Athenians in 424 B.C. It is probably the "sandy P." which was the capital of the kingdom of Nestor according to Homer, though there is a P. in Elis and another in Triphylia, both of which have been identified with the P. of Nestor. Nestor is stated by Homer to have been the oldest of the Greeks who came to Troy, and to have ruled over 3 generations of men: hence a Pylian age means a very long time. In Fisher's Fuinus Prol., Mercury says, "Time hath spent A Pylian age since you 2 breathed." In T. Heywood's B. Age ii., Nestor vows to bring back part of the Calydonian boar "home to P., where I reign." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 9, 48, calls Nestor "that sage Pylian sire."

PYNDUS. See PINDUS.

PYRÆUM (PIRÆUS). The harbour-town of ancient Athens, abt. 5 m. S.W. of the city. It was fortified by Themistocles and connected with the city by the Long Walls. It consists of a rocky isthmus, with a large basin on the N. side called Emporium, now Drake, or Porto Leone, and a smaller bay called Cantharus; and 2 on the E. side called Zea and Munychia respectively. In the old Timon i. 4, Pseudolus says, "Hail, Athens! Welcome may I be, who mounted on a wooden horse this day arrived at P." In ii. 1, Gelasimus says of his father: "The next house to P. was one of his." In iii. 3, Gelasimus says, "Go, Pædio, to P.: inquire If any ship hath there arrived this day From the Ionian sea." In Tiberius 1824, Germanicus says of Tigramenta: "Were it Pireus or Seleucia, Germanicus would never leave assault."

PYRAMIDS (Pd. = Pyramid, Pes. = Pyramides). The great tombs of the Egyptian kings of the 4th dynasty—Khufu, Khephren, and Menkaura—on the W. bank of the Nile near the ancient Memphis. They were built about 3500 B.C. The great Pd. of Khufu is 451 ft. high and covers an area of 12½ acres.

In H6 A. i. 6, 61, Charles says of Joan of Arc: "A statelier pyramis to her I'll rear Than Rhodope's at Memphis ever was." Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 12, says that the least of the 3 great P. "was built at the cost and charges of one Rhodope, a very strumpet." Rhodope was a friend of Æsop's, and had nothing to do with the Pd., but she may have been confounded with Nitocris, who was traditionally but quite erroneously connected with the 3rd Pd. In Mac. iv. 1, 57, Macbeth conjures the Witches to speak, "Though palaces and p. do slope Their heads to their foundations." In Ant. ii. 7, 21, Antony tells Cæsar "They take the flow o' the Nile by certain scales i' the pd." The rise of the Nile was measured by a Nilometer at Memphis, but not by any scale on the P. In line 40, Lepidus says, "I have heard the Ptolemies' pyramises are very goodly things": his drunken condition may excuse his error. In v. 2, 61, Cleopatra says, "Make My country's high pes. my gibbet And hang me up in chains." In Sonnets cxxiii. 2, the Poet addresses Time, "Thy p. built up with newer might To me are nothing novel, nothing strange." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii., Earth asks, "Where be those high Pes. so famed By which the barbarous Memphis first was named?" In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar speaks of "Alexandria Famous for those wide-wondered P. Whose towering tops do seem to threaten the sky." The P. are over 100 m. from Alexandria. In Marlowe's Massacre i. 2, Guise says, "Set me to scale the high Pes. And thereon set the diadem of France." In Prodigal iii. 3, Flowerdale says, "To him that is all as impossible As 1 to scale the high pes." In B. & F. Philaster v. 3, Philaster says, "Make it [the funeral monument] rich with brass, with purest gold and shining jasper, like the Pes." In Locrine iii. 4, 32, Locrine vows to build a temple to Fortune "Of perfect marble and of jacinth stone, That it shall pass the high Pes." In Greville's Alaham, the chorus to Act iii. speaks of a "Pyramis raised above the force of thunder." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faust, in his description of Rome, speaks of the "high pes. Which Julius Cæsar brought from Africa." He is probably thinking of the obelisks which were erected in front of the Vatican, in front of Sta. Maria Maggiore, in front of St. John Lateran, and in the Piazza del Popolo, in 1586, 1587, 1588, and 1589 respectively. The 1st was brought from Heliopolis by Caligula, the 2nd was imported by Claudius, the 3rd by Constantine, and the 4th by Augustus: Julius Cæsar had nothing to do with any of them.

PYRENE. See PIRENE.

PYRENEES (Pan. = Pyrenean). The range of mtns. dividing France from Spain. The highest peaks rise to about 11,000 ft. In K. J. i. 1, 202, the Bastard tells how the traveller talks "of the Alps and Apennines, The Pan. and the river Po." In the old Timon i. 4, Pseudocheus, describing his journey on his flying horse, says, "The Pan. mtns., though that there I with my right hand touched the very clouds . . . did ne'er fright me." In Greene's Friar iv., the K. of Castile says, "The Pyren mts. swelling above the clouds That ward the wealthy Castile in with walls Could not detain the beauteous Elinor." In Webster's Weakest i. 2, the Messenger reports: "The power of Spain has passed the Pyren Hills Under Hernando, the great D. of Medina." In Noble Soldier v. 3, the Q. speaks of "the Pan. hills that part Spain and our country [Italy]." In Massinger's Virgin iv. 3, Theophilus says, "I will raise up A hill of their dead carcasses to o'erlook The Pan. hills, but I'll root out These superstitious fools." In Rawlins' Rebellion ii. 1, Antonio says, "Gray-bearded winter froze my very soul Till I became, like the Pyrenian hills, Wrapt in a robe of ice." In Brome's Antipodes i. 6, Dr. Hughball, talking of his travels, boasts, "I have touched the clouds upon the Pan. mountains." In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Hercules calls Deianeira "White as the garden ily, pyren snow." Drayton, in Idea xxv. 4, hopes to "crown the Pyrens with my living song."

QUEENBOROUGH, or QUINBOROUGH. A spt. in Kent on the Isle of Sheppey, 2 m. S. of Sheerness. Its inhabitants are employed in fishing and oyster-dredging. In Middleton's Queenborough, Simon, the Mayor, is one of the leading characters. The time is that of the coming of Hengist and Horsa to England in the reign of Vortigern. Taylor, the water poet, on one occasion sailed in a paper boat "from Lond. unto Q.," a distance of abt. 35 m. Nash, in Prognostication, predicts "Quin-borowe oyster boats shall oft times carry knaves as well as honest men." Gascoigne, in Voyage into Holland (1572), tells how he went from Gravesend "To board our ship in Q. that lay."

QUEENHITHE, or QUEENHIVE. A quay on the N. bank of the Thames in Upper Thames St., a little W. of Southwark Bdge. It was originally called, from its owner, Edred's Hithe, but K. John gave it to his mother Eleanor, and hence it was named Q. It was the landing-place for all kinds of goods brought to Lond. by sea, and the revenue from tolls and wharfage dues came to the Queen. They were sold to the city of Lond. in Henry III's reign for £50, but by the time of Henry VII they had sunk to £15 per annum, owing to the growth of the size of ships so that they could not come through Lond. Bridge. An old legend told how Eleanor, Queen of Edward I, on telling a lie about her share in the murder of the Lady Mayoress, sank into the ground at Charing Green and rose up again at Q., or, as it is alternatively called, Potter's Hithe. The story is enacted in Peele's Ed. I, which has on the title-page: "Lastly, the sinking of Queen Elinor, who sunk at Charing Cross and rose again at Potters Hith, now named Queen Hith." There is an old ballad on the same subject. In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 3, Knavesby says, "I will sink at Queen Hive and rise again at Charing Cross, contrary to the statute in Edwardo Primo." In his Witch i. 1, Almachildes says to Amoretta, "Amsterdam swallow thee for a Puritan and Geneva cast thee up again! Like she that sunk at Charing Cross and rose again at Q." In Cartwright's Ordinary v. 4, Hearsay, when the Watch cannot find the sharpers, says, "Sunk like the Queen! They'll rise at Q., sure!"

In Bale's Laws ii., Idolatry says, "Give onions to St. Cutlake and garlic to St. Cyriac, if ye will shun the headache: ye shall have them at Q." In iv., Infidelity says, "He that spake of ye was selling of a cod in an oyster-boat a little beyond Q." In Dekker's Westward iv. 1, Birdlime says, "I'll down to Q. and the watermen which were went to carry you to Lambeth Marsh shall carry me thither," i.e. to Brainford. In v. 3, Moll says, "I warrant they [the husbands of the ladies who have gone on a jaunt to Brainford] walk upon Q., as Leander did for Hero, to watch for our landing." In Middleton's Chaste Maid ii. 2, one of the Promoters says, "Let's e'en to the Checker at Q. And roast the loin of mutton till young flood: Then send the child to Brainford." In Jonson's Staple iii. 1, Fitton says, "The eel-boats here, that lie before Q., came out of Holland." In Penn. Parl., one of the provisions is "Poor bargemen at Q. shall have a whole quart [of beer] for a penny." In Westward for Smelts, we read of "the watermen's garrison of Q." which met at the Red Knight. In B. & F. Thomas iv. 2, Launcelet tells how the Watchman followed him: "The sts. are dirty, takes a Q. cold," i.e. such a cold as would easily be caught in the damp and mud there. In Wit 5.W. v. 1, Pompey says, "I hear more than I eat: I'd ne'er row by Q. while I lived else." I suppose he means if he could eat indefinitely he would never pass by Q., but put in to visit one of the many taverns in the neighbourhood.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE. University of Cambridge, founded by Margaret of Anjou, Queen of Henry VI, in 1446. It stands on the bank of the Cam in Silver St., behind St. Catherine's Hall. Textor's Thersites was acted there in 1543, and in 1546 a College ordinance was passed that any student refusing to act in the College Plays or absenting himself from their performance would be expelled. Nicholas Robinson's comedy Strylus was performed in 1553. A play in Latin, entitled Lalia, was acted, probably in 1595, in the presence of Lord Essex and other noblemen. John Weever, referring to this performance, in Epig. iv. 19, says, "When such a Master with you beareth sway How can Q. C. ever then decay f No. Yet Q. C. evermore hath been Is, and will be, of Colleges the Queen." Another Latin play, Fucus Histriomastix, was acted here in Lent 1623.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE. University of Oxford, founded in 1340 by Robert Eglesfeld, Chaplain to Queen Philippa, and named by him in her honour. It stands in the High St. opposite to University College. John Rainolds, who took up the controversy against stage-plays in the Colleges in 1592 against William Gager of Christchurch, was a Q. man.

QUEEN'S HEAD ALLEY (now Q. H. PASSAGE). Lond., running from No. 41 Newgate St. to Paternoster Row. It was named from a tavern at the corner, where the professors of Canon Law lodged before they removed to Doctors' Commons. R. Harford had a bookshop in Q. H. A. in 1638 with the sign of the Gilt Bible.

QUEBUS. An imaginary place in the topography of Sir Andrew Aguecheek. The whole sentence is doubtless modelled on Rabelais. In Tw. N. ii. 3, 25, Sir Andrew says to the fool, "Thou wast in very gracious fooling last night when thou spok'st of Picrogromitus, of the Vapians passing the equinoctial of Quebus."

QUEVIRA (another name for NOVA ALBION, q.v.).

QUILOA (better known as KILWA). A town with a fine harbour on the E. coast of S. Africa, S. of Zanzibar and a little over 100 m. N. of Cape Delgado. It is known to have been a flourishing spt. as early as 1330; it was taken by the Portuguese in 1507, and remained in their possession. Milton, P. L. xi. 399, enumerates among the kingdoms shown in vision to Adam by Michael, "Mombaza, and Quiloa, and Melind."

QUINTIN'S (SAINT) (more properly St. QUENTIN'S). An ancient town in France (Picardy) on the Somme, 87 m. N.E. of Paris. It was the scene of a battle in 1557 between the Spaniards and the French: the Spaniards, who were assisted by a force of English soldiers, gained the victory. In Wit & Wisdom ii. 1, Idleness says, "I have been at St. Q. where I was twice killed." In Jonson's Tub iii. 4, Sir Hugh says, "I was once a capt. at St. Q." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV. B. 93, Scales reports that the Count St. Paul "lies and revels at St. Q. And laughs at Edward's coming into France." This was in 1474, when Edward IV invaded France. In Merry Devil i. 2, 32, the Host says to Bilbo, "My soldier of St. Q., come, follow me." Puttenham, Art of Poesie iii. 22, blames "one that would say k. Philip shrewdly harmed the town of St. Quintaines, when indeed he won it and put it to the sack." Sir John Davies, in In Gerontem 10, represents his hero dating events from "The going to St. Q. and Newhaven." In Old Meg, Hall, the ox-leach, is said to be so old that he might have "cured an ox that was eaten at St. Q."

QUIRINAL. One of the 7 hills of Rome, lying N.E. of the Capitol. Spenser, in Ruines of Rome iv., says of Rome that Jove "Upon her stomach laid Mt. Q."

RABAH (RABBAH, the capital of the Ammonites ; now AMMAN). It was on the Upper Jabbok, abt. 20 m. from the Jordan. It was taken by Joab as related in II Samuel xi. It was here that Uriah the Hittite was exposed to certain death by Joab at the command of David. In Conf. Cons. ii. 3, Hypocrisy says, "Joab was glad The Ammonite in R. to confusion to bring." In Peele's Bethsabe i. 2, Abisai says to Joab, "Before this city R. we will lie." The scene of ii. 3 is laid at R. Milton, P. L. i. 397, says of Moloch : "Him the Ammonite Worshipped in Rabba and her watery plain."

RADCLIFF. See RATCLIFFE.

RADNOCKSHIRE. Looks like one of Lewis Carroll's "portmanteau" words made up of the names of 2 adjacent counties in S. Wales, Radnor and Brecknock. In T. Heywood's Royal King i., the Welshman says, "If ever I shall meet you in Glamorgan or R. I will make bold to requite some of your kindness."

RAGUSA. An ancient spt. on the E. coast of the Adriatic in S. Dalmatia. It has a good harbour and was a centre of extensive trade, as well as of the manufacture of silk and woollen goods and malmsey wine. Its importance as a trading port may be gathered from the fact that "Argosy," meaning a merchant-vessel, is from Ragusa, a ship of R. There is also a R. in Sicily 29 m. S.W. of Syracuse, which had considerable silk manufactures. Which of the two is meant in the quotation below is hard to say : probably the former. In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Lady Cressingham says she has sent patterns for her silks to the factors "at Florence and R., where these stuffs are woven."

RAINBOW. A sign in Fleet St., Lond., belonging to what is now No. 15. At first it was a printing house, but in 1657 James Farr opened a coffee house there, the second of its kind in England. It survived the Gt. Fire, but was pulled down in 1860, rebuilt, and reopened as the Rainbow Tavern. Glapthorne's Argalus was "Printed by R. Bishop for Daniel Pakeman at the Rainebow near the Inner Temple Gate. 1639."

RAM ALLEY. A narrow court on the S. side of Fleet St., Lond., opposite to Fetter Lane, now known as Hare Pl. It took its name from a house with the sign of the Star and R., originally belonging to the Knights Hospitallers, but turned into a brewery after being confiscated by Henry VIII. It was only some 7 ft. wide, and ran down to the footway from Serjeant's Inn to the Temple. It claimed the right of sanctuary, and there was a backway from the Mitre Inn into the A. which afforded a way of escape from the law to the frequenters of that famous tavern. It was a place of evil reputation, inhabited chiefly by cooks, bawds, tobacco-sellers, and ale-house-keepers. The worst of its dens was the Maidenhead, near the Temple end of it. In Ret. Pernass i. 2, Judicio says of John Marston : "He cuts, thrusts, and foins at whomsoever he meets And strews about R. A. meditations : Tut, what cares he for modest close-couched terms ? Give him plain naked words stript from their shirts." One of the characters in Jonson's Staple is Lickfinger, "mine old host of R. A.," "old Lickfinger the cook," who is represented as having some share in the catering for the Lord Mayor's banquet and utilizing his opportunity by stealing 20 eggs. In Massinger's New Way ii. 2, Amble says of Marraill, the attorney : "The knave thinks still he's at the cook's shop in R. A., where the clerks divide and the elder is to choose." In Day's

B. Beggar iv., Canby says, "You shall see the amorous conceits and love-songs betwixt Capt. Pod of Py-Corner and Mrs. Rump of R. A." Capt. Pod was a well-known exhibitor of motions, or puppet-shows, and it may be presumed that Mrs. Rump is equally historical. Nash, in Prognostication, says, "The fishwives shall get their living by walking and crying because they slandered R. A. with such a tragical infamy" : probably they charged the cooks with selling flesh on Fridays or in Lent. Barry's Ram centres about the A. The rascally lawyer Throate "lies in R. A." ; and in i. 3, he says, "Though R. A. stinks with cooks and ale, Yet say, there's many a worthy lawyer's chamber Buts upon R. A." In iii. 3, he says, "Are you mad ? Come you to seek a virgin in R. A. So near an Inn-of-Court, and amongst cooks, Ale-men, and laundresses ?" In Brome's Couple, Careless takes sanctuary in R. A., but, having got hold of some money, he says (ii. 1), "I need no more insconcing now in R.-A." In his Damoiselle iv. 1, Bumpsey says, "I'll but step up into R. A. Sanctuary."

RAMATH-LECHI (i.e. the HILL OF THE JAWBONE). The traditional site of the slaying of the Philistines by Samson with the jawbone of an ass (see Judges xv. 17). It was somewhere in the tribe of Judah, but its exact site is uncertain. In Milton, S. A. 145, the Chorus, referring to this story, says, "A thousand foreskins fell, the flower of Palestine, In R.-l., famous to this day." It is not improbable that the legend was suggested by the name of the place, which may have been derived from the shape of the hill.

RAMHEAD. The sign of a tavern (in Madrid?) in the play within the play in Middleton's Gipsy iv. 3, where Sancho (as Hialdo) complains of his master : "He scores up the vintner's name in the Ramhead, flirts his wife under the nose."

RAMNUS. See REAMNUS.

RAMOTH (more fully R.-GILEAD). An important city of Palestine lying in the tribe of Gad, E. of Jordan, and one of the Cities of Refuge. It has been variously identified with Remthen, on the upper course of the Yarmuk, near Edrei, 25 m. S.E. of the S. end of the Sea of Galilee, and with Gerash on the upper waters of the Jabbok, about 20 m. E. of the Jordan. Here Ahab was killed in battle against the Syrians, having been persuaded to go on the campaign by a "lying spirit" (see I Kings xxii. 20). Milton, P. R. i. 373, makes Satan say, "When to all his angels he proposed To draw the proud k. Ahab into fraud, That he might fall in R., they demurring, I undertook that office."

RAMYKINS (RAMKINS). A fort near Flushing in the Isle of Walcheren. It was taken from the Spaniards in 1572 and assigned to Q. Elizabeth in 1585 as a cautionary town. Gascoigne, in Dulce Bellum 102, says, "I was in rolling trench At Ramykens, where little shot was spent." This was at its capture in 1572.

RATCLIFFE. Originally a manor in the parish of Stepney on the N. bank of the Thames, between Shadwell and Limehouse. It is inhabited chiefly by people engaged in various marine industries. It gave its name to the old R. Highway, now known as St. George St. Hentzner mentions it as "a considerable suburb." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 278, Dean Nowell says, "This Ave Gibson founded a free school at R." The lady referred to was Avice Gibson, wife of Nicholas Gibson, grocer, and her free-school and almshouses were almost the first buildings to be erected in R. In Oldcastle iii. 2, Acton, in a list of villages where the rebels are quartered, mentions, "Some nearer Thames, R., Blackwall, and Bow." In Look about v., Skink, pursued by the watch, says, "In the highway to R. stands a heater," i.e. a hot pursuer. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Canby says, "We'll wheel about by Ratcliff and get to his lodging" at Bethnall Green. In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Otter says, "We'll go down to Ratcliff and have a course i' faith," i.e. a bear-baiting. In his Alchemist iv. 4, Face says, "I'll ship you both away to Ratcliff Where we will meet to-morrow." In Davenant's Wits ii. 1, Palatine says, "I told her her beloved velvet hood [must] be sold to some Dutch brewer of R." In Launching, it is said, "The East India gates stand open wide to entertain the needy and the poor—Lyne House speaks their liberality; Ratcliff cannot complain nor Wapping weep nor Shadwell cry against their niggardliness."

Like all waterside places, R. had a bad reputation for the character of its inhabitants. In News from Hell, it is mentioned along with Turnbuck-st., Southwark, Bank-side, and Kent-st., as the abode of whores and thieves. In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, Compass says of the time of the birth of children: "It varies again by the time you come at Wapping, Radcliff, Limehouse, and here with us at Blackwall: our children come uncertainly, as the wind serves," i.e. because the husbands are away on voyages and their wives misbehave in their absence. Gosson, in School of Abuse, p. 37 (Arber), says of loose women: "They live a mile from the city, like Venus' nuns in a cloister, at Newington, Ratcliffe, Islington, Hogsdon, or some such place."

RAVEN. A tavern in the High St. of Foy (Cornwall). In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. iii. 2, Clem says to Roughman, "You lie at the Raven in the High St."

RAVENNA. A city in N.E. Italy, 4 m. from the coast of the Adriatic, from which it is separated by the famous pine-wood where Odoacer defeated Paulus. In the days of the Empire it had a magnificent harbour, and was made by Augustus his chief naval station on the Adriatic. Honorius made it the seat of his court in 402, and it remained so till the fall of the Western Empire in 476. Odoacer resided there, and after him Theodoric, during whose reign (493-526) it reached its acme of splendour. A dozen Byzantine churches, built during this period, remain to attest its greatness. Theodoric was buried in the Mausoleum, which still remains in perfect preservation as the Rotunda of Sa. Maria. In 540 it was reunited to the Roman Empire and was the seat of the court of the Exarchs for 200 years. After a long period of independence it became, in 1509, part of the Papal States, and so continued till the unification of Italy in 1859. Here Dante died and was buried. In Wilson's Swiss i. 1, 68, the scene of which is Pavia, early in the 7th cent., the K. says, "Shall the warlike Lombards now turn their backs to the Ravennans, a contemned people?" The scene of Middleton's Witch is laid in R. and its neighbourhood. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "honest old R." Whetstone tells of a company of players, "the comedians of R.," visiting England in 1582.

RAVENSPURGH (otherwise RAVENSPURN, or RAVENSER). It was close to Spurn Head at the mouth of the Humber, near Kilnsea, but it was swept away by the encroachment of the ocean in the 16th cent. Here Bolingbroke landed on July 4th, 1399, ostensibly to claim his father's estates. Edward IV also landed here in 1471 to regain the throne from which he had been driven by Warwick.

In R2 ii. 1, 296, Northumberland calls upon his fellow-conspirators: "Away with me in post to R." In ii. 2, 51, Green brings word, "The banished Bolingbroke repeals himself And . . . is safe arrived at R." In ii. 3, 9, Northumberland thinks it will be "a weary way from R. to Cotswold. . . . In Ross and Willoughby"; and in line 31 Percy informs his father that Worcester "is gone to R. To offer service to the D. of Hereford." In H4 A. i. 3, 248, Hotspur recalls to Northumberland the time when the K. and he "came back from R." In iii. 2, 95, the K. says to Prince Hal, "As thou art at this hour was Richd. then When I from France set foot at R." In iv. 3, 77, Hotspur speaks of Bolingbroke's arrival "Upon the naked shore of R." In H6 C. iv. 7, 8, K. Edward says, "What then remains, we being thus arrived From R. haven before the gates of York But that we enter?"

RAYNES. See RENNES.

RAYNUM (RAINHAM). Vill. in Kent, on the road from Rochester to Feversham, abt. 5 m. from the former. In Feversham iii. 4, Michael instructs the murderers of Arden: "You may front him well on R. Down"; and in iii. 6, as they are riding from Rochester to Feversham, Michael makes an excuse to turn back, and Arden says, "Get you back to Rochester, but see You overtake us ere we come to R. Down."

READING. The county town of Berks., on the Kennet, just above its junction with the Thames, 39 m. W. of Lond., and 15 W. of Windsor. In M. W. W. iv. 5, 80, Evans says, "There is 3 cozen-germans that has cozened all the hosts of Readings, of Maidenhead, of Colebrook, of horses and money."

REALTO. See RIALTO.

RECANATI. A town in Italy on a commanding eminence near the coast of the Adriatic, 18 m. S. of Ancona. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "long Recanati, built Upon a steep hill's ridge."

RED BRAYES. A valley near the river on the S. side of Leith in Midlothian. In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 20, Grey says, "Conduct these noble pledges from the red Brayes to Insketh."

RED BULL. The sign of a bookseller's shop in Lond. Nabbes' Unfort. Mother was "printed by J. O. for Daniel Frere and are to be sold at the sign of the Red Bull in Little Britain. 1640."

RED BULL. One of the old Lond. Theatres, standing in Woodbridge St., off St. John St., in Clerkenwell. It was opened about 1605, and seems to have been, as the name would suggest, a converted inn-yard. Prynne, in Histrio-mastix, records its recent re-building in 1633. In New Book of Mistakes (1637), we have: "The R. B. in St. Johns St. who for the present (alack the while) is not suffered to carry the flag in the maintop," i.e. it was closed on account of the plague in 1636-7. A picture of a stage in the frontispiece to Kirkman's The Wits (1673) has been erroneously described as the stage of the R. B., and has often been reproduced as part of the evidence as to the arrangement of the Elizabethan stage. It shows a traverse hanging either from the balcony, or not more than a foot or two in front of its alignment, and a separate curtain to conceal the balcony itself when necessary. But the R. B. was an open-air theatre, and this picture cannot represent it. It was used for "drolls" or variety entertainments during the Commonwealth, re-opened at the Restoration, but finally abandoned by the drama in 1663 and handed over to fencers, wrestlers, and the like. The site was later occupied by a distillery. Wright, in Historia Histrionica (1699), says, "The Fortune near Whitecross St., and the R. B. at the upper end of St. John's St. The two last were mostly frequented by citizens and the meaner sort of people." Later on he says, "The Globe, Fortune and B. were large houses and lay partly open to the weather; and there they always acted by daylight." In Davenant's Playhouse i., the Player says, "Tell 'em the R. B. Stands empty for fencers; there are no tenants in it but old spiders"; this was in 1663.

In B. & F. Wit S. W. ii. 2, Pompey, telling of Sir Gregory Fop's new method of courtship, says: "He drew the device from a play at the B., t'other day." In their Pestle iv. 1, when the Citizen suggests as to Ralph, "Let the Sophy of Persia come and christen him a child," the Boy answers, "Believe me, Sir, that will not do so well; 'tis stale; it has been had before at the R. B." Probably the reference is to The Travails, by Day, Rowley, and Wilkins, which dates from 1607, the same year as Pestle. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque p. 558, Geraldine says, "We'll go to the R. B.; they say Green's a good clown," to which Bubble, the part being acted by Green himself, says, "Green! Green's an ass," and adds, "He is as like me as ever he can look." In Tomkis' Albumazar ii. 1, Trincalo says, "Then will I confound her with compliments drawn from the plays I see at the Fortune and R. B." In Randolph's Muses i. 1, Mrs. Flowerdew's Puritan brother is reported by her to have prayed that "the B. might cross the Thames to the Bear-garden, and there be soundly baited." In Cowley's Cutter iii. 7, Jolly says, "Tho' you shall rage like Tamerlain at the B., 'twould do no good here." Dekker, in Raven's, says of the actors: "Fortune must favour some . . . the whole world must stick to others . . . and a 3rd faction must fight like Bulls" where the reference is to quarrels between the actors at the Fortune, Globe, and R. B. Goffe, in Careless prol., says "I'll go to the B. or Fortune and there see A play for twopence and a jig to boot." In verses prefixed to Randolph's Works, Haz., p. 504, the writer speaks of the "base plots" acted at the R. B. Gayton, in Pleasant Notes on Don Quixote, p. 24, says, "I have heard that the poets of the Fortune and R. B. had always a mouth-measure for their actors, who were terrible tear-throats, and made their lines proportionable to their compass which were sesquipedales, a foot and a half." Pepys, in his Diary, March 23rd, 1661, went "out to the R. B." and saw All's Lost by Lust.

RED CROSS ST. Lond., running N. from the front of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, to Barbican, opposite Golden Lane. It had its name from a cross which stood at its Barbican end. A Chronological Catalogue of the Electors Palatine was "printed by William Jones, dwelling in R.-C.-St. 1631."

RED LATTICE. It was the custom for taverns in Lond. to have a red lattice for a window. In Gascoigne's Government iv. 6, he says, "There at a house with a r. l. you shall find an old bawd and a young damsel." In H4 B. ii. 2, 86, the Page says of Bardolph: "A 'calls me e'en now through a r. l. and I could discern no part of his face from the window." In Marston's Ant. Rev. v. 1, Bafardo boasts ironically, "I am not as well known by my wit as an alehouse by a red lattice." When Greene, in News from Heaven and Hell, is represented as speaking of "a pot of that liquor that I was wont to drink with my hostess at the R. Lattice in Tormoyle St.," he uses the word generically for a tavern, not specifically as the sign of one particular hostelry. In Curates Conference (1641), Needham complains that in Lond. parish clerks "can have their meetings usually in taverns of 3 or 4 pounds a sitting, when poor curates must not look into a r. l. under fear of a general censure."

RED LION. A common public-house sign, derived no doubt from the R. L. rampant of Scotland, to be seen in the 2nd quarter of the British Royal Standard. R. L. St., in Holborn, was so-called from the R. L. Inn, and in the wall of the building which now occupies its site a tablet is let in with the date 1611. Here were brought the bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, and Bradshaw in 1661 before they were dragged to Tyburn. In Middleton's No Wit ii. 1, Weatherwise says, "She was brought a-bed at the R. L. about Tower Hill." In News Barthol. Fair, in a list of taverns, we have "R. L. in the Strand." In Jonson's Tub ii. 1, Hilts says, "Find out my Capt. lodged at the R. L. in Paddington; that's the inn." This inn is still to be found at the corner of the Edgeware and Harrow Rds.; there is a tradition that Shakespeare once acted there.

RED LION. An inn at Waltham, also an inn at Brentford. In B. & F. Pestle ii. 1, Humphrey is riding a sorrel "which I bought of Brian, The honest host of the R. roaring L. In Waltham situate." There was a R. L. at Brentford mentioned in Julian of Brainford's Testament as being "at the shambles' end."

REDRIFF. See ROTHERHITHE.

RED SEA. The Latin Mare Rubrum or Erythræum, so called, it may be, from the red tinge of the mtns. of the Sinaïtic peninsula, which are so striking a feature to the voyager down the gulf of Suez; or from the red coral which abounds on its shores. The Hebrews called it Yam Suph, or Sea of Weeds, from its character at the head of the gulf of Suez, where they knew it best. It runs between Egypt and Arabia, for about 1200 m., from the straits of Babelmandeb to the Sinaïtic peninsula; there it divides into the Gulfs of Suez and Akaba. At the head of the former it is connected with the Mediterranean by the Suez Canal. Once it extended further N. to Lake Timseh, where it was crossed by the Hebrews on their exodus from Egypt. The only way into it from England was round the Cape of Good Hope; the Portuguese visited it from their settlements on the coast of India, but it was of little commercial importance, until the digging of the Suez Canal made it our highway to the East.

In Bale's Promises iv., Moses says, "Through the R. S. thy right hand did us lead." In York M. P. xi. 375, a boy says, "The Rede S. is right near at hand," and Moses promises "I shall make us way with my wand." In the corresponding passage in the Townley M. P. it is called "The Reede S." In Jonson's Prince Henry's Barriers, Merlin speaks of Israel's host marching "through the R.-S. . . to the Egyptians' loss." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. v. 3, Tamburlaine says, "Here, not far from Alexandria, Whereas the Terrene and the R. S. meet, Being distant less than full a hundred leagues, I meant to cut a channel to them both, That men might quickly sail to India." The Venetians had formed such a project soon after Vasco da Gama doubled the Cape of Good Hope in 1497, but it was opposed by the Mameluke Sultans and came to nothing. In Middleton's Quiet Life, i. 1, Beaufort says to young Franklin, "I had thought to prefer you to have been capt. of a ship that's bound for the R. S." It was a stock joke to associate the red herring and the boiled lobster with the R. S. Nash, in Lenten, p. 326, tells of someone who "showed a country fellow the R. S. where all the red herrings were made." In Massinger's Picture iii. 1, Hilario, throwing away his poor provision in hope of speedy advancement, says "Thou, red herring, swim to the R. S. again." In B. & F. Elder B. ii. 3, Andrew proposes to dispute "which are the males and females of red herrings, and whether they be taken in the R. S. only." In Brome's Academy iv. 1, Nehemiah says, "One asking whence lobsters were brought, his fellow replied, one might easily know their country by their coat; they are fetched from the R. S."

REDSHANKS. A nick-name for a bare-legged and therefore red-legged Scotchman or Irishman. In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iii. 1, Arthur describes Modred's army as made up of "sluggish Saxons' crew and Irish kerns And Scottish aid and false red-shanked Picts." In Barry's Ram ii. 4, Frances says "I will rather wed A most perfidious R." Heylyn (s.v. HEBRIDES) says, "The people resemble the Wild Irish and are called Red-shankes." Burton A. M. iii. 2, 5, 1, tells how "the Brahmins . . . lay upon the ground . . . as the r. do on the heather." It is also applied to the Gauls. In King Lear, Haz. p. 378, Mumford says, "Ye valiant race of Genovestan Gawles, Surnamed R. for your chivalry, Because you fight up to the shanks in blood." But this is not the real reason of the name. Nash, in Lenten, p. 312, gives a still more absurd derivation: "The Scotch jockies or R. (so sir-named of their immoderate maunching up the R. or red-herrings)."

REESHOPSCURRE. Apparently some port on the coast of the Baltic, probably Rixhöft, the W. extremity of the Gulf of Dantzig. The scene of Chetle's Hoffman is laid near Dantzig. In C2, Lorrèque says, "We were cast ashore under R."

REGENT HOUSE. The house where the Regents met in the University of Oxford; the Congregation House. The Regents included all Doctors and Masters of Arts for 2 years after their Degrees; and all Professors, Heads of Houses, and Resident Doctors. The original Congregation-House was at the E. end of St. Mary's Ch., and was primarily a royal chapel, built probably by Henry I; but as early as 1201 it is called "our house of Congregation." In Greene's Friar, scene vii. is laid in the R. H. at Oxford. Mason begins: "Now that we are gathered in the R. H. It fits us talk about the K.'s repairs."

RENNES. A city in France, abt. 200 m. S.W. of Paris, 60 m. due N. of Nantes. It was famous for its fine linen, which was known as R. or Cloth of R. In Skelton's Magnificence, fo. xxiii., Poverty reminds Magnificence how his skin "was wrapped in shirts of Raynes." Chaucer, in Dethe of Blaunche 255, speaks of "Many a pelowe and every bere of clothe of reynes." Tindale's translation of Luke xvi. 19 describes the rich man as "Clothed in purple and fine raynes."

RENNISH. See RHINE.

RETFORD. A town in Notts. on the right bank of the Idle, on the Great North Rd. from Lond., from which it is distant 141 m. In Downfall Huntington v. 1, the Gaoler says, "Here is meat that I put up at Retford for my dog."

RHAMNUS (Ra. = Rhamnusia), now OVRIO-KASTRO. A town on the E. coast of Attica, abt. 8 m. N. of Marathon. It was the chief seat of the worship of Nemesis, whose temple contained a colossal statue of the goddess, said to be the work of Phidias; she is often called Rhamnusia. The remains of the statue are in the

RHEIMS, or RHEMES

British Museum. Watson, in Tears of Fancie (1593) xlii. 1, appeals: "O thou that rulest in Ramnis golden gate, Let pity pierce thy unrelenting mind." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. ii. 3, Cosroe says, "She that rules in R. golden gates Shall make me solely Emperor of Asia." In Peele's Arraignment iii. 2, Diggon says, "Yet will Ra. vengeance take On her disdainful fault." In his Alcazar ii. prol., the Presenter says that the Furies start up "Waked with the thunder of Ra.'s drum." In Lochrine ii. 1, Hubba says, "If she that rules fair Rhamnis golden gate Grant us the honour of the victory . . . we will rule the land." In Selimus 608, Nemesis is called "Chief patroness of R. golden gates." In Lochrine ii. 6, 2, Humber speaks of "Thundering alarms and Ra.'s drum." Marston begins his Scourge of Villanie, "I bear the scourge of just Ra." In Mason's Mulleasses 1258, the Ghost of Timoclea says she is "Ra.-like attired," i.e. is bent on vengeance. In the old Timon i. 4, Gelasius talks of his house "in R. street"; this is a well-invented name for a street in Athens, but as far as I can ascertain, quite imaginary.

RHEIMS, or RHEMES. The ancient Durocortorum, a city in France, on the Vesle, 81 m. N.E. of Paris. It was the see of a Bp. from 360, and was raised to an Archbprie. in 744. Clovis was baptized here by St. Remi in 494; and the Kings of France were here crowned down to the Revolution of 1830, with the exception of Henri IV and Louis XVIII. The glory of the city is the cathedral, built in 1211 on the site of an older church; the magnificent façade was erected in the 14th cent., and is one of the finest examples of Gothic in the world. It suffered severely from fire in 1431, but was carefully restored. From 1914 to 1918 it was battered to pieces by the Germans. Schools for the teaching of the liberal arts were founded by Archbp. Adalberon in the 10th cent., which, though not actually a University, held almost University rank. In 1420 it was ceded to the English by the Treaty of Troyes, but they were expelled by Joan of Arc, who caused Charles VII to be crowned there in 1429. Its chief manufactures are wine of the champagne kind, and woollen textiles. The English Roman Catholic Seminary, founded at Douai in 1568, was temporarily transferred to R. from 1578 to 1593; and so the Roman Catholic version of the New Testament in English, published here in 1582, is known as the R. New Testament.

In H6 A. i. 1, 60, word is brought to Bedford that "Guienne, Champagne, R., Orleans, are all quite lost"; and in line 92 it is further announced "The Dauphin Charles is crowned K. in R." In Greene's Friar iv., the Emperor tells how Vandermast has disputed with the scholars of "Paris, R., and stately Orleans"; and in ix. Vandermast boasts, "I have given non-plus to the Paduans, to them of R., Louvain, and fair Rotterdam." In Shrew ii. 1, 81, Gremio describes Lucentio as a "young scholar that hath been long studying at R." In Marlowe's Massacre p. 242, K. Henri says of the D. of Guise: "Did he not draw a sort of English priests From Douay to the seminary at R. To hatch forth treason 'gainst their natural Q.?" In Chapman's Rev. Bussy v. 1, Guise tells of a voice he heard crying: "Let's lead, my lord, to R." Dekker, in Double P. P. (1606), says of the Papist passant gardant, or the Spy, "To Rhemes or Rome sails his intelligence." In Ret. Pernass i. 4, Studioso speaks of "Rome and Rhemes that wonted are to give A Cardinal cap to discontented clerks." Hall, Epp. 1, says that the English Universities "may justly challenge either Rhemes or Douay." In Barnes' Charter v. 1, Baglioni has "A Valentia blade, powder of Rhemes, and bullets"; where powder of Rhemes is evidently gunpowder.

RHEINBERCH (= RHEINBERG). A fortified town on the left bank of the Rhine, opposite Duisberg. It was taken by the Spaniards in 1597, recaptured by Count Maurice in 1601, and again retaken by the Spaniards in 1606. In Barnavelt iv. 5, Orange asks, "Who hindered me from rescuing of R. In the last siege?"

RHINE, RHEIN, or RHENE (Rh. = Rhenish, Re. = Rhene). One of the largest rivers in Europe, about 800 m. long. It rises in the St. Gothard Mtns., only a few miles from the source of the Rhône, and after flowing N.E. as far as the Lake of Constance, turns westward and then northward at Basel, from which point it is navigable throughout the rest of its course. It passes successively Spire, Mannheim, Mainz, Coblenz, Bonn, Cologne, Düsseldorf, and Wesel; after entering Holland it divides into several streams, the most noteworthy being the Waal, the Yssel, and the Lek. For 2 cents. it formed the boundary between the Roman Empire and the Teutonic tribes to the E.; and the ambition of France has been, and is, to make the Rhine the boundary between herself and Germany—an ambition realized under the first Republic and Napoleon. She was reduced within her old boundaries in 1814, and Alsace and Lorraine were taken from her by Germany in 1871; they passed back to France, however, in 1919. The provinces N. of Bingen are known as the Rh. Provinces, and the lower Palatinate is often called the Palatinate of the R. The white wines of the dist. between Mainz and Bonn are famous throughout the world, though the Elizabethans regarded them as inferior to the clarets of Bordeaux.

In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Anthony says, "Cæsar made . . . the changed-coloured Re. to blush To bear his bloody burthen to the sea." In Fisher's Fumus ii. 1, Nennius says, "R. and Rhone can serve, And envy Thames his never-captive stream." In iv. 4, Cæsar says, "In vain doth Tagus' yellow sand obey, R.'s horned front and nimble Tigris, If we recoil from hence" (i.e. Britain). The Greek and Roman artists frequently represented the figures of river gods with horns. In Nero iv. 4, Nymphidius says, "If we have any war, it's beyond R. and Euphrates." In May's Agrippina i. 357, Agrippina says, "That German colony, Which I of late deducted o'er the R. To Ubium, for evermore the name Of Agrippina's Colony shall bear"; the reference is to Cologne, or Colonia Agrippinæ. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker i. 1, 205, Dioclesian, anticipating history by more than a century, says, "The Gothes and Vandalls have out past the bounds And o'er the R. past into Burgundy." In Costly Wh. i. 2, the D. says, "Could not this palace, seated in the R., Free him from vermin rats?" The reference is to the story of Bp. Hatto of Mainz, who was devoured by rats in his castle on a little island in the R., opposite Bingen. In Marlowe's Faustus i., Faust says, "I'll make swift R. circle fair Wittenberg." Wittenberg is on the Elbe, 200 m. from the R. Swift is the wrong adjective for the R. in the lower part of its course; though we read in Alphonsus iv. of "the cold, swift-running Rhyn." The R. is often spoken of as cold or frozen; in imitation of the Latin poets, who, thinking of the rigours of a Batavian winter, called the R. gelidus. In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 66, Mandrecarde says, "I furrowed Neptune's seas Northeast as far as is the frozen Re." In B. & F. Shepherdess i. 3, Alexis talks of "the wind that, as he passeth by, Shuts up the stream of R. or Volga," i.e. by freezing them. In Peele's Old Wives v. p. 212, Eumenides says, "For thy sweet sake I have crossed the frozen R." Spenser, in the river-list in F. Q. iv. 11, 21, calls it "swift Re." Milton P. L. i. 353, compares the host of the fallen angels to the tribes of Goths and Vandals, whom "the populous North Poured from her frozen loins to pass Re. or the Danaw." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Justiniano says, "Come, drink up R., Thames, and Meander dry." In Marston's Insatiate v. 1, Sago speaks of "Rhenus ferier [sic] than the cataract." Possibly ferier is a misprint for fiercer; Marston may have been thinking of the falls of Schaffhausen. Drayton, in Idea xxv. 3, says that but for foreigners' prejudice, his lines should "glide on the waves of R.," which he rhymes to "restrain." In Costly Wh. the Palatine of the R. is one of the suitors for the hand of Euphrata. The Palsgrave (i.e. Count Palatine) of the R. appears as one of the 7 Electors in Chapman's Alphonsus. In i. 2, 18, he introduces himself as "George Casimirus, Palsgrave of the Rhein." This is wrong; the Count Palatine on this occasion was Ludwig II. See also under PALATINE.

The wine from the R. provinces was called Rh., generally spelt Rennish, or Reinish, with many variants: In Merch. i. 2, 104, Portia says of her German suitor, "Set a deep glass of Reinish wine on the contrary casket, I know he will choose it." In iii. 1, 44, Salarino, speaking to Shylock about Jessica, says: "There is more difference between your bloods than there is between red wine and rennish"; Rh. wine being white. In Ham. i. 4, 10, Hamlet talks of the K. draining "his draughts of Renish down." In v. 1, 197, the 1st gravedigger tells how Yorick "poured a flagon of Renish on my head once." In Middleton's Michaelmas iii. 1, Shortyard says, "This Rh. wine is like the scouring-stick to a gun, it makes the barrel clear." So in Quip, p. 241, Greene says of poor beer: "It scours a man's maw like Rennish wine." In Prodigal i. 2, the Drawer says, "Here is one hath sent you a pottle of rennish wine, brewed with rosewater." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii. 1, the Drawer brings Ilford "the pure element of claret," and he exclaims: "Did I not call for Rh., you mongrel?" The Stillyard seems to have been specially famous for its Rh. Nash, in Pierce F. 1, says, "Men when they are idle and know not what to do, saith one, Let us go to the Stillyard and drink Rh. wine." Nabbes, in The Bride ii. 6, asks, "Who would let a cit breathe upon her varnish for the promise of a dry neat's tongue and a bottle of Rh. at the Stillyard?" In Ford's Queen iii. 1770, Pynto says, "The good man was made drunk at the Stillyard at a beaver of Dutch bread and Rh. wine." In Underwit iv. 1, a song runs: "The Stillyard's Reanish wine and Divell's white, Who doth not in them sometimes take delight?" In Brome's Moor iv. 2, Quicksands says he saw his wife "at the Stillyard with such a gallant, sousing their dried tongues in Rhemish [sic], Deal, and Backrag." Some take Rhemish to mean wine of Rheims, but there is little doubt that it is a misprint for Rh. In Nash's Prognostication, he predicts: "If the sun were not placed in a cold sign, Renish wine would rise to rod. a quart before the latter end of August." In Nabbes' Bride i. 4, Rhemish, the Drawer, says that he has "Rh., the Swan hath none better." In Dekker's News from Hell, Charon sends in a bill for nails to mend his wherry, "when 2 Dutchmen coming drunk from the Rennish wine house split 3 of the boards with their club-fists." In Cartwright's Ordinary ii. 1, Slicer mentions "Rh. that hath brimstone in it" as a remedy for the itch. In Larum B. i., Danila says of the citizens of Antwerp that he will "beat their Rennish cans about their ears." Drayton, in Polyolb. xv. 109, calls the river "the rich and viny R."

RHOANE. See ROUEN.

RHODANUS. See RHONE.

RHODES (Rn. = Rhodian). An island off the S.W. corner of Asia Minor, 10 m. from the nearest point of the mainland, abt. 45 m. long, and 22 broad at its widest part. It was taken possession of by Dorians from the Peloponnesus, who built the 3 cities of Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus. In 408 B.C., however, the 3 cities combined to build a new capital at the N.E. corner of the island, designed by Hippodamus of Miletus, and called R., which rapidly became one of the most splendid cities of the ancient world. The Rns. alternated in their allegiance between Athens and Sparta; but like the rest of Greece, they were unable to resist the power of Philip of Macedon, and received a Macedonian garrison. After the death of Alexander they expelled it, and in 304 successfully resisted a formidable siege by Demetrius Poliorcetes. Henceforward they enjoyed their independence and entered on the most glorious period of their history. Aeschines founded a school of Rhetoric which attracted students from all the world; Julius Caesar spent some time there in 75 B.C. The city was adorned with statues, the most famous being the Colossus, a huge brazen image of Helios, erected at the entrance to the harbour in 280 B.C., though the legend that it bestrode it cannot be believed. It is said to have been upwards of 150 ft. high; but it was overthrown in an earthquake in 224 B.C., and its fragments lay there until A.D. 672, when they were sold to a Jew by the Caliph Maowias and carried away by 900 camels. After at first siding with Pompeius, R. transferred its allegiance to Caesar, and was sacked in revenge by Cassius in 42 B.C. It became part of the Eastern Empire, and in A.D. 1308 was granted by the Emperor Emmanuel to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem on their expulsion from Palestine. They took possession of it and resisted a siege by Othman, and strongly fortified the city. Mohammed II besieged it in 1480, but it made a stubborn resistance, and his death in 1481 saved it from capture. Selim I was preparing to attack it when he died, but his plans were carried out by Suleyman, who took the island in 1522 after one of the most famous sieges in history. The knights were allowed to depart on honourable terms, and after a few years found a new home at Malta. From that time R. was part of the Ottoman Empire until 1919, when it passed to Italy. The Street of the Knights still remains, adorned with the armorial bearings of its former masters; but the ch. of St. John has been turned into a mosque, and the palace of the Grand-master has fallen into ruins.

In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar boasts: "Rhodans' shrill Tritons through their brazen trumps Echo my fame against the Gallian towers." In v. 1, Cassius calls R. "my nurse when in my youth I drew The flowing milk of Greekish eloquence." He had studied Rhetoric there. When he says "Fair R., I weep to think upon thy fall," referring to his own pitiless sack of the city, one is reminded of the Kaiser Wilhelm whose heart bled for Louvain in 1914. In Jonson's Sejanus iv. 3, Latiaris says of Sejanus: "He does all, gives Cæsar leave To hide his ulcerous and anointed face, With his bald crown, at R." Tiberius had spent 7 years in R. from 5 B.C. to A.D. 2; and visited it again about A.D. 28.

In Tiberius 558, Germanicus says of Tiberius: "R. [saw] him banished." In Ford's Sun iii. 3, Humour calls the Colossus, "That Rn. wonder, gazed at by the sun." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii., Earth asks, "Where's the hundred-gated town called Thebes? Where's the Colosse of R.?" See also under COLOSSUS. R. was visited by pilgrims during its tenure by the Knights of St. John. Hycke, p. 88, says, "I have been at R., Constantine, and In Babylonde." The Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP. i., says, "Then at the Rodes also I was." In Selimus 1928 Corcut says, "I fled fast to Smyrna where we might await the arrival of some ship that might transfreight us safely to R."

In Kyd's Solyman i. 1, reference is made in the prologue to "the history of brave Erastus and his Rn. dame." In i., Haler says to Soliman, "I hold it not good policy to call Your forces home from Persia and Polonia. Strive not for R. by letting Persia slip." This was just before the siege of 1522. In v. Basilisco says, "The Great Turk, whose seat is Constantinople, hath beleaguered R." In Span. Trag. v. 1, Hieronimo says, "The Chronicles of Spain Record this written of a Knight of R.; He was betrothed and wedded at the length To one Perseda, an Italian dame, Whose beauty ravished all that her beheld, Especially the soul of Solyman." Davenant has 2 plays on The Siege of Rhodes, i.e. the siege of 1522. In S. Rowley's When You D. i., Campeus announces the demand of the Pope that Henry "Would send an army to assail the Turk That now invades with war the isle of R." This was in 1518; but nothing came of it. In Dekker's Wonder iii. 1, Torrenti's brother tells "Myself did freight a fleet Of gallant youthful Florentines, all vowed To rescue R. from Turkish slavery." In Marlowe's Jew ii. 2, Bosco says, "When their hideous force environed R., Small though the number was that kept the town, They fought it out and not a man survived To bring the hapless news to Christendom." This is not the truth; the knights were granted liberal terms and went first to Crete and afterwards to Malta. In Massinger's Renegado ii. 5, Grimaldi says, "The bold Maltese at R. Laughed at great Solyman's anger; and if treason Had not delivered them into his power, He had grown old in glory as in years At that so fatal siege." Latimer Sermon on Card i. (1529), compares man to R. and his sins to the Turks, and says, "Alas for pity! The R. are won and overcome by these false Turks." In B. & F. Malta i. 3, Gomera is appointed "Great Master of Jerusalem's hospital, From whence to R. this blest fraternity Was driven, but now amongst the Maltese stands." In Webster's White Devil iv. 2, Lodowico, describing the knights of the several orders, says: "That lord i' the black cloak with the silver cross is Knight of R." The black robe with the 8-pointed silver cross, afterwards known as the Maltese Cross, was the official attire of the Knights of St. John.

In Oth., the action of which is about 1570, in i. 1, 29, Iago says that Othello's eyes had seen the proof of him "At R., at Cyprus, and on other grounds." In i. 3, 14, the Sailor reports "The Turkish preparation makes for R."; but the D. questions this; and a further messenger announces "The Ottomites, Steering with due course towards the isle of R., Have there enjoined them with an after fleet" and are now making for Cyprus. R. was at this time in the possession of the Turks. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 2, Pedro reports that Alvarez, after killing the father of Louis de Castro, "retired himself to R., where, of course, he would be safe from pursuit from Spain. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight, in a list of fish valued for the table by the Romans, mentions "helops from R." The helops was some kind of sea-fish, possibly the sword-fish, or the sturgeon. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Maharball, speaking of the Carthaginians at Capua, says: "Here we are feasted With Chalcedonian tunny, Rn. guilt-heads"; probably the same fish is meant. Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit., p. 101, gives 2 statements about the natural history of R., viz., "The Persian trees in R. do only wax green but never bring forth apple" (see Pliny Hist. Nat. xvi. 47), and "In R. no eagle will build her nest." (Ibid. x. 41.) The scene of B. & F. Maid's Trag. is laid at R.

RHODES, RODA. A town in Saxe-Altenburg, abt. 10 m. S.E. of Jena, and 140 S.W. of Berlin. According to the Faustbuch, it was the birthplace of Faust; and this story is followed by Marlowe, in Faustus Prol., where the Chorus says: "Now is he born . . . In Germany, within a town called Rhodes."

RHODOPE. A mtn. chain forming the boundary between Thrace and Macedonia, now the Despoto Dagh. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 4, Cato asks, "Why would Jove throw them [his thunderbolts] down on Oeta's Mt. Or wound the under-ringing R." and not hurl them at the Romans? In Peele's Anglorum Feriæ 290, he says that the radiant beams of Elizabeth "have power to set on fire The icy ridge of snowy R." Spenser F. Q. ii. 12, 52, says that the Bower of Bliss was "More sweet and wholesome than the pleasant hill Of R., on which the nymph that bore A giant babe herself for grief did kill." The legend was that R. bore a giant babe, Athos, to Neptune. Milton P. L. vii. 35, speaks of "that wild rout that tore the Thracian bard in R." The reference is to the murder of Orpheus by the Thracian Mænads. Barnes, in Parthenophil lxxv. 9, inveighing against the cruelty of Cupid, says that his father was "Ismarus or R."

RHÔNE (the ancient RHODANUS). A river in S. Europe, rising in Mt. St. Gothard, and flowing through the Lake of Geneva. At Lyons it receives the waters of the Saône, and thence runs S. into the Gulf of Lyons. Its total length is 375 m. The lands of the Sequani, Helvetii, Allobroges, and other tribes conquered by Cæsar lay along its banks. In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 1, Nennius says, "Rhine and Rhône can serve And envy Thames his never-captive stream." Spenser, in the river-list in F. Q. iv. 11, 20, mentions "Long Rhodanus, whose source springs from the sky."

RHONE. A variant for Roanne, on the Upper Loire the passage of which it commands. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, the K. of Spain asks that "he may have safe passage by your frontier towns And find the river free that runs by Rhone." The K. of Spain demanded a passage for his troops "from the Alps"—i.e. the Savoy Alps—to his territories in Flanders. Roanne lies on the way between the Savoy Alps and Burgundy, where (as in Bresse) Spain is mentioned in this passage as having partisans.

RIALTO (contracted from Rivo Alto). The largest of the 117 islands upon which Venice is built. It was the place of the earliest settlement, and continued to be the centre of trade. It lies in the N. bend of the Grand Canal, on the W. side. The Ponte di R., originally of wood, but replaced in 1588 by the present stone structure, connects it with the E. bank of the Canal. The Exchange was held in the Piazza of San Jacopo in the porches opposite to the Church. Coryat describes it as "a most stately building where the Venetian gentlemen and the merchants do meet twice a day, betwixt 11 and 12 of the clock in the morning, and betwixt 5 and 6 of the clock in the afternoon." In Merch. Shylock hears "upon the R." (i. 3, 20) of Antonio's ventures by sea; in i. 3, 108, he reproaches Antonio "Many a time and oft In the R. have you rated me About my moneys and my usances." "What news on the R.?" is the question both of Shylock i. 3, 39, and of Salanio iii. 1, 1; and in iii. 1, 48, Shylock calls Antonio "a bankrupt, a prodigal, who dare scarce show his head on the R." In T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 79, the Clown says of one of the Banditti: "This fellow fled from Venice, for killing a man cowardly on the R." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 2, Mosca tells Lady Politick that her husband and the courtizan have rowed together "toward the R." In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Monticelso says, "I make but repetition of what is ordinary and R. talk." In Chapman's All Fools v. 2, Valerio says that Darioetto can tell the exact price of all the new-fashioned waistcoats, nightcaps, gloves, etc., "in the whole R." Chapman was thinking of the Lond. Exchange, where there was a large number of milliners' shops in the arcades. In Marston's What You i. 1, Iacomo says, "Therefore should you have him pass the bridge Up the R. like a soldier." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 295, one of the Lords says, "I have been in Venice in the Realto there, called St. Mark's," a natural enough confusion. In Brome's Novella i. 2, Nanulo says, "Signior Pantaloni intreats you meet him on the R. instantly." In Shirley's Gent. Ven. ii. 1, Malipiero talks of "notaries which now stuff the R." In his Ball v. 1, Freshwater, in the very apocryphal account of his travels, says: "The Venetians are the valiantest gentlemen under the sun; we tickled 'em in the very R." In Marmion's Antiquary i. 2, Gasparo says, "As I followed my son From the R., near unto the bridge, We were encountered by a sort of gallants." The word is used in a generalized sense for any similar place to the R. at Venice. In Andromana, the scene of which is Iberia, in i. 5, Libacer says of his master: "As he was taking water at the R., his foot slipped a little and he came tumbling in the sea." W. Rowley in Search 22, speaks of the Lond. Royal Exchange as "the R."

RICHARD, SAINT. This may have been Richd. Fitznige, Bp. of Lond. in the reign of Henry II, whose shrine was in St. Paul's Cathedral; but there was also a Richd., son of Lothar, K. of Kent, who died at Lucca, where miracles were wrought at his shrine; and another of Chicester. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i., the Palmer claims to have been "at Saynt Rycharde and at SayntROKE."

RICHMOND. A town in N. Riding Yorks., on the Swale, 44 m. N.W. of York. The castle, still a noble ruin, crowns a steep cliff rising 100 ft. above the river. Alan Rufus, Count of Bretagne, came over with William the Conqueror, and was by him made Earl of R. The castle was built by him, but the Norman keep, still in a good state of preservation, was the work of Conan, the 4th Earl. The Earldom was forfeited in 1390. According to Grafton, Robert of Artois was created Earl of R. by Edward III; but there is no documentary proof of this. Edmund Tudor received the title in 1452; and from him it passed to his son Henry, afterwards Henry VII, on whose accession it merged in the Crown. The present D. of R. and Gordon is descended from Charles Lennox, the natural son of Charles II, who was created D. in 1675. In K. J. ii. 1, 552, K. John says, "We'll create young Arthur D. of Bretagne And Earl of R." This was never done. So in Trouble. Reign. Haz., p. 250, John says to Arthur, "Here I give thee Brittain for thine own Together with the earldom of Richmond." As both were already Arthur's by descent, this was not exactly a generous gift. In Ed. III i. 1, the K. says to Robert of Artois, "We create thee Earl of R. here." In H6 C. iv. 6, 67, K. Henry lays his hand on the head of "young Henry Earl of R." and predicts that he will be K. one day. He is forthwith sent to Brittany for safety. Henry VII is mentioned as R. throughout Acts iv. and v. of R3. In R3 i. 3, 20, The Q. says to Derby: "The Countess R., good my Lord of Derby To your good prayers will scarcely say Amen." The Countess, Henry VII's mother, married Stanley, Earl of Derby, on the death of her husband, Edmund Tudor.

In Davenport's Matilda i. 1, Oxford speaks of "R., imperious Leicester, and old Bruce" as amongst the rebellious Barons. This was Ranulph Blundevill, who claimed the title as the husband of Constance, the daughter of Conan, the 4th Earl. Nash, in Summers, p. 35, says, "I would have a barber who would whet his razor on his R. cap." R. was a mart for the Yorkshire wool, and remained a seat of the hand-knitted stocking manufacture until the Industrial Revolution.

RICHMOND. A town in Surrey, on the S. bank of the Thames, 10 m. from Lond. It was originally called Sheen, and was the seat of a royal palace as far back as the reign of Henry I. In 1499 the palace was burnt down; Henry VII rebuilt it, and called it R. from his own title, Earl of R. Here both he and Elizabeth died. The palace was partially demolished during the Commonwealth, and the rest of it was pulled down in the 18th cent. The view from R. Hill is justly famous. In Armin's Moreclacke B. 4, a Messenger announces: "The Court goes from R. to Whitehall." In Middleton's Tennis, the characters in the Introduction are R., St. James's, and Denmark House. Herrick, in Tears to Thamesis (1647), recalls his excursions on the Thames "With soft smooth virgins for our chaste disport, To R., Kingston, and to Hampton Court."

RIDYBONE, REDBOURN. A vill. in Herts., 4 m. N.W. of St. Alban's, on the N.W. road. Here were preserved the relics of a fabulous saint, Amphiball, said to have been the means of St. Alban's conversion; but his shadowy existence is due to a mistranslation of amphibolus in the legend of St. Alban; it really means nothing but a cloak! In J. Heywood's Four PP. i., the Palmer claims to have been "at Ridybone and at the blood of Hayles."

RIE. See RYE.

RIMINI. A town in Italy on the coast of the Adriatic, 60 m. N.W. of Ancona. It is the ancient Ariminum. It has a fine cathedral dating from the 14th cent., and a noble marble bridge built by the Emperor Augustus. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "good Rimini."

RIO DE LA PLATA. The estuary of the rivers Parana and Uruguay, on the E. coast of S. America, between Uruguay and the Argentine. In Mayne's Match iii. 2, Quartfield says of the alleged strange fish they are exhibiting: "We took him strangely in the Indies, near the mouth of Rio de la Plata."

RIPHEAN MOUNTAINS (more properly RIPHEAN). A fabulous range of mtns. conceived by the Greeks as forming the N. boundary of the world and being wrapped in perpetual snows. In Ford's Sun v. 1, Winter says, "At your beams the waggoner might thaw His chariot axled with R. snow." In Spenser F.Q. iii. 8, 6, the witch makes the false Florimell out of purest snow "Which she had gathered in a shady glade Of the R. hills." In Rabelais Pantagruel ii. 11, Licksole says, "The R. mtns. had been that year oppressed with a great sterility of counterfeit gudgeons." He is talking elaborate nonsense.

RIPPON, now RIPON. A city in W. Riding Yorks., on the Ure, 23 m. N.W. of York. The famous cathedral was founded in 1331 and completed in 1494. It was formerly celebrated for the manufacture of spurs, which gave rise to the proverbial phrase "as true as R. rowels." A pair of them, presented to James I in 1617, cost £5. In Jonson's Staple i. 1, Pennyboy junior says to the Spurrier, "There's an angel; if my spurs be not right R.—" and the Spurrier interrupts: "Give me never a penny if I strike not through your bounty with the rowels." In Davenant's Wits v. 3, Palatine says, "Whip me with wire, Headed with rowels of sharp R. spurs; I'll endure anything rather than thee."

RISO, RIZEH. A spt. town on the S. coast of the Black Sea, abt. 50 m. E. of Trebizond. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 1, the K. of Trebizond enumerates the troops he brings to fight against Tamburlaine from "Riso, Sancia, and the bordering towns."

RIXAM, or RIXUM. See WREXHAM.

ROAN. See ROUEN.

ROCHELLE (LA). A spt. in France on the Bay of Biscay, opposite to the islands of Rhé and Oleron, 95 m. N. of Bordeaux. It had a large trade, and was especially known for its wine, which was a light claret, very innocuous as compared with the strong wines of Spain. In the 16th cent. it became the centre of the Calvinist Protestants; and after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew it successfully resisted a 6 months' siege by the League. It was taken, however, by Richelieu in 1628 after a valiant resistance of 8 months. Chaucer, in C. T. C. 571, compares the weakness of the wine of "the R., near Burdeaux-town" with the strong Spanish wine of Lepe. Greene, in Quip, p. 241, says of the dishonest vintner: "If he hath a strong Gascoigne wine, he can allay it with a small Rochel wine." Hall, in Satires v. 2, compares R. wine unfavourably with that of Bourdeaux; "When pleasing Bourdeaux falls unto his lot, Some sourish R. cuts thy thirsting throat." In Webster's Weakest v. 3, Villiers says, "I am of R., and my name is Villiers." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 121, Brackenbury says, "His luck was to take the prize of France As he from Rochell was for Lond. bound." In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Honeysuckle says, "They say Charing Cross is fallen down since I went to R." In Davenant's Plymouth iv. 1, Trifle, the inventor of false news, says: "R.'s recovered by the Huguenots." In Middleton's Gypsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "All the world is a second R.," i.e. a refuge for the persecuted.

ROCHESTER. An ancient episcopal city in Kent, on the Medway, 33 m. E. of Lond. On the right bank of the river are the fine remains of the Norman castle, built by Bp. Gundulph in the 11th cent. It has sustained several sieges, notably by Simon de Montfort, and by the rebels of Jack Straw's raising. The cathedral was founded in 604 by Augustine, and rebuilt, after its destruction by the Danes, by Gundulph early in the 12th cent. It is noteworthy for its fine Norman front. R. is on the old pilgrim's road from Lond. to Canterbury. In Chaucer C. T., B. 3116, the Host says, "Lo! Rouchestre stant heer faste by." In H4 A. i. 2, 144, Poinc says, "Gadshill lies to-night in R.," and ii. 1, takes place in an Inn-yard in R. Gadshill, the scene of the robbery, is about 2½ m. on the Lond. side of R. In John Evangel. 360, Evil counsel says, "Sith I came from R. I have spent all my winning." Probably he got his winning on Gadshill, which was a notorious haunt of highwaymen. In Trouble. Reign. Haz., p. 299, Lewis says, "Your city R. with great applause By some divine instinct laid arms aside." In Life of Jack Straw i., Morton reports: "They [the rebels] hold me out from my castle at R." The Bp. of R. figures in Oldcastle as one of the persecutors of the Knight. In ii. 1, Harpool makes the Bp.'s sumner eat his process, saying, "If thy seal were as broad as the lead that covers R. ch., thou shouldst eat it." In Davenport's Matilda v. 3, Chester reports that Lewis and the French "have reached R." In Bale's Johan 1361, Private Wealth says of the Pope's Interdict: "The bp. of Salysbery and the bp. of R. Shall execute it in Scotland everywhere." The Interdict, however, did not extend to Scotland, and in any case these Bps. had no authority there. In Fair Women ii. 1092, we are informed that Browne was apprehended "at R. in a butcher's house of his own name." In Feverham ii. 1, Will says, "Let us be going and we'll bait at R., the horse halts downright." In Lyly's Bombie iii. 4, Riscio says to her, "They say you are cunning, and are called the good woman of R." In iv. 1, Dromio says, "We in R. spur so many hackneys that we must needs spur scholars, for we take them for hackneys"; his reason being that a scholar can be hired for 10 groats to say service, "and that's no more than a post horse from hence to Canterbury." Dekker, in Bellman, says that "the Hackney-men of R. have been oftentimes come over" with a certain horse-courser's trick which he describes. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker i. 1, 195, Maximus says to his daughter, "R. Castle shall be your palace." Of course there was no castle at R. as early as A.D. 297, the date of the play.

ROCKINGHAM. A small town in Northants, 21 miles N.E. of Northampton, near the boundary of Leicestersh. The alliterative phrase "as far as from Rome to R." is used for a great distance. In Wise Men iv. 2, Hortano says to the Puritan wife of Rusticano, "You allege Scripture as far as Rome is from R. and expound it at your pleasure."

ROCKSBOROUGH, ROXBURGH. Formerly the capital of Roxburghsh., on the left bank of the Teviot, 4 m. S.W. of Kelso. It is now an inconsiderable vill.; but the ruins of the ancient castle W. of the town are still to be seen. It was one of the oldest and strongest castles in Scotland, and owing to its situation near the Border was frequently besieged and taken by Scotch and English in turn. In 1333 it was taken by Edward III and ceded to England by Baliol. In Ed. III i. 2, Mountague reports of the K. of Scotland: "The tyrant hath begit with siege The castle of R., where inclosed The Countess Salisbury is like to perish." In the next scene Edward relieves the Castle; and Act ii. is taken up with the K.'s love-making to the Countess there.

ROGUE LANE. A nickname for Sheere or Shire Lane, Lond., given to it because of its extremely disreputable character. See under SHEER LANE. In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Clough wishes for Priss: "Mayst thou set up in R. L., and die sweetly in Tower Ditch."

ROKE, SAINT. The shrine of St. Roke or Roch at Angera on the E. side of Lago Maggiore in N. Italy. The saint was born at Montpellier and died in prison at Angera, where a shrine was built in his honour. He was specially invoked for help in times of plague. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i., the Palmer claims to have visited, inter alios, "At Saynt Rycharde and at Saynt Roke."

ROLLS HOUSE. The official residence of the Master of the R. on the E. side of Chancery Lane, Lond. The site was originally occupied by a H. of Maintenance for Converted Jews, built by Henry III in 1233. A very ancient picture of the R. Chapel is preserved in a MS. of Matthew Paris at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and is reproduced in Bell's Fleet Street in Seven Centuries, p. 80. In 1377 the house and chapel were handed over to the Master of the R., who resided and held his court there. A new H. was erected in 1717, but the Chapel remained. Now H. and Chapel have gone to make room for the new Public Records Office, and the Court has been transferred to the Royal Palace of Justice. In Lydgate's Lickpenny the author says, "Unto the R. I gat me from thence Before the clerks of the Chancerie, Where many I found earning of pence But none at all once regarded me." Marlowe's Ed. II was "printed at London for Roger Barnes, and are to be sold at his shop in Chauncerie Lane over against the Rolles. 1612."

ROMAGNA. A dist. on the coast of the Adriatic between the sea and the Apennines, from the mouth of the Foglia to that of the Panaro. Ravenna was its chief town. It was bestowed by Charlemagne on the Holy See, but it was not made actually part of the Papal States till its conquest by Caesar Borgia about 1500. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, the Pope allots to Caesar: "In Romania from Pontremolie and Prato to fair Florence." In iv. 2, Caesar claims: "This arm hath conquered all Romania." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have ambled all over Italy "from Venice to Roma, Vecchia, Bononia, R.," and half a dozen other cities. In Jonson's Volpone i. 1, Mosca makes scorn of the merchant who "hath filled his vaults With Romagna and rich Candian wines, Yet drinks the lees of Lombard's vinegar."

ROME (Rn.= Roman, Rh.= Romish). The ancient Roma, the famous city on the Tiber in Italy, 15 m. from the sea coast. According to tradition it was founded by Romulus and his brother Remus 753 B.C. The original settlement appears to have been on the Palatine Hill, but the city ultimately spread over the seven hills, viz., the Capitoline, Palatine, Aventine, Coelian, Esquiline, Viminal, and Quirinal. These were all on the left bank of the Tiber; the modern city has, however, crossed the river and occupied the Vatican. R. was governed by Kings until the expulsion of the Tarquins in 509 as a result of the Rape of Lucrece by Sextus Tarquinius. Thenceforward it was a Republic, the executive officers being the 2 Consuls, of whom L. Junius Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus were the first. The story of Coriolanus belongs to 488. In 390 R. was taken by the Gauls after the terrible defeat of the Allia. She recovered, however, and gradually made herself mistress of central Italy. The defeat of Carthage in the Punic wars was the first step in a career of conquest which at the close of the 1st century B.C. left R. the imperial city of the Mediterranean basin from the Euphrates to the Danube and the Rhine. The civil wars between Pompey and Caesar led to the assassination of Caesar by Brutus and Cassius in 44 B.C., and the subsequent struggle between Octavian and Antony resulted in the complete ascendancy of Octavian, who from 23 B.C. was the absolute ruler of the Empire under the titles of Emperor and Augustus. In A.D. 330 Constantine transferred the capital to Constantinople, and in 395 the Empire was divided into an E. and a W. part. During this century Italy was invaded successively by the Goths, the Vandals, and the Huns, and in 410 R. was taken and sacked by Alaric; Attila, the Hun, again despoiled the city in 454; and in 476 Augustulus, the last of the Western Emperors, died. From this time the City and dist. around it were practically governed by the Bps. of R., who had taken the title of Papa or Pope; until in 800 Charlemagne, K. of the Franks, was crowned Emperor of R., and so laid the foundation of the Holy Rn. Empire, which lasted nominally until the abdication of Francis II of Austria in 1806. During the Middle Ages the Popes were the supreme authority in R. and the Papal States, which were gradually added to their territorial possessions. Finally in 1870 the temporal power of the Popes was limited to the palace of the Vatican, and R. became the capital of United Italy. As the list of plays shows, the chief interest of the dramatists was in the events centring round the life and death of Julius Cæsar; but they were also attracted by the tragic stories of Lucrece, Virginia, Sophonisba, Coriolanus, Hannibal, Catiline, Sejanus, and Nero; and the story of the Rn. conquest of Britain was specially interesting from the possibility of patriotic treatment. A few plays also deal with stories of the later Empire. Very few plays have their scene laid in modern R.; Webster's Duchess of Malfi and White Devil, and Barnes' Devil's Charter almost complete the list. Modern R. stands rather for the Rn. Catholic Church, and almost all the references to her are in that connection.

The following plays and poems deal with events in the history of R.: Rape of Lucrece, Coriolanus, Titus Andronicus, Julius Cæsar, Antony and Cleopatra (Shakespeare); Cornelia (Kyd); Cleopatra (Daniel); Octavia (Nuce); Virtuous Octavia (Brandon); Julius Cæsar (Alexander); Appius and Virginia (Bower, R.); Wounds of the Civil Wars (Lodge); Cæsar and Pompey (Chapman); Cæsar's Revenge (Anon.); Catiline, Sejanus (Jonson); Sophonisba (Marston); Rape of Lucrece (Heywood); Tragedy of Nero, Tragedy of Tiberius Claudius Nero (Anon.); Virgin Martyr, Roman Actor, Believe as You List, Emperor of the East (Massinger); Appius and Virginia (Webster); Faithful Friends, Bonduca, The Prophetess, A.D. 284, Valentinian, A.D. 454, The False One (Beaumont and Fletcher); Tragedy of Cleopatra, Julia Agrippina (May); Hannibal and Scipio (Nabbes); Messalina (Richards); Fuinus Troes (Fisher); Devil's Charter (Barnes); The Jewes Tragedy (Heming).

R. was pronounced Room during the 15th and 16th cents., and even later. In Lucrece 715, we have: "So fares it with this faultful lord of R., For now against himself he sounds this doom."; and in 1644: "And never be forgot in mighty R. The adulterate death of Lucrece and her groom." In K. J. iii. 1, 180, Constance says, "O lawful let it be That I have room with R. to curse awhile." In J. C. i. 2, 156, Cassius says, "Now is it R. indeed, and room enough When there is in it but one only man." In Richards' Messalina Epil. 6, the author says, "This Theater does appear The music R. of concord." The scene of the play is R. In J. C. iii. 1, 289, Antony says, "Here is a mourning R., a dangerous R., No R. of safety for Octavius yet." In H6 A. iii.

i, 51, Winchester says, "R. shall remedy this," and Warwick answers: "Roam thither then," which seems to demand the modern pronunciation.

The usual adjective is Rn.; but Rh. occurs once in Cym. i. 6, 152, in a contemptuous sense; Imogen comparing her treatment by her father to that she might expect in "a Rh. stew." In Kyd's Cornelia ii., the lady says, "The noble Romulists that rest forbear To seek my murdering love." The same curious word is used again in iii. 2. The idea is that the Rns. are descendants of Romulus.

R., the ancient city founded in 753 B.C., the seat of the Rn. Republic, and later the head of the Rn. Empire. In H4 B. iv. 3, 45, Falstaff says, "I may justly say with the hook-nosed fellow of R., I came, saw, and overcame." Julius Cæsar, after defeating Pharnaces of Pontus 47 B.C., sent the despatch to the Senate, "Veni, vidi, vici." In H5 v. Chor. 26, the citizens of Lond., flocking out to meet Henry, are compared to "the senators of antique R." going forth to "fetch their conquering Cæsar in." In H6 A. i. 2, 56, the Bastard says of Joan of Arc: "The spirit of deep prophecy she hath, Exceeding the 9 sibyls of old R." The number of Sibyls is variously given by different authorities, but there was only one specially connected with R., the Cumæan sibyl, who sold the sibylline books to Tarquin. Possibly Shakespeare was thinking of the original number of these books, which was 9. In Cor. i. 1, 166, Menenius says, "R. and her rats are at the point of battle." In iii. 3, 104, Coriolanus is forbidden on pain of death "to enter our R. gates." In Tit. i. 1, 6, Saturninus says, "I am his firstborn son, that was the last That wore the imperial diadem of R." The supposed date of the play is during the Empire; but there is nothing historical about it. In Ham. i. 1, 113, Horatio recalls the portents that happened. "In the most high and palmy state of R., A little ere the mightiest Julius fell." In ii. 2, 410, Hamlet refers to the time "when Roscius was an actor in R." He died 62 B.C. Cym. i. 4, is laid in R.; the period is the latter part of the 1st cent. A.D. In Lucr. 1811, we are told that Brutus, "with the Rns. was esteemed so As silly-jeering idiots are with kings." In H5 iii. 2, 87, Fluellen extols "the disciplines of the pristine wars of the Rns." In H5 ii. 4, 37, the Constable says that the youthful follies of Henry "Were but the outside of the Rn. Brutus Covering discretion with a coat of folly." Brutus pretended to be an idiot in order to escape the vengeance of Tarquin. In H6 B. iv. 1, 135, Suffolk says, "A Rn. sworder and banditto slave Murdered sweet Tully." Cicero was murdered by the emissaries of Mark Antony. In Cor. i. 1, 71, Menenius says, "The Rn. State . . . will on The way it takes, cracking 10,000 curbs Of more strong link asunder, than can ever Appear in your impediment." In Cor. ii. 2, 92, Cominius tells how "at 16 years, When Tarquin made a head for R., he [Coriolanus] fought Beyond the mark of others." In J. C. ii. 1, 52, Brutus says, "Shall R. stand under one man's awe? What, R.? My ancestors did from the streets of R. The Tarquin drive when he was called a k." In Cym. iii. 1, 8, Lucius says, "When Julius Cæsar was in this Britain and conquered it, Cassibelan, thine uncle, granted R. a tribute." In Jonson's Sejanus iii. 1, Natta says, "Thou praisest Brutus and affirmst That Cassius was the last of all the Rns." In Nero ii. 2, the Emperor speaks of "Empire-crowned seven-mountain-seated R." In Massinger's Great Duke i. 2, Cosmo says, "This kind of adoration showed not well In the old Rn. emperors, who forgetting That they were flesh and blood, would be styled gods."

In B. & F. False One v. 2, Septimius says, "R., that from Romulus first took her name Had her walls watered with a crimson shower Drained from a brother's heart." In their Prophethess ii. 3, Delphia says, "'Tis imperious R., R., the great mistress of the conquered world." In Calisto, Haz. i. 58, Sempromio says, "Behold Nero, in the love of Poppæa oppressed, R. how he brent." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar says, "R., our native country, Fair pride of Europe, mistress of the world, Cradle of virtues, nurse of true renown, Whom Jove hath placed in top of 7 hills That thou the lower world's 7 climes mightst rule," and in iii. 2, a Rn. speaks: "Fair R., great monument of Romulus, Thou mighty seat of consuls and of kings." In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 1, Britale, a Briton, says, "Imperious monster, R., seven-headed Hydra, We scorn thy threats." So in iii. 5, Nennius protests: "Before this land shall wear the Rn. yoke, Let first the adamantine axle crack." In Davenant's Cr. Brother iii. 1, Cosimo says, "The old sibyl presented her divine manuscripts to the dull Rn." In Barnavelt iv. 5, Barnavelt says, "Octavius did affect the Empire And strove to tread upon the neck of R. And all her ancient freedoms." In Val. Welsh i. 1, we are told that the action takes place in "the reign of R.'s great Emperor, ycleped Claudian." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 43, tells how from Long Alba "Romulus to R. removed."

The proverb "Roome was not builded on a day" occurs in the preface to Tarlton's News out of Purgatory, and in B. & F. Prophethess i. 3. Spenser's Ruines of Rome should be consulted passim.

Milton, P. R. i. 217, makes our Lord say that it was his early ambition "To rescue Israel from the Rn. yoke." Pompey brought Judæa under the Rn. sway 65 B.C. In iii. 158, the Tempter speaks of "Judæa now and all the Promised land Reduced a province under Rn. yoke." In 362 he speaks of the difficulty of establishing an independent kingdom in Jerusalem "Between 2 such enclosing enemies, Rn. and Parthian"; and advises our Lord to attack the Parthians first "maugre the Rn." Thus He would sit on the throne of David and rule "From Egypt to Euphrates . . . and R. or Cæsar need not fear." But in iv. 45 he shows our Lord "great and glorious R., Queen of the earth"; and in 80 says, "All nations now to R. obedience pay, To R.'s great Emperor"; who is now "from R. retired to Capræa" (i.e. Tiberius). In P. L. xi. 405, Adam is shown "Europe . . . and where R. was to sway The world"; in ix. 510, reference is made to the legend that Jupiter Capitolinus, in the form of a serpent, had intercourse "with her who bore Scipio, the height of R."; i.e. Scipio Africanus Major.

In Mason's Mulleasses 1477, Ferrara says, "The sts. of Florence, like the sts. of R. When death and Scylla reigned, shall run with blood." The reference is to the proscription that followed the return of Sylla to R. in 82 B.C. In Kirke's Champions ii. 1, Anthony speaks of R. as "Great mistress of the world, whose large-stretched arms O'er land and sea holds domination; Renowned for government in peace or war Even to the shore of scorching India."

Character of the ancient Romans. In Lucr. 1828, Brutus addresses Collatine "Courageous Rn." In H. B. ii. 2, 135, Falstaff begins his letter: "I will ~~imitate~~ the honorable Rns. in brevity." In Cor. i. 2, 14, Titus Lartius is described as "a most valiant Rn." In Mereh. iii. 2, 297, Bassanio describes Antonio as one "In whom The ancient Rn. honour more appears Than any that draws breath in Italy." In Cor. i. 6, 2, Cominius says, "We are come off Like Rs., neither foolish in our stands, Nor cowardly in retire." On the other hand, in iii. 1, 238, Coriolanus says of the plebeians: "I would they were barbarians,—as they are, Though in R. littered—not Rns.—as they are not, Though calved in the porch o' the Capitol." In J. C. i. 3, 80, Cassius says, "Rns. now have thews and limbs like to their ancestors; But . . . our fathers' minds are dead, And we are governed with our mothers' spirits"; and later, "Cæsar would not be a wolf But that he sees the Rns. are but sheep." In ii. 1, 125, Brutus says, "What other bond Than secret Rns. that have spoke the word And will not palter?" and in 233 Cassius says, "Show yourselves true Rns." In Cym. v. 5, 81, Lucius says, "Sufficeth A Rn. with a Rn's heart can suffer." In Massinger's Madam iv. 2, Goldwire says, "I'll suffer like a Rn." In Shirley's Traitor ii. 1, Sciarra says, "It was the glory of Rns. to prefer their empire's safety to their own lives." In Massinger's Guardian v. 4, Alphonso says, "We do approve the Rn. maxim, To save one citizen is a greater prize Than to have killed in war 10 enemies." In his Virgin i. 1, Diocletian boasts of having revived "the ancient Rn. discipline Which raised R. to her greatness." In his Believe v. 2, Antiochus says, "Pity in Rn. officers is a crime to be punished more than murder in cold blood." In his Maid Hon. iv. 4, Aurelia says, "The lordly Rn. who held it the height Of human happiness to have kings and queens To wait by his triumphant chariot-wheels, In his insulting pride deprived himself Of drawing near the nature of the gods In being merciful." In B. & F. Rule a Wife iv. 1, Estifania says, "I remembered your old Rn. axiom, The more the danger, still the more the honour." In Chapman's Rev. Bussy ii. 1, Baligny says to Clermont: "He [Guise] ranks you with the best of the ancient Rns." In Ingelend's Disobedient 51, the Father says, "Wilt thou follow warfare and a soldier be pointed And so among Trojans and Rns. be numbered?" In Davenant's Favourite ii. 1, Oramont says, "The Rn. race of men Sure is not yet extinct in Italy." In Brewer's Lingua i. 1, Lingua speaks of "The Rn. eloquent"; no doubt he is thinking specially of Cicero. In Brome's Covent G. iii. 1, Cockbrain says, "I will suffer private affliction with a Rn. resolution for the public welfare." In Dekker's If it be 354, Ravillac protests: "Merciless hangmen! To tyrannize over so brave a Rn. spirit." In Davenport's New Trick iii. 2, Roger says of his master: "He was too full of fire, witness his spirit, Most worthy of a Rn. character." In Chapman's Cæsar iv. 5, 45, Statilius says, "The gods avert from every Rn. mind The name of slave to any tyrant's power." In iii. 1, 119, Pompey prays the gods, "that our great Rn. Genius Have made, not give us one day's conquest only, Nor grow in conquests for some little time, As did the Genius of the Macedons, Nor be by land great only, like Laconians; Nor yet by sea alone, as was th' Athenians', Nor slowly stirred up, like the Persian angel, Nor rocked asleep soon, like the Ionian spirit; But made our Rn. Genius fiery, watchful, And even from R.'s prime joined his youth with hers, Grow as she grew, and firm as earth abide By her increasing pomp at sea and shore." The whole passage is taken from Plutarch's De Fortuna Romanorum II. In Shirley's Bird iii. 3, Donella cries, "O liberty! liberty! Are all the Rn. spirits extinct?" Milton, in Son. to Vane 3, says, "a better senator ne'er held The helm of R."

The Rn. virtue is often used specifically of the willingness to commit suicide, as Cato of Utica did

(he is the subject of Chapman's Cæsar v. 2), rather than submit to ignominy. In Ham. v. 2, 352, Horatio says, "I am more an antique Rn. than a Dane; Here's yet some liquor left," and seizes the poisoned goblet. In Mac. v. 8, 1, Macbeth says, "Why should I play the Rn. fool and die On my own sword?" In J. C. v. 3, 89, Titinius, about to stab himself, says, "This is a Rn.'s part." In Ant. iv. 15, 87, Cleopatra says, "Let's do it after the high Rn. fashion And make death proud to take us." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Mosca says, "Let's die like Rns., since we have lived like Grecians." In Massinger's Maid Hon. iv. 3, Adorni says, "This Rn. resolution of self-murder Will not hold water at the high tribunal." In B. & F. Woman Hater iii. 3, when Lazarillo says, "I will die bravely and like a Rn.," one of the bystanders says, "Mark that! He will kill himself." In Shirley's Courtier ii. 2, Carintha says, "We know our dwelling after death Which Rn. souls unlawfully did seek And found too soon." In Davenant's Cr. Brother v. 3, Foreste says, "A true Rn. now would walk aside and with his own sword dismiss his own soul." In B. & F. Fair Maid I v. 2, Forobosco says, "The foreman of their jury is dead, but he died like a Rn." In Massinger's Madam iv. 2, Goldwire says, "I'll suffer like a Boman"; probably a misprint for Rn. In Lælia iv. 2, 46, Virginius says, "Romanus sum, Romano more moriar." In B. & F. Cure v. 3, Bobadilla says, "I would even have died too bravely, i' faith, like a Rn. steward; hung myself in mine own chain."

The Rn. women, with Lucrece as their prototype, were highly praised for their chastity; and the matrons for their gravity and dignity. In Shrew ii. 1, 298, Petruchio says, "She will prove Rn. Lucrece for her chastity." In Cor. v. 3, 65, Coriolanus describes Valeria as "the Moon of R.; chaste as the icicle That's curdied by the frost from purest snow And hangs on Dian's temple." In Massinger's Madam iii. 2, Luke says he will revive in his nieces "the memory Of the Rn. matrons, who kept captive queens To be their handmaids." In his Emperor i. 1, Paulinus says, "The mother of the Gracchi, grave Cornelia, R. still boasts of." In v. 2, Theodosius says, "Great Julius, only for suspicion of a crime, Sued a divorce; nor was this Rn. rigour Censured as cruel." In May's Heir iii. 2, Leucothea says, "No Rn. dame shall in her great example outgo my love." In B. & F. Thierry iv. 2, Martell says that in Ordella "All was that Athens, R., or warlike Sparta, Have registered for good in their best women."

Roman luxury, extravagance and decadence under the Empire. In Shirley's Honoraria ii. 1, Phantasm says, "If you have but the patience to spend, you may outdo the Rn. luxuries."

Romans used as a humorously complimentary address. In Merry Devil v., Sir Arthur says, "We were stayed for you," and the Host replies: "Were you, my noble Rns.?" In Middleton's Mad World i. 1, the Ancient says to Folly-wit, "Why there spoke a Rn. captain!"

The Eagle was the standard of ancient R.; it was made the national standard by Caius Marius 104 B.C. In Cym. iv. 2, 348, the Soothsayer sees "Jove's bird, the Rn. eagle, winged From the spongy S. to this part of the W." In Jonson's Sejanus iii. 1, Silius talks of his battles with the Gauls "when our Rn. eagles Have fanned the fire with their labouring wings." In B. & F. Prophetess iii. 1, Dioclesian says, "Expectation, like the Rn. eagle, Took stand and called all eyes." In Marston's Leaguer iii. 4, Faustina urges Philautus to "seek for fame In brave exploits like these that snatch their honour Out of the talents of the Rn. eagle." Spenser, in Ruines of Rome xvii., says, "Then was the German raven in disguise That Rn. eagle seen to cleave asunder." In Hemings' Jewes Trag. 584, Vespasian says, "Let our Rn. eagle be displayed." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker i. 1, 26, K. Allured says, "Maximinus and Dioclesian Display their by-neckt eagle over Brittain." Rowley evidently transfers the double-headed eagle of Austria to the Rn. empire. In Shirley's Servant iv. 5, Belinda says, "The Rn. eagles never Did spread their wings upon so many shores."

The Rn. sword was a short two-edged blade, more used for thrusting than cutting; the soldiers were armed with this and with a pilum or javelin. In Lucr. 505, Sextus "shakes aloft his Rn. blade." In Cym. iii. 3, 57, Bellario says, "My body's marked with Rn. swords." In B. & F. False One i. 1, Labienus, describing the battle of Pharsalia, says, "The Rn. piles on either side Drew Rn. blood, which spent, the prince of weapons, The sword, succeeded."

Roman triumphs. These were great public processions to the Capitol granted to victorious generals. In Oth. iv. 1, 121, Othello says to Cassio, "Do you triumph, Rn.?" where the word triumph obviously suggests the epithet; Cassio was actually a Florentine. In As. iv. 2, 4, Jacques says, "Let's present him to the D., like a Rn. conqueror." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Gaveston says, "I think myself as great As Cæsar riding in the Rn. street With captive kings at his triumphant car." In Massinger's Picture ii. 2, Ferdinand says, "All rewards and signs of honour, With which the Rns. crowned their several leaders, To him alone are proper." In his Bondman iii. 3, Graculo says, "Let us, like conquering Rns., walk in triumph, Our captives following."

Roman Law. In Lucr. prol. 2, we are told that Tarquinius, "contrary to the Rn. laws and customs had possessed himself of the kingdom." In Tit. i. 1, 280, Marcus says, "Suum cuique is our Rn. justice." In i. 1, 407, Bassianus says, "Let the laws of R. determine all."

Roman custom of putting a cap or Pillens on the head of an enfranchised slave; the cap of liberty. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 3, Candido, defending the citizen's cap, says, "It is a citizen's badge and first was worn By the Rns.; for when any bondsman's turn Came to be made a freeman, thus 'twas said, He to the cap was called, that is, was made Of R. a freeman."

Roman Augurs. These officials foretold the future by the appearances and cries of birds; but in the later days of the Republic it was recognized that the whole business was a solemn farce. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass ii. 1, 508, Radagon says, "Tut! Be not now a Rn. augurer!"

Roman Authors, Orators, Actors and Theatre. Gascoigne, in Government prol., says, "I mean for to present no Terence phrase; The verse that pleased a Romaine rash intent Might well offend the godly preacher's vein." The chief orator was Cicero, but the last years of the Republic, and the 1st cent. of the Empire were adorned with many famous pleaders. Milton P. L. ix. 671, compares the Tempter to "some orator renowned In Athens or free R." In P. R. iv. 360, he says that the Hebrew prophets excelled "all the oratory of Greece and R." In J. C. ii. 1, 226, Brutus says, "Let not our looks put on our purposes, But bear it as our Rn. actors do With untired spirits and formal constancy." In Chapman's Rev. Bussy i. 1, Guise says, "I would have these things Brought upon stages, to let mighty misers See all their grave and serious miseries played As once they were in Athens and old R." The Rn. theatre was in the amphitheatre form, like the one, for instance, preserved at Pompeii. In Massinger's Unnat. Com. ii. 1, Malefort says, "Retire to yonder mt. Where you, as in a Rn. theatre, May see the bloody difference determined."

Various objects described as Roman. The Rn. dollar was used for the standard coin of ancient R. in the time of the kings. In B. & F. Friends ii. 2, Pergamus says, "I would not, for 100 Rn. dollars But be the first that should come home again." In L. L. L. v. 2, 617, Longaville speaks of the face of Holofernes as "The face of an old Rn. coin, scarce seen." In B. & F. Gentleman i. 1, Marine says, "Those are the models of the ancient world Left, like the Rn. statues, to stir up Our following hopes." In Field's Weathercock iv. 2, Pouts defies "any tortorous engine Even from the Rn. yoke to the Scotch boot." The yoke was a wooden beam, called Furca, worn by slaves as a punishment.

R., of the primitive Rn. Ch. of the 1st cent., to which St. Paul addressed his Epistle to the Rns., and which was traditionally (but doubtfully) said to have been founded by St. Peter. In Conf. Cons. iv. 1, Philologus says, "By the name of Babylon, from whence Peter wrote, is understood R." See I. Pet. v. 13. Modern expositors for the most part agree with Philologus. He says later in the scene: "St. Paul to the Rns. hath this worthy sentence." In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "The apostle Paul in his xiii chapter of his epistle to the Romaines teacheth plainly that rulers bear not the sword in vain." In Juventus, p. 128, Knowledge says, "The reward of the heavenly inheritance Is given us through faith for Chrises deservings As St. Paul declareth in the iiiii chapter to the Romaines." In York M. P. xlvii. 288, Peter says, "To Rns. so royal . . . Will I pass fro this place, my people to preach."

The Holy Roman Empire. The unique Empire, which lasted from its institution by Charles the Gt. in A.D. 800 till the resignation of the dignity by Francis II of Austria in 1806. The Emperor was appointed by 7 Electors, the Archbps. of Mentz, Treves, and Cologne, the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, the Margrave of Brandenburg, and the Dukes of Saxony and Bavaria. The office carried great prestige, but no territorial possessions. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein ii. 1, the hero addresses "Electors of the sacred Rn. Empire." In Barnes' Charter iv. 2, Caesar Borgia says "The Romain emperor had fawned upon us, had I been lieutenant of your forces." The reference is to Maximilian I. In S. Rowley's When You K. 2, Henry VIII speaks of "Gt. Charles the mighty Romaine Emperor Our nephew." This was Charles V. In Chapman's Alphonsus ii. 1, 9, Alphonsus says, "I was alone too weak to underprop So great a burden as the Rn. Empire." It was the custom for the Emperor to have his successor elected during his own lifetime under the title of K. of the Rns. In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi says, "Under the K. of Romaines I was cut just from this shoulder."

Gesta Romanorum was a mediaeval collection of tales with morals, first printed in 1473; the stories were mostly assigned to some real or imaginary Emperor of R. Many of them were humorous, hence a jest, or jest, came to mean a funny story. In Goosecap iv. 1, Fowlweather says to Lord Furnivall, "For your lordship's jest, why, Gesta Romanorum were nothing to them."

Rome, the contemporary city, as a place of interest to travellers and pilgrims. In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Wincott's wife tells of Geraldine's discourse "In R., of that great pyramis Reared in the front, on 4 lions mounted; . . . those idol temples, . . . Of their Pantheon and their Capitol." In Roister ii. 2, Doughtie says, "Should I home again without answer go? It were better to go to R. on my head than so." In Marlowe's Faustus, scene 7 is laid in the Pope's privy chamber at R.; and Mephisto says to Faust, "Now that thou mayst perceive What R. containeth to delight thee with, Know that this city stands upon 7 hills That underprop the groundwork of the same; Just through the midst runs Tiber's flowing stream With winding banks that cut it in 2 parts; Over the which 4 stately bdes. lean That make safe passage to each part of Rome; Upon the bde. called Ponte Angelo Erected is a castle passing strong; Besides the gates and high pyramides Which Julius Caesar brought from Africa." The 4 bdes. were the Ponte Sant Angelo, the 2 bdes. of the Insula, and the Bde. of the Senators. Probably the pyramides refer to the obelisk brought by Constantine to Rome A.D. 353. Pope Adrian VI (1522-1523) seems to be the Pope in question. In Hycke, p. 92, Frewyll says, "If any of us 3 be Mayor of Lond., I wys, ywis, I will ride to R. on my Thumb." In Chapman's Usher v. 2, Strozza makes "a vow to go on foot to R." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 295, it is stated that "R.'s Exchange is built after the manner of Frankford and Embden."

Rome as the local centre of the Roman Catholic Church. In L. L. L. v. 2, 717, Boyet says that Armado's penance, to go woolward, "was enjoined him in R. for want of linen." In H6 B. i. 3, 65, the Q. says of K. Henry: "I would the college of the Cardinals Would choose him Pope and carry him to R." In H8 iii. 2, 213, Wolsey admits that the purpose of his wealth was "to gain the Popedom And fee my friends in R." In B. & F. Span. Cur. v. 2, Jamie says, "We may get for money, (As that, you know, buys anything in R.) A dispensation." In their Women Pleased iv. 1, Bomby says of the Hobby-horse "The beast is an unseemly and a lewd beast, and got at R. by the Pope's coach-horses." The Puritans objected to May-pole dances as papistical. In Three Ladies ii., Simony says, "My birth, nursery, and bringing up hath been in R., that ancient religious city." In Bale's Johan 176, the K. says, "By the boar of R. I throw thou meanest the Pope." In Barnes' Charter i. 2, one says, "R., which should be Virtue's paradise, Bare of all good, is wilderness of vice." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 1, Trapolin says, "I'd to R. and turn Friar if I had any Latin in me."

Rome Used for the Papal Court, the Church of Rome. In K. J. iii. 1, 104, Pandulph commands Philip: "Raise the power of France upon his [John's] head, Unless he do submit himself to R." In v. 2, 70, Pandulph announces: "K. John hath reconciled himself to R.," and Lewis replies: "His peace with R. What is that peace to me? Am I R.'s slave? What penny hath R. borne To underprop this action?" In H8 ii. 2, 94, Wolsey says, "R., the nurse of judgment, Hath sent this good man, Cardinal Campeius." In Darius p. 67, Iniquity says that his father is the Pope; "In R. he dwelleth." In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 1, Tribulation Wholesome compares "the beauteous discipline of the Puritans" with the "menstruous cloth and rag of R." In Barry's Ram iv., Smallshanks, exhibiting Face as a baboon, says: "What can you do for the Pope of R.?—Hark, he stirreth not." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 4, the Archbp. of Canterbury says to the K., "On your allegiance to the see of R. Subscribe to his exile." In Jonson's Barthol. iv. 4, when Overdo quotes Horace and Persius, Busy says, "I will leave to communicate my spirit with you if I hear any more of those superstitious relics, those lists of Latin, the very rags of R., and patches of Popery." In Marlowe's Massacre p. 235, Guise says to a Protestant, "that tongue of thine . . . hath blasphemed the Holy Ch. of R." In v., Henry says, "I here do swear to ruin that wicked ch. of R. that hatcheth up such bloody practices." In Trouble. Reign, prol., it is said of K. John: "For Christ's true faith endured he many a storm, And set himself against the Man of R." In Chapman's D'Olive ii. 2, D'Olive speaks of "the grossness of old superstition, Derived into the ch. from the foul sink Of Rh. popery." In Brome's Covent G. iv. 1, Gabriel says, "Overmuch abuse of these outlandish liquors have bred so many errors in the Rh. ch." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass v. 5, 2284, Jonas prays that Lond. "may bide, the pillar of His Ch., Against the storms of Rh. Antichrist." In Trouble. Reign, Haz., p. 272, John says, "I grieve to think how Kings in ages past, Simply devoted to the See of R., Have run into a thousand acts of shame." Barnfield, in Pecunia (1598), says, "Thou mayest obtain a pardon for thy sins; The Pope of R. for money will it sell."

The combination Roman Catholic is first found in the beginning of the 17th cent. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 2, Kately says of Cash: "He's no precisian, that I am certain of, Nor rigid Rn. Catholic." The earliest example in the O. E. D. is 1605. In Arraignment of the Late Traitors (1606) Harl. Misc. iii. 48, Digby is said to have refused at his execution to have "any prayers of any, but of the Rh. Catholics." In Arraignment of Seminary Priest (1607) Harl. Misc. iii. 63, Brewerie "confessed himself to be a Romaine Catholick." Donne, in The Will (1633) says, "My faith I give to Rn. Catholics." T. Fuller, in Church History ii. 11, 34, says, "There was a stiff Rn. Catholic (as they delight to term themselves)."

Roman. An inhabitant of the contemporary city. In Ford's 'Tis Pity i. 2, Putana says of Grimaldi: "They say he is a Rn."

Roman Type. The sort of type that is commonly used at present, as distinguished from the Gothic, or Black-letter, and the Italic. In Rabelais' Gargantua i. 23, the hero learns "to form the antique and Rn. letters." In Tit v. 1, 139, Aaron boasts of having carved on his enemies' skins "in Rn. letters Let not your sorrow die though I am dead." In B. & F. Valour iv. 1, Lapet says, "Bid him put all the thumps in Pica Rn. And with great T's, you vermin." When asked "In what letter will you have your kicks?" he says, "All in Italic; Your backward blows, all in Italic." Later on he asks: "Did I not say this wherit and this bob Should be both Pica Rn.?" In Three Ladies ii., Simplicity says, "There was written in Rn. letters—Given by that worthy valiant Capt., Master Fraud." In Davenant's Platonic iv. 4, Fredaline says, "You see your names here, carved out in Rn. characters." In B. & F. Corinth iv. 1, the Tutor speaks of "the Rn. T" as a fashionable shape for a beard. In Webster's Law Case iii. 2, after Romelio has stabbed Contarino, he says to the Surgeon, "You may read why I came hither." "Yes," answers the Surgeon, "in a bloody Rn. letter." In Middleton's Dissemblers iii. 2, Lactantio describes the D.'s writing as "a bastard Rn.—much like my own." So in writing, a Rn. hand is a round, bold hand. In Tw. N. iii. 4, 31, Malvolio says of the supposed letter from Olivia: "I think we do know the sweet Rn. hand." In Marston's Insatiate iv., Herod says, "Here's a lady's Rn. hand to me, is beyond all." In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 3, Easy asks: "How like you my Rn. hand?" In Brome's Northern iii. 2, Beavis asks: "What hand is it? Secretary, Rn., Court, or Text?"

Fashions of Dress. In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto advises the Host to wear "the Naples hat with the R. hatband." In Dekker's Shoemaker's ii. 1, Rose says to her maid, "Do this, and I will give thee for thy pains My cambric apron and my Rh. gloves." In Webster's Malfi i. 1, Bosola says, "I fell into the galleys; where I wore 2 towels instead of a shirt, with a knot on the shoulder, after the fashion of a Rn. mantle." Probably he means a toga.

Allusions to modern history. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iii. 2, the D. speaks of "the factions at R. between the Ursins and Colonnas." In Lælia i. 1, 110, Virginius says, "Romæ cum prædatio est, Tredecim illa mecum captivas expleverat." The reference is to the sack of R. in 1527 by an army of German and Spanish marauders, under the Constable Bourbon, who were supposed to be acting for the Emperor, Charles V.

Cosmetics. In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Face reminds Subtle of the time when he first met him "with your pinched-horn-nose And your complexion of the Rn. wash." In Davenant's Favourite iv. 1, the Lady says, "For essences to R., tweeses to Brussels and for fans to Paris."

Beard. A style of wearing the hair on the face, with the ends of the moustache turned up, and a small goatee beard, forming together the figure of a T or cross. In Fucus Histriomastix iv. 5, 30, Villanus says the latest form of beard pleases him best, "Romanam vulgo vocant."

Rome as a centre of legal training. The Collegio della Sapienza was founded by Innocent IV in 1244 for the study of canon and civil law. The present building was completed in 1576, and is the home of the University. In Merch. iv. 1, 154, Bellario describes his young friend, Balthasar (Portia) as "a young doctor of R."

R. was the subject of one of the motions or puppet shows. In Jonson's Ev. Man O., Ind. Asper says the would-be critic "Will show more several motions in his face Than the new Lond., R., or Niniveh."

Roman Nose. A nose of an aquiline shape but with a prominent bridge. In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 2, Mrs. Carol says, "Your nose is Rn. which your next debauchment at tavern, with the help of pot or canstick may turn to Indian, flat." In Massinger's Renegado i. 1, Gazet says he will proclaim one of his courtezans "An Austrian princess by her Rn. nose." In Brome's Couple iv. 1, Lovely says, "Thin jaws and Rn. nose Are never-failing signs of widows' joys."

Roman Organ. St. Cecilia, who was martyred at R. in the 3rd cent., is said to have invented the organ. In Davenant's Italian v. 3, Altamont says, "Hark how the Rn. organ seems to invoke The Thracian lyre."

Miscellaneous References. In Wise Men iv. 2, Hortano says, "You allege Scripture as far as R. is from Rockingham and expound it at your pleasure." That is, Scripture utterly irrelevant to the subject. In Day's B. Beggar iv., Strowd says, "And I do not beat them, I'll be bound to go to R. with a mortar a' my head." Kempe, in Nine Days Wonder 18, says, "I could fly to R. (at least hop to R., as the old proverb is) with a mortar on my head." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 2, the Clown says, "He did measure the stars with a false yard; and may now travel to R. with a mortar on's head, to see if he can recover his money that way." The phrase is supposed to refer to some story of a wizard who accomplished this feat; it means to do the impossible. In Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Richard Corbet says, "No more shall man with mortar on his head Set forwards towards R."; Coryat having performed an even more difficult feat

ROMFORD. See ROMFORD.

ROMVILE (thieves' cant for LOND.). In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Moll and Tearcat sing "A gave of ben rom-bouse in a bousing ken of R. is benar than a caster, peck, pennam, lap, or popler, which we mill in deuse a vile"; which is, being interpreted, "A quart of good wine in a drinking shop of Lond. is better than a cloak, meat, bread, butter-milk or porridge, which we steal in the country." Dekker, in Lanthorn, quotes as an example of pedlars' French: "Cut benar whiddes, and being we to Rome vile, to nip a bousing"; which translated is, "Speak better words and go we to Lond. to cut a purse."

RONCESVALLES. A valley in the Pyrenees abt. 35 m. from their W. extremity, where Charlemagne was defeated and Orlando slain in 778. There was a Priory of the Blessed Virgin there, and a cell of that priory was founded near Charing Cross in Lond. with which Chaucer's Pardoner was connected.

In the dramatists, "rouncival" commonly means coarse, gross, fat: possibly from Rouncival Peas—a large species, possibly imported from R.—mentioned by Tusser (1553) and other writers of the 16th and following cents. In Dekker's Satiro. iv. 3, 190, Tuca says to Horace (Jonson): "Dost roar? Thou hast a good rouncival voice to cry Lanthorn and Candlelight." Nash, in Saffron Walden, says of a fat woman: "It was so fulsome a fat Bonarobe and terrible Rouncevall."

ROSE. A common tavern sign in Lond. The R. in Russell St., Covent Garden, next to Drury Lane Theatre, became notorious during the later part of the 17th and 18th cents. as a haunt of men about town. It has been immortalized in Plate III. of Hogarth's Rake's Progress. In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 1, Lord Bonville says, "A cup of sack and Anthony at the R. Will reconcile their furies." There was another R. Tavern at the corner of Thonet Pl., outside Temple Bar. It is described by Strype as having "good conveniences of rooms and a good garden." In Prodigal ii. 4, Léver says, "Let's meet at the R. at Temple Bar. That will be nearer your counsellor and mine." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Greenwit, disguised as a summer, says, "I have caught a cold in my head, Sir, by sitting up late in the R. Tavern." In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 3, Luce says that in the country there is "no master Such-a-one to meet at the R." There was another R. Tavern close to the Ch. of All Hallows, Barking, which was destroyed by an explosion of gunpowder in a ship-chandler's shop adjacent, in 1649. In Oldcastle iv. 4, one of the Bp. of Rochester's men, being at the Tower, says, "Come, we may have a quart of wine at the R. at Barking, and come back an hour before he be ready to go." In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 2, Pisaro, who lives in Crutched Friars, says, "Well, we'll to the R. in Barking for an hour." In Deloney's Craft i. 14, Nicholas says to John, "Stay for me at the R. in Barking." Yet another R. Tavern stood on Holborn Hill, from which Taylor, the Water-Poet, records that he started for Southampton in 1647. In Carrier's Cosmographie, Taylor speaks of it as near Holborn Bdge. In T. Heywood's Lucerne ii. 5, Valerius sings: "The gardener hies him to the R."; but which of them does not appear.

ROSE. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's Churchyard. One of the old editions of Colin Clout was "imprinted at Lond. in Paules church yard at the sign of the Rose by John Wychte."

ROSE AND CROWN. A bookseller's sign near Holborn Bdge. Three Lords was "printed by R. Jhones at the R. & C. near Holburne Bdge. 1590." Robinson's Handfull of Pleasant Delites was printed at the same sign in 1584; and Marlowe's Tamburlaine bears the same imprint in 1590.

ROSE AND CROWN. A famous tavern in the Poultry at the W. end of the Stocks Market. The sign was painted by the Dutch painter, Hoogstraten, and cost £20. The name was afterwards changed to the King's Head. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, but rebuilt, and lasted till the middle of the 19th cent., when it at last disappeared. Machin, in his diary (1560), mentions it as the R. Tavern, and describes a fray there over the arrest of one Cobham for debt. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 257, an apprentice says, "I'll but drink a cup of wine with a customer at the R. & C. in the Poultry and come again presently." Taylor, in Carrier's Cosmographie, mentions a R. & C. as a Carrier's inn in St. John's St.

ROSEMARY LANE (now ROYAL MINT ST., LOND.). Running E. from the S. end of the Minorities to Leman St., where it is continued by Cable St. It had a bad reputation, and one side of it was occupied by old clothes shops, whence it was often called Rag Fair. Richd. Brandon, the supposed executioner of Charles I, lived in R. L. In Noble Soldier v. 2, Baltasar describes himself as "an honest housekeeper in R. L., too, if you dwell in the same parish." The allusion is to the use of r. both at funerals and weddings. In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, the President of the Twiball club is styled "Lord Paramount of all Garden-Alleys, Gun Alley, and R. L." In News from Hell, R. L. is mentioned with many other places of ill repute as an abode "of whores and thieves." In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough says of the r. prepared for his wedding, "Make a bonfire on't, to sweeten R.-1."

ROSE THEATRE. The 3rd Lond. Theatre, built on the Bankside at Southwark by Philip Henslowe in 1588. It was the first of the Bankside theatres, except perhaps that at Newington Butts. It was apparently a wooden building, and after the building of the Swan and the Globe was outclassed, and was abandoned by Henslowe in 1603, though it was still used for occasional entertainments. It stood in R. Alley, which ran from the Bankside to Park St. just to the W. of Southwark Bdge. It was first used by Lord Strange's company, and then by the Admiral's men, the chief rivals of the Chamberlain's men, who played at the Globe. In Dekker's Satiro. iii. 1, 316, Tuca says to Mrs. Mimiver, "Thou hast a breath as sweet as the R. that grows by the Bear-Garden." The Bear-Garden lay N.W. of the R.

ROSSANA, ROSSANO. An archiepiscopal city in S. Italy, on a rocky height near the S.W. coast of the Gulf of Taranto, 150 m. S.E. of Naples. In B. & F. Double Mar. ii. 1, Martia asks about "young Ascanio, prince of Rossana, K. Ferrand's most beloved one."

ROTHERHAM. A town in W. Riding Yorks., on the Don, 48 m. S. of York, and 159 m. N. of Lond. It was an old Saxon town, and had a weekly market and an annual fair long before the Norman conquest. In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Robin Hood says, "At R. dwelt our bowyer, God him bless!"

ROTHERHITHE (also spelt REDRIFF and ROTHERED). A vill. on the Surrey side of the Thames, between Bermondsey and Deptford, now part of Lond. The first docks in Lond. were here, now the Surrey Commercial Docks. The original name was Aetheredes Hyd; the 16th and 17th cent. spelling was almost always Redriff. Henslowe, in his Diary, records sending his horse "to grass to Redriffe." Harman, in Caveat 24, tells of a notable haunt of vagabonds "between Detforde and Rothered, called the King's Barn." In Day's B. Beggar iv., Playnster says, "Convey her to my farm at Rederiff." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Seawit affirms: "I have the toll of a wharf near R. will yield me about 4 marks a year."

ROTTEINBERG, ROTTENBURG. A town in S. Würtemberg on the Neckar, 30 m. S.W. of Stuttgart. There are Rothenburgs in Silesia, Bavaria, and Switzerland; but probably the first is meant, if indeed any in particular. Jonson, in Epigram to Capt. Hungry, says, "Keep your names of . . . Hans-spigle, R., and Boutersheim, for your next meal," i.e. to get a meal by boasting of your imaginary exploits at these places.

ROTTEN ROW. A row of cottages on the E. side of Norton Folgate, above the old St. Mary Spital; they were built as almshouses by the Prior of the Hospital, but fell into decay after its dissolution. Afterwards a draper, called Russell, pulled them down and built on their site, changing the name to Russell's R. The old name, however, stuck to them, and they shared the general bad repute of Shoreditch as a haunt of profligates and thieves. There was also a R. R., afterwards called Middle R., on the E. side of Goswell Rd., S. of Old St., near the Charterhouse. Close by was the infamous Pickthatch; this is probably the one intended in the quotation. In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, the President of the disreputable society of the Twiball knights is described as "Duke of Turnbull, Bloomsbury, and R.R." The well-known Rotten Row in Hyde Park was first made by William III, as an approach to Kensington Palace, and was not in existence in our period.

ROTTERDAM. The capital of S. Holland, on the Nieuwe Maas at the point where it is joined by the Rotte, 20 m. from its mouth. It is one of the most important commercial cities of the Netherlands. It was the native place of Erasmus; the house where he was born, now a tavern in Wijde Kerk-sstraat, is marked by a tablet, and his statue in bronze adorns the Groot Markt. It afforded refuge to many of the expelled Puritans during the reign of James I. Its name proved irresistibly suggestive to our pun-loving playwrights. In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick reveals a project he has "to serve the state Of Venice with red herrings for 3 years, And at a certain rate, from R." the herring fishery being one of the chief industries of the Netherlands. In Dekker's If It Be 359, the Puritan says, "We were all smoked out of our own country and sent to R." In Greene's Friar ix., Vandermaast claims to have given the non-plus to them "of Rheims, Louvain, and fair R." In More iii. 2, Erasmus is spoken of as "the famous clerk of Rotherdam." In Barnavelt ii. 2, Leidenberge reports: "Arnarn and R. have yielded him [Barnavelt] obedience." In Davenant's Albion iv. 1, Conrade says, "He must to R. to the fat doctor there and be stewed in a stove." He probably means the famous Cornelius, a Dutch doctor, who gained a European reputation for his treatment of certain diseases by hot baths. In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Mixum speaks of the members of the Twiball club as "Rotterdamians," with punning intention; which is more obvious still in T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, where the Clown says, "Had we but touched at Rot or Dam, 10 to 1 we had never come off sound men."

ROUANS. Rovezzano seems to be meant, which lies 3 m. E. of Florence between the right bank of the Arno and Mt. Settignano. In Middleton's Women Beware iii. 2, The D. of Florence says to Leantio: "Rise now, the Capt. of our fort at Rouans."

ROUEN. The ancient Rotomagus, a city in France on the Seine, 85 m. N.W. of Paris, and 45 from the sea. In the Cathedral was buried the heart of Richd. Cœur-de-Lion, still preserved in the sacristy. John, D. of Bedford, was buried there. Joan of Arc was burnt alive in the Place de la Pucelle, in 1431. In the Castle, the site of which is now occupied by the Halles, Prince Arthur was murdered in 1204. It was the capital of the Dukes of Normandy, and was held by the Kings of England till 1204, when it was taken by Philippe Augustus, and remained under the French crown till its capture by Henry V in 1419. It was recovered by the French in 1449. It was seized by the Huguenots, but the D. of Guise recovered it in 1562. The massacre of St. Bartholomew extended to R. It was finally besieged and taken by Henri IV in 1593.

In H5 iii. 5, 54, the French K. orders his Captains to attack Henry "And in a captive chariot into R. Bring him our prisoner"; in line 64 he commands the Dauphin: "You shall stay with us in R." In H6 A. i. 1, 65, Gloucester exclaims, "Is Paris lost? Is R. yielded up?" In iii. 2, the attack on R. by Joan of Arc, the death of Bedford, and the defeat of Joan by Talbot are described. In line 1 Joan cries, "These are the city gates, the gates of R., Through which our policy must make a breach." In 133 Talbot says, "Let's not forget The noble D. of Bedford, late deceased, But see his exequies fulfilled in R." In iii. 3, 2, Joan says, "Dis-may not, Princes, at this accident, Nor grieve that R. is so recovered." This is incorrect; the death of Bedford took place in 1435, 4 years after the burning of Joan. In iii. 2, 82, Talbot says, "In this late-betrayed town Great Cœur-de-Lion's heart was buried." In Marlowe's Massacre p. 234, Guise, giving directions about the Massacre, says, "Retes to Dieppe, Mount-sorrell unto R., And spare not one that you suspect of heresy." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 93, Elizabeth says that Grey and Clifton "Fought for our father, brother, and sister, At Dennis, Roan, Bullen, and at Callice." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 308, the Courtezan says, "This jewel an English factor gave me at his departure out of Rhoane." In Rabelais' Pantagruel iv. 6, Ding-dong says of his sheep: "With the fleece of these your fine Roan cloth is to be made." The scene of B. & F. Brother iv. 2, is laid at R. in the time of D. Rollo of Normandy; it is spelt Roan.

ROUERINDA (a Latinized form of RUBIERA). A vill. abt. 5 m. W. of Modena, in N. Italy. In Lalia i. 3, 198, Lalia, who is in a nunnery at Modena, says to her nurse, "Dic patri me cum sorore quadam Rouerindam Unam profectam, reversuram post triduum."

ROUGEMONT. The old castle on a hill N. of Exeter, built by William the Conqueror, and dismantled during the civil wars. In R3 iv. 2, 108, Richd. says, "When last I was at Exeter, The Mayor in courtesy showed me the castle, And called it R.; at which name I started Because a bard of Ireland told me once, I should not live long after I saw Richmond." The story is taken from the 2nd edition of Holinshed.

ROUNCIVAL. See RONCESVALLES.

ROUND CHURCH (or ST. SEPULCHRE'S, CAMBRIDGE).

A ch. in Cambridge, on the E. side of Bridge St., a little N. of Jesus Lane. It was built in 1101 in imitation of the Ch. of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and has been carefully preserved. Nash, in Pierce E. 2, speaks of a glutton as having "a belly as big as the round ch. in Cambridge." T. Fuller, in Church History ii. 8, 16, says that Bede's cell was still shown at Cambridge "betwixt St. John's College and R.-ch., or St. Sepulchre's."

ROUND, THE. The round ch. at the W. end of the Temple Ch., Lond. See under TEMPLE.

ROSSILLON (spelt variously ROSIGNOLL, ROSILION, ROSSILION). An ancient province of S.E. France, on the W. coast of the Gulf of Lyons. The Castle of R. near Perpignan still preserves the name. It was long governed by its own Counts, but in 1173 it was bequeathed to the K. of Arragon. In 1659 it was finally ceded to France. Bertram, Count of R., is the hero of All's Well; and the scene of i. 1, 3, ii. 2, iii. 2, 4, iv. 5, and v. 2, 3, is laid in the Count's palace at R. The story is derived from the Decameron iii. 9, the hero of which is Beltramo, Count of Rossiglione.

ROXBURGH. See ROCKSBOROUGH.

ROYDEN. A vill. in Essex, on the border of Herts., 20 m. W. of Chelmsford. Its old ch. and manor house are still worth seeing. In Lochrine ii. 5, Trompart cries, "O colliers of Croyden, And rustics of Royden And fishers of Keat, Come you to lament For Strumbo the cobbler."

ROYSTON. A town in Herts., 20 m. N. of Hertford and 38 N. of Lond., on the North Road. In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Kate says, "Master Featherstone came to meet me as far as Royston."

RUBICK SEA. A fantastical name for the Red Sea q.v. In Davenant's Just Italian iv. 4, Altamont says, "He bleeds like to a spring That borders on the R. S." Evidently Altamont thought that the Red Sea and the springs near it were of the colour of blood. Many emigrants to Australia have been disappointed to find the Red Sea of the normal colour.

RUBICON. A stream flowing from the Apennines into the Adriatic on the E. coast of Italy, between Ravenna and Ariminum; almost certainly the modern Fiumicino. It formed the boundary between Italy and the province of Gallia Cisalpina. By crossing it with his army in January 49 B.C., Julius Caesar practically declared war on Rome: hence the phrase which became current in England in the early part of the 17th cent. "to cross the R." meaning to take a decisive and irrevocable step. In Caesar's Rev. i., chor. 2, Discord speaks of "promised victories by fatal signs At R. foretold." In B. & F. False One v. 2, Photinus says to Caesar, "Thou didst presume to pass the R. Against the laws of Rome." Drayton, in Polyolb. xv. 247, says, "R. much famed both for his fount and fall The ancient limit held, 'twixt Italy and Gaul."

RUDDINGTON. A town in Notts., abt. 4 m. S. of Nottingham. One of the characters in Sampson's Vow is Miles, the miller of R.

RUFFIANS'-HALL. A name for W. Smithfield, where sword and buckler fights often took place (see SMITHFIELD). In Eastward i. 1, 17, Touchstone exclaims "Hey-day, R.-H! Swords, pumps, here's a racket indeed!" Fuller, quoted in Strutt's Sports 261, says, "West Smithfield was formerly called R.H., where such men usually met . . . to try masteries with sword and buckler." Nash, in Pierce D. 1, says, "Men will needs quarrel . . . that they may make R. H. of hell."

In Almond for Parratt C. 4, he says of Martin Marprelate: "Masse Martin hath never broke sword in R.H."

RUMBELOWE. Properly a sort of refrain or chanty, sung by sailors when rowing or doing other rhythmical work. It is also used as a comic place-name. Hycke, p. 88, says, "I have been in the land of R., 3 mile out of hell." In Compl. Scot (1549) vi. 65 (quoted in N. E. D.), we have "Sal I go with you to rumbelo fayr?"

RUMELIA. A term applied to all the European provinces conquered by the Turks from the Greek Emperors, to the exclusion of Greece. Rumney wine was a sweet wine from the Balkan Peninsula (possibly including Greece), popular in England in our period. Boorde (1542), in Dyetary x., enumerates amongst hot wines, "Wyne Greek, romanysh, romny." In Elements 22, we have "Sak, raspyce, alycaunt, rumney." Burton, A. M., enumerates "Rumny, Brown bastard, Metheglin" amongst drinks.

RUMFORD, or ROMFORD. A town in Essex, 12 m. N.E. of Lond. It was a favourite place for a summer day's excursion with the Londoners, when they wanted a run into the country. It was the centre of an agricultural dist., and its markets on Tuesdays for hogs, and on Wednesdays for corn and cattle were much frequented. Charcoal-burning was also carried on for the supply of Lond. In Underwit ii. 1, Sackbury says to Courtwell, "Thy father's in Essex; if he live, he'll purchase R." In Jonson's Barthol. iv. 3, Whit promises Mrs. Littlewit that she shall "ride to Ware and R. in dy coach, shée de players, be in love vit 'em; sup vit gallantsh, be drunk, and cost de noting." In his New Inn iv. 3, Pinnacia says of a gallant: "A coach is hired and 4 horse; he runs in his velvet jacket thus to R., Croydon, Hounslow, or Barnet, the next bawdy road."

In Massinger's Madam iii. 1, Shavem threatens to have Ramble arrested "for the bacon you took on the highway from the poor market-woman, as she rode from R." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 1, Tim, being told that the Welsh lady has 2,000 runts, says he has looked in Rider's Dictionary to find out what runts are; "and there I can hear no tidings of these runts neither; unless they should be R. hogs, I know them not." Taylor, in Works i. 82, calls the master of his ship "Giles Gammon; he was born at R." One of *Tarleton's Jest*s relates how he met a kinsman at Ilford, and made him so drunk that "meaning to go towards Lond., his aim was so good, that he went towards R. to sell his hogs." Ilford is about half-way on the road between Lond. and R. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Dapper says, "The grunting of 500 hogs coming from R. market cannot make a worse noise than this canting language." In Downfall Huntington i. 3, Little John says, "At R., Sowtham, Wortley, Hothersfield, Of all your cattle money shall be made." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says, "These Rank-riders, like butchers to R. market, seldom go under 6 or 7 in a company." Nash, in Wilton K. 4, says, "All the colliers of R., who hold their corporation by yarking the blind bear at Paris Garden, were but bunglers to him."

RUMNEY, ROMNEY. One of the old Cinque ports, on the E. coast of Kent, N. of Dungeness. Around it lies R. Marsh, a level tract of 24,000 acres, devoted to the grazing of sheep. Jonson, in Forest vi., To Celia, asks the lady for kisses "Till you equal with the store All the grass that R. yields." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Honeysuckle says, "Change of pasture makes fat calves in R. Marsh." In The Crier of Canterbury (1608), the 1st tale begins: "In R. Marsh by the sea-coast there dwelled a Crier." Drayton, in Polyolb.

xx. 265, says, "R. . . . for fineness of her grass And for her dainty site all other doth surpass." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker v. 1, 52, Barnaby says, "The enemy is landed at Sandwich, set ashore at Dover, and arrived at Rumny Marsh."

RUMNILLO. Is this a jesting way of referring to Rumney or Romney Marsh? The scene of the play is Lond. In B. & F. Wit Money i. 1, Valentine says to Lovegood, "I would not change ways with you . . . For all your beans in Rumnillo."

RUNNING-MEAD, RUNNYMEDE. A plain in the county of Surrey, on the right bank of the Thames, in the parish of Egham, 20 m. S.W. of Lond. Here John signed Magna Charta on June 17th, 1215. In Davenport's Matilda ii. 4, Fitzwater says, "In a field called R.-M., 'twixt Staines and Windsor, to covenants drawn (bearing the name and sense of Magna Charta) K. John subscribed."

RUSSELL ST. Lond., running E. from the E. side of Covent Garden to Drury Lane. It was built in 1634. Later it became famous for its coffee-houses; Will's at the N.W. corner of Bow St., Button's on the S. side, 2 doors from Covent Garden; and Tom's on the N. side. Here also were the Rose and the Three Feathers taverns. Joseph Taylor, one of Shakespeare's actors, lived in R. St., 1634-1641. The 4th Folio of Shakespeare was "printed for H. Herringman, E. Brewster, and R. Bentley at the Anchor in the New Exchange, the Crane in St. Paul's churchyard, and in R.-St. Covent Garden. 1685."

RUSSIA (Rn.= Russian). The great country in E. Europe and N. Asia. Its articulate history begins in the 9th cent. under the Scandinavian hero-kings, Rurik, Oleg, Vladimir, who made Christianity the religion of the country, and Yaroslav, the author of the first Rn. Code. From 1054 to 1238 it was divided into a number of more or less independent principalities. The Mongols came in 1238, and for over 200 years were the supreme power in R. Between 1462 and 1613 the Autocracy was established, the Mongols expelled, and the kingdom consolidated under the great monarchs, Ivan III, Basil V, and Ivan IV. In 1613 the throne fell to Michael Romanoff, the founder of the late Imperial house. During the 16th cent. R. was divided from the rest of Europe by the powerful kingdom of Poland. The capital was Moscow, whence the Rns. are frequently called Muscovites. During the reign of Edward VI of England, Chancellor, an Englishman, visited the court of Ivan the Terrible and was courteously received; and through his accounts R. became known to our forefathers. Ivan was anxious to cultivate friendly relations with Elizabeth, and even tried to secure the daughter of the Earl of Huntingdon as his wife.

Position and climate. The climate was known to be cold and the nights in winter very long. Heylyn (s.v. Muscovite) tells how in the N. parts water, thrown up into the air, will turn to ice before it falls to the ground. In Webster's Malfi iv. 1, the Duchess says, "I could curse . . . those 3 smiling seasons of the year Into a Rn. winter." In his White Devil iii. 1, Monticello asks, "What are whores? Cold Rn. winters that appear so barren As if that nature had forgot the spring." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "R. is a country too cold." In Davenant's Cr. Brother iv. 1, Castruchio speaks of "R., where the people freeze till they spit snow." In his Albervine v. 1, Hermengild says, "She trembles like a frosty Rn. on a hill." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Volpone speaks of "the cold Rn.;" transferring the characteristic of the climate to the women of the country. Beaumont, in The Glance 5, says, "2 flames, 2 Semeles, Dwell in those eyes, whose looser glowing rays Would thaw the frozen Rn. into lust." In Meas. ii. 1, 139, Angelo says of Pompey's long tale: "This will last out a night in R. when nights are longest there."

Historical allusions. Chaucer, in Squire's Tale F. 10, says, "At Sarray in the land of Tartarye Ther dwelt a k. that werryed Russye." Sarai was the capital of the Golden Horde, founded by Batu Khan about 1224; it is the modern Tsarev on the Volga. Chaucer calls this K. Cambyuskan, evidently Genghis Khan, who was, in fact, the grandfather of both Batu Khan, and Kublai Khan, whose court was at Cambaluc, now Peking. It is really Kublai Khan of whom the poet is thinking, but his knowledge was confused, and he muddled up both the kings and their capitals. In C. T. Prol. 54, we are told that the Knight had "reyed in Lettow and in Ruce"; doubtless in company with the Teutonic Knights, who made frequent raids against the heathens of Lithuania and Russia. In Selinus 540 Selim says, "Basilius, the mighty Emperor of R., Sends in his troops of slave-born Muscovites." This was Basil, who reigned from 1505 to 1533; Selim's date is 1512-1520. In Meas. iii. 2, 94, Lucio repeats a rumour that the D. of Vienna "is with the Emperor of R." In W. T. iii. 2, 120, Hermione declares, "The Emperor of R. was my father." The historical period of both these plays is quite indefinite, but probably Ivan the Terrible was suggested to the audience. In L. L. L. v., the K. of Navarre and his lords visit the Princess "apparelled like Muscovities or Rns." Probably the idea was suggested by Ivan's embassy in 1583 to ask for himself the hand of Mary Hastings, daughter of the Earl of Huntingdon. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B., "A Rn. Prince, the Emperor's ambassador," is represented as one of the guests at the opening of Gresham's Royal Exchange in 1570. "He doth not our language understand," says Gresham. For some 10 years past, since the foundation of the Muscovy Company, trade relations had been established between R. and England; and in 1569 we hear of Thomas Banister doing a good business in kerseys with the Rns. In Jonson's Cynthia i. 1, Amorphus (who is supposed to stand for Anthony Munday) claims that in the course of his extensive travels his hat was given him "by a great man in R., as an especial prized present." It was, it appears, the hat that Ulysses wore in his 10 years' wanderings! In Day's Travails we are told of the visit of Sir Anthony Sherley to the Rn. Court about 1600, and one act is laid there. In T. Heywood's Witches ii. the soldier claims to have "served with the Rn. against the Polack, a heavy war." R. was invaded by the Poles in 1609, and they were not finally repulsed till 1618. Heylyn (s.v. Muscovite) says, "In matters of war the people are indifferently able, as being almost in continual broils with their neighbours." Milton P. L. x. 431, describes the Tartar fleeing "from his Rn. foe By Astracan." In xi. 394, Adam is shown "the Rn. Ksar in Mosco." The scene of B. & F. Subject is laid in Moscow during a war with the Tartars, but the date of the action is otherwise indeterminate. A History of Muscovy will be found in Milton's Prose Works.

National Character. Heylyn (s.v. Muscovite) says, "The people are perfidious, swift of foot, strong of body, and unnatural. They are exceedingly given to drink. They are for the most part of a square proportion, broad, short, and thick; grey-eyed, broad-bearded, and generally are furnished with prominent paunches. The Commons live in miserable subjection to the Nobles; and they again in as great slavery to the D. or Emperor. They are altogether unlearned. The women are private, fearful to offend; but, once lascivious, intolerably wanton. It is the fashion of these women to love that husband best which beateeth them most." In Webster's Malfi iii. 5, the Duchess asks: "Must I, like a slave-born Rn., Account it praise to suffer tyranny?" In Dekker's Babylon 259, Paridel says of Q. Elizabeth: "She walks not, as the Rn. . . with foul big-boned slaves Strutting on each side with the slicing axe." In his Seven Sins he says, "The Rns. have an excellent custom; they beat them on the shins that have money and will not pay their debts." In his Wonder iv. 1, the Soldier says, "Give him the Rn. law for all these sins, 100 blows on his bare shins." In Day's Parl. Bees x., Impotens says, "Let him have Rn. law for all his sins; A hundred blows on his bare shins." In Webster's White Devil iv. 1, Flamineo says, "I am not in R.; my shins must be kept whole." Hall, in Epp. ii. 7, asks: "What is your R. to all her inhabitants but a large prison, a wide galley?"

National Dress. Heylyn (s.v. Muscovie) says, "Not only the clothes of the people, but their very houses are lined with thick furs." In L. L. L. v. 2, 368, Rosalind speaks of the masquers as "4 in Rn. habit"; and in 303 they are described as "Disguised as Muscovites in shapeless gear." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings: "Some like breechless woman go—The Russ, Turk, Jew, and Grecian"; and again, "The Russ with sables furs his cap."

National Customs and Practices. Nash, in Lenten, p. 290, says: "In R. there are no presents but of meat or drink." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The Russ drinks quass"; i.e. kvass, a sort of rye-beer described by Chancellor (1553) as "like our penny ale." Heylyn (s.v. Muscovie) says, "Every gentleman hath in his house a stove or hot-house in which they keep, as it were, to thaw themselves." In Dekker's Match me iii. 1, John says, "I could not in a Rn. stove sweat more Than I did in my bed."

Trade and Commerce. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 2, Tamburlaine says, "Christian merchants that with Rn. steers Plough up huge furrows in the Caspian Sea Shall vail to us." The passage is copied in Srew Haz. 513, where Perando says, "Thou shalt have precious jewels fetched from far By Italian merchants that with Rn. steers Plough up huge furrows in the Terrene Main." Bears were imported into England from R. for the bear-baitings which were so popular in Lond. In H5 iii. 7, 154, Orleans calls the English "foolish curs that run winking into the mouth of a Rn. bear and have their heads crushed like rotten apples." In Mac. iii. 4, 100, Macbeth says to the Ghost, "Approach thou like the rugged Rn. bear . . . and my firm nerves Shall never tremble." In Dekker's Babylon 212, Titania says, "They have hearts more rugged Than is the Rn. bear." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 3, Sir Alexander complains that his son is still wild "as a Rn. bear." Heylyn, p. 12, quotes from Du Bartas: "From R. [come] furs to keep the rich from cold." In Lady Mother iii. 1, Bonville speaks of "the immaculate ermine hunted by the frozen Russ." In W. Rowley's New Wonder v., Welcome says, "One cup of ale will shroud one better from the cold than all the furs in R." For further illustrations of Russia see under Muscovy.

RUTILES, i.e. the Rutuli, who were supposed to have inhabited the part of Latium on the sea-coast around Ardea. Their K., Turnus, figures in the Aeneid as the brave rival and opponent of Aeneas when he landed in Italy. In Marlowe's Dido i. 1, Jupiter predicts of Aeneas: "3 winters shall he with the Rutiles war And in the end subdue them with his sword."

RUTLAND. The smallest county in England, lying between Lincs., Northants, and Leicestersh. The capital is Oakham, which boasts an old Norman castle dating from the reign of Henry II. In Piers B. ii. 110, "Rainalde the reve of Rotland sokene" is one of the roystering witnesses to Gluttony's Deed of Gift. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iii. 1, the singing boy says, "Sir, [I was] born at Ely; we all set up in Ely but our house commonly breaks in Rshire." The coarse jest seems to mean that the voice breaks at the time of adolescence. The eldest son of the D. of York was created Earl of R. in 1386, and D. of Aumerle in 1397. After his treasonable plot he was degraded to his former title. In R2 v. 2, 43, York speaks of him as "Aumerle that was; But that is lost for being Richd.'s friend, And, Madam, you must call him R. now." In v. 3, 96, the Duchess calls him "R., my transgressing boy." He subsequently became D. of York and was killed at Agincourt. The 3rd son of Richd., D. of York, was the Earl of R. He was killed at Wakefield Bridge by Clifford when he was only a boy, and buried at Fotheringay. His hapless fate is referred to frequently in H6 C. and R3. The present D. is descended from Thomas Manners, created Earl of R. in 1525; the title was raised to a Dukedom in 1703.

RUTLAND HOUSE. A Lond. mansion, at the top of Aldersgate St., near what is now Charter House Sq. The name is preserved in R. Pl. on the N. side of the square. At R. H., Davenant succeeded in getting leave to give dramatic entertainments towards the close of the Commonwealth. His First Day's Entertainment at Rutland House, with its interesting accounts of contemporary Lond. and Paris, was staged on May 21, 1656; and his Rhodes in August of the same year. In the printed edition of the latter it is stated that it was "made a representation at the back part of R. H. in the upper end of Aldersgate St., Lond., 1656."

RYALTO. See RIALTO.

RYE. A spt. in England, in the S.E. of Sussex, 30 m. S.W. of Dover. It was one of the Cinque Ports, and had a large trade with the Continent; but the choking up of the harbour has reduced it to a shadow of its former self. The castle, now used as a gaol, was built in the reign of Stephen. The town was walled and fortified in the reign of Richd. I and further strengthened by Edward III. The E. gate still remains. R. was the birthplace of the dramatist, John Fletcher, whose father, afterwards Bp. of Lond., was then vicar there. In Three Ladies ii., Simony says that Friar Austin "landed about R., Sandwich, or Dover." As every school-boy knows, the actual landing-place of Augustine was the Isle of Thanet. Later on in the same scene Lucre includes R. among the places where, as a consequence of their commercial importance, there are infinite numbers that "great rents upon little room do bestow." In Greene's Friar ii., Bacon promises to build a wall of brass to ring "the English strand From Dover to the marketplace of R." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says that the beggars' children "are sometimes carted in dossers, like fresh fish from R. that comes on horseback." Nash, in Lenten v. 253, says, "Rie is one of the ancient towms belonging to the Cinque Ports, yet limpeth cinque aee behind Yarmouth . . . and to stand threshing no longer about it, Rie is Ry, and no more but Rie, and Yarmouth wheat compared with it."

SABA, or SABAEA (Sh. = Sheba, Sn. = Sabaeen). An ancient kingdom in South Arabia. Recent discoveries of inscriptions and coins have proved its antiquity and importance. It is called Sh. in the A.V. of the Bible, but Saba is the correct form. Gold, precious stones and spices were imported by the Hebrews from S. It is best known through the visit of its Q. to the court of Solomon, as recorded in I. Kings x. 1-13. In Marlowe's Faustus xii., Faustus says, "When it is winter here with us, in the contrary circle it is summer with them, as in India, S., and farther countries in the E." In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Bussy says, "Haste thee where the grey-eyed morn perfumes Her rosy chariot with Sn. spices." In Massinger's Lover i. 1, Matilda says, "I can accept from you One grain of incense with devotion offered Beyond all perfumes or Sn. spices." In his Great Duke ii. 3, Sanazarro speaks of "those smooth gales that glide O'er happy Araby or rich S., Creating in their passage gums and spices." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. i. 1, Alberto says, "He came so perfumed as he had robbed S. or Arabia of their wealth And stored it in one suit." In their False One ii. 1, Caesar says, "Fling on your spices, Make a Sn. bed, and place this phoenix [the body of Pompey] Where the hot sun may emulate his virtues." Milton, P. L. iv. 162, speaks of "Sn. odours from the spicy shore Of Araby the Blest." Rabelais, in Pantagruel iv. 54, says, "The best incense is produced in S." Massinger, in Bondman iv. 3, speaks of "Whole hecatombs or Sn. gums." The Q. of Sh. or S. is referred to in Marlowe's Faustus v., where Mephistopheles promises Faust that his wife shall be "as wise as S." In Clyomon H. 2, she is called "sage S." In H8 v. 5, 42, Cranmer predicts of the infant Princess Elizabeth: "S. was never More covetous of wisdom and fair virtue Than this pure soul shall be." Lodge, in Answer to Gosson ad fin., prays for Q. Elizabeth: "God enlarge her wisdom that like S. she may seek after a Saloman"—a pretty broad hint to the Virgin Q. ! Wither's I Loved a Lass (1629) begins: "I loved a lass, a fair one, As fair as e'er was seen; She was indeed a rare one, Another Sh.'s Queen." In Cowley's Cutter ii. 2, Puny addresses Aurelia as "My dear Q. of Sh."

SABA, QUEEN OF. The sign of a tavern in Gracechurch St., Lond., which was kept at one time by the comedian Tarlton. In *Tarlton's Jest*s we are told "Tarlton dwelt in Gracious St. at the sign of the Saba, a tavern."

SABA (the SAVUS, now the SAVE). A river rising in the Carinthian Alps and flowing E. along the borders of Bosnia and Serbia into the Danube. In Peele's Old Wives 885, Eumenides says to Delia, "For thy sweet sake I sailed up Danuby As far as Saba, whose enhancing streams Cut 'twixt the Tartars and the Russians." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 66, Mandrecarde says, "I crossed up Danuby As high as Saba whose enhancing streams Cut 'twixt the Tartares and the Russians."

SABELLA. See SABINES.

SABINES (Se. = Sabine). An ancient Italian tribe occupying the mountainous dist. N.E. of Latium. Their chief towns were Reate, Amiternum, Interocrea, and Nursia. According to legend, the original settlers on the Palatine at Rome were without women; and so they arranged to hold a festival to which the S. were invited. They then seized upon the Se. women and carried them off for their wives. A war followed, but the women rushed in between the contending armies, and a peace was made by which the S. were admitted to union with the Romans and were settled on the Quirinal. Numa Pompilius, and K. of Rome, was a Se. Later, we find them fighting against the Romans, by whom they were decisively defeated in 449 B.C., and again, after a long period of quiescence, in 290. From this time their national existence was at an end. In B. & F. Valentinian iii. 1, Lucina says, "The curses that I owe to enemies, Even those the S. sent, when Romulus (As thou hast me) ravished their noble maids, Made more and heavier, light on thee!" In Kyd's Cornelia iii., Cicero speaks of Rome as "This stately town, so often hazarded Against the Samnites, Sabins, and fierce Latins." The scene of B. & F. Friends is laid partly in the country of the S. in the time of Titus Martius (presumably Ancus Martius is intended), K. of Rome; and the action includes an imaginary war with the S. In iii. 2, Sir Pergamus boasts of having conquered "bold Arminius, The stoutest champion of the Sabines."

The S. were supposed to be expert in magic arts. Hence, in Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, 219, Horace says, "I now remember me, Sir, of a sad fate A cunning woman, one Sabella, sung, When in her urn she cast my destiny." This is a translation of Horace, Sat. i. 9, 29. The Se. flower, or Herba Sabina, was a kind of juniper. Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat 673, mentions amongst sweet flowers "the Se. flower." Rabelais, in Pantagruel iii. 50, mentions amongst plants that have their name from the place where they grow, "Se., from a territory of that appellation."

SABREN. See SEVERN.

SAGAN. A town in Silesia, abt. 130 m. South-W. of Berlin, on the right bank of the Bober. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein ii. 3 Hungary speaks of "The general of your forces of Gloyawe, Mechlenburg, S., Friedland."

SAGITTARY. A Centaur who was fabled to have come to the help of the Trojans in the Trojan War. Shakespeare makes the S. the sign of the Tavern in Venice where Othello has his lodging. In Oth. i. 1, 159, Iago bids Brabantio "Lead to the S. the raised search." In i. 3, 115, Othello begs the Senators to "Send for the lady to the S."

SAGUNTUM. A city of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the E. coast near the mouth of the Pallantias, 90 m. South of the mouth of the Ebro. The modern town of Murviedro occupies its site. It was besieged and taken by Hannibal in 218 B.C., in spite of the fact that it was in alliance with Rome, and this was the proximate cause of the 2nd Punic War. The sack of the city was marked by ruthless savagery. 8 years afterwards it was recovered by the Romans and constituted a Colonia. Jonson opens his Pindaric Ode on Carey and Morison: "Brave infant of S., clear Thy coming forth in that great year When the prodigious Hannibal did crown His rage with razing your immortal town." The story of this infant, who went back into his mother's womb in horror at the siege, is told in Pliny, Nat. Hist. vii. 3. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 5, a messenger brings word: "Sagunt, Locris, Tarracon, all these are re-o'ercome by Scipio."

SALA. A tributary of the Elbe, flowing into it on its left bank, some 15 m. above Magdeburg. It is now called the Saale. In H5 i. 2, 45, the Archbp. of Canterbury describes the land Salique as lying "Between the floods of S. and of Elbe." In line 63, he says that "Charles the Gt. did seat the French Beyond the river S. in the year 805."

SALAMANCA. One of the most ancient and picturesque cities in Spain, on the Tormes, 172 m. N.W. of Madrid. The Plaza Mayor is one of the largest and finest squares in Europe. The glory of S. is its University, founded in 1200 by Alphonso IX, and for the next 400 years one of the chief seats of learning in Europe. In Last's Domin. ii. 1, the K. says to Mendoza, "We here create you S.'s Duke." In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto says to Fly, "I'll have thee a doctor, Thou shalt be one, thou hast a doctor's look, A face disputative, of S." In Middleton's Gipsy i. 3, Roderigo says, "Speed me To S.; court my studies now For physic 'gainst infection of the mind." In B. & F. Span. Cur. i. 1, Leandro says to Ascanio, "If you'll spend some years in S., I'll supply your studies with all conveniences." In Shirley's Brothers ii. 1, Fernando says, "Alberto was the flower of 's time at S." In Tuke's Five Hours ii. 1, Diego says, "After I had spent 7 years at S., my father was utterly undone." In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 2, Theodosia says, "I have a brother, student in S." In their Custom ii. 1, Donna Guiomar says that she has provided for her son "The choicest masters and of greatest name Of S." In Lady Alimony iii. 1, a Citizen speaks of "losses which they had sustained through the hostile piracy of the S.": apparently a ship named after the city.

SALAMINE (i.e. SALAMIS). An island in the Bay of Eleusis between Attica and Megaris. Telamon, the son of Aeacus, fled thither after the murder of his half-brother Phocus, and his son Ajax came thence to the Trojan War. The island came into the possession of Athens in the time of Solon. It was the scene of the defeat of the Persian fleet by the Greeks 480 B.C. It was one of the seven claimants to be the birthplace of Homer. It is now called Koluri. In T. Heywood's B. Age ii., Telamon says, "From populous S. I, Telamon, am come." Lodge, in Answer to Gosson, p. 11, asks: "Why seek the Sminirians to recover from the Salaminians the praise of Homer?"

SALAMINE. The old name of Famagosta in Cyprus. See under MESSALINE.

SALAPIA. An ancient seaport of Apulia, on the coast of the Adriatic, now separated from the sea by a large marshy lake, the Lago di Salpi. It is abt. 190 m. E. of Rome, and is now quite deserted. In the 2nd Punic War it revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, and remained in his possession till 210 B.C. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 4, Hannibal is represented as falling in love with a lady "of Salapia."

SALEM (a shortened form of JERUSALEM, q.v.). In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 3, Doll, in her affectation of madness, says, "We call the Rabbits and the beathen Greeks to come from S. and from Athens and teach the people of Great Britain." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 1, 22, calls it "sacred S." Milton, in Ode on Passion 39, says, "My spirit some transporting cherub feels To bear me where the towers of S. stood."

SALEM (more properly SALIM). Mentioned in John iii. 23, as near to Aenon, where John the Baptist was exercising his ministry. Somewhere near the Jordan, its exact site has not been determined. Milton, in P. R. ii. 28, represents the disciples as seeking the Lord, just before His baptism, "in Jericho, The city of Palms, Aenon, and Salem old." It looks as if Milton confounded it with Jerusalem.

SALERNO (Se. = Salerne). The old Salernum, a city on the W. coast of Italy, at the head of the Gulf of Salerno, 34 m. South-E. of Naples. From the 9th cent. A.D. it was in the hands of the Lombards, but was taken from them by Robert Guiscard in the 11th cent. and made the capital of the Norman Kings of the Two Sicilies. In 1194 it was taken and sacked by the Emperor Henry VI, and the capital was transferred to Palermo. It was later annexed to the crown of Naples, and the heir-apparent was styled Prince of S. The Cathedral of St. Matthew was founded in 1076, and contains the bones of the Apostle. The University, founded in 1150, was one of the chief seats of learning in Italy, and its medical school was especially famous. The hero of Tancred and Gismonda, or Gismond of Salerne, is described as the K. of Naples and Prince of Se. In World Child 170, Manhood says, "Manhood mighty am I named in every country, for S. and Samers . . . have I conquered clean." The reference is to the taking of S. by Henry VI. In Barnes' Charter iv. 3, Lucretia says, "The Prince of Se. solemnly did swear These eyes were quivers."

A Latin poem composed with irregular internal rhymes was written in the 13th cent. by Johannes de Mediolano, with a prose commentary by Arnaldus de Villa Nova, under the title of Regimen Sanitatis Salerni (see below). Hence Salernian (or Salernitan) verse came to mean rhymed Latin verse. Dekker, in Hornbook c. ii., says to the gallant, "Care you not for those coarse painted cloth rhymes made by the University of Se., that come over you with Sit brevis, aut nullus, tibi somnus meridianus." In Lælia iii. 2, 160, Petrus says, "Vartorum ciborum commixtio pessima Causatur digestionem; in schola Salerna est In versu." In iv. 3, 42, he says, "Non hoc meum, sed Scholæ Salernæ consilium est"; to which Stragalcus answers, "Schola Salerna mendax venifica est. Nemo sanior est quam egomet sum Qui plus edo ac bibo quam tres Scholæ Salernæ." Hall, in Satires iv. 4, 22, says, "Never have I Se. rhymes professed, To be some lady's trencher-critic guest." Puttenham, Art of Poesie i. 7, says, "Some poets thought themselves no small fools when they could make their verses go all in rhyme, as did the School of Se." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 6, 4, says, "This is one of the Salernitan doctors, Dr. Merriman, Dr. Diet, and Dr. Quiet." The reference is to a passage in the Regimen: "Si tibi deficient medici, medici tibi fiant Haec tria, mens laeta, requies, moderata dieta."

SALIQUE LAND. The land inhabited by the Salian Franks. In H5 i. 2, 51, the Archbp. describes the land S. as lying 'twixt Elbe and Sala, and as being "at this time in Germany called Meisen." It is far more probable that the Salic Land was in Batavia; and the name, if derived from a river at all, is rather to be connected with the Yssel than the Saale; but most likely it has nothing to do with either.

SALISBURY. The Sarisberic of Domesday Book. The original site of the city was at Old Sarum, 1½ m. N. of the present city or New Sarum, which is the capital of Wilts., and lies at the junction of the Avon, Wiley, Bourne, and Nadder, 82 m. South-W. of Lond. Old Sarum dates back to British times; but the cathedral was transferred to New Sarum by Bp. Poore in 1218, and the town around it laid out by him. Old Sarum was soon entirely deserted, but it retained its representation in Parliament until 1832, though latterly it had not a single inhabitant: the most typical instance of a rotten borough. The Cathedral was founded in 1220 and dedicated in 1258; the famous spire, 404 ft. high, was added between 1335 and 1375. In Middleton's Queenborough iv. 3, Hengist is described as treacherously capturing Vortiger on "a plain near S." The incident took place at Stonehenge on S. Plain, q.v. In R3 iv. 4, 537, the K. cries: "Away towards S.!" and later, "Some one take order Buckingham be brought To S." In v. 1, the execution of Buckingham in an open place at S. is described. In H8 i. 2, 196, Buckingham is reported to have said, "I would have played The part my father meant to act upon The usurper Richd., who, being at S., Made suit to come in 's presence; which, if granted . . . he would have put his knife into him." In Ford's Warbeck iv. 4, the K. commands: "Set forward toward S."; and v. 2 is laid at S., where Warbeck, having been captured at Beaulieu, is brought before the K. In Hycke, p. 102, Frewyll tells how "At S. at Petty Judas we made royal cheer." Petty Judas was the Jewish quarter of the city. In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 1, Truewit warns Morose that his wife will be a states-woman, "know all the news, what was done at S., what at the Bath." Probably the reference is to the prominent position of Cecil, Earl of S., in the court of James I. In Brome's Ct. Beggar iii. 1, Ferdinand asks: "What do you think of S. steeple for a fit hunting-spear to encounter with the whore of Babilion?" In Bale's Johan 1361, Wealth says of the Pope's Interdict: "The bp. of Salysbery and the bp. of Rochester Shall execute it in Scotland everywhere." But the Interdict did not extend to Scotland, and, anyhow, these bps. had no jurisdiction there. Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchett, p. 56, says, "The tales shall be told secundum usum Sarum; the Dean of S. can tell twenty."

S. has been a territorial title in the English peerage since the reign of Henry I. The Earl of S. who appears in K. J. was William de Longespee, a natural son of Henry II, created Earl by Richd. I on the death of his father-in-law, William de Evreux, the 2nd Earl. At first he sided with the K. against the Barons, but later he joined them in their support of the Dauphin. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Lancaster says, "4 Earldoms have I beside Lancaster: Derby, S., Lincoln, Leicester." Henry de Lacy married Margaret, Countess of S., in 1257, and claimed the title in her right; and Thomas of Lancaster gained it by marrying their daughter and heiress, Alice. The Countess of S., whom Edward III woos in Acts i. and ii. of the play of that name, was the wife of William de Montacute, one of the founders of the Order of the Garter; indeed, the tradition is that the garter picked up by the K. was that of the Countess of S. The S., who in R2 supports the cause of the hapless K., was John de Montacute; he headed a revolt against Henry IV, and was beheaded by the rabble at Cirencester in 1400. In R2 v. 6, 8, Northumberland reports that he has sent to Lond. "the heads of Oxford, S., Blount, and Kent." In H5 iv. 3, the S., who takes part in the battle of Agincourt and is described by Bedford as being "as full of valour as of kindness; Princely in both," was Thomas de Montacute, son of the last-named Earl; his death at the siege of Orleans in 1428 is described in H6 A. i. 4. His title descended to Richd. Neville, who married his daughter and heiress Alice and was the father of Warwick the King-maker; he joined the Yorkists, as described in H6 B. v. 1, and commanded their forces at the 1st battle of St. Albans (H6 B. v. 3); he was taken prisoner by Margaret at the battle of Wakefield and beheaded in 1460. The title then descended to his son Richd., Earl of Warwick, who was killed at Barnet in 1471. George, D. of Clarence, married his daughter Isabel, and received the earldom in 1472. The infant son of Richd. III was made Earl in 1477, but died in 1484. Margaret, daughter of George of Clarence, was made Countess in 1513, but was attainted and beheaded in 1541. The earldom was revived in the person of Robert Cecil, created 1605: from him the present Marquess is descended. Philip Massinger was born at S. in 1584.

SALISBURY COURT. On the South side of Fleet St., Lond., W. of St. Bride's Ch. It included what is now called S. Sqre. It gets its name from S. House, the town residence of the Bps. of S. from the 13th cent. onward. S. Sqre. was the great court of the House, and S. C. ran right down to the river and included what is now Dorset St. In 1564 the whole estate passed to Sir Richd. Sackville, and his son, 1st Earl of Dorset, enlarged the house and called it Dorset House. In 1629 the then Earl of Dorset leased a piece of land, about where the S. Hotel now stands, to Gunell and Blagrave, who built there the S. C. Theatre. It was a private theatre, and took the place of the old Whitefriars Theatre; indeed, it is often called the Whitefriars in the plays. It was pulled down by a company of soldiers instigated by the Puritans in 1649, and was not rebuilt till 1660. The whole property, including Dorset House and the Theatre, was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. In Marmion's Leaguer, acted there in 1631, it is referred to as "the Muses' Colony, New planted in this soil." In Epistle Dedicatory to his Histrion-mastix (1633), Prynne says, "a old play-houses, the Fortune and the Red Bull, have lately been re-edified and enlarged, and one new one (Whitefriars) erected"; this last being S. C. The scene of Randolph's Muses is a theatre, probably S. C. In the records of Sir Henry Herbert, Master of the Revels, under date Feb. 16th, 1634, it is stated that Cromes, a broker of Long Lane, was committed to the Marshalsey "for lending a church-robe with the name of Jesus upon it to the players in S. C. to present a flamen, a priest of the heathens." In Epilogue to Brome's Antipodes, it is said: "The play was well acted at S. C." In Actors' Remonstrance (1643) the authors say, "It is not unknown to all the audiences that have frequented the private houses of Black-friars, the Cockpit, and S. C., without austerity we have purged our stages from all obscene and scurrilous jests." In Historia Histrionica (1699), it is mentioned amongst the theatres existing before the wars as "the private house in S. C."

SALISBURY PLAIN. A great plain in Wilts., N. of S., abt. 20 m. broad and 14 long. It is covered with a fine grass which makes it an excellent sheep-walk. In the centre of the P., 9 m. N. of S., is the remarkable Druidical circle called Stonehenge. According to one legend it was set up by Merlin as a monument to his mother Joan; and no one was able to count the stones correctly, through his magic. The P. was a notorious haunt of footpads and highwaymen. In Oldcastle iv. 3, when Cobham is arrested and about to be sent to Southampton to the K., his servant Harpool says, "O that thou and I were within 20 m. of it, on S. P.!"—where they would be safe owing to its solitude and size. In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, Banausus says, "I have a rare device to set Dutch windmills upon Newmarket Heath and S. P., to drain the fens"; Colax points out: "The fens, Sir, are not there"; and Banausus retorts: "But who knows but they may be?" In Treasure, Haz. iii. 267, Inclination says, "I can remember when Noe's ship was made and builded on S. P.; the same year the weather-cock of Pauls caught the pip." In Merlin v. 1, Merlin says to his mother, "When you die, I will erect a monument Upon the verdant plains of S. No K. shall have so high a sepulchre, With pendulous stones that I will hang by art Where neither lime nor mortar shall be used, A dark enigma to the memory, For none shall have the power to number them." In Lear ii. 2, 89, Kent says to Oswald, "Goose, if I had you upon Sarum P. I'd drive ye cackling home to Camelot." Apparently Shakespeare identified Camelot with Winchester (see under CAMELOT). Geese, as well as sheep, are plentifully pastured on S. P. The wearisome joke about the Winchester Goose is here insinuated.

In Cartwright's Ordinary iv. 2, Moth says, "So did the Saxon upon thylke plain Of Sarum done to death by treachery The lords of merry England; nem esur saxes." For the story see under SAXON. Act iv. sc. 3 of Middleton's Queenborough is occupied with this incident, and is located at "A plain near S." In John Evangel 362, Idle says of Sensuality: "I left him in the p. of S. He told me that he would lift Some good fellow from his thrift." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Sogliardo says of Shift: "He has been the only Bid-stand that ever kept New-market, S.-p." etc. In Fulwell's Like, Haz. iii. 326, Roister says, "Sometimes I pitch a field on S. P." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 20, says, "Some times they are clerks of Newmarket Heath, sometimes the sheriffs of S. P. They make many a man stand at Hockley-in-the-Hole." On p. 37 the Devil makes Gregory the Cut-purse "keeper of Combe park, sergeant of S. P." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "All travellers are so beaten to the trials of this law [i.e. the law of highway robbery] that if they have but rode over Shooters Hill or S. P. they are perfect in the principles of it." In Brome's Academy v. 2, Valentine, asked if he can read, says: "I had done ill to venture on S. P. else"; i.e. if he could not read his neck-verse, and so save himself from hanging. In Penn. Parl., section 58 runs: "Also soldiers, that have no means to thrive by plain dealing, we think it necessary that 4 times in the year they go a-fishing on S. P." Stubbes, in Anat. Abuses, p. 53, says that to get money for fine clothes young gallants "will either sell or mortgage their lands on Setters Hill and Stangate Hole and S. P. with loss of their lives at Tyburne in a rope." The scene of George Wilde's Converted Robber (1637) is laid on S. P.

SALMACIS. A fountain springing from the foot of the N. hill of Halicarnassus, q.v. The water was supposed to have an enervating influence on those who drank of it, because its tutelary nymph was one who refused to join in the chase and spent her time in idleness. She fell in love with Hermaphroditus and embraced him as he was bathing in the pool, and the two were merged into one hermaphrodite person. In Apian 425, Apian says, "Oh Gods above, bend down to hear my cry, As once he did to S. in pond hard Lyzia by! Oh that Virginia were in case as sometime Salma-sis!" In Peck's Armaignement i. 5, Oenone says, "S., resembling idleness, Turns men to women." Davensant's Salmacis Pref. says, "On the top of the right horn of the hill which surrounds Halicarnassus is a famous fountain of most clear water and exquisite taste, called S." In Marston's League i. 4, Fidelity characterizes a lady as being "As chaste as S. amidst the stream." The story is the subject of Francis Beaumont's poem Salmacis and Hermaphroditus.

SALOMON ISLANDS (now SOLOMON ISLANDS). A large group of islands in the Pacific Ocean, stretching diagonally from the South point of New Ireland to the New Hebrides. They were discovered by the Spanish navigator Mendana in 1567, and named, from their prospective wealth, Islas de Salomon. Nash, in Lenten, p. 311, speaks of men doing a feat of arms "that from Salomons Islands to St. Magnus corner might cry clang again," i.e. from one end of the earth to the other.

SALTASH. A spt. in Cornwall at the N.W. corner of Plymouth Sound, 4 m. from Plymouth. Two of the ships in the fleet seen by Hycke, p. 88, going from England to Ireland were "the Star of Salte-Ashe with the Jhesus of Plumouth."

SALUSSES (also SALUCA, SALUCES, SALUTIA; i.e. SALUZZO). A city in Piedmont, 30 m. South of Turin, between the Po and the Vraita. It was the seat of a famous Marquessate which began with Manfred in 1142 and continued till the death of Gabriel, when it was seized by the French. Henri IV restored it to Charles Emmanuel of Savoy. One of the Marquises was the husband of Griselda, the heroine of Chaucer's Clerkes Tale; the castle in which she was confined is still to be seen in the lower part of the town, and is used as a penitentiary. In Dist. Emp. iv. 2, Richd. is described as "count of Poyteers, marquis of Saluca." This is in the time of Charlemagne, and is not historical. The scene of Chaucer's Clerkes Tale is "Saluces"; it is also the scene of Phillips' Grissill, where it is called "Salutia." In Chapman's Consp. Byron i. 1, the D. of Savoy swears "by my dearest marquessate of Salusses." He was the Charles Emmanuel mentioned above.

SALUTATION. The sign of a tavern in Lond., which still remains at 17 Newgate St., on the South side of the st. The sign probably represented the meeting between Gabriel and the Virgin Mary. Its fuller title was "The S. and Cat." Possibly a figure of St. Catharine was introduced into the original sign-board. In Feverham iii. 4, Shakesbag says, "Then, Michael, this shall be your penance, to feast us all at the S." In Milkmaids iii. 1, Smirke says, "I left him condoling with 2 or 3 of his friends at the sign of the Lamentation"; and Frederick corrects him: "The S. thou meanst." In Look about xx., Block says, "One of the drawers of the S. told me that he had took up a chamber there." In News Barthol. Fair mention is made of a S. at Billingsgate.

SALYSBERY. See SALISBURY.

SAMANDRIA, or SEMENDRIA. A fortified town on the South bank of the Danube at its junction with the Jessava, 24 m. South-E. of Belgrade. It was often taken and retaken by the Turks and Hungarians during the 15th cent. In Selwus 506, Baiazet says, "We give to him all great Semendria bordering on Bulgrade of Hungaria."

SAMARCANDA, or SAMARKAND. An ancient city in central Asia, abt. 500 m. South-E. of the Sea of Aral, and 145 m. E. of Bokhara. It was destroyed by Alexander the Gr., but afterwards rebuilt. In A.D. 711 it was taken by the Arabs, and soon became one of the leading centres of Mohammedan learning. In 1219 it was pillaged by Jenghiz Khan, but Timur (Tamburlaine), who was born at Kesh, or Shahr-i-Sabz, 50 m. South of Samarkand, made it his capital and restored its former splendours. His palaces and tomb are still to be seen there. It is now in the possession of Russia, having been annexed to that Empire in 1868. The walls form a circuit of 8 miles, but only a small part of the city is inhabited. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 2, Tamburlaine apostrophizes it: "O S., where I breathed first And joyed the fire of this martial flesh, Blush, blush, fair city, at thy honour's foil." In Milton, P.L. xi. 389, Adam sees in vision "Samarchand by Oxus, Temir's throne." Temir is Timour; S. is 200 m. N. of the Oxus. Hall, in Quo Vadis, p. 37, mentions as a sample of travellers' tales "The Samarcanian lamb, which groweth out of the earth by the navel."

SAMARIA, now SEBASTIYEH (Sn. = Samaritan). A city in Palestine, abt. 32 m. N. of Jerusalem. It was made the capital of the Northern Kingdom (Israel) by Omri, and remained so till it was taken and destroyed by Sargon of Assyria in 721 B.C. The inhabitants were transported to Mesopotamia, and their place taken by settlers brought from various parts of the Assyrian Empire. These newcomers partially adopted the Jewish religion, but were not acknowledged by the Judæans as true members of the Chosen People. After the return of the Jews from the Captivity in Babylon in 538 hostilities broke out between them and the Sns., and the latter seceded from the Jews and built a temple of their own on Mt. Gerizim. The bitter feeling lasted all through the rest of the history of the Jews, and in our Lord's time "there were no dealings between the Jews and the Sns." One of the best-known incidents of the Gospel story is the conversation between our Lord and the woman of S. recorded in John iv.; and the parable of the Good Sn. (Luke x. 33) has given to the word the meaning of a benevolent person. The Sn. sect, with its temple and its own version of the Pentateuch, has continued up to the present day.

In Bale's Promises vi., Esaias says, "The K. of Judah in Jerusalem did dwell And in S. the K. of Israel." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, Rasni, K. of Nineveh, says, "I beat proud Jeroboam from his holds, Winning from Cades [i.e. Kedesh-Naphtali] to S." This is not true, as no attack was made by Assyria on Israel during the reign of Jeroboam II. In v. 1, 1901, Jonas says to Ninivie, "Thine eldest sister is Ladama, And Sodome on the right hand seated is." Mr. J. C. Smith conjectures for Ladama "S." and compares Ezekiel xxiii. 33, where the prophet threatens Judah "with the cup of thy sister S." Deighton, with more probability, suggests "El Adama," i.e. Admah, one of the cities of the Plain associated with Sodom and Gomorrah in their overthrow (see Gen. xiv. 8, and Deuteronomy xxix. 23). In Chaucer, C.T.D. 16, the wife of Bath says, "Beside a welles Ihesus, God and man, Spak in repreeve of the Sn." In York M.P. xlv. 290, James declares his intention of preaching to the "Samaritanus." Milton, P.R. iii. 359, supposes our Lord "possessed of David's throne By free consent of all, none opposite, Sn. or Jew." In his Animadvers. 21, he characterizes the Anglican Liturgy as "Sn. trumpety."

SAMERS. Occurs in a list of countries mentioned by Manhood in World Child 170: "Manhood mighty am I named in every country, For Salerno and Samers and Andalus Have I conquered clean." Possibly it is meant for Samos, q.v., which was ravaged in 1453 by Mohammed II and finally added to the Turkish empire in 1550.

SAMNITES. A powerful tribe inhabiting the dist. of central Italy to the E. of Latium and W. of Apulia. 3 wars with the S. are recorded in the history of Rome, in 343, 326, and 298 B.C. respectively. Subsequently the S. supported Pyrrhus against Rome, but in 272 they were finally subdued. They revolted in the Social

War of 90 B.C., but without success. In Kyd's Cornelia iii., Cicero speaks of Rome as "This stately town so often hazarded Against the S., Sabins, and fierce Latins." In Pembroke's Antonie iv. 1456, Cæsar asks, "What rebel Samnite . . . hath wrought such woe to Rome" as Antony? The S., like the Sabines, were supposed to have special skill in magic arts. In Lælia iii. 3, 51, Virginius says of his daughter: "Veneficæ utinam Samniæ enecandam dedissem!"

SAMOEDS. A Mongolian people living on the coast of the Arctic Ocean in N.E. Russia, E. of the White Sea. Purchas, in Pilgrims (1614) 432, says, "The Samoits, or Samoyeds, are clad from head to foot in deers-skins." Milton, P.L. x. 696, speaks of winds blowing "from the north Of Norumbega, and the Samoed shore."

SAMOS (Sn. = Samian). An island in the Ægean Sea, off the coast of Asia Minor between Ephesus and Miletus, separated by a narrow channel from the promontory of Mycale. It was an Ionian colony, and came to the zenith of its glory under the rule of the tyrant Polycrates in the 6th cent. B.C. From his death in 522 to the battle of Mycale in 480 it was under the power of the Persians; it then became a member of the Athenian Confederacy. After many vicissitudes it was added to the Roman Province of Asia 129 B.C. It was sacked by the Arabs in the 8th cent., but was recovered by the Emperor Leo in the 13th. After being successively held by the Venetians and the Genoese, it was finally added to the Ottoman Empire in 1550. The island is full of game, and produces good wine. Its pottery was famous in antiquity. The temple of Hera (Juno) was one of the finest in the Greek world, though only a single column of it now remains. S. was the birth-place of Pythagoras, and, according to one tradition, of Æsop.

In Treasure, Haz. iii. 272, Lust says, "I remember Æsop's advice which he gave to the Samies against K. Cræsus." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Mahaball says, "Here are we feasted With more than Sn. gluttony." The allusion is to the luxury of the court of Polycrates. Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603), ii. 12, tells of the "humour of Polycrates, the tyrant of S., who, to interrupt the course of his continual happiness . . . cast the richest and most precious jewel he had into the sea." In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "History accuseth Apollonius for neglecting of his charge in S." Hall, in Sat. vi. 1, says, "Do thou disdain . . . The tongue-tied silence of the Sn. sage," i.e. Pythagoras, who prescribed silent meditation to his disciples. Milton, P.L. v. 265, compares Satan approaching the earth to a pilot who "from amidst the Cyclades Delos or S. first appearing kens." S. is not one of the Cyclades; but Milton may mean that the pilot is approaching from the Cyclades. In Nash's Summers, p. 100, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to S. for peacocks." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises Physander, amongst other dainties, "Sn. peacocks." The Sn. peacocks gained their celebrity from their association with the worship of Hera, or Juno, to whom they were sacred.

SAMOTHRACE. A large island in the N. of the Ægean Sea, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus. Its highest peak rises to 5240 ft. and is a conspicuous object. The Cabiric Mysteries originated in S. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Hercules says, "Have we in the Argœe pierced S., The Chersoneson Sea, the Hellespont?" In Iron Age A. ii., Achilles says that Hector has conquered "Pannonia, Illyria, and S."

SANBORN. An imaginary place in the imaginary kingdom of Francelia. In Suckling's Goblins v., Píramont speaks of the time "when Sanborn's fatal field was fought."

SANCINA (probably SAMSOON is meant). A port on the Black Sea in Asia Minor, 166 m. West of Trebizond. It carries on a considerable trade with Constantinople. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, the K. of Trebizond announces that he has brought troops from "Riso, S. and the bordering towns That touch the end of famous Euphrates."

SANCTA MONTE. A hill in Italy, near the coast, and close to the mouth of the Arno. In Day's Law Tricks i. 1, Polymetis says, "In S. M., neighbour to Sardinia, where silver Arno courts the fresh banks, my sister met at the temple"—and was carried off by Turkish pirates.

SANCTUARY. The precincts of a ch. or royal palace within which criminals, except those guilty of sacrilege or treason, and debtors were immune from arrest. The right was abolished for criminal cases in 1625, and for civil cases in 1722. The name was specially applied to the precincts on the N. and W. sides of Westminster Abbey. They included the Great, or Broad, and the Little Sanctuaries. The space on which St. Margaret's Ch. and the Westminster Hospital now stand is still called Broad S. Here Elizabeth, Q. of Edward IV, took refuge in 1471 and gave birth to Edward V. Later she and her sons again sought s. there from Richd. of Gloucester. In H6 C. iv. 4, 31, Elizabeth says, "I'll hence forthwith unto the S. To save at least the heir of Edward's right." This was in 1471. In True Tragedy, Haz., p. 81, the little D. of York cries to the Messenger: "What art thou that with ghastly looks presseth into S. to affright our mother Q.?" In R3 ii. 4, 66, the Q. says, "Come, come, my boy, we will to S." In iii. 1. 44, Buckingham urges Gloucester to drag the boys out: "Oft have I heard of s.-men, But s.-children ne'er till now." Deloney, in Reading ix., tells of a Fleming "who took s. at Westminster." In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Mrs. Tattle professes to have all the news "of Tuttle st., and both the Almshouses, the two Sanctuaries." Other sanctuaries in London were Whitefriars, the Savoy, the Mint in Southwark, St. Martin's-le-Grand, and Cold Harbour, q.v. In the list of taverns in News Barthol. Fair one is called "St.-Martins in the Sentree": it was built on the site of the old St. Martin's-le-Grand.

SANDAL. A vill. in Yorks., on the Calder, 2 m. South-E. of Wakefield. The Castle was built by John, Earl of Warren; it was assigned as a residence to Baliol by Edward III in 1333. Later it became the property of Richd. of York. It was dismantled by the Parliament in 1646, and little is left of it save a few scattered stones. In H6 C. i. 2, 63, York says, "Sir John and Sir Hugh Mortimer, mine uncles, You are come to S. in a happy hour." The scene is laid in S. Castle. In True Trag., p. 17, York says, "Myself here in Sandall castell will provide both men and monie."

SANDWICH. A town in Kent near the E. coast, 12 m. due E. of Canterbury, and opposite the Goodwin Sands. It was one of the Cinque Ports, and had a large trade until the port got silted up about the beginning of the 16th cent. It gave its name to a kind of cord, and an adventure of John Montague, the 4th Earl of S., who sat gambling for 24 hours with no food save some slices of beef between pieces of bread, caused the name of sandwich to be given to that form of refreshment.

In W. Rowley's Shoemaker v. 1, 51, Barnaby brings word: "The enemy is landed at S., set ashore at Dover, and arrived at Rumny Marsh." In Three Ladies ii., Simony says that Friar Austin "landed about Rye, S., or Dover." His actual landing place appears to have been the island of Thanet, a few m. N. of S. Later in the same Act, Lucre mentions S. amongst other towns where, in consequence of their great trade, she has infinite numbers that "great rents upon little room do bestow." Drayton, in Barons' Wars iii. 46, tells of ships waiting "at S." to bring the Q. to France. In Apus, Haz. iv. 129, Haphazard says, "Conscience, sailing by Sandwich, he sunk for his sin": i.e. in the Goodwin Sands. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i. 1, Smoke says, "I hope Smoke the smith of Chepstead is as good a man as Chub the chandler of S." Both are among the rebels. In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, a watchman gives the rest news which "came up in a carboat from S." In Webster's Cuckold v. 1, Lessenham says that since Rochford defeated the Spanish ships off Margate "Dover and S. and Margate and all the coast is full of you."

SAN SPIRITO. A monastery at Venice. In Jonson's Volpone v. 8, Voltore is sentenced to be confined in "the monastery of San Spirito."

SANSTON (probably SAWSTON is meant). A vill. 6 m. South of Cambridge. It possesses a church partly of Norman date, and a fine manor house dating from 1557. In Mankind 23, New Guise says, "First I shall begin at Master Huntington of Sanston; from thence I shall go to William Murley of Hanston, and so forth to Pilchard of Trumpington." See under HANSTON.

SANZONATS. A misprint for Sauromats, the latter being another form of Sarmatians. See SARMATIA. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1821, Earth speaks of inquiring news "from the remote estates Of (the oft-shifting place) the Sanzonats." In the note, however, the word is printed Sauromats, and they are defined as the inhabitants of Russia and Tartaria.

SARACEN (Ss. = Saracens). The derivation of the word is unknown, but it was applied by the Romans to the tribes of Syria and Arabia; then it comes to mean an Arab, and is specifically applied to the Mohammedans of Palestine, against whom the Crusaders fought. Then it stands for any enemy of the Christian faith. The dark, moustachioed faces of the Ss. were regarded as peculiarly ugly, and they were supposed to be utterly barbarous and cruel. In R2 iv. 1, 95, Carlisle says, "Many a time hath banished Norfolk fought Against black pagans, Turks, and Ss." In Peele's Ed. I. i. 1, Edward says, "Welcome, sweet Nell, Whose eyes have seen the slaughtered Ss. Piled in the ditches of Jerusalem." In Fulwell's Like, Haz. iii. 336, Virtuous Living says, "O gracious God, how highly art thou of all men to be praised, Of Christians, Ss., Jews, and also Turks." In B. & F. Pesile iii. 2, Ralph exhorts Tapstero: "Spill the blood of treacherous Ss." In Shirley's Imposture v. 1, when Hortensio speaks of Pandolfo's having killed 6 great Turks, he corrects him, "It was but 5, Sir, and a S." In Bale's Johan 1297, the K. says that the Pope had bound his predecessor, Henry II, "3 year after to maintain battle free Against the Sarazens which vexed the Spaniards sore." As a matter of fact, the Pope excused Henry from going on a crusade if he should be fighting against the Moors in Spain. In Jonson's Prince Henry's Barriers, Merlin describes how "Cœur de Lion like a storm Pours on the Ss." In Spenser's F. Q. i. 2, 12, the knight fights with "A faithless Sarazin, all armed to point."

In Nash's Wilton E. 1, Jack speaks of "one that has a sulphurous, big, swollen face like a S." One of the characters in Davenant's Britannia has "a S.'s face with great, black moustachoes." In Cockayne's Obstinate i. 1, Jaques says, "I fear he is some S.: he looks so dismal." In W. Rowley's All's Lost ii. 2, 22, Dionysia says, "Do you think a Sarazin's head or a blackamoor's face can affright me?" In Field's Weathercock i. 2, Abraham asks, "What is yon gentleman?" He looks so like a S. that, as I am a Christian, I cannot endure him." Hall, in Sat. vi. 1, 13, describes a man with a face "like a painted, staring S." In Ret. Pernass. iv. 2, Furor addresses the Recorder as "Thou slimy-sprighted, unkind S." In Middleton's Mad World ii. 4, Sir Bounteous says, "If I be not ashamed to look my lord in the face, I am a S." Nash, in Saffron Walden O. 2, says, "He was thus saracinely sentencing it against me," i.e. savagely. In Shirley's Riches i., Clod says, "You march [on Lord Mayor's day] to the Guildhall, where you look on the giants and feed like Ss. till you have no stomach to Paul's in the afternoon."

SARACEN'S HEAD. A popular tavern sign. There was a "Sarezon Hed" at Nottingham in 1510. There was one in Lond. outside Aldgate; but the most famous, thanks largely to Dickens, was the one on the N. side of Snow Hill without Newgate. In 1522 it is recorded to have had 30 beds and stabling for 40 horses. In Dekker's Satiro i. 2, 362, Tuca says to Horace (Jonsen), "Dost stare, my Sarsens H. at Newgate? Dost gloat?" In Deloney's Craft ii. 6, "Harry . . . smeared Tom Drum's face with his blood that he made him look like . . . the Sarazines H. without Newgate." In Tarlton's jests we read of a man's fat red face: "it fits like the S. H. without Newgate." In Dekker's Shoemaker's v. 1, Eyre says to his wife, "Lady Madgy, thou hadst never covered thy S. H. with this French flap but for my fine journeyman's portuguese." The Inn was pulled down when the Holborn Viaduct was built, but the sign remains at the corner of Cock Lane and Snow Hill. There was also a S. H. at Islington, where is laid the scene of Jordan's Walks of Islington and Hogsdon (1641).

SARAMNA. Probably a mistake for Samara, the old name of the river Somme, in N. France, flowing past Amiens, the old Samarobriua, into the English Channel. Cæsar met the States of Gaul at Samarobriua in 54 B.C. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar, boasting of his exploits, says: "Arar and proud Saramna speaks my praise."

SARAZIN. See SARACEN.

SARDINIA (Sn. = Sardinian). A large island in the Mediterranean between Italy and Spain, South of Corsica. The Carthaginians held it from 512 to 238 B.C., when it was taken by the Romans. After the fall of the Western Empire it was successively occupied by the Vandals and the Goths, but in A.D. 665 it asserted its independence and for the next 4 cents. was governed by its own kings. In 1050 the Pisans came to rescue it from the attacks of the Saracens, and held it till 1225, when the Pope gave it to the K. of Aragon, and it remained a Spanish Province till 1713. By the treaty of Utrecht it was handed over to Austria, who conferred it in 1720 on the D. of Savoy with the title of K. of Sardinia. It is now part of the united kingdom of Italy.

In Ant. ii. 6, 35, Pompey says to Cæsar, "You have made me offer Of Sicily, S." This was in 41 B.C., when Octavian sought to make an arrangement with Sextus Pompeius under which the latter was to have control of Sicily, S., and Corsica. In Davenant's Platonic v. 7, Theander says, "The arms I won at Capua are thine, and those Sn. horse I chose for our last war." In Ford's Trial iii. 4, Benatzi says, "I was born at sea as my mother was in passage from Cape Ludugory to Cape Cagliari, toward Africa, in S." In Day's Law Tricks i. 1, Polymetis speaks of "Sancta Monte, neighbour to S." This hill was, as the context shows, on the coast of Italy, near the mouth of the Arno; therefore over against S. The eating of a certain herb (Herba Sardonica) which grows in S. was said to produce a sort of facial convulsion resembling a grin, which was usually followed by death. Hence the phrase "Sardonian, or Sardonic, laughter," meaning bitter, scornful laughter without any merriment in it. In Spenser's F. Q. v. 9, 12, the monster Guyle "gan . . . with Sardonian smile Laughing on her, his false intent to shade." Chapman, in Odys. xx. 457, speaks of "A laughter . . . most Sardonian, With scorn and wrath mixed." Greene, in Menaphon (1589) 62, asks: "Have you fattened me so long with Sardenian smiles, that . . . I might perish in your wiles?" The fish called a Sardine possibly derived its name from its being caught around S. In Boorde's Intro. of Knowledge (1547) xxviii. 195, the Spaniard says, "I was born in Aragon . . . Masyl bacon and sardyns I do eat and sell." In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Lazarillo begs for "a pilcher, Signor, a surdiny, an olive." In their Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo says that Theodosia looks ready to eat "a fine piece of kid now and fresh garlic With a sardina and Zant oil."

SARDINE SEA. The sea between Sicily and Sardinia. E. D., in Trans. of Theocritus (1588) xvi., says, "Out of our island [Sicily] drive our enemies . . . Along the Sardine Sea."

SARDIS. The capital of the kingdom of Lydia, lying at the N. base of Mt. Tmolus, on the Pactolus, abt. 100 m. from the coast of Asia Minor. It attained its greatest splendour in the time of Cræsus, became then part of the Persian Empire, was conquered by Alexander the Gt., and after his death fell to the Seleucid kings of Syria. It revolted from Antiochus the Gt., but was taken by him after a long siege. After the battle of Magnesia it became part of the Roman Empire, and so remained till the coming of the Seljuk Turks in the 14th cent. It was taken and destroyed by Timur in 1402, and since then has been entirely deserted. The site is marked by an insignificant vill. called Sart. In Mas-singer's Believe v. 1, Cornelia, referring to Antiochus the Gt., says to Marcellus, "You had the honour in his court at S. To be styled his friend." Brutus and Cassius met at S. immediately before their defeat and deaths at Philippi. In J. C. iv. 2, the scene is a camp near S.; and Lucilius reports of Cassius and his troops: "They mean this night in S. to be quartered." They arrive, and the next scene takes place there. In iv. 3, 3, Cassius upbraids Brutus for condemning Lucius Pella "For taking bribes here of the Sardians." In v. 1, 80, Cassius says, "Coming from S., on our former ensign 2 mighty eagles fell." In v. 5, 18, Brutus says, "The ghost of Cæsar hath appeared to me two several times by night; at S. once, And this last night here in Philippi fields." The scene of Cartwright's Slave is laid at S. S. gave its name to the sard, or sardius, stone, a kind of yellow cornelian. Lodge, in Wits Miserie 76, says, "The stone Sardius hindereth the properties" of wrath.

SARGEANTS INN. See SERGEANTS INN.

SARMATIA. A term somewhat vaguely applied to a vast dist. stretching from the Vistula to the Volga, and from the Baltic to the Caspian. In Fisher's Fuinus iii. 2, Laberius boasts: "A Roman never daunted was with looks, Else had not Samertane and Lybian bugbears Been captive led in chains." In Glapthorne's Hollander iv. 1, Sir Martin speaks of "odours precious as the Sarmatick gums." Barnes, in Parthenophil Elegy xvii. 11, says, "Here am I, in perpetual bondage tied, Than if with savage Sauromates far worse." Milton, P. R. iv. 78, describes embassies coming to Rome from "Germans and Scythians, and Sarmatians N. Beyond Danubius to the Tauric pool," i.e. the Sea of Azov. T. Heywood, in Hierarchie ix., p. 574, says, "In John Milesius any man may read Of divels in S. honored, Call'd Kottri or Kibaldi."

SARRA. Another form of Tyre, q.v. Milton, P. L. xi. 243, describes Michael as wearing "A military vest of purple . . . Livelier than Meliboean, or the grain of S.": grain meaning dye.

SARSENS HEAD. See SARACEN'S HEAD.

SARUM PLAIN. See SALISBURY PLAIN.

SATURNAL, MOUNT. See CAPITOL.

SATYLLYE (i.e. ADALIA, the ancient ATTALIA). A port on the South coast of Asia Minor in Pamphylia, at the mouth of the Cataphractes. In Coventry M. P. of Mary Magdalen 1428, the sailors sing, "Yonder is the land of S." Chaucer's Knight was "at Satalye" when it was won from the Turks by Pierre de Lusignan in 1352 (C. T. A. 53).

SAUROMATS. See SANZOMATS and SARMATIA.

SAUXIN. In T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 101, the Souldan describes his army as drawn "From S. eastward unto Nubia's bounds." I conjecture that Suakim, which in Heylyn is spelt Suachen, is meant. It is a seaport on the coast of Nubia, on the Red Sea. Eastward, if so, should rather be westward; for S. is on the E. coast of Nubia; but I imagine Heywood's geographical knowledge was somewhat vague.

SAVIOUR'S, SAINT. An ancient Abbey of the Cluniac order in Bermondsey, which stood at the junction of Bermondsey St. and Abbey St., where is now the ch. of St. Mary Magdalen. It was built in 1082, and dissolved by Henry VIII. The Cross, or Rood, over the gate was found in the Thames in 1118, and had a great reputation for miracle-working. Pilgrims flocked to it, and, along with many other similar objects of popular reverence, it was taken down in 1558. It would seem, however, to have been restored to its place later, for it appears in a drawing of the Abbey made in 1679 and engraved by Wilkinson in Londinia Illustrata. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i., the Palmer tells how he has visited "Saynt Savvour's." John Paston, writing in 1465, begs Margery Paston "to visit the rood of Northedor and St. Savvour at Bermondsey while ye abide in Lond." Weever, p. 111, says, "The image of the Rood of St. Saviour at Bermondsey was brought up to Lond. and burnt at Chelsea, anno 30 Henry VIII." This was perhaps a wooden copy of the original cross.

SAVIOUR'S SAINT, SOUTHWARK (see MARY (SAINT) OVERIES). Taylor, the Water-poet, describes himself as "I John Taylor of St. Saviour's in Southwark."

SAVOY. A duchy lying N.W. of the Alps and originally stretching from Lake Geneva to the Mediterranean, and separated from France by the Rhône. Its Dukes were descended from Humbert the White, who died in 1048. They had from time to time considerable possessions in Piedmont, and though the old Duchy is now part of France the descendants of its Dukes are the Kings of United Italy. During our period the Dukes were Emmanuel Philibert (1553), Charles Emmanuel the Great (1580), and Victor Amadeus (1630). An entirely unhistorical D. of S. is one of the candidates for the Empire in W. Smith's Hector. In Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, Byron instructs La Fin to report to the K. that he was charged "to propound my marriage With the 3rd daughter of the D. of S., Which you have done, and I rejected it." This was Charles Emmanuel. In B. & F. Wild Goose iii. 1, Lugier tells of "a countryman of mine, a brave Savoyard, nephew to the D." i.e. Charles Emmanuel. In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 2, Horatio introduces himself as "2nd son unto the D. of S. and the Piedmont Prince." In Webster's White Devil iv. 2, one of the ambassadors is "my lord of S., knight of the Annunciation." This was an Order instituted by Amadeus VI. in 1362, to commemorate the defence of Rhodes against the Turk by Amadeus I. The gold collar of the Order was specially massive, and the motto F.E.R.T. was supposed to stand for "Fortitudo Ejus Rhodum Tenuit." In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto exhorts Lord Beaufort: "Put on the S. chain about thy neck"—probably referring to the chain of the Order. The passage is plagiarized in B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1. The scenes of Davenant's Love and Honour and Shirley's Grateful Servant are laid in S.

SAVOY PALACE. A palace in Lond., on the N. bank of the Thames between the Strand and the river, W. of Somerset House. It was built by Peter of S., who visited England on the occasion of the marriage of his niece Eleanor to Henry III, and had this palace formally granted to him in 1248 and was created Earl of Richmond. He bestowed it on the Frates de Monte Jovis, a fraternity whose headquarters were in his Duchy of S. but who had a Priory at Hornchurch in Essex. Q. Eleanor bought it from them for her 2nd son, Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, and it remained for a long time the Lond. house of the Lancaster family. Here was imprisoned the French K. John, who was taken prisoner at Poitiers; after his release he remained at the S., where he died in 1364. In 1381 it was completely destroyed by Wat Tyler and his rebels, and remained a heap of ruins till it was rebuilt by Henry VII in 1505 as a Hospital of St. John the Baptist for the housing of 100 poor people. It was suppressed in 1553 and its furniture transferred to Bridewell, but it was re-endowed by Q. Mary and continued to be used as a hospital till 1702, when it was finally dissolved. The buildings were then used for various purposes—as printing offices, a military prison, and places of worship for the French and the Dutch; they were finally swept away, all but the Chapel, when Waterloo Bdge. was built. The Chapel of St. Mary in the Hospital, otherwise of St. John the Baptist in the S., dates from the early 16th cent. and, happily, still survives. Its precincts were a Sanctuary, which was haunted by all sorts of bad characters, and the chapel was constantly used for the celebration of irregular marriages of the Fleet type. Recorder Fleetwood, writing in 1560 about the rogues and vagabonds of Lond., says, "The chief nursery of all these evil people is the S." The name has received quite a new connotation through the S. Theatre and the S. Hotel.

The scene of R2 i. 2 is laid in the D. of Lancaster's Palace; doubtless the S. is intended. In Straw iii., the Lord Mayor says, "The rebels are defacing houses of hospitality, St. John's in Smithfield, the S., and such like." In the Nine Worthies of London (1592), we are told about the rebels: "Earls' manor houses were by them destroyed, the S., and St. Jones by Smithfield spoiled." In H6 B. iv. 7, 2, Cade directs his followers: "Now go some and pull down the S."; but this is a reminiscence of Wat Tyler's work, for the S. was still in ruins. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. v. 2, the Master of Bridewell tells how it was endowed "With all the bedding and the furniture Once proper to an Hospital belonging to a D. of S." There must have been a striking clock in the tower, for in Middleton's R. G. iii. 1, Laxton says, "Hark! what's this? 1, 2, 3; 3 by the clock at S." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 5, Firk says, "Master Bridegroom and Mrs. Bride in the mean time shall chop up the matter at the S." In Middleton's Five Gallants ii. 1, Primero complains, "I have had 2 [knights' heirs] stolen away at once and married at S." In his Chess iv. 4, the Black Knight (Gondomar) promises "a S. dame" that she should have a child "if she could stride over St. Rumbaut's breeches, a relique kept at Mechlin." A S. dame is either a runaway bride or a woman of bad reputation; there is probably also a reference to the fact that the "Fat Bishop," Antonio of Spalato, was at this time Master of the S. Hospital. In Barry's Ram ii. 4, Smallshanks says, "Foot, wench, we will be married to-night; we'll sup at the Mitre and from thence my brother and we three will to the S."

SAXON (Sy. = Saxony). The name of a Teutonic tribe living, when we first hear of them, in what is now Holstein. Thence some of them passed over the North Sea to Britain, and settled there during the later years of the 5th cent. The name is still heard in the last syllable of Essex, Middlesex, Sussex, and Wessex. In our plays these invaders are called Ss., and the word then comes to be used for an Englishman as distinguished from a Welsh or Irish man. The old English language is called S., and the word is applied also to simple English not augmented with words of French or Latin origin. The Ss. also penetrated southwards into Germany, where they settled in the district N. of Bohemia, between the Rhine and the Elbe, now called Sy. They were conquered by Charlemagne and incorporated into the Frankish Empire; but their Dukes gradually grew in power until by the 12th cent. Sy. was one of the 4 great German principalities and its Dukes were Electors of the Empire. Under that title Frederick (died 1428) became one of the most powerful princes in Germany. In the reign of Frederick the Wise (1486-1525) Sy. welcomed the doctrines of the Reformation; and Luther's Translation of the Bible made the S. dialect the standard language of Germany. The Dukes during our period were Augustus I (1553-1586), Christian I (1586-1591), Christian II (1591-1611), and John George (1611-1656). After the Napoleonic wars the N. part of Sy. became a province of Prussia, the remainder forming the kingdom of Sy., now, under a republican Government, a member of the German Empire. There are also several S. Duchies (Weimar, &c.), likewise members of that Empire.

1. Saxon in the sense of the settlers in England. In Merlin i. 2, Artesia speaks of herself as "The sister of the S. general." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iii. 1, Arthur describes Modred's army as made up of "Sluggish Ss' crew, and Irish kerns, And Scottish aid, and false red-shanked Picts." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1547) xvi. 164, says, "I do marvel greatly how the Ss. should conquer Englonde." In Spenser F. Q. i. 1, 65, St. George is said to have sprung "from ancient race of S. kings that . . . High reared their royal throne in Britain's land." In Cartwright's Ordinary ii. 2, Moth speaks of Thursday as "Ycleped so from Thor the Ss' god." In iv. 2, he says, "So did the Ss. done to death by treachery the lords of England; Nem esur saxes." The allusion is to the story of the treachery of Hengist, who invited the British to a feast on Salisbury Plain and then instructed the Ss., at the word "Nem eower seaxes" (i.e. Take your knives), to fall on their guests and murder them. This story is the subject of Middleton's Queenborough iv. 3. In Brome's Queen's Exch. i. 1, Segebert says to Bertha, "Your majestic father made The Ss. happy and yourself a q." Hall, in Sat. v. 1, 70, calls Alfred "the S. king." The language spoken in England before the Conquest began about 1600 to be called English-S., or Anglo-S.; and Old S. was used to mean plain, simple English. Puttenham, Art of Poesie ii. 3, says, "Our natural and primitive language of the S. English bears not any words (at least very few) of more syllables than one." In i. xxx, 72, he calls "song" "our natural S. English word." In Nash's Summers, p. 37, Orion says, "Dogs bark as good old S. as may be." In B. & F. Wife i. 2, Podramo says of a letter: "'Tis a woman's, Sir, I know by the hand and the false orthography; they write old S."

2. Saxony in the sense of the German Dukedom and Electorate. In H5 i. 2, 46, the Archbp. speaks of "the land Salique Between the floods of Sala and of Elbe Where Charles the Gt., having subdued the Ss., There left behind and settled certain French." He goes on to say that this was what "Is at this day in Germany called Meisen." In Greene's Friar vii., Mason tells how the K. is coming to Oxford with "The Almain monarch and the S. duke." If any particular D. is intended, it must be Albert I or II. The scene of Milkmaids is laid at the court of John Ernest, D. of Sy.: presumably the John who was D. 1525-1532. In ii. 2, Julia says, "Faustus did fetch Bruno's wife, duchess of Saxonia, in the dead time of winter, grapes she longed for." In the Faust-Buch this story is told of the Duchess of Anhalt, which Marlowe, in his Faustus, follows. In Chettle's Hoffman there is a John, D. of Sy., who calls himself "mad John of Sy." The scene of Dodypoll is partly in the Court of Sy.; and in ii. 3, we are told that the D. Alphonso has been proposing marriage with "Katharine, sister to the S. d." The scene of Costly Wh. is laid at the court of Sy. A D. of Sy. figures in Defiance of Fortune (1590), and another in Evoradamus, Prince of Denmark (1605). The D. of Sy. appears as one of the Electors in Chapman's Alphonso: in ii. 34, he calls himself "Augustus, D. of S."; he was really Albrecht I; his daughter Hedewick, who marries the English Prince Edward, is entirely fictitious. He also appears in W. Smith's Hector. In Fair Em, William the Conqueror masquerades as "William of Sy.," possibly, as Fleay thinks, because William Kemp, who is supposed to be meant by William the Conqueror, had recently been in Sy. The Ss. shared with the rest of the Germans the reputation of being hard drinkers. In Merch. i. 2, 91, Nerissa asks, "How like you the young German, the D. of Sy.'s nephew?" and Portia replies: "Very vilely in the morning when he is sober, and most vilely in the afternoon when he is drunk." In Dave-nant's Wits iv., Thwack promises himself "Wine evert flowing in large S. romekins About my board." Fynes Moryson, Itiner. iii. 2, 4, says, "The Netherlanders use less excess in drinking than the Ss., and more than other Germans."

In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 61, Alphonsus says, "In S. land you know it is the use That the first night the bridegroom spares the bride." This practice, known as the Toby-night, from the story in the Apocrypha of Tobit's abstinence, was a rule of the Ch., observed both in France and Germany, and was not a S. custom specially. In the same play iii. 1, 113, it is announced that Richd. is going to bring a company of boors and maidens "to dance a S. round."

SAXTON. A vill. in W. Riding Yorks., abt. 4 m. South of Towton, and 11 E. of Leeds. Towton Heath lies between Towton and S., and was the scene of the battle of 1461, in which the Yorkists totally defeated the Lancastrians. The scene of H6 C. ii. 3 is "a field of battle between Towton and S."

SCALA COELI (more fully, SANTA MARIA S.C.). A ch. outside Rome on the road to Ostia. It is close to the ch. of San Paolo alle Tre Fontane, which marks the traditional spot of the execution of the Apostle. It was built over the cemetery of St. Zeno. It derives its name from a vision of a ladder reaching to heaven seen by St. Bernard. The ch. was restored in 1582, and is an octagonal building with a cupola in the centre. Special Indulgences were attached to worship offered there. In Bale's Johan 2107, Dissimulation, after poisoning himself and the K., says, "Sing for my soul a mass of S. Celi That I may climb up aloft with Enoch and Heli." A Will is quoted in The Academy, Jan. 3rd, 1891, dated 13 Hen. VII, in which money is left for the singing of a mass "at Rome at S. Cely." Bacon, Works iii. fol. 183, says, "In the ch. of the blessed Virgin Mary is th'alter which is called s. c.; if they there sing mass for the souls that are in purgatory, the said souls are delivered out of hand." Latimer has many scornful references to it in his sermons.

SCALDING ALLEY. On the N. side of the Poultry, Lond., by St. Mildred's ch., where the poulterers used to scald their fowls. In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas says, "My daughter Cis is an honest cook's wife And comes out of S. A."

SCALDIS. See SKALDE.

SCALONIA. See ASCALON.

SCAMANDER. One of the rivers of Ancient Troy, now the Bunarbashi, rising in Mt. Ida and flowing into the sea just South of Kum Kali at the entrance to the Dardanelles. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Anchises says, "S. fields they [the Greeks] have strewn with carcasses." In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Byron says, "Like Pelides in S.'s flood, Up to the ears in surges will I fight." In Nero iii. 2, Nero says, "Priam saw his Troy burnt . . . whilst thy pure streams, Divine S., did run Phrygian blood." In Pembroke's Antonie ii. 290, Philostratus speaks of "Red S.'s armour-clogged streams." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 35, tells how the Trojan ladies "saw the fields of fair S. strown With carcasses of noble warriors"; and in iv. 11, 20, he calls it "Divine S., purpled yet with blood Of Greeks and Trojans." Lodge, in Answer to Gosson, p. 14, says that "S. . . maketh gray yellow"—a bit of Euphuistic natural history.

SCANDEROON (ISKANDEROON, or ALEXANDRETTA). A spt. on the coast of Syria, abt. 70 m. W. of Aleppo, of which it forms the natural port. It gets its name from Alexander the Gt., who founded it. Sir Kenelm Digby defeated the Venetians near the Gulf of S. in 1628. Jonson, in Underwoods xcvi., on Sir Kenelm Digby, says, "Witness his action done at S. Upon his birthday, the 11th of June." Dekker, in Lanthorn, tells of a woman who, trying to inveigle merchants into her company, pretends that "she is wife to the master of a ship, and they bring news that her husband put in at the Straytes, or at Venice, or S."—and is therefore out of the way.

SCANDIA. A name applied to Norway, Sweden, and part of Denmark; it is sometimes used to include Iceland also. Burton, A. M. i. 2, 1, 2, says, "Nothing so familiar as for witches and sorcerers, in Lapland, Lithuania, and all over Scandia, to sell winds to mariners and cause tempests."

SCARBOROUGH. A town on the coast of Yorks. in the N. Riding, 39 m. N.E. of York. The Castle, standing on a hill above the town, was built in the reign of Stephen. It is now in ruins. Piers Gaveston sought refuge here from the Barons, but was taken and beheaded. It was besieged and battered by Cromwell, and the castle subsequently dismantled by the Parliament. The phrase "a S. warning," which meant a sudden surprise with no warning at all, seems to have originated from the summary way of dealing with thieves which was practised there. In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 4, Edward says to Gaveston and his friends, "Fly, fly, my lords, the earls have got the hold, Take shipping and away to S." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage, which is another version of All's One: A Yorkshire Tragedy of the Calverley family, the husband is called Scarborough; probably to suggest his Yorks. origin. J. Heywood, in Proverbs E. ii., says, "A day ere I was wed I had you, (quoth I); S. warning I had (quoth he), thereby I kept me thence." In Life of Story (1571) Harl. Misc. i. 414, Story says, "Indeed I had Scarborough warning to come to this arraignment, for I knew nothing thereof until 7 of the clock in the morning." Puttenham, Art of Poesie iii. 18, gives as a proverbial speech, "Skarborow warning, for a sudden commandment allowing no respect or delay to bethink a man of his business."

SCHELDT. See SKALDE.

SCHIEDAM. A town in South Holland, on the right bank of the Maas, 4 m. W. of Rotterdam. It is chiefly noted for its manufacture of gin, or hollands, which is often called S. In Shirley's Imposture v. 4, Volterino says, "I left her [the witch] in a sieve was bound for Scotland, whence she was determined to take egg-shell to S."

SCHTEITER-HUYSSSEN (perhaps HUISSEN is intended). A town in Gelderland, 3 m. South-E. of Arnhem, formerly strongly fortified and possessed of an ancient castle. For references to this place see under BOUTTER-SHEIM.

SCICILIE. See SICILY.

SCILLA. See SCYLLA.

SCILLY ISLANDS. A group of islands belonging to the British Crown, lying at the entrance to the English Channel, abt. 25 m. W. of Land's End. Their number is variously reckoned from 40 to 140; only 5, however, are inhabited; the rest are mere rocks. They are probably the Cassiterides of the ancients. In Armin's Moreclacke G. 1, the Governor of S. bids the gentlemen "Welcome to S.," and the scene of part of the play is laid there.

SCITHIA

SCITHIA. See SCYTHIA.

SCLAVONIAN. See SLAVONIAN.

SCOLDS CORNER. Somewhere in the neighbourhood of Smithfield, Lond.; possibly the corner of Cock Lane and Giltspur St. In Promos ii. iv. 1, Gresco says to the watch, "Search Ducke Alley, Cocklane, and S.C." The scene is in Julio in Austria, but these places are all in Lond.

SCONE. An ancient royal city in Scotland, 2 m. N. of Perth. Here the Scottish kings were crowned on the Stone of Destiny, supposed to be the one on which Jacob reposed at Bethel. It was brought to England by Edward I in 1296, and is now enclosed in the Coronation Chair in Westminster Abbey. Little is left of the old city except a cross and the fragmentary ruins of the Abbey. In Mac. ii. 4, 31, Macduff says that Macbeth has "gone to S. to be invested." In v. 3, 75, Malcolm invites the lords "to see us crowned at S."

SCOTLAND (Ssh. = Scottish, Sh. = Scotch). The part of Great Britain N. of the Tweed and Solway Firth. The Romans penetrated it as far as the Tay, but effected no permanent conquest. They found it inhabited by the Picts and the Scots, the latter of whom certainly, and the former possibly, were of Gaelic origin. The Teutonic invaders of Britain established themselves in the South-E. part of the country, afterwards called Lothian, and became the ancestors of the Lowland Sh., who spoke a dialect of English akin to that of Northumberland and Yorks. The Gaelic tribes were driven into the N. and W., retaining their own speech and independence; whilst Lothian belonged to the English kingdom of Northumbria. About the 9th century the Highlands grew into a united kingdom, and in 1018 Malcolm won Lothian, which henceforth remained an integral part of the Ssh. kingdom. In spite of the attacks of Edward I, II, and III, the Ssh. kings maintained their independence until the union of the crowns of England and S., in the person of James VI of S. and I of England, in 1603. The Parliaments were not united till 1707. The Ssh. people embraced the Presbyterian form of the Reformed faith in the 16th century, and the Ch. of S. remained Presbyterian in spite of the Union. The accession of James I brought a large number of Scotsmen into England, where they were regarded with a good deal of jealousy and dislike, as our plays testify.

General and Geographical References. Hycke, p. 88, boasts that in the course of his travels he has been "in middes of Scotlonde." In H4 A. iii. 1, 45, Glendower speaks of "the sea That chides the banks of England, S., Wales." In Err. iii. 2, 122, Dromio found S. "by the barrenness, hard in the palm of the hand" of his kitchen-maid. Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchet, p. 46, says, "We care not for a Ssh. mist, though it wet us to the skin." Taylor, in Penniless, says, "The old proverb of a Ssh. mist was verified, in wetting me to the skin." A Ssh. mist means a shower of fine rain.

Historical Allusions. In Fisher's Fuimus i. 3, Cassibelan says, "Androgeus, haste thee to the Scots and Picts, 2 names which now Albania's kingdom share." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iii. 1, Arthur describes Modred's army as made up of "Sluggish Saxons' crew and Irish kerns And Ssh. aid and false red-shanked Picts." In Mac., Shakespeare tells the story of the murder of K. Duncan by Macbeth and the latter's accession to the throne of S.; and his death at the battle of Dunsinane. The historic period is 1041-1057; but Holinshed, who was Shakespeare's authority, contains little that is strictly historical except the murder of Duncan. In iv. 3, 164, Macduff asks, "Stands S. where it did?" and Ross replies, "Alas, poor country, Almost afraid to know itself; it cannot be called our mother, but our grave." In v. 8, 63, Malcolm says, "My thanes and kinsmen, Henceforth be Earls, the first that ever S. In such an honour named." Holinshed is the authority for this statement. In Peele's Ed. I, Edward makes Baliol K. of S. in 1292, and his subsequent rebellion and defeat in 1296 are described. In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, reference is made to the raids of the Sh. on England; and Lancaster quotes a ballad made by the "fleering Scots"—"Maid of England, sore may you mourn For the lemans you have lost at Bannocksburn." The battle of Bannockburn was won by the Scots in 1314. In Ed. III, David II of S. appears, and the siege by him of Roxburgh Castle and his subsequent retreat form the subject of Act i. In H5 i. 2, 160, Canterbury recalls how, in the days of Edward III, England took and impounded "as a stray The K. of Scots"—David II was taken prisoner by Q. Eleanor, at Neville's Cross, in 1346, and kept in captivity for 11 years. In H4 A. i. 1, 54, Westmoreland mentions "brave Archibald, That ever valiant and approved Scot," as Percy's opponent at Holmedon Hill; and a further report declares that "10,000 Scots" were slain there. In i. 3, 214, Hotspur declines to give up his prisoners to the K.: "By God, he shall not have a Scot of them." Later in the scene, Worcester advises him to deliver up his Ssh. prisoners without ransom, "And make the Douglas' son your only mean For powers in S." Thus, as Hotspur sees, "The powers of S. and of York" are to join with Mortimer to attack Henry IV. The battle of Holmedon Hill took place on Sept. 14, 1402; Archibald was the Earl of Douglas. In ii. 4, 116, the Prince describes Hotspur as "he that kills me some six or seven dozen of Scots at a breakfast." In ii. 4, 377, Falstaff calls Douglas "that sprightly Scot of Scots that runs a horseback up a hill perpendicular." In iii. 2, 164, Blunt says, "Lord Mortimer of S. hath sent word That Douglas and the English rebels met At Shrewsbury." There was no such person as Lord Mortimer of S.; the man intended is George Dunbar, Earl of March in the peerage of S. The Mortimers were Earls of March in the peerage of England, whence the confusion arises. Moreover, Edmund Mortimer in this play was not the Earl of March at all, but the 2nd son of the 3rd Earl, Edmund, and uncle to the 5th Earl, also Edmund. In H4 B. ii. 3, 50, Lady Northumberland advises her husband, "Fly to S.!" and he resolves to do so. In iv. 4, 98, Harcourt brings word: "The Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolph, With a great power of English and of Scots, Are by the sheriff of Yorks. overthrown." This was at the battle of Bramham Moor in 1408. In H5 i. 2, 142, the K. says, "We fear the main intendment of the Scot Who still hath been a giddy neighbour to us; For . . . my great-grandfather Never went with his forces into France But that the Scot on his unfurnished kingdom Came, pouring like the tide into a breach." Westmoreland adds, "There's a saying very old and true, 'If that you will France win, Then with S. first begin'; For once the eagle England being in prey, To her unguarded nest the weasel Scot Comes sneaking, and so sucks her princely eggs." The same proverb is quoted by Oxford in Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 350. In H6 C. iii. 1, 13, K. Henry says, "From S. am I stolen, even of pure love, To greet mine own land with my wishful sight." Henry fled to S. after the battle of Hexham in 1464, but returned to England in disguise the next year, and was recognized and taken prisoner. In iii. 3, 26, Margaret says that Henry "is forced to live in S. a forlorn," and adds, "S. hath will to help but cannot help." Warwick, in 151, retorts: "Henry now lives in S. at his ease." In R3 iii. 7, 17, Buckingham says to Gloucester, "I Laid open all your victories in S." Gloucester was in command of the expedition against S. in 1482, when he invested Berwick, and recovered it for England. In Greene's George, one of the characters is James of S.; Edward is the contemporary K. of England, so that James III and Edward IV would seem to be intended. Other indications point to Edward III, but there was no Sh. K. James contemporary with him. In Ford's Warbeck, James IV of S. is one of the characters, and a large part of the play is occupied with Warbeck's residence at his Court, and the consequent invasion of S. by the English. In iv. 2, Astley says, "If these Sh. garboils do not fadge to our minds, we will run pell-mell amongst the Cornish chuffs." Milton, in Sonn. to Cromwell, says, "Darwen stream with blood of Scots imbrued, And Dunbar field resounds thy praises loud." The references are to the battles of Preston (1648) and Dunbar (1650), in which Cromwell defeated the Sh. In Hester, Anon. Pl. ii. 265, Ambition says, "If war should chance either with S. or France, This gear would not go right"—a very daring anachronism. Greene wrote a play entitled The Scottish History of James IV, slain at Flodden. The plot, however, is entirely fictitious.

SCOTLAND

English Dislike of the Scots who came to England with James I. In Eastward iii. 3, Seagull, speaking of Virginia, says: "You shall live freely there without serjeants or courtiers or lawyers or intelligencers; only a few industrious Scots, perhaps, who indeed are dispersed over the face of the whole earth. But as for them, there are no greater friends to Englishmen and England when they are out on't, in the world, than they are; and, for my own part, I would a hundred thousand of them were there; for we are all one countrymen now, you know." This was the passage which gave such offence to James, and led to the imprisonment of the authors, Chapman, Marston, and Jonson. In Barry's Ram iv. 1, Sir Oliver says, sarcastically, "English love Scots, Welshmen love each other." In Sharpham's Fleire ii. 169, Fleire says that the ladies at Court "love the fine little Scottes spur, it makes the court jennet curvet, curvet gallantly." In iii. 173, Knight says, "Many of our ladies delight much in the Sh. music." "Ay," says Fleire, "with their instruments," where a double entendre is meant. In Suckling's Brennoralt, the rebel Lithuanians are meant for the Sh. malcontents of 1639. Donne, in Eleg. (1633) xi. 42, speaks of "S., which knew no state, proud in one day," i.e. the day of the accession of James VI to the throne of England. James is said to have knighted 700 persons during the first 3 months of his residence in England. Hence Sh. knight became a term of contempt. In Eastward ii. 2, Quicksilver warns Sir Petronel that his wife will say "she could have been made a lady by a Sh. knight and never ha' married him;" a declaration by writing, word, or sign, even without witnesses, or notorious cohabitation, being sufficient in old Sh. law to establish a marriage. In Kyd's Soliman i., the Englishman says, "In S. was I made a knight." But as the play was produced in 1588 the reference cannot be to James's knights—unless the passage is a later insertion. In Chapman's Bussy i. 2, 124, L'Anou says, "The D. mistakes him . . . for some knight of the new edition."

The Patron Saint of S. is St. Andrew. According to tradition, St. Regulus brought some of the bones of the apostle Andrew to S. in the 9th cent., and enshrined them at the monastery around which the city of St. Andrews sprang up. St. Andrew's Cross is represented in the shape of an X or saltire, and is white on a blue field. It is embodied in the Union Jack. In Kirke's Champions i., Andrew says, "For bonny S. Andrew will advance." The Arms of S. are described by Heylyn (s.v. SCOTLAND) as "Sol [i.e. Or] a Lion rampant within a double tressure counterflowered."

Louis XI of France enrolled a body of Scottish archers to be his bodyguard. Readers of Scott's Quentin Durward will recall them. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, the Chancellor says, "This was it that made Louis the 11th renounce his countrymen And call the valiant Scots out of their kingdom To use their greater virtues and their faiths . . . in his royal guard."

S., like most northern countries, was supposed to be the home of witchcraft and enchantment. The 3 Witches in Macbeth are typical examples. In Shirley's Imposture v. 4, Volterino says, "I left her [the witch] in a sieve was bound for S." In Dodypoll iii. 2, Alberdure says, "This is Melpomene, that Sh. witch." The reference is to the trial of certain Sh. witches in 1590. In T. Heywood's Witches i., Winny says, "You look like one o' the Sh. wayward sisters": referring to the witches in Macbeth.

National Characteristics. Boorde, in Intro. of Kno-w ledge iv., says that the N. Scots are like the wild Irish, rude and unmannered; they are very poor, and live in single-roomed huts; they hate all Englishmen, and are great boasters and liars. Still, they are hardy and strong, and are good musicians. They are accustomed to swear by "the foul evil," and they have always been true to the French. English is spoken in the South, but a speech like Irish in the N. of the country. In H4 A. iv. 1, 85, Douglas says, "There is not such a word Spoke of in S. as this term of fear." In v. 4, 119, Falstaff says, "'Twas time to counterfeit or that termagant Scot had paid me scot and lot too." In H4 A. v. 3, 11, Blunt says to Douglas, "I was not born a yielder, thou proud Scot." In Chapman's Caesar ii. 1, 116, Ophioneus says, "Thou shalt . . . cheat with the Englishman, brag with the Scot, and turn all this to religion." In Merch. i. 2, 83, Portia says of the Sh. lord who has come wooing her: "He hath a neighbourly charity in him, for he borrowed a box of the ear of the Englishman, and swore he would pay him again when he was able." After the accession of James the players prudently altered "Sh." to "other." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius celebrates the charms of "The Italian in her high chapins, Sh. lass, and lovely Frau too."

Dress and Appearance. Both Sh. and Irish are nicknamed "Red-shanks" from their going bare-legged. In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Chough refers to the Sh. and Irish as "red-shanks." Elder, in a Letter (1542) in Barnatyne Misc. i. 10, speaks of "The yrische lords of S., commonly called the Reddshankes and by historiographers Pictis." See under REDSHANK. In Ford's Warbeck iii. 2, a masque is presented by "4 Sh. antics, accordingly habited." Dekker, in Hornbook iv., says that a gallant must be "ingenious in the trussing of a new Sh.-hose." The Sh. cap, or Glengarry bonnet, is familiar. In Lochrine iv. 2, the direction is: "Enter Strumbo with a pitch-fork and a Sh.-cap." In Spenser's

Mother Hubbard 210, the Ape, who is dressed as a soldier, has "Upon his head an old Sh. cap . . . With a plume feather, all to pieces tore." In Scot. Presb. v. 1, Anarchy says to Directory, "Sir, you must go, but not to S.; that's but purgatory—yet where you'll find many blue bonnets more, I mean, to hell." The Farthingale was a kind of crinoline, fitting tightly round the waist, and projecting stiffly over the hips. In Eastward i. 2, Poldavy, the French tailor, enters with a Sh. farthingale; and when Girtred asks: "Is this a right Scot? Does it clip close and bear up round?" he answers: "Fine and stiffly, i' faith; it will keep your thighs so cool and make your waist so small." In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Birdlime says, "This [i.e. to control one's husband] is better wit than to learn how to wear a Sh. farthingale." The falls are a kind of hanging veil; the bum a sort of bustle. In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "She's in that French gown, Sh. falls, Sh. bum, and Italian headtire you sent her."

The Sh. jig, or reel, is a lively dance, performed to a tune in triple, usually 6/8 time. In Ado ii. 1, 77, Beatrice says, "Wooring, wedding, and repenting is as a Sh. jig, a measure, and a cinque pace; the first suit is hot and hasty like a Sh. jig, and full as fantastical." In Greene's James IV prol., Bohan says, "I have 2 sons That with one Ssh. jig Shall break the necks Of thy antiques." The phrase is sometimes used in an obscene sense, as in Dekker's Westward v. 2, where Sir Gosling says, "The bawd shall teach me a Sh. jig"; and in Richard's Misogonus ii. 2, where Misogonus says, "I would ask no more of her than one Ssh. jig."

The language of the natives in the rural Highlands of S. is a branch of the Celtic family, but what is usually meant by Sh. in our dramatists is the dialect of English spoken in the Lowlands. Dekker, in Lanthorn, says that, before the confusion of tongues at Babel, "the quick Ssh. dialect, sister to the English, had not then a tongue." Specimens are found in the talk of the Scots capt., Jamie, in H5; thus in iii. 2, he says, "It sall be vary gud, gud feith, gud captains bath; and I sall quit you with gud leve, as I may pick occasion; that sall I, marry." Jonson introduces fragments of the same sort of talk in the Sad Shepherd, e.g., "He neer fra' hence sall neis her in the wind"; "Shew yoursell to all the shepherds bauldly; gaang amang 'em, be mickel in their eye, frequent and fugeand." Other examples occur in Greene's James IV, Thomas of Reading, Conflict of Conscience, and Club Law. In Sampson's Vow ii. 1, 11, Doisells, the French commander at Leith, says, "The Sh. language I am perfect in." In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, the Capt. says to Lady Loveall, "I'll help you to the jewel, the Sh. dictionary will tell you the value of it." Jewel is used here with a possible reference to the Sh. word "jevel" which means to spill a liquid, but I have not been able to find the point of the reference to the Sh. dictionary.

Various Articles Specified as Scotch.

ALE. In Underwit iv. 1, a song mentions "Wholesome pots of Sh. ale, though 'tis dear." ASH was used for spear-shafts. In Ed. III i. 2, K. David speaks of "the staves of grained Ssh. ash" borne by his soldiers. BARNACLE. A species of wild goose (Anas Leucopsis) which visits the N. shores of Britain in winter, and was supposed to be developed from a species of shell-fish. In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bianca says, "Any man that will flatter greatness shall be sure to be like your Sh. barnacle, now a block, instantly a worm, and presently a great goose." Hall, in Satires iv. 2, speaks of "That Ssh. barnacle. . . That of a worm doth wax a winged goose." BAWBE. A Sh. silver coin which, owing to the debasement of the metal, was only worth about $\frac{1}{4}$ d. It was probably so called from the name of the mint-master, the Laird of Sillebawby. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii., Thomas says, "We have not a Scots baubee to bless us with." BOOT. An instrument of torture, made of wooden staves, into which the leg was inserted; and wedges, being driven in gradually, crushed the limb of the unfortunate victim. It was much used in the persecution of the Sh. Presbyterians. In Field's Weathercock iv. 2, Pouts speaks of "Racks, Strappadoes, wheel, or any tortorous engine, Even from the Roman yoke to the Sh. boot." In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bianca says, "All your empirics could never do the like cure upon the gout the rack did in England or the Sh. boot." There were stories of persons who had been cured of the gout by the application of these tortures. BROAD-SWORD. Also called an Andrew Ferrara, and later a claymore. It was a broad-bladed sword with 2 cutting edges. Hall, in Satires iv. 4, tells of a man rushing into a quarrel "With a broad Scot or proking spit of Spain." B. & F., in Chances viii., talk of "a tough Andrew." COAL. Mineral coal began to be mined in S. about 1291, and by the close of the 16th cent. it was in general use for domestic purposes and was exported by sea to Lond. In Mayne's Match iii. 3, Quartfield, hearing that old Warehouse has been run down by a coal-ship in the Thames, says, "I shall love Sh. coal for this wreck the better." In Hall's Characters, one of the topics of the Busy-body's conversation is "the report of the Ssh. mine." DIRK. The dagger, or sgian-dhu, carried by the Highlanders, often in the top of their stockings. In Club Law i. 5, Cricket says, "O Lord, that I could but save me as much money as would buy me a Ssh. dagger to prick the villains!" Thomas Becon, in Jewel of Joy (1550), says of the English: "Their dagger must be Ssh. with a Venetian tassell of silk." FLEAS. A name for Syphilis. Taylor, in Praise of Hempseed, says, "Many a gallant Hath got the Spanish pip, or the Ssh. fleas, Or English pox, for all's but one disease." HOLY-BREAD. The bread used in the celebration of the Lord's Supper by the Sh. Ch. In Webster's White Devil v. 6, Flamineo says, "My liver's parboiled, like Sh. holly-bread." HORSES. James I established horse-racing in S., and did much to encourage the breed of running-horses, both before and after his accession to the throne of England. In Chapman's Rev. Busy ii. 1, Baligny speaks to Clermont of "your brave Sh. running-horses That all the horse in France far overruns At every race and hunting." POUND. At the time of the union of the Crowns the pound Scots was only worth 20d., or one-twelfth of a pound sterling. In Jonson's Barthol. iii. 1, Cokes says, "What a masque shall I furnish out for 40s., 20 pound Sh., and a banquet of gingerbread." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iii. 1, Ferdinand says, "You and I to cribbage for an odd hundred pound; I mean not Sh., but Sterling English pieces." TAILOR. Travelling pedlars were known as Sh. tailors, or drapers. In B. & F. Fair Maid iv. 2, the tailor says, "I have talked with a Sh. tailor who . . . has travelled far, and was . . . in Poland." House to house "travellers" or pedlars are to-day called Scottish (or Scotch) travellers.

SCOTLAND YARD. An irregular group of buildings in Lond., lying South of Charing Cross, between Whitehall and the Thames. It derived its name from a palace which stood there, which was first granted to Kenneth III of S. by K. Edgar and was the official residence of the Kings of S. when they came to Lond. The last of their representatives to occupy it was Margaret, sister of Henry VIII and wife of James IV of S. In the reign of Elizabeth it fell into decay, but it was partially restored by James I and used as Government offices. In 1829 it became the headquarters of the Metropolitan Police. Here Milton was accommodated from 1649 to 1652, whilst he was acting as Latin Secretary to the Council of State.

SCRASBLESEA. A vill., apparently in Yorks.; it has not been identified. Dyce suggests Scrivelsby or Scamblesby, both in Lincs.; but their position is not suitable. In George i., Johnny says to the K. of Scots, "The Earl of Kendall vows to meet you at Scrasblesea, God willing."

SCRUTINEO. A hall in the Doge's Palace in Venice. It occupies part of the façade towards the Piazzetta. The 41 nobles who elected the Doge were chosen here. It now contains the MSS and early printed books of the Library. The scene of Jonson's Volpone iv. 2 is laid in "The Scrutineo, or Senate House" at Venice.

SCYLLA. A rocky promontory on the Italian side of the Straits of Messina, 15 m. N. of Rhegium. According to Homer, the promontory was the home of a ravenous monster who attracted sailors by siren songs and then devoured them. By the arts of Circe, S. was turned into a pack of hounds from her waist downwards and then flung herself into the sea, and was changed into, or inhabited, the rock that bore her name. Opposite to it, near Messina, is the whirlpool Charybdis; in trying to avoid S., there was a danger of falling into Charybdis; hence S. and Charybdis stand for 2 alternatives either of which is fraught with peril. In Span. Trag. v., the Viceroy says, "Let the wind and tide hale me along To Sylla's barking and untamed gulf." Milton, P. L. ii. 660, referring to the dogs that barked round the waist of Sin, says, "Far less abhorred than these Vexed S., bathing in the sea that parts Calabria from the hoarse Trinacrian shore." W. Smith, in Chloris (1596) xxxv. 6, speaks of his love "passing the gaping S.'s waves." In Mason's Milestones 2259, Julia says, "Thy Mermaid eloquence Sounds harsher in my ears than Silla's dogs Unto the frightened seaman."

In Merch. iii. 5, 19, Launcelot says to Jessica, "When I shun S., your father, I fall into Charybdis, your mother." In Brandon's Octavia 620, Octavia says, "What Sylla, what Charybdis, can impart But half those horrors which in thee appear?" In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 3, 1085, Iphigina says, "So shall we soon eschew Caribdis' lake And headlong fall to Sylla's greedy gulf." In the old Timon v. 5, Timon says, "In the wide-devouring S.'s gulf, Or in Charybdis I will drown myself." In Houghton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pisaro, speaking of the Spanish pirates, says: "Roaring Charybdis nor devouring S. Were half such terror to the antique world." In Chapman's Busy iii. 1, Montsurry says that women "in their hearts are S. and Charybdis." In Wilson's Swiss iv. 2, Ariolus says, "I am just like a weather-beaten vessel tossed from rock to rock, from S. to Charybdis." In Shirley's Ct. Secret iv. 1, Pedro says, "I have dangerous sailing betwixt your Grace's S. and her Charybdis." In Milton's Comus 257, Comus says that when the Sirens sang "S. wept and chid Her barking waves into attention; And fell Charybdis murmured soft applause." In Apian, Haz. iv. 139, Virginian says, "The huge Carrebd his hazards thou for him Hast oft assayed, was Silla's force by thee Oft shunned or yet Lady Circe's land?" Middleton, in Black Book Intro., p. 6, speaks of "S. and Charybdis, those 2 cormorants and Woolners of the sea." Richard Woolner, of Windsor, was a notorious glutton of the time.

SCYLLA (i.e. SCYLACE). An ancient Pelasgian town on the Propontis, E. of Cyzicus. It was one of the 12 coast towns taken by Achilles before his quarrel with Agamemnon (Homer, Iliad ix. 328). In T. Heywood's Iron Age A. v., Ulysses claims: "'Twas I sacked Thebes, Chriseis, and Scylla, with Lernessus walls."

SCYRAS. Probably the plain of Azgar is meant; it lies on the W. coast of Morocco, South of Alcazar. In Peele's Alcazar i. 2, the Moor orders "Pisano, march away before to Scyras."

SCYRUM (more properly SCYROS). An island in the Ægean Sea, one of the N. Sporades, abt. 40 m. E. of Eubœa. Here Achilles was concealed by Thetis; and it was here that Theseus met his death. Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit., p. 74, speaks of "the men in the island of S. which pull up the old tree when they see the young begin to spring." In Euphues England, p. 207, he tells a story of one Cassander who dwelt "in the island S." No authority for either statement has been discovered.

SCYTHIA (Sn. = Scythian). The Greek name for the country inhabited by the Sns., a nomadic tribe probably of Indo-Germanic affinities, but supposed by some authorities to have been akin to the Ottoman Turks, or the Mongols. They wandered over the region to the N. of the Black Sea, which constitutes the Steppes of Southern Russia, but their habitation had no very definite boundaries. Towards the end of the 7th cent. B.C. they pressed South into the Assyrian Empire and into Asia Minor, and threw even Palestine into a panic terror, as may be seen from the prophecies of Jeremiah. Cyrus attacked the Massagete, a Sn. tribe, and offered marriage to their Q. Tomyris; she rejected his offer, and afterwards defeated and slew him. Darius, and later, Alexander the Gt., invaded S. The last traces of the Sns. disappeared about 100 B.C., but the name continued to be applied in a vague way to the tribes of central Russia and Asia. Timur or Tamburlaine is often described as a Sn. The Sns., as Purchas says, "grew into a proverb of immane cruelty"; they are spoken of as barbarous, pitiless, and savage. They were supposed to guard their women with great care, and to inflict the severest penalties for adultery. Their country was thought of as mountainous and cold.

One of the characters in Jonson's Queens is "Victorious Thomyris of S." In H6 A. ii. 3, 6, the Countess of Auvergne says, "I shall as famous be by this exploit As Sn. Tomyris by Cyrus' death." In Lyly's Campaspe iii. 4, Hephæstion describes "the Sns., careless what courage or fortune can do" awaiting the attack of Alexander. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron says that Alexander taught "The Sns. to inter, not eat their parents." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 4, Cæsar says, "I'll fill Armenian plains and Medians' hills With carcasses of bastard Sn. brood." In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, Amurack bids Bajazet "Go post away apace to Siria, S., and Albania, and all other lands Which owe their homage to high Amurack." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. prol. the hero is described as "the Sn. Tamburlaine"; in i. 1, he is called "that sturdy Sn. thief," "that paltry Sn.," etc. In Selimus 2439 Selim calls him "great Tamburlaine the Sn. thief." In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortune speaks of him as "that great Sn. swain, Fortune's best minion, warlike Tamburlaine." He was born at Kesh, near Samarkand, and was of Mongolian descent. Milton, P. R. iii. 301, says, "Now the Parthian k. In Ctesiphon hath gathered all his host Against the Sn., whose incursions wild Have wasted Sogdiana." This is unhistorical, but is invented in order to give the poet an opportunity of describing the various nations in the Parthian host. In iv. 78, our Lord sees embassies coming to Rome, "Germans, and Sns., and Sarmatians." According to the legend followed in Locrine, the Sns. or Huns, under their chief, Humber, invaded Britain in the days of Brutus and his sons, and Humber was drowned in the river that bears his name. Milton Vac. Ex. 99 speaks of "Humber loud that keeps the Sn's. name."

The Sns. were expert archers. In Cowley's Cutter ii. 3, Puny says, "Come away like an arrow out of a Sn. bow." But it is their barbarity that is most insisted on in the plays. In Tit. i. 1, 131, Chiron exclaims, "Was ever S. half so barbarous?" In Lear i. 1, 118, Lear says, "The barbarous Sn., Or he that makes his generation messes To gorge his appetite, shall to my bosom Be as well neighboured . . . As thou, my sometime daughter." In the old Timon ii. 4, Demeas says to the serjeants, "Where hale ye me, Getes, cannibals, ye cruel Sns.?" In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 4, Olympia says, "Those barbarous Sns., full of cruelty, Will hew us piecemeal." In Ed. iii. i. 1, the K. speaks of "such sweet laments That it may make a flint-hearted Sythian pitiful." In York. Trag. viii., the Master says, "The Sns. or the marble-hearted Fates Could not have acted more remorseless deeds." In Chivalry F. 4, Katharine says, "No bloody Sn. or inhuman Turk But would ha' trembled to ha' touched his skin." In Nero i. 4, Scævola says of the Emperor: "Hath he not broached His own wife's breast, and torn with Sn. hands His mother's bowels up?" In Field's Weathercock ii. 1, Scudmore affirms that "wild Virginia, black Afric, or the shaggy S." have more conscience than old Worldly. In Shirley's Traitor iv. 1, Sciarra says, "Let me die A death that may draw tears from Sns." In his Duke's Mist. iii. 3, Leontio says, "What Sn. can behold an outrage done upon those eyes, and not melt his rough nature in soft compassion?" In Glapthorne's Wallenstein ii. 2, Frederic says, "She bears a spell about her that would charm A Sn's. native fierceness into softness." In Davenant's Platonic ii. 5, Theander asks, "Was she by a Sn. nursed That she is grown so cruel?" In his Wits ii., Pallatine says, "I was not bred on Sn. rocks." In Cuckqueans ii. 1, Nim exclaims, "O more than Sn. inhospitality!" In Cowley's Riddle iv., the Maid says, "Sure he has charms about him that might . . . move a Sn. rock." In Lady Mother v. 2, Thorowgood says, "I should esteem it As base and black a sin as Sns. do Adultery."

In B. & F. Valentin. v. 2, Valentinian cries for "Drink, drink, colder, colder Than snow on Sn. mtns." In their Double Mar. iii. 3, Violetolet says, "Let me declare thy virtues Chaster than crystal on the Sn. cliffs." In their Four Plays in One, Triumph of Death vi., Gabriella asks, "What Sn. snow so white? what crystal chaster?" In Wilson's Swiss iii. 3, the K. says, "Thou art more cold than frozen Sns. are." In Nabbes' Hannibal iii. 4, Massanissa says to Sophonisba, "This will make that ivory breast as cold As Sn. sands, bleaked with continual freezing Into a seeming crystal."

In Chapman's Bussy i. 1, Monsieur says, "The rude Sns. Painted blind Fortune's powerful hands with wings To show her gifts come swift and suddenly." I have not been able to find his authority for this. In Tiberius 152, Asinius suggests "the Sithian baths" as one part of the Roman Empire that may be chosen by Tiberius as his residence, if he declines the throne. Probably the author means the German Spa, for "Sn." is used sometimes by the Elizabethans in the widest sense, including all the old German tribes. Just above Asinius has spoken of the English wells, which shows that the author was thinking in modern terms. But it is not improbable that Sithian is a misprint for Sirian, which takes its place in i. 167. In May's Agrippina iv. 470, Petronius says, "The Sn. yields His early fleece" for the luxury of Rome. But May has mis-translated the Latin original, which is Seres, i.e. the Serians or Chinese; Serian wool meaning silk.

SCYTHIAN SEA. Another name for the Black Sea, q.v. E. D., in Trans. of Theocritus (1598) xvi., says, "Let the poets strive, K. Hiero's glory for to strain Beyond the Scythean sea."

SEACOAL LANE. A lane in Lond., now represented by a narrow alley running from Farringdon St. into Fleet Lane, behind Cassell's premises in Ludgate Hill. Formerly it ran from Snow Hill to Fleet Lane, and at its foot on the Fleet River was a landing-stage where the boats, bringing sea-borne coal, discharged their freight. It is mentioned in the Pipe Rolls as early as 1228. Here was St. George's Inn, one of the oldest Schools of Law in Lond. In Elizabethan times it was chiefly occupied by ale-houses, cook-shops, and chandlers' stores. In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Druggier relates how he was cured of a headache by a good old woman; "Yes, faith," he says, "she dwells in S. L., did cure me With sudden ale and pelltory of the wall; Cost me but 2d." One of Peele's Jests is located "at a blind alehouse in S. L."

SEBASTIAN'S, SAINT. A ch. in Madrid. In Shirley's Brothers i. 1, Fernando says, "I was at St. Sebastian's last Sunday."

SEBASTIAN'S (ST.) MONASTERY. A monastery in Naples. I have not succeeded in identifying it further. In Webster's Law Case ii. 2, Romelio says, "Take up the body and convey it To St. Sebastian's monastery."

SEBASTIAN, SAINT, TOWER OF. A tower, apparently near to the Porta del Popolo, which is at the N. end of the Corso at Rome, and was the gate through which the Flaminian Way entered the city. There is a Porta di San Sebastiano at the extreme South of the city where the old Appian Way comes in. It was a fine gate, flanked with a couple of towers. Probably Barnes was a little confused in his topography when, in his Charter ii. 1, Alexander orders Castilian to "fortify upon the tower of St. Sebastian affronting that port where proud Charles should enter, called Santa Maria di Popolo."

SECHEM, or SHECHEM (the present NABLOUS). A town lying in the valley between mts. Ebal and Gerizim, in the centre of Palestine, 6 m. South-E. of Samaria. Here Abraham encamped when he first entered the land of Canaan (Gen. xii. 6, 7). Jacob's Well and Joseph's Tomb are in its immediate neighbourhood. Milton P. L. xii. 136, says of Abraham: "I see his tents Pitched about Sechem."

SEDAN. A town in N. France on the right bank of the Meuse, 130 m. N.E. of Paris. Dr. Johnson derives the word S.-chair from the name of the town, but the derivation is uncertain. S.-chairs were introduced into England from Naples about 1634. In Brome's Sparagus iv. 1, Sam says of Mrs. Brittleware: "She's now gone forth in one o' the new hand-litters; what call ye it, a S.?" In i. 3, he spells it Sedam.

SEDGELEY. A town in South Staffs., abt. 10 m. N.W. of Birmingham. The inhabitants were chiefly engaged in blacksmith's work. It is associated with the S. Curse, quoted below. It should be noted, however, that Middleton, in City Madam ii. 2, quotes the curse with the addition "as the Scotchman says." In B. & F. Prize v. 2, Jaques says, "A Sedgly curse light on him Which is, Pedro, The fiend ride through him booted and spurred, with a scythe at his back." In Suckling's Goblins i., Peligin says, "Now the Sedgly curse upon thee; The great fiend ride through thee booted and spurred with a scythe on his neck."

SEGONTIACS. A tribe of the ancient Britons, whose home appears to have been in Hants. In Fisher's Fuinus iv. 4, Mandubratius says, "By me the Trinobants submit, and Segontiacs."

SEGOVIA. A city in Spain, in Old Castile, 45 m. N.W. of Madrid. The cathedral, with its 3 naves, is one of the finest in Spain, and the Roman aqueduct of 170 arches is perhaps the most remarkable relic of the Romans in the peninsula. The scene of B. & F. Pilgrim is laid in Segovia and its neighbourhood. It is an adaptation of Lope de Vega's El Peregrino en sua Patria. Act v. sc. 6 takes place in the cathedral.

SEINE. A river in N. France, rising in the heights of Langres, and flowing past Troyes, Paris, and Rouen in a N.E. direction to the sea, which it enters at Havre after a course of abt. 470 m. In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 357, the Archbp. of Burges brings word that Henry "is already landed At Kidcocks in Normandy upon the river of Sene, And laid his siege to the garrison town of Harflew." Kidcocks is a curious attempt to render Chef de Caux. Drayton, in Odes (1606) xii. 6, says, "At Caux, the mouth of S., With all his martial train, Landed K. Harry." In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 233, Guise says, "There are a hundred Protestants Which we have chased into the river S." In B. & F. Gentleman iv. 4, Marine says, "Not all the water in the river S. Can wash the blood out of these princely veins." In Cartwright's Ordinary ii. 2, Moth exclaims, "I am jolly now as fish in S," where there is probably a pun on the other meaning of seine, viz. a net.

SELEUCIA. A maritime city in N. Syria, N. of the mouth of the Orontes. It lay at the foot of Mt. Coryphaezum, and was very strongly fortified. It was built by Seleucus Nicator about the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. It became the port of Antioch. In Tiberius 1824, Germanicus says of Tigranena: "Were it Pireus or Seleucia, Germanicus would never leave assault."

SELINUS. A city near the W. extremity of the South coast of Sicily. Its extensive and striking ruins are called Torre dei Pulci. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 4, Tamburlaine compares himself to "an almond tree y-mounted high Upon the lofty and celestial mt. Of evergreen Selinus." The passage is taken from Spenser's F. Q. i. 7, 32, where the form is Selinis.

SELSEY. A fishing vill. in South-W. Sussex, near the end of S. Bill, abt. 65 m. South-W. of Lond. It was famous for its crabs, lobsters, and other shell-fish. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Sir Politick has discovered that Stone, the Fool, was a spy, and distributed intelligence to ambassadors "Sometimes in Colchester oysters and your S. cockles."

SENATE HOUSE. In ancient times there appear to have been 3 Senacula or S. Houses at Rome—one near the N.E. corner of the Forum, close to the Temple of Concord; another beside the Porta Capena; and a 3rd near the Temple of Bellona. But in later times the S. had no fixed place of meeting, but used various temples for the purpose, such as those of Apollo on the Palatine, of Concord, of Fides, and of Quirinus. The meeting at which Cæsar was murdered was held in the Theatre of Pompeius. In Cor., the S. H. is mentioned more than once; and it is clear, from ii. 2, that Shakespeare conceived it to be in the Capitol, as is further shown by J. C. ii. 4, 24, where Portia asks, "Is Cæsar yet gone to the Capitol?" and Ham iii. 2, 109, where Polonius says, "I did enact Julius Cæsar; I was killed i' the Capitol."

SENE. See SEINE.

SENIER. The Amorite name for the Hermon range in N. Palestine. Milton P. L. xii. 146, says of Abraham: "His sons Shall dwell to S., that long ridge of hills." He is following I Chron. v. 23, but he misunderstands the phrase "S. and Mt. Hermon," which means "S., that is, Mt. Hermon," and makes the S. range distinct from Hermon, and further South. Cf. Deut. iii. 9, "Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion, and the Amorites call it S."

SENNAR. The Vulgate form of Shinar, the Hebrew name for the whole of Babylonia, possibly derived from an early form of the Babylonian name Sumer. Milton P. L. iii. 467, speaks of "The builders next of Babel on the plain Of Sennar."

SENOYS. See SIENNA.

SENTREE. See SANCTUARY.

SEPHER (i.e. SEPPHORIS). A town in Upper Galilee, 10 m. W. of Mt. Tabor. It came into prominence during the reign of Herod the Gr.; it was made the capital of Galilee in the time of Herod Antipas, and was known later as Diocæsareia. It is represented by the vill. of Sephurieh, 5 m. N. of Nazareth. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass v., Jonas says to Rasni, "As the kids that feed on Sepher plains So be the seed and offspring of your loins." The quartos read Lopher; Dyce suggested Sepher, the Vulgate spelling of the Shapher in Numbers xxxiii. 23, but this Shapher is a mtn. in the Desert of the Wanderings; I think Sepphoris is more likely to have been intended.

SEPULCHRE. The ch. of the Holy S. in Jerusalem, which was much frequented by pilgrims. It stands on the E. side of Christian St., in the N.W. of the city. The original ch. was erected by Constantine's order in A.D. 333; it was greatly damaged by fire in 1808. It contains not only the supposed s. of our Lord, but also Mt. Calvary, the Pillar of Scourging, and many other equally dubious sites. Its recovery from the Saracens was the avowed object of the Crusades. In Look About xxxiii., Richard says, "I will to Palestine And pay my vows before the S." In R2 ii. 1, 55, Gaunt speaks of "the s. in stubborn Jewry Of the world's ransom, blessed Mary's son." In H4 A. i. 1, 19, the K. announces his purpose to lead an English force "As far as to the s. of Christ." In Webster's Weakest i. 1, K. Louis says, "Are not our vows already registered Upon the unvalued s. of Christ?" Louis IX. vowed a Crusade in 1244, but was not able to go to Palestine till 1248. In Day's Travails, p. 50, the Sultan Ahmed I claims to be "last protector of the Sepulcher Of Juries God and crucified King." In J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 14, the Palmer says, "At Hierusalem have I been Before Christ's blessed Sepulchre."

SEPULCHRE'S, SAINT (Pr. = Pulcher). A ch. in Lond., on the N. side of Newgate St. between Giltspur St. and Snow Hill, diagonally opposite to the old Newgate Prison, now the new Central Criminal Court. It was originally built in the 12th cent., and named in honour of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. It was rebuilt in the middle of the 15th cent., and the square tower with its 4 corner spires, and the fine South-E. porch, are probably part of the ch. then erected. It was partially destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and repaired under Wren's direction. Since then it has suffered many restorations. The name was pronounced with the accent on the 2nd syllable, and is commonly abbreviated to St. Pr's. It had a clock in the tower, and a fine peal of bells. The graveyard was much used in the years when the Plague raged in Lond. In 1605 a certain Robert Dowe left money to provide for the ringing of a passing-bell at St. S. when prisoners from Newgate were executed; and also for the visitation of the prisoners by the bellman on the night preceding their execution, when he rang his bell and recited the following doggrel: "All ye that in the condemned hold do lie, Prepare you, for tomorrow you shall die; Watch all and pray, the hour is drawing near That you before the Almighty must appear; Examine well yourselves, in time repent, That you may not to eternal flames be sent. And when St. Pr's. bell tomorrow tolls, The Lord above have mercy on your souls. Past 12 o'clock." The poor wretches, on their way to Tyburn, were also addressed as they passed the ch., and presented with a nosegay. In the description of the execution of Humphrey Lloyd (1607) we are told: "When he was being drawn in the cart with others toward execution, and all the carts being stayed before St. S. ch., where the most christian and charitable deed of Master Dooove at every such time is worthily performed, etc." Jonson, in Voyage, says, "Cannot the Plague-bill keep you back, nor bells Of loud S. with their hourly knells?" Dekker, in Wonderful Year, says, "The 3 bald sextons of limping St. Giles, St. S., and St. Olaves, ruled the roast more hotly than ever did the triumviri of Rome." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 25, speaks of sheets "smudged so dirtily as if they had been stolen by night out of St. Pr's. churchyard," where they would have been used as shrouds for the dead.

In Jonson's Devil v. 5, Shackles tells how Pug has blown down part of the prison at Newgate and "left Such an infernal stink and steam behind You cannot see St. Pr's. steeple yet." In his Epicoene iv. 2, Truewit tells Dawe that Sir Amorous was so well armed "you would think he meant to murder all St. Pr's. parish." Dekker, in Hornbook iv., advises the gallant to set his watch by St. Paul's, "which, I assure you, goes truer by 5 notes than St. S. chimes." Taylor Works ii. 81, says that Coryat's fame "shall ring Louder than St. Pr's. bell." In Old Meg, p. 1, we are told, "Never had St. S. a truer ring of bells" than the Hereford Morris-dancers.

SERBONIAN BOG, or LAKE SERBONIA. A huge quicksand on the Coast of Egypt, E. of the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile, at the foot of Mt. Casius. It is now almost dried up; but Diodorus i. 30, relates that Darius Ochus lost his army there in 350 B.C. Milton

P. L. ii. 592, compares Hell to "that Serbonian bog Betwixt Damietta and Mt. Casius old Where armies whole have sunk."

SERES. The name of the people inhabiting N.W. China. Heylyn says, "China is thought to have been the ancient habitation of the S., who, being excellent in the weaving of silks, which they made of a fine wool growing on the leaves of trees, occasioned all silks to be called Serica." In Lyly's Endymion i. 3, Sir Thopas says, "I go clothed with artillery; it is not silks, nor tissues, nor the fine wool of Ceres." In his Sapho iii. 1, Pandion says, "The S. wool being softest and whitest fretteth soonest and deepest." In Nero iv. 1, Nero says to Poppæa, "The S. and the feathered man of Ind Shall their fine arts and curious labours bring." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 374, says, "The softness of wool which the S. send sticketh so fast to the skin that . . . it fetcheth blood." Rabelais, in Pantagruel iii. 51, speaks of "the lanific trees of S."

SERIAN. Possibly means connected with the Serapeum, the temple of Serapis at Alexandria, founded by Ptolemy Soter, and reputed to be second only to the Capitol at Rome. It was destroyed by Theodosius in A.D. 389. In Chapman's Blind Beggar ix. 102, Leon says, "As I was walking through the Serian groves I saw the desperate Count . . . Fly through the deserts to the Memphic shades."

SERICANE. The country of the Seres, q.v. In Gascoigne's Steel Glass 768, we read of the luxurious courtiers: "For whom soft silks do sail from Sericane." Milton P. L. iii. 438, speaks of "the barren plains of Sericana, where Chinese drive With sails and wind their cany waggons light."

SERIPHOS. One of the islands of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea, between Cythnos and Siphnos. It is abt. 12 m. in circumference. The Roman Emperors used it as a place of banishment for criminals. Gosson, in School of Abuse, p. 29 (Arber), says, "They that are born in Seriphos . . . where they see nothing but foxes and hares, will never be persuaded that there are huger beasts."

SERJEANTS INN. A building in Lond. for the lodging of the Serjeants-at-Law and the Judges. The 1st S. I. was in Chancery Lane, on the E. side, close to Fleet St. The site is now occupied by the Law Union and Rock Life Insurance Company's building. The 2nd I. was at 50 Fleet St., where now is the Norwich Union Life Office. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and on its site the Amicable Assurance Society's premises were erected. It was so near to Ram Alley that the judges protested more than once against the annoyance caused to them by the stench and smell of the tobacco smoked there. The Society of S. was dissolved in 1876, and their property sold. The portraits, coats of arms, and plate, were bought by Serjeant Cox, and transferred to his house at Mill Hill. Machin's Dumb Knight was published "by William Sheares at his shop in Chancery Lane near S.I. 1633." T. Heywood's Hogsdon was "printed by M.P. for Henry Shaphard and are to be sold at his shop in Chancery Lane at the sign of the Bible between S. I. and Fleet st. 1638." The Tragedy of Mariam was "printed by Thomas Creede for Richard Hawkins, and are to be sold at his shop in Chancery Lane, near unto Sargeants Inne. 1613."

SERRALIONA, or SIERRA LEONE. A cape on the W. coast of Africa, abt. 500 m. N.W. of Cape Palmas. The name is also applied to the dist. round the cape, which became a British colony in 1787. Milton, P.L. x. 703, describes the rush of the South winds "Notus and Afer, black with thunderous clouds, From Serrationa." Hexham, in Mercator ii. 426, says, "Sierra Liona is . . . a very high mt. . . . from whence there comes fearful noises and great tempest."

SESSE (i.e. Sessa, the old SUSSA AURUNCA). A town in Italy in the Terra di Lavoro, 30 m. N. of Naples, and a few m. from the coast of the Gulf of Gaeta. In B. & F. Double Mar. i. 2, Ferrand says, "There rides a pirate near, The D. of Sesse, my enemy and this country's"; i.e. Naples. The D. finally takes Naples and kills the tyrant Ferrand.

SESTOS. A town in the Thracian Chersonesus, on the European side of the Hellespont, at its narrowest part, opposite to Abydos. Its site is E. of the fort of Kilit Bahr. According to the well-known legend, Leander used to swim the Hellespont from Abydos to S. to see Hero, who guided him by a light placed in her tower. He was finally drowned in one of his nocturnal efforts to reach his lady-love. The story gained wide currency in Elizabethan times through Marlowe's treatment of it in his Hero and Leander. The straits are about a mile wide at this point; and it was here that Xerxes built his bridge of boats for his army to cross over into Europe. Marlowe, in Hero and Leander i., says, "On Hellespont . . . 2 cities stood, The one Abydos, the other S. hight. At S. Hero dwelt." Chapman, in his completion of Marlowe's Poem in 1598, divided it into 6 Sestiads, with a sort of play on the word. In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Leatherhead quotes the above passage, but says it is too learned and poetical for his audience; and so, in his puppet-play, he says, "At the Bankside is our S.," and his Leander swims the Thames from Puddle-Wharf to the Bankside. In Ed. III ii. 2, the K. says to the Countess of Salisbury, "I will through a Hellespont of blood To arrive at Cestus where my Hero lies." In Shrew. Haz., p. 497, one of the characters in which is the D. of Cestus, Polidor says to Aurelius, "Welcome from Cestus, famous for the love Of good Leander and his Tragedy." In B. & F. Maid in Mill iv. 1, Aminta says, "Sir, your Hymen-taper I'll light up for you; the window shall show you the way to S." Nash, in Lenten, p. 317, says of Leander: "At S. was his soul." W. Smith, in Chloris (1595) xvii. 4, says of Leander: "Through Hellespont he swam to Cestos main"; and in xxv. 9, "Love made Leander pass the dreadful flood Which Cestos from Abydos doth divide." The author of Zepharia (1594) viii. 10, speaks of "the light which Sestyan Hero showed Arm-finned Leander to direct in waves." In Mason's Mulleasses 1839, Timoclea says, "Now like the Sestian maid May I court Leander swimming in my arms."

SETHIN. May be a misprint for Scythian or Syrian, though Wagner's conjecture "sedarn," i.e. cedarn, makes the best sense. In Greene's Priar viii., Edward speaks of "Frigates bottomed with rich Sethin planks, Topt with the lofty firs of Lebanon." See Sir A. Ward's note on this passage.

SETIA. An ancient town in Latium, now Setze, 40 m. South-E. of Rome. Its wine was greatly esteemed in the 1st cent. A.D., and was said to have been brought into notice by Augustus. Milton, P.R. iv. 117, referring to the Roman epicures, speaks of "Their wines of Setia, Cales, and Falerne."

SEUTA. See CEUTA.

SEVERN (Sa. = Sabrina). The longest river in England except the Thames. It rises on the E. flank of Plinlimmon in Montgomeryshire, and flows in a semi-circular course of abt. 200 m. past Welshpool, Shrewsbury, Tewkesbury, and Gloucester, into the Bristol Channel, which forms its estuary. The British name was Hafren, which the Romans transliterated into Sa. From the name the legend arose that Sa., the daughter of Locrine, was drowned in the river by Gwendolen, the 2nd wife of Locrine. The story of Sa's death is told in the last Act of Locrine, where Gwendolen says, "Because this river was the place Where little Sabren resolutely died, Sabren for ever shall the same be called." Sa. appears as the nymph of the river in Milton's Comus, where her death is related, and she is described (825) as "a gentle nymph that with moist curb Sways the smooth S. stream." In Fisher's Faints ii. 5, Belinus speaks of the S. as "That boiling stream where Sabrina lost her breath." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Doll says, "Look how Sa. sunk i' th' river S." Milton Vac. Ex. 96, calls it "S. swift, guilty of maiden's death."

Spenser, in the river list F. Q. iv. 11, 30, calls it "the stately S." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 2, says, "Stately S. for her shore is praised." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 14, says that Camber possessed the Western part of Britain "Which S. now from Logris doth depart"; Logris meaning England. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iii. 2, 185, Sir Hugh says, "There's not a crag beyond the S. flood But I have held against the Roman foes." In Cym. iii. 5, 17, Cymbeline orders: "Leave not the worthy Lucius Till he have crossed the S." In Death Huntingdon ii. 2, young Brian speaks of "the Lord of the March That lies on Wye, Lug, and the S. streams." In H4 A. i. 3, 98, Hotspur tells of the fight between Mortimer and Glendower "on the gentle S. sedgy bank," and how they drank 3 times "of swift S.'s flood." In iii. 1, 66, Glendower boasts: "Thrice from the banks of Wye And sandy-bottomed S. have I sent him [K. Henry] Bootless home." In the following proposal for the division of England, Glendower's share is "from Trent and S. hitherto All westward, Wales beyond the S. shore." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii. 2, the Clown comes on weeping, and exclaims: "Mine eyes are S., plain S.; the Thames nor the river of Tweed are nothing to them"; where the S. is regarded as longer than the Thames, which it is, if the Bristol Channel be counted as its mouth.

SEVERRE (i.e. St. SEVER). A city in South-W. France, in the department of Landes, abt. 80 m. South of Bourdeaux. It was twice taken during the wars of the 16th cent. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, Byron says of Picote: "I only did employ him . . . for the reduction Of Severre to the service of the K."

SEVILLE. One of the most important cities in Spain, on the left bank of the Guadalquivir, 355 m. South-W. of Madrid. It was the capital of the Roman Province of Bética, and the Roman aqueduct, with its 410 arches, was used until quite recently to bring water to the city. In the 5th cent. the Vandals had their Court there. The Moors took it in 714, and it remained in their hands till 1248, when it was taken by Ferdinand III. The Moorish occupation has left its mark on the appearance of the city, and the Moorish Palace, called the Alcazar, begun in 1181, ranks next to the Alhambra of Granada, as an example of Moorish architecture. The Cathedral of Sta. Maria de la Sede is the next largest in Europe after St. Peter's at Rome. It was begun in 1403 and finished in 1519. The Giralda, or Bell-tower, is of Moorish construction, and dates from the 12th cent. It has long been famous for its olive-oil, silks, and oranges. The pun on S. and Civil was too obvious to be missed by the Elizabethans, from Shakespeare downwards.

Hycke, p. 88, claims to have been "in Spayne, Portyngale, Sevyll, also in Almayne." In Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, Barabas has debts owing "In Florence, Venice, Antwerp, Lond., S." In Look About xxxiii., Skink says of a Spaniard: "Rivo will he cry and Castile too, And wonders in the land of S. do." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "The most beauties of Spain have been oft in Civill," with a pun on uncivil. In Dekker's Match me i., Cordolante says, "Horses we'll forthwith hire And quick to Sivell." In Stucley 2154, Philip says, "Come, lords, to horse; to Cyvilt lies our way." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 2, D'Avolos says of Roseilli: "I hear he departed towards Benevento, determining to pass to S., minding to visit his cousin in the Spanish court." In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "Does Madrill yield no money? S. shall. Is S. close-fisted? Valladoly is open." In Jonson's New Inn iv. 2, Tipto says of the visitors: "They are [Spaniards] have been at S. in their days, And at Madrid too." In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Metaldi addresses Pachico as "my most ingenious cobbler of S." In their Rule a Wife i. 6, Estifania says of her furniture: "I have, besides, as fair as Sevil, Or any town in Spain, can parallel." In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Sanitonella tells of "Don Crispiano, the famous corregidor of S., who by his mere practice of the law hath gotten 30,000 ducats a year."

In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pisaro reads from a letter: "We have sent unto your Worship sack, S. oils, pepper, Barbary sugar." In Cromwell iii. 3, Hales says, "They that are rich in Spain spare belly-food To deck their backs with an Italian hood And silks of Civill." Nash, in Strange News, Works ii. 282, says, "For the order of my life, it is as civil as a Civil orange." In Ado ii. 1, 304, Beatrice says, "The Count is neither sad, nor sick, nor merry, nor well; but civil, Count, civil as an orange and something of that jealous complexion"; yellow being the colour of jealousy. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Bastard says, "Thy name shall live nor be forgotten When Sivill oranges be rotten." In Rowley's All's Lost i. 3, 38, Jaques says of Margaretta: "She has cried oranges the most of her time here in Civill; now a fine orange for her crest, with Civillity written round about it, would speak wondrous well." In Aptus, Haz., iv. 151, Haphazard says, "He never learned his manners in Sivill," i.e. he is an uncivil wretch. S. is the scene of B. & F. Love's Cure, Rawlins' Rebellion, and Lady Alimony. The scene of W. Rowley's All's Lost is partly laid in S., but this is an error; the Court of Roderick, the last of the Visigothic Kings of Spain, in whose reign this play is supposed to take place, was at Toledo.

SHADWELL. A parish on the N. bank of the Thames, between Wapping and Limehouse. Like most ports, it had an unsavoury reputation. In Jonson's Magnetic ii. 1, Polish says, "Have you an oar in the cockboat, 'cause you are a sailor's wife and come from S.?" In Launching we read: "The East Indian gates stand open wide to entertain the needy and the poor . . . Ratcliffe cannot complain . . . nor S. cry against their niggardliness." In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, Compass mentions Limehouse and S. as amongst the suburbs of Lond.; where suburb means a haunt of loose women.

SHALCAN. The name of one of the Tartar tribes, but I cannot exactly identify it. In Dekker's If it be, 277, Ruffman says, "A shalcant Tartar being my grandfather, Men call me Shalkan Bohor."

SHARON. The dist. on the coast of Palestine, stretching some 55 m., from Joppa to Mt. Carmel. It is famous for the variety and beauty of its wild flowers. In Song of Solomon ii. 1, the Shulamite says, "I am the rose of S."; an unfortunate translation, which has given currency to the idea that S. is fertile in roses, which is not the case; the word means the White Narcissus. Herrick, in School or Pearl of Putney, speaks of "S., where eternal roses grow"; and in Ode to Nicholas Herrick, of "S., where a spring Of roses have an endless flourishing."

SHEARS, THE. The sign of a carriers' inn at St. Albans. In Oldcastle v. 5, 12, the Constable reports: "A lusty priest we found in bed yonder at the Sheeres."

SHEBA. See SABA.

SHEEN. The old name of Richmond, Surrey, q.v. Henry I had a palace here, and Chaucer was clerk of works to the Palace in the reign of Richd. II. In 1449 it was burnt down, but Henry VII rebuilt it and named it Richmond after his earldom. It was partly pulled down by Parliament during the Commonwealth, and its destruction was completed in the next cent. Chaucer, in Legend of Good Women 497, says, "When this book is made, give it the Q. On my behalfe, at Eltham, or at Sheene." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 2, 41, in answer to Woodstock's question "Where lies the Q., Sir?" a servant says, "At S., my lord; most sick and so much altered As those about her fears her sudden death." Fuller, Holy State x., says that Richd. II "so fervently loved Anna of Bohemia, his Q., that when she died at S. in Surrey he both cursed the place and also out of madness overthrew the whole house." Anne died there in June 1394. In Cromwell i. 2, Cromwell says he will one day build a palace "As fine as is K. Henries house at S." Fynes Morison, in Itiner. (1617), mentions the K.'s palace of S.

SHEER LANE, i.e. Shire Lane. In Lond., running South from Little Lincoln's Inn Fields into Fleet St., close by Temple Bar. It acquired a very disreputable character, and in spite of the change of name to Lower Serle's Place in 1845, it retained it, until it was swept away altogether by the erection of the new Law Courts. In this Lane was the famous Trumpet Tavern. In Wise Men ii. 4, Antonio says, "Go to Mrs. Sylvester in Sheerelane, desire her to lend me a pair of sheets."

SHEFFIELD. A town in the South part of the W. Riding Yorks, on the rivers Don and Rother, abt. 160 m. N. of Lond. The Lordship of S. was in the Furnival family in the reign of Richd. I.; in 1406 it passed to the Talbots. The manufacture of cutlery dates from the earliest times and is still the staple business of the town. In H6 A iv. 7, 66, Talbot is described as "Lord Furnival of S." In Chaucer's C. T. A. 3933, the Reeve says of the Miller: "A S. thwitel baar he in his hose." In Dekker's Edmonton ii. 2, Somerson says, "See, the bridegroom and bride come; the new pair of S. knives, fitted both to one sheath." Laneham, in Letter 38, describes the ancient minstrel with "a pair of capped S. knives hanging at the side." Nash, in Lenten iii. 178, says, "Tell me if our English sconces be not right S. or no."

SHEPPEY. An island in Kent, on the South side of the estuary of the Thames, separated from the mainland by a branch of the Medway. Sheerness stands at its

N.W. extremity. It is just opposite to Faversham. In Feversham ii. 1, Bradshaw says, "Master Greene, I'll leave you, for I must to the ile of Sheppy with speed." In iii. 6, Lord Cheiny says to Arden, "You are a stranger, man, in the ile of Sheppy."

SHERRIS (Sy. = Sherry), XERES or JEREZ, specifically JEREZ DE LA FRONTERA. A town in Spain in the province of Andalusia, 16 m. N.E. of Cadiz. It gave its name to S. Sack or S. wine, which came to be called briefly S., and then, from a mistaken notion that S. was a plural, Sy. In H4 B. iv. 3, 111, Falstaff indulges in a eulogy of "a good S. sack," which later he describes as "an excellent S." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Okes says, "Sack! you said but e'en now it should be sy." and Jonas replies: "Why, so it is; sy." In his New Inn i. 1, the Host says: "Be merry and drink sy.; that's my posy." In Middleton's Mad World v. 1, Sir Bounteous cries: "Some sy. for my lord's players there!" See also XERES.

SHERRYES. See SHERRIS, XERES.

SHERWOOD. A forest in the centre of Notts., between Mansfield and Kneassal. It is chiefly famous as the resort of Robin Hood and his comrades. In Massinger's New Way i. 3 (the scene of which is the country round S.) Furnace says, "There came last night from the forest of S. the fattest stag I ever cooked." In Jonson's Love's Welcome, which was performed at Welbeck in Notts, Accidence speaks of "odd tales Of our outlaw, Robin Hood, That revelled here in S." In Munday's 2 plays on the Downfall and the Death of Robert, Earl of Huntington, the Earl is called, in the title, "Robin Hood of merry Sherwoods." In the Downfall ii. 2, Robin says, "I am resolved To keep in S. till the K.'s return." The name was so familiar that it came to be used generically for any forest. Phaer, in trans. of Aeneid (1562) renders Lucus ingens by "The shirwood great."

SHIETER-HUISSEN. See SCHRETER HUYSEN.

SHIP. A tavern sign in Lond. There was a S. tavern in the Strand just outside Temple Bar at the corner of little Shire Lane; another at Charing Cross, and a 3rd by the Exchange. In T. Heywood's Locrine ii. 5, Valerius sings: "To the S. the merchants go." In the list of Inns in News Barthol. Fair we find, "The Windmill at Lothbury, the S. at the Exchange."

SHIPWRECK. The sign of a tavern in Lond. In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Doll says, "So will we 4 be drunk i' th' Shipwreck Tavern."

SHITENS. A coarse attempt at a pun on the name of the Scythians. In Locrine ii. 3, 61, Strumbo says, "By the common soldiers of the Shitens, the Scythians—what do you call them?—[the city] with all the suburbs were burnt to ground."

SHOE LANE. A st. in Lond., running N. from Fleet St. opposite St. Bride's Ch., to Holborn. It is older than Fleet St. itself, and is mentioned as Vicus de Solande in the reign of John. It became successively Scholond, Scholane, and then, by Hobson-Jobson, S. L. Here the Dominican Friars had their first Lond. settlement in the 13th cent. Sir Henry Wootton, in 1633, speaks of a visit he paid to "the Cockpit in S. L." The Gt. Fire swept it all away except the N. end where St. Andrew's Ch. stood; but the ch. was pulled down abt. 10 years later, and the construction of the Holborn Viaduct has completed the transformation of that end of the L. In S. L. lived John Florio, the translator of Montaigne, and in Gunpowder Alley, leading off it, Lilly the astrologer lived, and Lovelace the poet died. In Ret. Pernass. i. 4, Philomusus says, "Let our lodging stand here filthy [fity] in Shooe-l., for, if our comings in be not the better, Lond. may shortly throw an old shoe after us." In Barry's Ram iii. 2, Throate says, "Let the coach stay at S. L. end"; and later in the scene Smallshanks says, "Come, we will find her; Let's first along S. L., then straight up Holborn." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 3, when Dapper escapes from the serjeants in Holborn, Curtlax cries: "Run down S. L. and meet him." S. L. was the home of the designers of rude woodcuts and signs. In Whimsies (1631) we read of "a Sussex dragon, some sea or inland monster, drawn out by some S. L. man." In Nabbes' Presentation for Prince (1638) the almanack-maker says, "Instead of Shoelane hangings, may the walls of my house be painted with chalk."

SHOEMAKERS HALL, or CORDWAINERS HALL.

The H. of the Guild of Cordwainers in Lond. The Guild was incorporated in 1410, and had 3 successive halls on the same site, at what is now 7 Cannon St., on the N. side, between Old Change and Friday St. It is abt. 300 yards from St. Martins-le-Grand. The present H. was built in 1788. Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchett, Eliz. Pamph., p. 56, charges Martin Marprelate with having drawn Divinity from "the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge to Shoemakers Hall in Sanct Martin's."

SHOOTERS HILL. A steep hill, formerly very narrow and overshadowed with trees, abt. 7 m. out of Lond. on the Great Dover Road, just beyond Charlton. It was a notorious haunt of highwaymen, and in the time of Richd. II was widened to make it safer, but with little effect. In 1733 the gradient was lessened and the road slightly diverted; but the footpad's trade continued to flourish until the beginning of the 19th cent. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report claims to have been "at Suddbury, Southampton, at S. H." In Fair Women ii. 220, Old John is met by Bean, who is going from Lond. to Greenwich, and says he is on his way "to drive home a cow and a calf that is in my close at S. H. foot."

In Hycke, p. 90, the hero tells us that Ill Will is "Brother to Jack Puller of Shoters hyll." Again, p. 96, Imagination says, "Well, fellows, now let us go our way For a' Shoters hyll we have a game to play." Again, p. 104, Frewyll says, "If I might make 3 good voyages to Shoters hyl Then would I never travel the sea more." In Oldcastle i. 3, Butler says, "Coming o'er S.-H., there came one to me like a sailor and asked my money. I was never so robbed in all my life." In iii. 4, Sir John, the parson-highwayman, says, "God-a-mercy, neighbour S. H., you ha' paid your tithe honestly." This was after a successful highway robbery. In Mayne's Match iii. 4, Plotwell says, if his uncle marries, "The sleight upon the cards, the hollow die, Park Corner, and S. H., are my revenue." Stubbes, in Anat. of Abuses (1583), p. 53, speaks of men who mortgage their lands, and then take to robbery "on Suters h. and Stangate hole with loss of their lives at Tiburne in a rope." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "All travellers are so beaten to the trials of this law [i.e. the law of highway robbery] that, if they have but rode over S. H. or Salisbury Plain, they are perfect in the principles of it." In Fair Women ii. 782, the 1st lord says, "A cruel murther's done Near S. H., and here's a letter come From Woolwich . . . Noting the manner and the marks of him That did that impious deed." Hall, in

Sat. vi. 1, 67, says that the traveller hopes that "The vale of Standgate, or the Suters h., Or western plains, are free from feared ill."

SHOREDITCH. A parish in N.E. Lond., lying South of Old St., between City Road and Bethnal Green. The S. High St. is a continuation of Norton Folgate as far as the corner of Old St. and Hackney Road. The name was erroneously derived from a story that the famous Jane Shore died there; but we read, in Piers B. 13, 340, of a certain Dame Emme "of Shordyche," which sufficiently disproves this derivation; although it is perpetuated by the Jane Shore tavern at 103 S. High St., and is supported by T. Heywood's Ed. IV B., where Catesby says, after relating the deaths of Shore and his wife, "The people for ever mean to call the ditch Shores ditch in the memory of them." The name was originally Soerdich, and is derived from the name of the Lords of the Manor, one of whom, Sir John de Soerdich, was a famous diplomatist in the reign of Edward III.

In W. Rowley's New Wonder v., Foster's wife says, "The K. comes to see Master Brewen's hospital and old St. Mary's spital here by S." Brewen's hospital was on the N. side of Spital Sq., near the South end of Norton Folgate. In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Monopoly says, "I'm to sup this night at the Lion in S." As the High St. was part of the old Roman road to the N., it had many taverns for the accommodation of travellers. The road was not too good, for in the account of the preparations for the return of Charles I to Lond. in 1641 we read that the way from Kingsland to S. was impassable for their Majesties "in regard of the depth and foulness of it." In Nicholas' Marriage and Wiving vi., we are told of the origin of the name of the spring called "Dame Annis a Clare," which is stated to be "a spring near S." See ANNIS A CLERE. In Houghton's Englishmen iv. 1, Frisco, leading Delion and Alvaro on a wild-geese chase through Lond. by night, says, "We are now at the farthest end of S., for this is the maypole." If he means the famous Maypole in Leadenhall St. they were certainly at the farthest end of S., and a good deal farther! About 1604 one "Master John Tyce, living near S. Ch.," introduced the making of taffetas, cloth of tissue, velvets, and satins into Lond. In S. were the first two Lond. playhouses, the Theatre and the Curtain, q.v. Many of the actors and playwrights lived in the parish, and were buried in the church of St. Leonard, q.v. A fragment from the Bodleian Aubrey MS. 8 fol. 45, says, "He was not a company keeper; lived in S., would not be debauched, and if invited to write, he was in pain." This passage is believed by Mr. Madan, Sir Sidney Lee, and Sir George Warner to refer to Shakespeare. It is otherwise probable that he lived in S. when he first came to Lond.

S. had the worst of reputations as a haunt of loose women and bad characters generally. In Pilg. Pernass. v. 1, Philomusus says, "An honest man May chastely dwell in unchaste Shordiche st." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iv. 5, Bobadill says that his quarters have been "in divers skirts i' the town, as Turnbull, Whitechapel, S." In his Devil i. 1, Iniquity proposes to Pug to visit "S., Whitechapel, and so to St. Kathern's." In Jack Drum ii. 359, Drum says, "'Tis easier to find virginity in S. than to hear of my mistress." In Randolph's Muses iv. 3, Justice Nimis talks with complacency of the revenues he gets from Clerkenwell and Turnbal "with my Picket-hatch grange and S. farm." Nash, in Wonderful Year (1591) says, "I find that the altitude of that place (Peticote Lane) and of S. are all one elevated; and 2 degrees, and under the zenith or vertical point of Venus." In his Pierce F. 4, he says, "Examine how every 2nd house in S. is maintained, and tell me how many she-inmates you find." In Dekker's If it be 352, Pluto asks "The bawd of S., is that hell-cat come?" Middleton, in Hubbard, says, "S. was the only Cole-Harbour and sanctuary for wenches and soldiers." In his No Wit iv. 2, Sarsenet says, "A man may smell her meaning, though his nose wanted reparations and the bridge left at S." In his Inner Tem. 172, Dr. Almanac says, "Stand forth, Shrove Tuesday! 'tis in your charge to pull down bawdy houses, cause spoil in S." Dekker, in Owl's Almanac, says, "Shrove Tuesday falls on that day on which the prentises pulled down the Cockpit and on which they did always use to rifle Madam Leake's house at the upper end of S." The prentises had licence on Shrove Tuesday to attack any houses of ill-fame and despoil them. In Killigrew's Parson iv. 1, Wanton says, "Never to love, seldom enjoy, and always tell—foh! it stinks worse than S. dirt." Hall, in Sat. i. 9, 21, asks: "What if some S. fury should incite Some lust-stung lecher?" S. R., in Letting of Honour's Blood (1611), mentions, "some coward gull That is but champion to a S. drab." Marston, in Sat. i. 4, says, "He'll cleanse himself to S. purity." In S. Rowland's Honour's Looking Glass (1608), his servant takes the Country Gull "unto S., where the whores keep hell." The title D. of S. is said to have been sportively conferred by Henry VIII on Barlo, one of his guards, who lived in S., for his skill in archery; and the custom of annually conferring this title was kept up till 1683. Hence the D. of S. means a pinchbeck or imitation peer. Dekker, in News from Hell, says that in Charon's boat "The D. of Guize and the D. of S. have not the breadth of a bench between them." In his Armourers he says, "Arrows flew faster than they did at a cat in a basket, when Prince Arthur or the D. of S. struck up the drum in the field." In Jonson's Devil iv. 3, Wittipol says to Manly, "We'll leave you here To be made D. of S. with a project." In The Poor Man's Petition (1603) xvi., it is asked, "Good K., make not good lord of Lincoln D. of Shore-ditche."

SHORLOW. The residence of Lord Cheyny, in Kent, not far from Faversham. In Feversham ii. 6, Will says of Arden: "The Lord Cheyny bids him to a feast to his house at S." In iv. 4, Rede says, "He is coming from S. as I understand; here I'll intercept him."

SHOTTERY. A vill. abt. 1 mile from Stratford-on-Avon, reached by way of Rother St. The cottage, now shown as Anne Hathaway's, was first tenanted by the Hathaways in 1556, and was purchased by Anne's eldest brother, Bartholomew, in 1610. It was almost certainly to this cottage that Shakespeare came courting his future wife.

SHOWDAM THORP, or SHOULDHAM THORPE. A vill. in Norfolk, near Downham, abt. 35 m. W. of Norwich. In Day's B. Beggar ii., Strowd says, "Yonder's old Simson's son of S. T."

SHREWSBURY. The county town of Shropsh., strongly situated on a peninsula formed by a loop of the Severn, 128 m. N.W. of Lond. It was founded in the 5th cent., under the name of Pangwerne, as a defence against the Saxons; but it was captured by them and called Scrobbes-byrig. It was always important as a frontier fortress, and was often besieged by the Welsh. The Earldom was granted by William the Conqueror to Roger de Montgomery, who built the Castle and the Abbey of SS. Peter and Paul, of both of which some remains still exist. St. Mary's Ch. dates from the 10th cent., and some fragments of the old city wall survive. Edward I made it for a time the seat of his government, and in 1283 a Parliament was held there, which tried and condemned to death David, the last of the old Princes of Wales. Richd. II also held a Parliament here in 1398. The battle, in which Henry IV defeated the rebels under the Earl of Northumberland, was fought near S. on July 23rd, 1403. A Free Grammar School was founded by Edward VI in 1551, which has attained a high reputation. John Talbot was created Earl in 1442, and the title still remains in the Talbot family.

In Val. Welsh. i. 1, the Bardh says, "Octavian himself in person comes To S., where the great Earl of March The father of our valiant Welshman [i.e. Caractacus] Himself doth bring to supplant treason." Of course, there was neither a S. nor an Earl of March in the time of Caractacus. In Peele's Ed. I, p. 72, the K. orders "Messenger, hie thee back to S."; and the scene in which the execution of David is described takes place there. The battle of S. is the subject of H4 A. iv. 1 and 3, and v. 1-5. In iii. 1, 86, the rebels arrange to meet the Scottish power "at S." In iii. 2, 166, we learn from Blunt that "Douglas and the English rebels met The 11th of this month at S." In iv. 2, 59, Falstaff, meeting Prince Hal, says, "I thought your Honour had already been at S." In iv. 4, 10, the Archbp. says, "Tomorrow . . . is a day Wherein the fortune of 10,000 men Must bide the touch; for, Sir, at S. The K. . . Meets with lord Harry." In v. 4, 151, Falstaff relates how he fought "a long hour by S. clock" with Hotspur. In H4 B. prol. 34, we read of "that royal field of S." In i. 1, news of the battle is brought to Northumberland by Bardolph, Travers, and Norton, in succession. In i. 2, 167, the Chief Justice says to Falstaff, "Your day's service at S. hath a little gilded o'er your night's exploit on Gad's-hill." In H6 A. iii. 4, 27, the K. says to Talbot, "We here create you Earl of S." This is an anticipation; the scene takes place in 1431, and Talbot was not created Earl till 1442. In iv. 7, 61, he is properly spoken of, after his death, as "Valiant Talbot, Earl of S."

The S. who appears in Mere was George, a great-grandson of the great Earl. In True Trag. v., "Lord Talbot, the Earl of S. son and heir," is mentioned as one of Richmond's helpers. This is probably the same George Talbot; he was Earl from 1473 to 1538. His son was Francis, but he was not old enough in 1485 to have led troops to Richmond's aid. One of the subordinate subjects of Lyly's Endymion is a quarrel between George Talbot, Earl of S., and his wife; Geron representing the Earl, and Dipsas the Countess. The boys of S. School are recorded to have given performances of plays in a quarry outside the walls, under their master, Thomas Ashton, in the 16th cent. (see Churchyard's Worthiness of Wales (reprint), p. 85). Abraham Fraunce was a native of S., and was educated at the Grammar School.

SHROPSHIRE. The county in England on the borders of Wales, between Cheshire and Herefordsh. It shared with Cheshire the reputation of producing the best cheese in England. In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Jenkins says, "If you will go down with S. carriers, you shall have Welsh enough in your pellicies 40 weeks." John Marston, the dramatist, belonged to a S. family.

SHROUDS. The crypt of a ch., specifically applied to the chapel of St. Faith in St. Paul's Cathedral, Lond. Sermons were preached there when the weather was too bad for them to be delivered at the Cross. One of Latimer's sermons was "preached in the Shroudes at Pauls Ch. in Lond. on the 18th day of January anno 1548." Hakluyt, in Voyages ii. 1, 153 (1599), tells of "a ch. under the ground like to the shroudes in Pauls."

SIBARIS. See SYBARIS.

SIBMA. A town in the land of Moab, E. of the Jordan, 4 m. N.W. of Heshbon; now SUMIA. It was celebrated for its vines. Milton, P. L. i. 410, says that Chemosh was worshipped in "The flowery dale of Sibma clad with vines."

SICAMBRIANS. A tribe of Gauls, originally settled on the E. bank of the Rhine, between the Sieg and the Lippe. They made a vigorous resistance against Tiberius, but were defeated, and 40,000 of them transferred to the region between the Meuse and the Rhine. In Jonson's Sejanus iii. 1, Silius says, "I have charged, alone, into the troops of curled Sicambrians, routed them." Jonson borrows the epithet "curled" from Martial, who says they came "crinibus in nodum tortis."

SICANIAN (i.e. SICILIAN). See SICILY. Cowley, in His Mistress' Coldness iv., says, "Alphæus found not a more secret trace, His loved Sicanian fountain to embrace"; i.e. the spring of Arethusa, q.v.

SICHEM, or SICHEN. A town in Belgium in the province of Limburg, 55 m. E. of Brussels. Burton A. M. ii. 1, 3, says, "Many mad persons are daily cured . . . by our Lady of Sichern, in the Low Countries." Hall, in Epp. i. 5, asks: "Why doth she [the Virgin Mary] that cure at Zichem which at Halle she could not?"

SICILY (Sa. = Sicilia, Sn. = Sicilian, Ss. = Sicilies). The large triangular island immediately South of Italy, in the Mediterranean. It was renowned in ancient times for its fruitfulness, and was called the granary of the world. One of its most striking natural features is the active volcano, Ætna, which rises to a height of nearly 11,000 ft. The most ancient inhabitants were the Siculi, who appear to have crossed the Straits of Messina from Italy. Phœnician colonies were founded on the N. and N.W. coasts at an early date, and were soon followed by Greek colonies, chiefly on the South and E. coasts. One of the earliest of the Greek tyrants was Phalaris of Agrigentum, who was said to have constructed a brazen bull in which he immolated the victims of his suspicion, and in which he himself was ultimately roasted to death. Syracuse rose to be the most powerful of the Greek cities, and successfully repelled the attack of the Athenian expedition in 415 B.C.; Syracuse being a Dorian colony from Corinth, and so opposed to Athens in the Peloponnesian War. Dionysius began his splendid reign there in 405, in the course of which he drove back the Carthaginians into the N.W. part of the island. In 344 Timoleon came to Syracuse and freed the Greek cities from the growing domination of the Carthaginians. In 270 Hieron became K. of Syracuse, and his alliance with the Romans was the first step which led to the incorporation of S. in the Roman dominions in 210. During the 9th cent. A.D., S. was conquered by the Saracens, who made their capital at the old Phœnician town of Panormus, and held the island for over 250 years. In 1060 Count Roger of Normandy invaded S., and after 30 years of war conquered the whole island. In 1194 the Emperor Henry VI took the island from the last of the Norman dynasty, William III, and bequeathed it to his son Frederick II, "Stupor Mundi." Frederick's natural son, Manfred, seized the throne in 1258, but was defeated and slain by Charles of Anjou in 1266. On Easter Monday 1282, the people of Palermo revolted against the tyranny of Charles, and massacred the French at a signal given by the Vesper Bell; this was the so-called Sn. Vespers. The French were expelled and the Aragonese dynasty founded by Pedro of Aragon. He became K. of the two Ss., one being the island, and the other the Southern part of Italy, of which Naples was the capital. Ferdinand of Aragon took the title of K. of the two Ss. in 1479, and from him the title descended to the Emperor Charles V, and his son, Philip II of Spain. After many vicissitudes and changes S., with Naples, was, by the prowess of Garibaldi, united to Italy under the rule of the house of Savoy, in 1860. See NAPLES.

General References. In Chapman's Cæsar i. 2, 274, Cæsar tells of a man so keen-sighted that "in S. he could discern the Carthaginian navy . . . Though full a day and night's sail distant thence." Plutarch is the authority for this story. In Chapman's May Day v. 1, 235, Honorio says of Lucretia: "Her father being a Sn. fled thence for a disastrous act." In Gascoigne's Supposes i. 1, Polynesta describes Erostrato as "a gentleman that came from Sa. to study in this city"; i.e. Ferrara. Later, when Balia asks "Are there no other Sns. here?" she answers: "Very few that pass this way, and few or none that tarry here any time." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pisaro, hearing that his vessels have been captured by pirates in the Straits of Gibraltar, complains that his sailors did not go for Tripoly, "Being on the other side of S. As near as where they were unto the Straits." In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Floradin says, "I have travelled Italy and Scicilie."

Allusions to the History. In Massinger's Virgin v. 2, Theophilus says, "Let me feel, As the Sn. did his brazen bull, The horriddest you can find." In Rawlins' Rebellion ii., Philippa challenges Machvile to practice "Sn. tyranny on my resolute body, Proof against pain," i.e. such tortures as Phalaris and Dionysius invented. In Marlowe's Jew v. 4, Calymath speaks of "S., Where Syracusan Dionysius reigned." The scene of Edwards' Damon is in "Dionisius palace" in Syracuse. In Massinger's Bondman, Timoleon is one of the chief characters; in i. 2, he says, "S. being afire, she [Corinth] is not safe." In Kyd's Cornelia i., Cicero says, "Carthage and S. we have subdued." In Ant. ii. 6, 35, Pompeius says to Cæsar, "You have made me offer Of S., Sardinia; and I must Rid all the sea of pirates." In line 46 he reminds Antony, "When Cæsar and your brother were at blows Your mother came to S., and did find Her welcome friendly." This was in 40 B.C., when Lucius Antonius and Fulvia, the wife of Antony, attacked Cæsar. In iii. 6, 24, one of Antony's charges against Cæsar is "that, having in S. Sextus Pompeius spoiled, we had not rated him [Antony] His part of the isle." This was in 36 B.C., when Agrippa defeated the fleet of Pompeius and drove him in flight to Asia. In Cæsar's Rev. i., chor. 2, Discord says, "Pompey rode, clad In the Sn. pirates' overthrow." The reference seems to be to the victory of Pompeius Magnus over the Cilician (not Sn.) pirates in 67 B.C.; but the author may have been thinking of the successes of the younger Pompeius in S. in 43 B.C. and confused the two. In Thracian i. 1, Radagon describes himself as "Son to thy enemy, Sa's K." The story is pure romance and has nothing historical in it. The legend of K. Robert of S. is well known through Longfellow's version of it. It is taken from the Gesta Romanorum, and has an analogue in the Talmud. In the Gesta, the Emperor Jovianian is the hero. Longfellow makes the hero "Robert of S., brother of Pope Urbane, And Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine"; but there is no basis of fact behind it. In World Child 173, Conscience says, "Beware of pride and think on K. Robert of S. How he for pride in great poverty fell." A Ludus de Kyng Robert of Cesill was produced in 1453, and a play on the same subject in 1529. In Massinger's Maid Hon., Roberto, K. of S., is one of the characters; but at a much later date than is thinkable for the Robert of the legend. Burton, A. M. Intro., mentions, among the barbarities of mankind, "those French massacres, Sn. evensongs." Cotgrave (1611) defines Vespres Siciliennes as "mischiefs done or death inflicted in a place and time of imagined security." In Peele's Ed. i. i. 1, the Q. Mother tells how Edward is at hand with "The poor remainder of the royal fleet Preserved by miracle in Sicil road." It was while at anchor off S. that Edward received the news of his father's death. In Ed. iii. 1, the K. of France says, "The Ks. of Bohemia and of Cycelie are become confederate with us." The K. of S. at this time (1346) was Peter, the son of Frederick. The K. of Sicil mentioned often in H6 B. and C., and called more exactly in C. i. 4, 22, "the K. of Naples, Of both the Sicils and Jerusalem," was Regnier or Rayner or René, D. of Anjou, and father of Margaret of Anjou, the wife of Henry VI. Q. Joanna left the kingdom of the Two Ss. to him in 1435, but Alfonso made a successful counter-claim, and Regnier never had more than the empty title. In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi says, "I was myself brought up a page under Rayner, K. of S." In Shirley's Admiral i. 1, Cesario says to the K. of Naples, "Your son has defeated the Sn. bravely." In May's Heir iv. 2, Eubulus boasts that his ancestors "have been props of the Sn. crown . . . 'Gainst the hot French and Neapolitan." In W. T. Leontes is the K. of S., and Sa. is the scene of the first three (except iii. 3) and the last Acts. The historic period is quite indefinite. In Shakespeare's source, the History of Dorastus and Fawnia, the parts of the Kings of Bohemia and S. are reversed. In B. & F. Philaster, the hero is heir to the crown of S., but in i. 1, we are told that the Spanish Prince is likely to enjoy "both these kingdoms of S. and Calabria." Philaster, however, ultimately comes by his own. There is an imaginary Atticus, K. of S., in Swetnam.

The Fruitfulness of Sicily. In Nabbes' Hannibal v. 1, Hannibal calls S. "the world's granary." In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Autumn says, "A hundred grains Both from the Baltic and Sn. fields Shall be co-gested for thy sacrifice." Ignoto, in Eng. Helicon (1614), p. 250, says, "The corn of Sicil buys the western spice." In Rutter's Shepherd Hol. i. 4, Mirtilus asks: "Would you for all that fruitful S. can yield change one lock of your mistress' hair?" In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 1, 169, Ophioneus calls Sa. "the very storehouse of the Romans." In Tiberius 149, Asinius speaks of "the fruitful S." In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Beroldo gives a long description of the island, pointing out the absence of gold and silver mines, of silkworms, and other sources of wealth, and concludes: "Nature did design us to be warriors."

Natural Products and Features. Nash, in Wilton 122, says, "Goats then bare wool, as it is recorded in S. they do yet." In Deloney's Craft ii. 6, Tom says that in Arcadia asses "swarm as thick as bees in S." (see HYBLA). In Lyly's Sapho ii. 4, Phao speaks of "our Sn. stone which growth hardest by hammering." In Euphues Anat. Wit 38, he says that women harden their hearts "like the stone of Sa, the which the more it is beaten the harder it is." Lyly probably confuses Sn. with Silician, i.e. made of silex or flint. In T. Heywood's S. Age i., Pretus says, "Expose thyself Unto that monstrous beast of Cicily Called the Chimera." The legendary home of the Chimera was Lycia; but it was probably the personification of a volcano there, and Heywood may have transferred it to Aetna; unless, indeed, Cicily is a slip for Lycia. The island of the Sirens, from whom Odysseus escaped by filling his ears with wax, was somewhere near S., if not S. itself. In Marston's Leaguer iii. 4, Philautus says, "When she flatters . . . I will seal my ears with wax Took from that boat that rowed with a deaf oar From the sweet tunes of the Sn. shore." The whirlpool of Charybdis was near the coast of S. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy iv. 2, 37, Renel says, "The woes are bloody that in women reign. The Sicile Gulf keeps fear in less degree." In Lochine i. 1, 107, Brutus speaks of passing "the Cicillian gulf" on his way from S. to Aquitania. In Tit. iii. 1, 242, Marcus says, "Now let hot Aetna cool in S., And be my heart an ever-burning fire." In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 618, Orlando cries: "Aetna, forsake the bounds of S. For now in me thy restless flames appear." In v. 1, 1222, he speaks of "aspiring thoughts That burns as do the fires of Cicily." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass iii. 2, 1192, the Magus says, "The hill of Scicely . . . Sometime on sudden doth evacuate Whole flakes of fire and spews out from below The smoky brands that Vulcan's bellows drive."

S. was the home of Theocritus (born in Syracuse about 315 B.C.), Bion, and Moschus, the fathers of Pastoral Poetry. Hence the Sn. Muse means the Muse of Pastoral Poetry. Milton, in Lycidas 132, says, "Return, Alpheus, that dread voice is past That shrunk thy streams; return, Sn. Muse, And call the vales." The scenes of the following plays are laid in Sicily: Ado, W. T., Davenant's Platonic, Machin's Dumb Knight, May's Hair, Brome's Concubine, Cowley's Riddle, and Suckling's Sad One. See also under MESSINA, PALERMO, and SYRACUSE.

SICYON, now VASILIKI. An ancient city of the Peloponnese, lying abt. 2 m. from the Southern shore of the Gulf of Corinth, 15 m. N.W. of that city. It was famous for its olives, which Vergil calls "Sicyonia baccæ." In Ant. i. 2, 123, news is brought to Antony that his wife Fulvia has died "in S." as she was on her way from Italy to Asia to meet him. In T. Heywood's Dialogues xiv. 4392, Crates tells of "2 rich men Being from S. unto Cyrra bound" who "Were in the mid way near Iapygium drowned." Cyrra, or Cirrha, is on the opposite shore of the Gulf of Corinth to S.; but it does not appear how these unhappy navigators got near Iapygium on their way. In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Autumn says, "Tiber shall pay thee apples and S. olives."

SIDON. One of the most ancient cities of the Phœnicians, on the coast of Syria, about midway between Tyre and Beyroust. It had a fine double harbour, now mostly silted up, and was a great commercial centre through which the products of the East were distributed to the countries on the Mediterranean. It was closely connected with Tyre, though it is still a question which was the mother-city. Both were regarded as cities of great wealth and luxury. Carthage was a colony of Tyre, and Dido is represented as the daughter of the King of Tyre. In Marlowe's Dido i. Venus tells Aeneas that in Carthage "Sidonian Dido reigns as Q." In Brandon's Octavia 524, Byllius mentions "Blancbourg, a city near to S. placed" (see BLANCBOURG). Milton P. L. i. 441, speaks of Astarte, "To whose bright image nightly by the moon Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs." Astarte was a Phœnician goddess. In Cyrus i., Araspes says, "The covering is of blue Sydonian silk." The Phœnician dyes, prepared from the Murex, were famous throughout the ancient world. Greene, in Quip, p. 246, complains that the Milliners have "almost made England as full of proud fopperies as Tyre and S. were."

SIENA. A city in Tuscany, standing on a hill 60 m. South of Florence, and 160 N.W. of Rome. Of its earlier history little is known, but we find it in the 12th and 13th cents. under a more or less popular government, and engaged on the Ghibelline side in constant wars with Florence. Under the magistracy of the Nine, established in 1287, it entered on a period of prosperity, during which its University, founded in 1203, was re-established and enlarged, and most of its public buildings begun. Wars with Charles IV took place in the 14th cent., and fresh quarrels with Florence resulted in an alliance with Milan and the acknowledgement of the suzerainty of Gian Galeazzo Visconti, which, however, only lasted a very short time. The 15th cent. was filled with wars against Florence; for a brief period (1495-1512) Pandolfo Petrucci was supreme, but he did not succeed in founding a permanent dynasty; indeed, but for this short interlude, there was never any D. or Grand Signor of S.; and the personages who appear in some of our dramas under such a title are quite imaginary. Until it was finally annexed to Florence in 1557, S. maintained a republican form of government. It had the honour in 1859 of taking the first step toward the unification of Italy by voting for the annexation of Tuscany to Piedmont under Victor Emmanuel II. The Cathedral and the Palace, as well as many other public buildings, are well known both for their own splendour and for the magnificence of their art treasures. In All's i. 2, 1, the K. says, "The Florentines and Senoys are by the ears, Have fought with equal fortune and continue A braving war." The statement is taken from Boccaccio, whose Decameron is dated 1348; hence this war may have been that of 1260-69, the last one before that date. But Shakespeare neither knew nor cared when it was. In Gascoigne's Supposes ii. 1, Erostrato tells an imaginary story of how the customs officers in S. had interfered with the baggage of Count Hercules of Ferrara, and he had consequently sworn to be revenged on any Sienese who should be found in Ferrara; the date is 1508-1559. In B. & F. Women Pleased ii. 5, a Counsellor tells of a treaty between his royal mistress, the Duchess of Florence, and "S.'s D." A war follows between Florence and S., in which "the D. of S." is taken prisoner; but the Duchess of Florence offers him her hand and they are married. The whole story is imaginary. In Massinger's Great Duke i. 1, Contarino speaks of the great services done by Sanazzaro to Florence in the wars "against Pisa and S." Cosmo de Medici besieged and took S. in 1555, and it was almost immediately annexed to Florence. In his Maid Hon., one of the characters is Aurelia, Duchess of S., and many of the scenes are laid in or near the city; but the whole thing is unhistorical, and there never was any Duchess Aurelia. In Shirley's Traitor i. 2, Lorenzo asks: "Is it possible A treason hatched in Florence 'gainst the D. Should have no eyes at home to penetrate The growing danger . . . but at S. One must, with a perspective, discover all?" Again we have to do, not with history, but with fiction.

In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 2, Sancho says, "I have an aunt in S. in Italy, I'll go see her." In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 2, Trapolin says he has often written letters "as when a lady writes to her brother at S." In ii. 3, Horatio characterizes it as "fine-linguaged S." In Greene's Friar ix., Vandermast boasts: "I have given non-plus to the Paduans To them of Sien, Florence, and Bologna," where the Universities of these places are intended. S. is the scene of Ford's Fancies, and of Davenant's Cr. Brother; in the former appears an unhistorical Octavio, Marquess of S. In brief, there is little or nothing historical in any of the plays that deal with the Court of S., except that the authors knew something of the state of war which normally subsisted between S. and Florence.

SIGEUM. The promontory at the extreme N.W. corner of Asia Minor, at the entrance of the Hellespont, now called Yenisher. Here the Greeks were reported to have had their naval camp during the Trojan War; and a mound near the promontory is the traditional tomb of Achilles. In Shrew iii. 1, 28, Lucentio quotes Ovid's line, "Hic ibat Simois, hic est Sigeia tellus" ("Here flowed the Simois, here is the land of Sigeum").

SILESIA. A province of Prussia, lying between Bohemia and Poland. It once was part of Poland, but was ceded to the K. of Bohemia in 1355. The K. of Hungary took it in 1478, and in 1526 it became part of the Austrian dominions. It was treacherously seized and annexed to Prussia in 1740 by Frederick the Great. This act led to the War of the Austrian Succession (1741-1748), and was partly the cause of the Seven Years' War (1756-1763). In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says, "I have visited Moldavia and Livonia, Pamphlagonia and S." I suspect, from its position next to Pamphlagonia, that Cilicia is intended, q.v. But S. is near Moldavia, and may be the right reading.

SILLA. See SCYLLA.

SILLO, or SHILOH. A town in Palestine, now Seilun, in the tribe of Ephraim, 20 m. N. of Jerusalem. The Ark was taken there when the Israelites first entered Canaan, and it remained the central national sanctuary until it was destroyed by the Philistines in the time of Samuel. In Milton's S. A. 1674, the Chorus speaks of God as "our living Dread, who dwells in Silo, his bright sanctuary."

SILLOA, or SILOAM (now SILWAN). A vill. South-E. of Jerusalem, on the opposite side of the valley of the Kedron. The Pool of Siloam still remains under the name of Birket Silwan. Isaiah (viii. 6) refers to "the waters of Siloah that go softly," and probably means the rock-cut conduit by which the water of the Pool was conveyed into the city. Milton, P. L. i. 11, speaks of "Siloa's brook that flowed Fast by the Oracle of God." He probably meant the brook Kedron, which flows under the E. wall of the Temple on Mt. Moriah; though clearly the passage in Isaiah was in his mind.

SILURES. A tribe of ancient Britons who inhabited what is now Glamorgansh., Monmouthsh., and Herefordsh. They were amongst the most determined opponents both of the Romans and the Saxons. Henry Vaughan, who was born in Brecknocksh., calls himself in the title-page of his Silex Scintillans (1650) "Henry Vaughan Silurist." In Fisher's Fainus ii. 5, Belinus says, "Them the Silures flank, 8000 stout."

SILVER STREET. Lond., running W. from Wood St., Cheapside, to Falcon Sq. It was probably so called from the silversmiths who had their shops there. In this st. is the Hall of the Parish Clerks' Company. In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Otter says of his wife: "All her teeth were made in the Blackfriars, both her eyebrows in the Strand, and her hair in S-st." In his Staple iii. 2, Censure says, "A notable tough rascal, this old Pennyboy! Right city-bred!" to which Mirth replies: "In S-st., the region of money, a good seat for an usurer." Shakespeare at one time lodged with one Christopher Mountjoy in S. St.

SIMAGALLIA. See SINIGALLIA.

SIMOIS. A mtn. torrent rising in the Ida range and flowing past Troy into the Scamander. It is the modern Dumbrek Chai, which, however, has diverted its course and flows direct into the Hellespont. In Sackville's Gorboduc iii. 1, 2, Gorboduc talks of "S. stained streams Flowing with blood of Trojan princes slain." In Loecine ii. 3, 33, Thrasimachus speaks of "Hector and Troilus . . . Chasing the Græcians over Simois." In Lacr. 1437, we read: "From the strand of Dardan where they fought To S. reedy banks the red blood ran." In Taming of a Shrew, Haz., p. 513, Ferando swears, "More fair and radiant is my lovely Kate Than silver Zanthus when he doth embrace The ruddy Simies at Ida's feet." Zanthus [Xanthus] was the name of the Scamander amongst the Gods. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Anchises says, "Scamander fields They have strewn with carcasses, and S. streams Already purpled with the blood of Trojans." In Jonson's Poetaster i. 1, Ovid writes: "Homer will live Whilst Tenedois stands or Ide, Or to the sea fleet S. doth slide." In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 2, Fidelio says, "I would have you Fair and pleasant as Love's Q. When she Anchises came to kiss On the banks of S." Aphrodite fell in love with Anchises of Troy and bore him Aeneas. In Shrew iii. 1, 28, Lucentio quotes Ovid's line: "Hic ibat, S., hic est Sigeia tellus," and translates "Hic ibat, as I told you before, S., I am Lucentio," and Bianca retorts: "Hic ibat S., I know you not."

SINJEAN (i.e. CHINESE). The name Tsin for China was known as early as the 12th cent. B.C. Milton, P. L. xi. 390, mentions, amongst the great cities of the world, "Paquin, of Sinjean kings" (i.e. PEKIN, q.v.).

SINAI. A mtn. in the Southern part of the peninsula between the Gulfs of Suez and Akabah. It is now generally identified with Ras-es-Sufsafah, at the head of the plain of Er-Rahah. Here, according to Jewish tradition, the Law was given through Moses to the children of Israel after their Exodus from Egypt. It is called Horeb in some of the sources of the O.T. It was to the dist. near S. that Moses fled from Egypt, and here he kept the flocks of Jethro. In York M. P. xi. 94, Moses says, "Now am I here to keep Set under Synay side, the bp. Jethro sheep." In Harrowing of Hell 222, Moses says, "Lord, thou gave me with all skill The law of Sinay upon the hill." Milton P. L. i. 7, invokes the "Heavenly Muse that on the secret top Of Oreb, or of S., didst inspire That shepherd"; i.e. Moses. In xii. 227, Michael predicts the giving of the law by "God from the mt. of S." In Ode on Nativity 158, Milton describes the trumpet of the Resurrection as sounding "With such a horrid clang As on mt. S. rang" (see Exodus xix. 16). In Spenser's Sheph. Cal. July, 73, Morrell, discoursing of hills, says: "Of Synah can I tell thee more." Montaigne (Florio's Trans., 1603) ii. 12, says, "We are no nearer heaven on the top of Sina mt. than in the bottom of the deepest sea." Peele, in Bethsabe prol., speaks of the Muse of David: "Decking her temples with the glorious flowers Heavens rained on tops of Sion and Mt. S." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 1, the K. of Jerusalem says that his troops "On Mt. S. with their ensigns spread Look like the party-coloured clouds of heaven." It is, of course, absurd to suppose that troops from Palestine would rendezvous at Mt. S.

SINIGAGLIA (the ancient SENA GALLICA). A town in Italy on the Adriatic, 17 m. N. of Ancona. Here Cesar Borgia perfidiously massacred his allies in 1502. In Barnes' Charter iv. 5, Guicciardini says, "Cesar Betrayed the D. of Fermo at Sinigaglia." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "ill-aired Simegaglia."

SION. One of the hills on which Jerusalem was built. It has been customary to apply the name to the South-W. hill; but recent researches have shown that the original Mt. S. or City of David was upon the Southern spur of the Temple Hill, or Mt. Moriah. The word is often used as equivalent to Jerusalem; and in later times it came to be a synonym for Heaven; and also for the Christian Ch. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 1, Bethsabe says, "Jerusalem is filled with thy complaint, And in the sts. of S. sits thy grief." Milton, P. L. i. 10, says to the Heavenly Muse, "if S. hill Delight thee more . . . I thence Invoke thy aid to my adventurous song." In 386 he speaks of "Jehovah thundering out of S., throned Between the cherubim." In 453 he calls the women of Jerusalem "S.'s daughters." In 442 he says that Astarte was "In S. also not unsung." In iii. 30, he mentions "S. and the flowery brooks beneath." In 530 he describes the passage from the outside of the stellar Universe to the earth as being directly "Over Mt. S." In P. R. iv. 347, the Hebrew Psalms are called "S.'s songs." Hall, in Sat. i. 8, 3, says, in reference to the religious poets of his time: "Parnassus is transformed to S. hill," and calls them "Ye S. Muses." In Mariam i. 6, Constabarus speaks of Herod's temple as "the stately carved edifice That on Mt. S. makes so fair a show." Herod's Temple was, however, on Mt. Moriah, not on Mt. S. In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Mrs. Wincott speaks of young Geraldine's discourse: "Whether S. and those hills about With the adjacent towns and villages Keep that proportioned distance as we read." T. Heywood's Prentices ends "S. and Jerusalem are won." The Puritans used S. to mean the true Ch., i.e. themselves; and Babylon for the Roman and Anglican churches. In Cowley's Cutter v. 6, Tabitha says, "Brother Abednego . . . you will not open before S. in the dressings of Babylon?" i.e. preach in a surplice.

SION HOUSE. A mansion on the N. bank of the Thames, abt. 1 m. South of Brentford, and near the W. end of Kew Gardens. It was formerly a nunnery, founded in 1414 by Henry V. At the dissolution of the monasteries it was seized by the K., and the nuns ultimately found their way to Lisbon. Edward VI gave it to the D. of Somerset, who began the present mansion; afterwards it was bestowed on the D. of Northumberland, and it still remains in the possession of that family. When Northumberland H. at Charing Cross was pulled down in 1874, the famous lion that surmounted it was transferred to S. H., where it may now be seen. In Peele's

Jests we are told that "George took a walk from Brainford to S., where, having the advantage of a pair of oars at hand, he made this journey to Lond."

SIPYLUS. A spur of Mt. Tmolus in Lydia between the river Hermus and the city of Smyrna; now called Sipuli Dagh. In certain conditions of the light one of the cliffs seems to resemble the figure of a woman, and it was supposed by the ancients to be Niobe, who, through her grief at the loss of her children, was said to have been turned into this perpetually weeping rock. In Pembroke's Antonie ii. 368, the Chorus says of Niobe: "She yet doth mount where with his top to skies Mt. Sipylus doth rise."

SI QUIS DOOR. A door in the middle aisle of Old St. Paul's, Lond., on which advertisements of various kinds, especially those of servants needing employment, were posted up. They began (in Latin) with the words "Si Quis," i.e. "If any one" sc. wants a servant, etc. Dekker, in Hornbook iv., advises the gallant, "The first time you venture into Powles, presume not to fetch as much as one whole turn in the middle aisle, no, nor to cast an eye to Si Quis door (pasted and plastered up with serving-men's supplications)." Hall, in Sat. ii. 5, says, "Saw'st thou ever Si Quis patched on Paul's ch. door, To seek some vacant vicarage before?" In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 2, we have a stage direction: "Enter Shift with 2 si-quisses in his hand." When Mitis asks: "What makes he in Paul's now?" Cordatus says, "Troth, for the advancement of a si quiss or two." In iii. 1, Shift says, "I have set up my bills without discovery." Puntarvolo comes in and reads one of them, beginning: "If there be any lady or gentleman" wanting a gentleman usher, etc.

SIRACUSE. See SYRACUSE.

SIRIA. See SYRIA.

SIRTS. See SYRTES.

SISTO, SAN. The Capella Sistina built by Sixtus IV in 1473. It is in the Vatican at Rome, at the N.E. of St. Peter's. It is chiefly memorable for the frescoes of Michel Angelo. In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, the page, being asked the time, says, "By Sisto's horologe 'tis struck eleven."

SITTIM, or SHITTIM. The valley N.E. of the Dead Sea, in the plains of Moab; now Ghor es Seisaban. The Israelites were encamped here when they were seduced into idolatry by the Moabites (Numbers xxv. 1). Milton P. L. i. 413, tells how Peor "enticed Israel in Sittim, on their march from Nile."

SITTINGBURGH, or SITTINGBOURNE. A town in Kent, 38 m. South-E. of Lond., and abt. 9 m. E. of Faversham. It was on the Pilgrims' Road to Canterbury. In Chaucer's C. T. D. 847, the Sumnour says, "I bishrewe me But if I telle tales two or thre Of Freres, er I come to Sidyngborne." In Feverisham ii. 1, Will says, "Sirrah Shakebag, canst thou remember since we trolled the bowl at Sittingburgh where I broke the tapster's head of the Lyon with a cudgel-stick?"

SIVILL. See SEVILLE.

SKALDE. The Scheldt, a river rising in N. France and flowing through Belgium past Oudenarde, Ghent, and Antwerp to the North Sea, which it reaches by 2 channels, the E. and W. Scheldt. At Antwerp it is 1600 ft. wide and 45 deep, and forms a capacious and safe harbour. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 24, referring to the mythical victories of the 2nd Brute over the men of Hainault, says, "Let Scaldis tell . . . What colour were their waters that same day." Bryskett, in Astrophel

(1591), says of the death of Sidney: "The Scheldt, the Danow self, this great mischance did rue." In Larum A. 3, Danila says, "They do not sink The Prince of Orenge ships but suffer them To lie so near within the river Skalde."

SKINNERS WELL. An old spring on the W. side of Clerkenwell Ch., Lond. The name is preserved in Skinner St. which leads to the point where the old well was. The Skin Market on each side of what is now Percival St. continued till the middle of the 18th cent. At Skinners Well the clerks of Lond. performed what is styled a Ludus valde sumptuosus in 1384, which lasted 5 days; similar performances are recorded in 1391 and 1409. The subjects of these plays were the Scriptural stories from the Creation to the Last Judgment.

SLAVONIAN. A general name for the Slav races, which include the Russians, Bulgarians, Servo-Croats, Poles, Czechs, Moravians, and Wends. Popularly it is used as equivalent to Russian. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Urubassa reports: "K. Sigismund hath brought from Christendom More than his camp of stout Hungarians, Slavonians, Almain ruters, Muffies, and Danes." In Middleton's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 1, Matheo says, "Lodovico is a noble S.; it's more rare to see him in a woman's company than for a Spaniard to go into England and to challenge the English fencers there." The Russians were supposed to be very cold-blooded and indifferent to women. Donne, in Sat. (1593) ii. 59, speaks of "words . . . More, more than 10 Slavonians, scolding." In Shirley's Gamester iii., Slavonia is used as a name for an imaginary land of gamblers, probably because they are the slaves of their bad habit. The Nephew speaks of it as Slavonia; Wilding objects that that they know that country; "but," says the Nephew, "you do not know that Slavonia I mean"; and proceeds to describe under this disguise the follies of the gaming-house.

SLUICE. The embankment along the Thames which was built to protect the low-lying dist. of Lambeth Marsh from inundations. It was used as a landing-place for those who crossed the river to Lambeth. In Middleton's R. G. v. 2, a servant says of the runaway lovers: "They were met upon the water an hour since, Sir, Putting in towards the S." "The S.?" says Sir Alexander; "come, gentlemen, 'Tis Lambeth works against us."

SLUYS. A fortified town in Holland, near the mouth of the Scheldt, 10 m. E. of Bruges. It was taken by Prince Maurice in 1604. In Webster's Weakest v. 3, Villiers says, "This gentlewoman . . . Being embarked for England with her daughter, 'Twixt S. in Flanders, where she went aboard, And Goodwin Sands by sturdy adverse winds Was beaten back upon the coast of France." In Barnavelt iv. 5, Barnavelt asks: "When the Sluice was lost and all in mutiny in Middleborough, who durst step in before me to do these countries service?" In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown punningly says, "At Sluice we were both well washed." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Tristram says that the pander, the bawd, and the whore "lived by Flushing, by S., and the Groyne." It is unnecessary to explain the unsavoury double entendres.

SMIRNA. See SMYRNA.

SMITHFIELD, EAST. An open space, E. of the Tower of Lond., just outside the city walls. It was a haunt of riverside thieves, and was often used as the place for their execution. In Contention, Part I, Haz., p. 497, Lord Skayles says of Jack Cade: "The rebels have attempted to win the Tower, But get you to S. and gather head And thither will I send you Mathew Goffe." In H6 B. iv. 6, 13, Dick reports to Cade: "There's an army gathered together in S." The next scene is laid in S., and Mathew Goffe is slain. Evidently East S. is intended.

SMITHFIELD, WEST. Originally the smethe, i.e. smooth, field. An open space between 5 and 6 acres in extent, lying in the triangle formed by Holborn, Aldersgate St., and Charterhouse St., in Lond. On its E. side was the ch. and hospital of St. Bartholomew. It was the market for horses, cattle, sheep, and hay, from very early times until 1855, when the cattle market was removed to Copenhagen Fields, though the hay market was still continued; and the N. side was appropriated for the Metropolitan meat market. The open space lent itself to jousts and tournaments, and was also used for executions. Many martyrs were burnt at the stake at a point opposite the entrance to the ch. of St. Bartholomew, where, in 1849, excavations discovered, abt. 3 ft. below the surface, the ashes which marked the site of the burnings; a granite slab in the wall of St. Bartholomew's Hospital indicates the spot. Howes, in Annales (1631), says, "This field was for many years called Ruffians Hall by reason it was the usual place of frays and common fighting during the time that swords and bucklers were in use." Here was held the famous Fair of St. Bartholomew on August 24th (see under BARTHOLOMEW, ST.). It was in S. that Sir W. Walworth slew Wat Tyler, on June 15th, 1381. In 1615 the whole place was paved and drained at a cost of about £1600.

Historical Allusions. In Straw ii., the Lord Mayor says, "The rebels are defacing houses of hospitality, St. John's in S., the Savoy, and such like." The Priory of St. John was a little N. of S. In Johnson's Nine Worthies (1592), an account is given of the death of Wat Tyler at the hands of Walworth at the place appointed for the meeting of the rebels and the K. "in S." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i. 17, the Mayor says, "Such a rebel was by Walworth, the Lord Mayor of Lond., stabbed dead in S."

The Horse and Cattle Market. In H4 B. i. 2, 57, the Page says to Falstaff that Bardolph is "gone into S. to buy your worship a horse," to which Falstaff replies, "I bought him in Paul's and he'll buy me a horse in S.; an I could get me but a wife in the Stews, I were manned, horsed, and wived!" In More iv. 1, the Clown says, "Many such rewards would make us all ride, and horse us with the best nags in S." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 1, Laxfield asks, "Are we fitted with good frampul jades?" and the Coachman replies, "The best in S., I warrant you, Sir." The note in the Mermaid edition—"a noted market for worthless horses"—is quite misleading; there were bad horses sold at S., but there were good ones too; and the Coachman is praising, not running down, his steeds. In Jonson's Tub i. 2, Puppy says, "What's that, a horse? Can scourse [i.e. deal] nought but a horse, and that in Smithveld?" Jonson, in Discoveries, p. 697, says that one who does courtesies merely for his own sake "hath his horse well drest for S." In W. Rowley's New Wonder ii. 1, the Widow says, "'Tis thought, if the horse-market be removed, that S. shall be so employed," sc. as a market for the sale of widows. In the Cobler of Canterbury a couplet runs: "When in S. on Fridays no jades you can see, Then the Cobler of Rumney shall a cuckold be." Friday was the day of the horse-market. In Dekker's Lanthorn, chapter x. is headed "The knavery of horse-courers in S. discovered"; and an account follows of the various tricks which gave to the phrase "a S. bargain" the meaning of a deal in which the buyer is swindled. In Brome's Damoiselle ii. 1, Amphylus asks of his mare: "Was it well done of her to die to-day, when she had been i' my purse to-morrow in S.?" He had ridden her up from the country to sell her. In Jonson's Barthol. iii. 1, Wasse says to Cokes, "Will you scourse with him? You are in S., you may fit yourself with a fine easy-going street-nag for your saddle." In B. & F. Prize i. 4, Rowland says, "When I credit women more, may I to S., and there buy a jade, and know him to be so, that breaks my neck!" Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 4, 2, quotes a proverb: "He that buys a horse in S. and hires a servant in Pauls, shall likely have a jade to his horse, a knave for his man." Lupton, in London Carbonadoed (1632), says, "He that lights upon a horse in this place [Smithfield] from an old horse-courser, sound both in wind and limb, may light of an honest wife in the stews." In Curates Conference (1641), Needham says, "Juniors and dunces take possession of Colleges; and scholarships and fellowships are bought and sold, as horses in S." In Massinger's Madam i. 2, Plenty says, "The wool of my sheep, or a score or two of fat oxen in S., give me money for my expenses." The presence of the drovers brought it about that there were many taverns in S. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Ruinous makes "the Goat at S. Pens" the rendezvous for his companions in vice.

Bartholomew Fair. In Jonson's Barthol., Ind., the Stage-keeper, pretending to decry the play, says, "When't comes to the Fair once, you were e'en as good go to Virginia, for any thing there is of S. He has not hit the humours, he does not know them." In his Volpone v. 2, the Merchant says of Sir Politick's performance: "Twere a rare motion [i.e. puppet-show] to be seen in Fleet-st., or S. in the fair." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Seawit says, "My father fought pitched battles in S. without blood." Boxing and wrestling were features of the Fair. In Abington ii. 4, Coomes says, "I had a sword, ay, the flower of S. for a sword, a right fox, i' faith." Swords were sold at the Fair; and there were many amusements' shops in the neighbourhood of S. In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood, in his schemes for improving Lond., says, "S. shall be A Romish cirque or Grecian hippodrome."

Executions. In H6 B. ii. 3, 7, the K. says, "The witch in S. shall be burned to ashes And you 3 shall be strangled on the gallows." The witch was Margery Jourdain of Eye. The gallows were erected at the Elms between the horse-pond and Turnmill Brook, and was the usual place of execution before the removal of the gallows to Tyburn in the reign of Henry IV. In Jonson's Barthol. iv. 1, Cokes says, "Bartholomew Fair, quoth he! an ever any Bartholomew had that luck in't that I have had, I'll be martyred for him, and in S., too." Perhaps an allusion to the Protestants martyred at S. in Queen Mary's time. In Brome's Sparagus i. 5, Friswood says, "Let me see the paper; I would be loth to shorten his days with the danger of my neck, or making a bon-fire in S." In Fair Women ii. 1531, Tom says, "S. is full of people, and the sheriff's man told us it [the execution] would be to-day." In the pamphlet of this murder we are told that the execution took place in S., and that the spectators thronged the house-tops and even the battlements of St. Bartholomew's.

Trials by Combat were held in S. The fight between Horner and Peter in H6 B. ii. 3, is a parody of an actual appeal to combat which was fought in S. between John David and his master, William Catur, in 1446. In Treasure, Haz. iii. 266, Lust, after wrestling with Just, says, "I shall meet you in S. or else elsewhere; By His flesh and blood I will not then forbear." In Jonson's Barthol., Ind., the Bookholder exhorts the audience "not to look back to the sword and buckler age of S., but content himself with the present." Nash, in Christ's Tears, says, "No S. ruffianly swash-buckler will come off with such harsh, hell-raking oaths as they."

SMITHFIELD BARS. A wooden barrier on the North of S., Lond., which marked the boundary between the City Liberties and the County of Middlesex. The name survived till the building of the new Meat Market which covered the site. Taylor, in Works ii. 102, calls a certain woman "the honestest woman that dwells between S. B. and Clerkenwell." This is a left-handed compliment, as the dist. was one of evil repute. In Greene's Thieves, Kate says, "I'll so set his name out, that the boys at S. B. shall chalk him on the back for a crossbite."

SMOCK ALLEYS. The lanes occupied by houses of ill-fame in Lond. The best known was a lane on the W. of Spitalfields leading from Bell Lane to Artillery St. near Bishopsgate Without, close to Petticoat Lane, now Middlesex St. In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity says to Pug, "We will make forth our sallies Down Petticoat Lane and up the Smock-alleys."

SMYRNA. The largest and most important city in Asia Minor, and a great trade centre. It stands at the head of the Gulf of S., about midway down the W. coast of the peninsula. Old S. lay some 3 m. N. of the present city. It was destroyed by the Lydian K. Sadyattes about 700 B.C. The new city on the present site was built 4 cents. later by Alexander the Gt. S. was one of the claimants to be the birthplace of Homer. In Selimus 1928, Corcut says, "I fled fast to S., where we might await the arrival of some ship that might transport us safely unto Rhodes." Lyly, in prol. to Gallathea, says, "Ios and S. were 2 sweet cities; Homer was born in the one and buried in the other." Lodge, in Answer to Gosson, p. 11, asks, "Why seek the Smirniains to recover from the Salaminians the praise of Homer?"

SNOWDON. A mtn. range in Carnarvonsh., the highest peak of which is the loftiest mtn. in South Britain and reaches a height of 3571 ft. The last refuge of the Welsh was in this range, but it was penetrated and reduced by Edward I. The native name was Craig-Eliri, q.v. In Peele's Ed. I x., Sussex says, "The men and women of Sowdon [an obvious misprint] have sent in great abundance of cattle and corn." Drayton, in Polyolb. ix. 169, says, "Snowdony, a hill, imperial in his seat, Is from his mighty foot unto his head so great That, were his Wales distrest, or of his help had need, He all her flocks and herds for many months could feed."

SOCCAINE (an obvious misprint for LORRAINE, q.v.). In Chapman's Rev. Bussy v. 1, Guise speaks of advertisements he has received in regard to the Catholic League "from Rome and Spain, Soccaine and Savoy" (Mermaid edition).

SODOM. An ancient city in Palestine, E. of the Jordan; probably N. of the Dead Sea, though some authorities would place it at its South end. According to Gen. xix. it was destroyed by fire from heaven along with the 4 other Cities of the Plain, viz. Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar. Its wickedness became proverbial; and from the incident recorded in Gen. xix. 4, 5, Sodomy came to mean unnatural sexual crime. The burning of S. and Gomorrah was the subject of a popular Motion or Puppet-play. Protestant writers often use S. as a synonym for the Ch. of Rome. A kind of apple was supposed to grow near its site which looked fresh and sweet but turned to ashes in the mouth—possibly the fruit of Solanum Sodomeum. Phillip, in Grissil 386, says, "As God did plague S. and Gomorrah in his ire So will he destroy the wicked with flaming fire." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 2, the Angel compares Nineveh to "S. and Gomorrah full of sin." In Shirley's Duke's Mist iv. 1, Horatio says of a lady's painted face: "Her cheeks represent Gomorrah and her sister S. burning." In Jack Drum iv. 205, Pasquil says, "Then comes pale-faced lust; next S., then Gomorrah." In Bale's Johan 190, the K. says, "The Romish ch. I mean, more vile than ever was S." In his Promises iii., Pater Coelestis says, "The vile Sodomites live so unnaturally That their sin vengeance asketh continually." In his Three Laws ii., Idolatry says, "I dwell among the Sodomites, the Benjamites, and Midianites, And now the popish hypocrites embrace me everywhere." In the prol. to the same play, he speaks of "Idols and stinking Sodometry." Taylor, in Works iii. 137, says, "The Pope then caused all priests to leave their wives To lead foul Sodomitick single lives." Nash, in Wilton, speaks of "the art of whoring, the art of poisoning, the art of Sodometry." Milton, P. L. i. 503, speaking of the sins of the sons of Belial, says: "Witness the street of S."

In Jonson's Barthol. v. 1, Leatherhead says, "O the motions that I have given light to! Jerusalem was a stately thing, and so was Nineveh, and the City of Norwich, and S. and Gomorrah." In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Monticello says of Vittoria: "You see, my Lords, what goodly fruit she seems; Yet like those apples travellers report To grow where S. and Gomorrah stood, I will but touch her, and you straight shall see She'll fall to dust and ashes." Maundeville says they are full fair apples, but have coal and cinders within; though he frankly admits, "I neither saw nor heard of any." Milton P. L. x. 562, says, "Greedily they plucked The fruitage fair to sight, like that which grew Near that bituminous lake where S. flamed. . . . They . . . instead of fruit, Chewed bitter ashes."

SODOM LANE. Probably a nick-name for a lane of ill-repute in Lond.; I cannot identify it further. In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Worm says, "Did I not see thee once in a quarrel at ninepins behind Sodom-Lane disarmed with one of the pins?"

SOFALA. A dist. on the South-E. coast of Africa on the Mozambique Channel, between Delagoa Bay and the Zambesi. It exported a certain amount of gold-dust, and was hence by some commentators identified with the Ophir from which Solomon brought gold. Milton, P. L. xi. 400, mentions among the kingdoms shown in vision to Adam "Mombaza, and Quiloa, and Melind, And Sofala, thought Ophir."

SOGDIANA. A dist. in Central Asia, South-E. of the Sea of Aral, between the Oxus and the Jaxartes. It roughly corresponds to Turkestan and Bokkhara. Alexander the Gr. conquered the country, and seems to have spent nearly 3 years there and in the neighbouring Bactriana. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says of Alexander: "Bactrians and Zogdians, known but by their names, Were by his arms subdued." In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron says, "The great Macedon Was said . . . To bring the barbarous Sogdians to nourish, Not kill, their aged parents as before." Milton, P. R. iii. 302, describes an imaginary expedition of the Parthian K. "Against the Scythian, whose incursions wild Have wasted Sogdiana."

SOLA, or SOLL. A town on the coast of Cilicia in Asia Minor, abt. 30 m. W. of Tarsus. The Greek spoken by the inhabitants was very corrupt; this gave rise to the word solecism for a piece of bad grammar or construction; and then for an error in etiquette, or any impropriety. In Lyly's Midas iii. 1, the K. calls to mind "my cruelties in Lycaonia, my usurping in Getulia, my oppression in Sola." Nash, in Four Lett. Conf. 70, challenges his critics: "Suck out one solecisme or misshapen English word if thou canst." In Massinger Unnat. Com. iii. 1, the Steward says, "He ne'er observed you . . . take A say of venison or stale fowl by your nose, Which is a solecism at another's table." In Jonson's Cynthia v. 2, Amorphus says, "Forgive it now; it was the solecism of my stars." In his Epigrams cxvi., he speaks of "A desperate solecism in truth and wit."

SOLANTO (probably SOLETO is meant). A town in the heel of Italy, a few m. South of Lecco. It still possesses 2 convents. In Brome's Concubine v. 9, the K. says, "I vowed my after life unto the monastery of holy Augustinians at Solanto."

SOLDINO. A city of N. Syria, apparently somewhere between Aleppo and Tripoli; possibly Baalbek is meant, the old name of which, Heliopolis, might be translated by Sol-dino, the city of the Sun. It lies about half-way between Tripoli and Damascus. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 1, the K. of Soria says, "From Soria with 70,000 strong Ta'en from Aleppo, Soldino, Tripoli, And so on to my city of Damasco, I march."

SOLEMS (i.e. SOLESMES). A town in N. France near the boundary of Belgium, 20 m. E. of Cambrai. In Barnavelt iii., Barnavelt has letters from "the K. of Swechland and the Count of Solems."

SOLINES (an obvious misprint for SABINES, q.v.). In Tiberius 1840, Germanicus, referring to ancient Roman history, says, "Witness the tempests of the Solines troops and Titias Titaias" [i.e. Titus Tatius] doubtful treachery."

SOMERSET HOUSE. A palace in Lond. on the South side of the Strand between Strand Lane and Wellington St. The 1st S. H. was built by the Protector S. in the reign of Edward VI in 1549. It occupied the sites of the old ch. of St. Mary-at-Strand and the Inns of the Bps. of Chester and Worcester, which were pulled down to make room for it. James I gave it to his Q. in 1616, and in her honour it was renamed Denmark H. A chapel was built by Inigo Jones for Q. Henrietta Maria in 1632. All these buildings were pulled down in 1775 and replaced by the present S. H., with its fine façade towards the Thames. It is used partly as Government offices, partly for the work of King's College. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 316, the Sword-bearer says, "The Q. comes along the Strand from S. H." Daniel's Hymen's Triumph was performed here in 1614 in honour of the wedding of Lord Roxborough. See also DENMARK HOUSE.

SOMERSETSHIRE (Srt.=Somerset). A county in South-W. of England. The S. dialect is characterized by the flattening of s to z and f to v, and the county is often called Zomerzetshire in consequence; ich is used for I, and contractions like cham (I am), chave (I have), chill (I will) are common. Specimens of this dialect are found in Respublica, Horstes, King Lear, Gurton, Sparagus, and other plays in which rustics are introduced. The county shared with the rest of the W. country a great reputation for skill in wrestling. In Respublica v. 6, Avarice says, "I would have brought half Kent into Northumberland, And S. should have raught to Cumberland." In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough passes through "Wookey in S." on his way from Cornwall to Lond. Wookey Hole is a famous cavern in the Mendip Hills. In Brome's Sparagus ii. 3, Hoyden says that his father was "as rank a clown as any in S."; and in iv. 2, Tom says, "Did you know a zuster of Mr. Striker's that was married into Zummerzet shire?" In Hercules i. 3, 471, marg. Dromio, describing the behaviour of his fellow-passengers at sea, says: "One did, I take it, the S. trick fairly over; but indeed he never came back again." There is a pun here on the word somersault, which has nothing to do with S. wrestling, though it is often, by a sort of Hobson-Jobson derivation, spelled Srt. Thus Nash, in Saffron Walden Intro., desires that his pen may be inspired "with some of his nimblest Pomados and Sommersets." In B. & F. Fair Maid i. iv. 2, Forbosco says, "Now I will only make him break his neck in doing a somerset."

Srt. was a territorial title in the English Peerage. The Srt. of H6 A. was John, son of John Beaufort, eldest natural son of John of Gaunt. He succeeded his brother as Earl of Srt. in 1418, and was created D. in 1443; he died the following year. He was made Capt.-General of France in 1443. In ii. 4, he is represented as having selected the red rose as the badge of the Lancastrian party in the famous scene in the Temple Garden. He is present in iv. 1, at the coronation of Henry in Paris in 1431, and quarrels with York, but is reconciled by the K. In iv. 3, 9, York blames "that villain Srt." for not having sent him reinforcements in France; and in iv. 1, Srt. excuses himself on the ground that the expedition led by York and Talbot was "too rashly plotted." But as this took place at the time of Talbot's death, viz. 1453, it is clear that Shakespeare confuses John of Srt. with his brother Edmund, who was created D. in 1447 and sent to France as regent. He is present in H6 B. i. 1. In i. 2, 29, Gloucester relates how he dreamed that "Edmund, D. of Srt., lost his head." In v. 2, Richd. of Gloucester kills him at the 1st battle of St. Albans; and in H6 C. i. 1, flings his head down on the floor of Parliament House. He was succeeded by his son Henry, who was beheaded after the battle of Hexham in 1463. His brother Edmund succeeded him and is the Srt. who appears at Edward's court in iv. 1—which is a mistake, for he was always on the side of Henry—and who is beheaded after the battle of Tewkesbury in v. 5. In v. 7, 5, Edward boasts: "We have mowed down 3 Dukes of Srt., three-fold renowned For hardy and undoubted champions." The present Dukes are descended from Edward Seymour, who was created D. in 1547 and is best known as the Protector Srt. He was beheaded, but the title was restored to his heir in 1660. He is the D. of Srt. who, in Feversham i. 1, is reported to have given the lands of the Abbey of Faversham to Arden; Arden's murder took place in 1550.

SOMME. A river in N. France, rising near St. Quentin, and flowing in a W. direction through the old Province of Picardy, past Amiens and Abbeville into the English Channel. Cressy and Agincourt both lie N. of the Somme. In Ed. III iii. 3, the K. says, just before the battle of Cressy, "Where's the Frenchman by whose cunning guide We found the shallow of this river Some?" In H5 iii. 5, 1, the French K. says of Henry, just before the battle of Agincourt: "'Tis certain he hath passed the river Somme."

SOPER LANE. A st. in Lond., now called Queen St., running South from Cheapside to Southwark Bdge., a little E. of the Ch. of St. Mary-le-Bow. It was so called from the soapmakers, or soapers, who dwelt there. The name was altered to Queen St. in 1667 in honour of the wife of Charles II. In Middleton's Triumph Truth we are told: "At Soper-lane end a Senate-house [was] erected" as a part of the scenery of the pageant.

SOPHIA'S, SAINT. The cathedral at Constantinople built by the emperor Justinian A.D. 531-538. The dome rises 180 ft. above the pavement. It was converted, or rather perverted, into a mosque by the Turks. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge, p. 172, says, "The ch. is called Saynte Sophyes ch., in the which be a wonderful sight of priests."

SORBONNE. In Paris, the seat of the Académie de France, on the E. side of the Boulevard Michel, near the Luxembourg and the Panthéon. It was originally a theological college, built by Robert de Sorbon about 1255. It grew to be the headquarters of learning in Paris, and discussions on all subjects were held there. It was mainly, however, a school of theology, and its professors were resorted to for decisions on points of theology and canonical law. It had the honour of introducing printing into France in 1469. Richelieu reconstructed the buildings, but it was suppressed at the Revolution in 1790. It was re-established as the Académie de Paris in 1808, and its buildings were once more reconstructed in 1884. The old ch. is, however, retained. Rabelais, in Pantagruel ii. 10, describes how Pantagruel "went afterwards to the S., where he maintained argument against all the theologians or divines for the space of 6 weeks." In Chapman's D'Olive i. 1, D'Olive boasts that his chambers shall be "a second S. where all doubts or differences of learning, honour, duellism, criticism, and poetry shall be disputed." In Marlowe's Massacre i. 9, Ramus says, "The blockish Sorbonnists Attribute as much unto their own works As to the service of the eternal God."

SOREC, VALLEY OF (now the WADY SURAR). It runs from the N. of Jerusalem westward to Beth-Shemesh, and forms the easiest way from the Philistine Plain to that city. Sorek itself lies 16 m. due W. of Jerusalem, near the entrance of the Wady. In Milton's S. A. 229, Samson says, "the next I took to wife . . . was in the vale of Sorec, Dalila." See Judges xvi. 4.

SORIA. Probably the dist. round Tyre, the old name of which was Sor, is meant; or it may be a variant spelling of Syria. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 2, Frederick mentions amongst the allies of Tamburlaine "the Kings of S. and Jerusalem." In iii. 1, the K. of S. says, "From S. with 70,000 strong Ta'en from Aleppo, Soldino, Tripoli, I march." In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick has a plan to discover the plague in "a ship newly arrived from S. or from any suspected part of all the Levant."

SOSETUS. See COCYTUS.

SOTHRAY (apparently meant for SURREY, q.v.). In Skelton's Elinour Rumming pass. 1, it is said that that lady "dwelt in Sothray In a certain stead Beside Leatherhead." Leatherhead is in Surrey.

SOUND. The strait between the island of Zealand and Sweden, leading from the Cattegat into the Baltic. At its narrowest point, between Elsinore and Helsingborg, it is only 3 m. wide. All vessels passing through the S. had to anchor at Elsinore and pay a customs fee to Denmark. In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Pettifog says, "Custom is not more truly paid in the S. of Denmark."

SOUTHAM. A town in Warwicksh., 9 m. E. of Warwick, and 11 South-E. of Coventry. In H6 C. v. 1, 9, Somerville reports: "At S. did I leave him [Clarence] with his forces." Warwick, who is looking westward towards Warwick from the walls of Coventry, hears a drum in that direction, and says, "Then Clarence is at hand." Somerset corrects him: "It is not his, my lord; here S. lies," pointing to the South-E. In Downfall Hunting-ton i. 3, Little John says, "At Romford, S., Wortley, Hothersfield, Of all your cattle money shall be made." There was an annual horse and cattle fair at S. every July.

SOUTHAMPTON, or HAMPTON, q.v. A spt. in Hants, at the head of S. Water, 74 m. South-W. of Lond. In J. Heywood's Weather p. 100, Merry Report names "S." as one of the places he has visited. The scene of H5 ii. 2 is laid at S., just before Henry sailed thence for France. In chorus ii. 35, it is said, "The scene is now transported, gentles, to S." In ii. 3, 48, Nym says, "Shall we shog? the K. will be gone from S." In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 353, the K. says, "I will that there be provided a great navy of ships With all speed at South-Hampton." In Oldcastle iv. 3, the Bp. of Rochester says, "The K. is departed on his way for France And at S. doth repose this night." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A., p. 54, Morton says to Falconbridge, "Thou jointest in confederacy with France And cam'st with them to burn S. here." It was regarded as a long way from Lond. In Darius 67, Iniquity says of the Pope: "He hath as much lands as lieth between this and S." In Bale's Laws iii. 1, Infidelity says, "For such another [service] would I to S.," i.e. "I would go a long way." Bevis of S. was one of the popular heroes of ancient romance. He performed great exploits in Armenia and Syria, slew the giant Ascopart and the dragon of Colein, and finally returned to England, where he died. His sword was called Morglay, and his steed Arundel. In Ret. Pernass. prol., Momus says, "There's never a tale in Sir John Mandevill or Bevis of S. but hath a better ending." The Earl of S. to whom Shakespeare dedicated his Venus and Adonis and Lucrece was Henry Wriothesley, who succeeded his father in 1581, was attained in 1598, but restored to his titles and honours in 1603.

SOUTHTRON. Used especially by Scottish writers for an Englishman, one living South of the Tweed. In Chaucer C. T. I. 42, the Parson says, "But, trusteth well, I am a southren man, I kan nat geeste 'rum, ram, ruf' by lettre," i.e. I cannot tell a tale in alliterative metre like the N. poets.

SOUTH SEA (the SOUTH PACIFIC OCEAN). In As iii. 2, 208, Rosalind says, "One inch of delay more is a S. S. of discovery," i.e. leaves a whole S. S. of unknown places to be still discovered. Warburton's emendation, "a S. S. off discovery," is ingenious but unnecessary. Drayton, Polyolb. xix. 365, says, "Brave Candish . . . through the S. Seas passed, about this earthly ball." Wilbye, in First Set of Madrigals (1598), speaks of "Coral and ambergris sweeter and dearer Than which the S.

Seas or Moluccas lend us." In B. & F. Women Pleased i. 2, Lopes enumerates amongst his jewels "the S. S.'s treasure, Pearl fair and orient."

SOUTHWARK. A borough, formerly independent of the Lond. city government, but now under the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor and Council. It lies on the South side of the Thames between Lambeth and Deptford. It was known, in contrast to the City of Lond., as the Borough; and its principal st., running from the foot of Lond. Bdge. to Newington Causeway, is still called the Borough High St. It is in the county of Surrey. The parish ch. of St. Saviour's, formerly St. Mary Overy, still stands as it was in Elizabethan times; to the W. of it was Winchester House; and further still to the W. was the Bankside, with the Stews or Bordello, where most of the Elizabethan theatres were erected, including the Globe, the Rose, the Swan, and the bear-baiting ring at Paris Garden. The highway from Lond. to the South was the Old Kent Road and the Borough High St.; and in this last were many famous hostelries such as the Tabard, whence Chaucer's Pilgrims started for Canterbury, the White Hart, which was Jack Cade's headquarters, the George, the Bell, and the Bear at the Bridgefoot. Here too were the prisons of King's Bench, the Marshalsea, the White Lion, the Borough Compter, and the Clink. The S. Fair (also called the Lady Fair and St. Margaret's Fair) was reckoned, with Bartholomew Fair and Sturbridge Fair, as one of the 3 most frequented in the kingdom. It was held between the Tabard and St. George's Ch. on Sept. 7th, 8th, and 9th.

In H6 B. iv. 4, 27, a messenger brings word: "The rebels are in S.," i.e. Jack Cade's followers; and in iv. 8, 20, Cade says, "Hath my sword therefore broke through Lond. gates that you should leave me at the White Hart in S.?" In Straw ii. a messenger reports: "They [the rebels] have spoiled all S., broke up the Marshalsea and the King's Bench." In Oldcastle iii. 4, the scene of which is Blackheath, Sir John warns the disguised K.: "Thou mayst hap be met with again [by highwaymen] before thou come to S." Blackheath was a notorious resort of these gentry. Chaucer, C. T. A. 20, tells how he lay "in Southwerk at the Tabard," where he met the pilgrims; and in A. 718, he speaks of "this gentil hostelrye That highte the Tabard faste by the Belle in Southwerk." In A. 3140, the Miller blames "the ale of Southwerk" for his drunken plight. Nash, in Pierce D. 3, says, "Chaucer's host, Baly in S., shall be talked of whilst there ever be a bad house in S." In Piers C. vii. 83, we are told of a "souter of Southwerk" who appears to have been a dealer in sorcery and magic cures. In Goosecap i. 1, Jack compares Bullaker, the French page, to "the great baboon that was to be seen in S."—probably at the Fair. In B. & F. Pestle Ind., the Citizen says, "Let's have the waits of S.; they are as rare fellows as any are in England; and that will fetch them all o'er the water with a vengeance."

In Feversham v. 1, Shakebag proposes to take shelter after the murder of Arden with "a bonnie northern lass, the widow Chambley," who dwells "in S." In Greene's Friar vii., Ralph says, "I will make a ship that shall hold all your colleges and so carry away the niniversity [sic] with a fair wind to the Bankside in S." In Marston's Companion iii. 4, Capt. Whibble says, "There's a good plump wench, my hostess, a waterman's widow, at the sign of the Red Lattice in S., shall bid thee welcome." In Cobler of Canterbury, the cobbler says, "When S. Bankside hath no pretty wenches Then the cobler of Rumney shall a cuckold be." Nash, in Pierce F. 4, says, "Make a privy search in S. and tell me how many she-inmates you find." In News from Hell, the Cardinal speaks of "all the whores and thieves that live in Westminster, Covent Garden, Holborn, Grub Street, Clerkenwell, Rosemary Lane, Turnbull-street, Ratcliff, S. Bankside, and Kent-st." When Harman (Caveat ii.) lost his copper cauldron he tells how he "gave warning in Sothwarke, Kent St., and Barmesey st. to all the tinkers there dwelling."

SOUTHWELL. A town in Notts., 14 m. N.E. of Nottingham. The ch. of St. Mary at S. was much resorted to by pilgrims. It was founded by Paulinus, and is a fine building. In J. Heywood's Four PP i., the Palmer claims to have been "at our Lady of Southwelle." In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Tuck says, "I'll unto S. and buy all the knacks."

SOWDON. A misprint for SNOWDON, q.v.

SPA. A town in Belgium, 16 m. South of Liège, famous for its springs of various kinds of mineral waters. It first attracted attention in England in the latter part of the 16th cent., and soon became a popular resort for invalids of all kinds. Later the name was applied generically to other places where mineral springs were found, like Harrogate and Cheltenham. Heylyn (s.v. BELGIUM) says, "In this forest [Ardenne] or about the edges thereof are the famous hot baths, frequented from all the places of Europe, called the S.; not so pleasant as wholesome, not so wholesome as famous." Hall, in Epp. i. 5, says, "We passed to the S., a vill. famous for her medicinal and mineral waters, compounded of iron and copper; a water more wholesome than pleasant, and yet more famous than wholesome." Puttenham, Art of Poesie iii. 24, relates that "in the time of Charles the ninth, French K.," he visited "the Spaw waters." Charles reigned from 1560 to 1574. Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603) ii. 15, says, "They of Tuscany esteem the Bathes of Spaw more than their own." Spenser, F. Q. i. 11, 30, speaks of "Th' English Bath and eke the german Spaw." In Jonson's New World, the Herald says of the wells in the Moon: "Your Turnbridge or the Spaw itself are mere puddle to them." In Massinger's Peril Love ii. 3, Clarindore says that one drop of his lady's perspiration would purchase "The far-famed English Bath or German S." In Webster's Maji iii. 2, Caniola advises the Duchess to "go visit the S. in Germany." In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, Sad says, "You'll both live to repent before you have done travelling to the Epsoms, Burbons, and the Spaws, to cure those travelled diseases." In B. & F. Scornful iii. 2, Lovel says, "He has yet, past cure of physic, S., or any diet, a primitive pox." Taylor, in Works i. 83 (1630), says, "St. Winifred's Well, the Bath, or the Spaw, are not to be compared with this ship for speedy ease and cure."

SPAIN (Sh. = Spanish, Sd. = Spaniard). The Roman Hispania; the South-W. peninsula of Europe, excluding Portugal. The Phœnicians planted colonies on the coast, and the country came in early times under the dominion of Carthage, from whom it was taken by Rome as the result of the Punic wars. It was divided by the Romans into 2 provinces, Hispania Ulterior and Citerior, of which only the latter was fully subdued and organized. In A.D. 256 it was ravaged by the Franks, and after making a fine recovery it was again overrun about A.D. 400 by the Vandals and Goths. The Visigoths established their authority under Wamba in 478; and their kingdom lasted till 711, when Tarik and his 5000 Saracens crossed the Straits of Gibraltar, defeated Roderick near Xeres, and speedily subjugated the whole country. During the 8th—10th cents. Christian kingdoms were gradually organized in the N. in Leon, Navarre, Castile, and Aragon, and grew in power and influence. The marriage between Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile in 1469 led to the union of the whole of Christian S. under one crown; Granada was taken in 1492, and the power of the Moors destroyed; and they were finally expelled from S. in 1609. Under the rule of Charles I, better known as the Emperor Charles V, S. rose to the height of her influence in Europe, largely through the immense wealth which she gained from her discoveries and conquests in Peru, Mexico, and the W. Indies. Under his successor, Philip II, S. became the champion of Roman Catholicism against the doctrines of the Reformation, and the establishment of the Inquisition effectually stifled all freedom of thought. Her chief enemies were England and the provinces of the Netherlands; the defeat of the Sh. Armada in 1588 was the first important check to Philip's ambitions; and the revolt of the Netherlands led ultimately to the establishment of the United Provinces. The expulsion of the Moors in 1609 dealt a fatal blow to the industrial development of the country, and its later story has been one of steady decline into political insignificance. Plays based on Sh. history, real or imaginary, begin with Kyd's Span. Trag., and are continued in Greene's Alphonsus, Peele's Alcazar, Stucley, and the anonymous Lust's Dominion. Later we have Shirley's Spanish Duke of Lerma, Rawlins' Rebellion, and W. Rowley's All's Lost. A lost play by Hathway and Rankins (1601) was entitled The Conquest of Spain by John of Gaunt. The novels of Cervantes, and the plays of Lope de Vega and others, were drawn upon for plot and incident by the English dramatists, particularly by Beaumont and Fletcher, Massinger, and Webster.

General Allusions.—In L. L. L. i. 1, 164, Armado is described as "a refined traveller of S." His name was probably suggested by the Sh. Armada of 1588. Hycke, p. 88, says, "I have been in Fraunce, Irlonde, and in Spayne." In Marlowe's Faustus iii., Faustus says, "I'll join the hills that bind the Afric shore And make that country continent to S." In Grim ii. 1, Belphegor claims to be "a Sd. born, No baser than the best blood of Castile." In Chapman's Blind Beggar ii., Bragadino affirms: "I am Signor Bragadino, the martial Spaniard." In Webster's Wyat xi., Brett suggests an absurd derivation for Sd., which incidentally shows that the word was pronounced as a dissyllable, Span-yard: "A Sd. is called so because he's a Span-yard—his yard is but a span."

Historical References.—In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Hercules says, "The 3-headed Gerion sways in S." Hercules was reported to have visited S., where he killed the giant Geryon and erected the so-called Pillars of Hercules on either side of the Straits of Gibraltar, or, according to another account, in the neighbourhood of Cadiz (see under CALES). In Nero v. 1, Tigellinus reports that news has come that "S.'s revolted, Portingale hath joined." This was at the end of Nero's reign, when the legions of Gaul and S. acclaimed Galba as Emperor. In J. C. i. 2, 119, Cassius says of Caesar: "He had a fever when he was in S." Caesar was in S. as Quæstor in 68 B.C., and as Prætor in 60. Plutarch tells us that the falling sickness first took him "in Corduba, a city of S." In Davenant's Distresses ii., Androlio says, "Such scratching for females was ne'er heard of since first the hot Moors did overcome S." In Dist. Emp. i. 1, Reynaldo says, "I am come from Orlando, who in Spayne Hath with his own fame mixed your happiness By a blest victory." In Bale's Johan 1297, the K. says that the Pope had bound his predecessor, Henry II, "3 year after to maintain battle free Against the Sarazens which vexed the Spanyards sore." This was not exactly the case; the Pope excused Henry from going to the Holy Land on a crusade, if he should be fighting the Saracens in S. The Lady Blanch, in K. J., was the daughter of Alphonso VIII of S. and Eleanor, daughter of Henry II of England, and married the Dauphin of France, afterwards Louis VIII. Elinor, Q. of Edward I, appears in Peele's play as "the K. of S.'s daughter"; her father was Ferdinand III of Castile. Peele, in her person, satirises the pride and cruelty of the Sds. In H6 C. iii. 3, 82, Oxford affirms: "great John of Gaunt . . . did subdue the greatest part of S." This is a gross exaggeration; John of Gaunt, after the death of his Duchess, Blanch (celebrated by Chaucer), married the daughter of Pedro the Cruel and assumed the title of K. of Castile, but the throne was in the possession of Henry of Trastamara, and John of Gaunt's expedition, undertaken in 1388 to dispossess him, was a dismal failure. In H8 ii. 4, 47, allusion is made to Ferdinand of S., the father of Catherine of Aragon. This was Ferdinand II, who, by his marriage with Isabella of Castile, united the 2 kingdoms. In Devonshire v. 1, Henrico enumerates: "the K. of S.'s 7 kingdoms, Galicia, Navarre, the 2 Castiles, Leon, Arragon, Valentia, Granada, and Portugal to make up 8." In Jonson's Staple, the Infanta of S., with whom James I had tried to arrange a marriage with Prince Charles without success, is caricatured in the Princess Pecunia, daughter of the K. of Ophir, and princess of the mines of South America and Hungary. Jonson, in Underwoods lxxv. 36, asks, "What is't to me . . . whether the match from S. was ever meant?"

No event in our history has stimulated the national and religious consciousness of the people so much as the defeat of the invincible Armada of Philip II in 1588. It was a God-given triumph both for political independence and for the Protestant faith, and dates were long afterwards reckoned from '88. Philip and his Sds. were regarded with bitter hatred. In Greene's Orlando v. 1, Brandemart says, "What I dare, let say the Portingale And Sd. tall, who manned with mighty fleets Came to subdue my islands to their K., Filling our seas with stately argosies . . . Which Brandemart rebated from his coast And sent them home ballast with little wealth." Nash, in Lenten (Harl. Misc. vi. 149), says, "They were nothing behind in number with the invincible S. armada, though they were not such Gargantuan boisterous gulliguts as they." In Jonson's Prince Henry's Barriers, Mercury tells of the action "here of '88 against the proud Armada, styled by Spain the INVINCIBLE." In his Alchemist iv. 2, Dame Pliant says, "Truly I shall never brook a Sd.; Never since '88 could I abide them." In his New Inn iv. 2, Huffle says, "So you will name no Sd., I will pledge you"; and later he exclaims: "Sds. ! Pilchers !" and says, "I have heard the Sh. name Is terrible to children in some countries, And used to make them eat their bread-and-butter Or take their wormseed." In Devonshire i. 2, two merchants discuss the origin of the hatred of S. towards England, and derive it from religious motives: "When England threw off the yoke of Rome, S. sprang from her," and the Armada followed; and then Drake, "That glory of his country, and S.'s terror, Harried the Indies." "The Sh. Inquisition," says one of them in reference to the Armada, "was aboard every ship with whips strung with wire and knives to cut our throats." In Three Lords, Dods., vi. 451, Policy says, "Myself will muster upon Mile-End-Green That John the Sd. will in rage run mad," Later, Pompo says, "Honour in England, not in S., doth grow"; and Fraud says, "The Sds. are coming with great power." In Shirley's Fair One iv. 2, Treedle says, "We can have drums in the country and the train-band, and then let the Sds. come an they dare." In B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, a ballad is referred to, entitled "The landing of the Sds. at Bow, with the bloody battle of Mile-End." In Histrio v. 234, Perpetuana cries, "O sweet heart, the Sds. are come! We shall all be killed, they say!" The author of Tarlton's Jests relates: "Tarlton, being asked what countryman the devil was, quoth Tarlton: A Sd.; for Sds., like the devil, trouble the whole world." In the Introduction to Jonson's Barthol., the Stage-keeper laments the absence from the play of "a juggler with a well-educated ape, to come over the chain for the K. of England, and back again for the Prince, and sit still on his arse for the Pope and the K. of S." In Webster's Wyat, the hatred in England of S. and of the marriage of Mary with Philip of S., is strongly expressed. In ix., Wyat says, "Philip is a Sd., a proud nation, Whom naturally our countrymen abhor."

S., indeed, is used as a synonym for Hell. In Fulwell's Like, Haz. iii. 357, Newfangle, carried off on the Devil's back, says, "Farewell, for now must I make a journey into S." In Horestes D. 3, the Vice says to Fame, "Whither dost thou think for to go? to Purgatory or Spayne?" The Sh. Inquisition was the object of special detestation. In Cromwell iii. 3, Hales says, "Pride, the Inquisition, and this belly-evil [i.e. meagre diet] Are in my judgment S.'s three-headed devil." In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 237, Navarre says, "S. is the Council-chamber of the Pope, S. is the place where he makes peace or war." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iii. 1, Raphael says, "I will shun this place more than I would the Sh. Inquisition." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says that the Masquers "had a drum, the head of it being covered with the skins of 2 flayed Sh. Inquisitors." In Larum B. 2, one of the citizens of Antwerp says that D'Alva was "worse than the Sh. Inquisition." Burton, A. M. Intro., speaks of "that 4th Fury, the Sh. Inquisition."

Spain and the Netherlands. In Davenant's Wits v. 3, Twack tells of an ape "led captive by the Hollanders, because he came aloft for S. and would not for the States." Apes were trained to climb up a pole or jump over their chain on the mention of a country or religion which the audience would be likely to favour, but to pay no attention to the name of any other. Similarly, in Shirley's Bird iv. 1, Bonamico tells of the "horse that snorts at S. by an instinct of nature." In Underwit v. 3, Engine says, "My story would draw more audience than the motion of Ninivie, or the horse that snorts at S." In Shirley's Constant iii. 1, Clement says, "If the K. of S. had but that politic head, I know who might go fish for the Low Countries." In Larum, the story of the Sh. Fury after the capture of Antwerp in 1576 is graphically told.

Spain and The Indies.—In Err. iii. 2, 131, Dromio felt S. "hot in the breath" of his kitchen-maid; and he locates the Indies in her nose "all o'er embellished with rubies, carbuncles, sapphires, declining their rich aspect to the hot breath of S.; who sent whole armadoes of carracks to be ballast at her nose." In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Subtle promises Ananias so much gold that he shall be of power "to buy S. out of his Indies." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. 1. 2, Callapine talks of bringing "armadoes from the coasts of S. Fraughted with gold of rich America." In Middleton's Blurt iv. 2, Lazarillo says, "The Sh. fleet is bringing gold enough to discharge all, from the Indies." In Devonshire i. 2, an English merchant says, "Did not Spayne fetch gold from the W. Indies for us?" In Brome's Ct. Beggar i. 1, Gabriel speaks of "treasure of a deeper value than all the Hollanders have waited for these 7 years out of the Sh. plate-fleet," i.e. the fleet which annually brought the tribute from America to S. In B. & F. Cure iii. 2, Piorato speaks of Malroda, his mistress, as "the most wealthy mine of S." sc. in America.

Spain was the wealthiest and most powerful nation in Europe; hence "to call a man K. of S." was to pay him the highest possible compliment. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 3, when the Lord Mayor says to Eyre, "I hope ere noon to call you sheriff," Eyre replies, "I would not care, my lord, if you might call me K. of S." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Puntarvolo says, "Open no door; if the Adelantado of S. [i.e. the K.'s Deputy] were here, he should not enter." In Jeronimo ii. 1, Balthezar says, "For all S.'s wealth I'd not grasp hands." In Brome's Northern iii. 2, a song runs, "Nay, would my Philip come again, I would not change my state For his great namesake's wealth of S.," i.e. Philip II. The Sh. soldiers were supposed to be the best in the world. In Jonson's New Inn iii. 1, Tipto speaks of the "Sh. militia" as the finest soldiers. The Sh. privateers did much mischief to English merchants. In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pisaro, hearing of the capture of 3 English vessels by 2 Sh. galleys, exclaims: "A plague upon these Sh. galley pirates!"

The Patron Saint of S. was James, the brother of John, who was put to death by Herod. His body was said to have been miraculously transported to Santiago in Galicia, and was preserved in the cathedral there, which became a great centre for pilgrimages. In Kirke's Champions i. 1, James says, "James stands for S." In Lust's Dominion iv. 1, Philip cries, "St. Jaques for the right of S.!" In Kirke's Champions iv. 1, James says, "S. gave me birth, the Golden Fleece mine arms"—which is doubly absurd, for James was a Jew of Palestine, and the order of the Golden Fleece was instituted by Philip the Good of Burgundy in 1430.

National Character. Heylyn (s.v. SPAIN) says of the Sh.: "They are much given to women, impudent braggarts, and extremely proud in the lowest ebb of fortune. Indeed their gait is (gennet-wise) very stately and majestic. But, not to conceal their virtues and make ourselves merry only at their follies, they are questionless a people very grave in their carriages, and in offices of piety very devout; to their K. very obedient; and of their civil duties to their betters not unmindful. But that in them which deserveth the greatest commendations is an unmoved patience in suffering adversities, accompanied with a settled resolution to overcome them. It is said that the French are wiser than they seem, and the Sds. seem wiser than they are. In matters of war the Sds. are too slow and dull, losing many fair occasions by delays. The women are sober, loving their husbands or friends, wonderful delicate, curious in painting or perfuming. . . . Their fare is for the most part on sallies and fruits of the earth." In Jonson's New Inn iv. 2, Tipto gives the recipe for a

Sd. thus: "Valour 2 ounces; prudence half a dram; justice a pennyweight; religion 3 scruples; and of gravidad a face-full." His gravity, he goes on to say, "breeds respect to him from savages and reputation from all the sons of men." In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bilioso says, "Your Lordship shall ever find amongst an hundred Sds. threescore braggarts." Hall, in Characters (1608), p. 139, says that the Vain-glorious man is "a Sh. souldier on an Italian Theater; a bladder full of wind, a skin full of words; a foole's wonder, and a wise man's foole." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 1, Fernando says, "In S. you lose experience; 'tis a climate Too hot to nourish arts; the nation proud And in their pride unsociable; the Court More pliable to glorify itself Than do a stranger grace." In B. & F. Philaster i. 1, Cleremont says, "This speech calls him Sd., being nothing but a large inventory of his own commendations." In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, K. Henri speaks of "The any-way encroaching pride of S." In Kyd's Soliman, "the fiery Sd." is one of the competitors in the tournament in act i. In Brewer's Lingua i. 1, Lingua speaks of "the braving Sh." In Gascoigne's Government iii. 6, the Chorus says, "A Sh. trick it hath been counted oft To seem a thing, yet not to wish to be." Nash, in Pierce B. 4, says, "Properly pride is the disease of the Sd., who is born a braggart." In Tiberius 683, Sejanus says that the man who would climb must be all things to all men; "Drink with the Germaine, with the Sd. brave," i.e. brag. In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Wittipol says, "You must furnish me with compliments in the manner of S., my coach, my grandduennas." In his Epicoene ii. 1, Morose bids his man answer him by gestures and shrugs: "Your Italian and Sd. are wise in these, and it is a frugal and comely gravity." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, Littleworth says, "Your cloak's too long, and doth smell too much of Sh. gravity." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 1, Calippo says of the French: "Their free breeding knows not the Sh. and Italian preciseness practised among us." In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Lazarillo says, "We are all signors here in S., from the jakes-farmer to the grandee." In Glapthorne's Wallenstein ii. 2, Newman says, "You must not accost her in the Sh. garb, as if you had been new eating of a radish, and meant to swallow her as mutton to't." In his Privilege ii. 1, Bonivet says, "Your Sd. is of a stolid, serious, and haughty garb; acts all his words with shrugs and gestures; is of diet sparing." In Shirley's Courtier iv. 2, Volterre says, "The Sd. reserves all passion; when in discourse his toothpick is still his parenthesis." In B. & F. Pilgrim ii. 2, Pedro says to Roderigo, "Thou shamest the Sh. honour." In Middleton's Gipsy i. 1, Roderigo says, "It's as rare to see a Sd. a drunkard as a German sober." In B. & F. French Law i. 1, Cleremont, speaking of duels, says, "In all The fair dominions of the Sh. K. They are never heard of." In Per. iv. 2, 101, Sout says, "There was a Sd.'s mouth so watered, that he went to bed to her very description." In Cromwell iii. 3, Cromwell says, "Lust dwells in France, in Italie, and S." In B. & F. Cure i. 2, Bobadilla, having seduced a girl, says, "I but taught her a Sh. trick, in charity." In Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, Mrs. Mixum says, "Your Sd. is too hasty, he will not give a woman time to say her prayers after she is in bed."

Spanish Women.—In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 2, Subtle says, "It is the Sh. fashion for the women To make first court." In May's Old Couple iii. 1, Euphues says, "I see thou mean'st . . . to bring back The ancient Sh. custom, where the women Inherited the land, ruled the estates; The men were given in marriage to the women With portions, and had jointures made to them." In Massinger's New Way v. 1, Lovell says, "I grant, were I a Sd., to marry a widow might disparage me." In Davenant's Distresses i. 1, Leonte says, "Our Sh. custom warrants ladies in music to admit their lovers' evening and morning plaints." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 5, Calippo talks of "the stately dame of S." In B. & F. Rule a Wife Prol. we have: "Ladies, be not angry if you see A young fresh beauty, wanton, and too free, Seek to abuse her husband; still, 'tis S." In Middleton's Blurt i. 2, Lazarillo says, "Your monkey is your only beast to your Sh. lady."

The Diet of the Sds. was largely made up of salads and fruits, and was despised by the English as being meagre. In Mayne's Match iii. 3, Plotwell says, "We Did keep strict diet, had our Sh. fare, 4 olives among 3." In Cromwell iii. 3, Hales says, "We English are of more freer souls Than hunger-starved and ill-complexioned Sds. They that are rich in S. spare belly-food, To deck their backs with an Italian hood And silks of Civill." In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, Antonio says, "We Sds. are no great feeders." In Ford's Trial iii. 1, Banatzi begs for "Sh. salads—poignant!" In Dekker's Westward iii. 4, Mrs. Honeysuckle describes the fare in the Counter as "a Sh. dinner—a pilcher; and a Dutch supper—butter and onions." In Middleton's Blurt i. 2, a song runs: "What meat eats the Sd.? Dried pilchers and poor-John." In Brome's Northern v. 8, Bulfinch says of the Sds.: "They are a people of very spare diet, and therefore seldom fat." Donne, in Supping Hours, speaks of the diet of Nebuchadnezzar, when he became a beast, as "A salad worse than Sh. dieting." In Lyly's Midas, the Prologue says, "Enquire at Ordinaries; there must be salads for the Italian; picktooths for the Sd." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iii. 3, Bots says, "We have meats of all sorts; that which is rotten-roasted for Don Spaniard." Nash, in Wilton K. 1, says, "In S. they have better bread than any we have." In Davenport's New Trick iii. 1, Friar John says, "The best wheat's in S."

National Dances.—In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 2, Face says, "Your Sh. pavin Is the best dance." The Pavin, or Pavan, was a stately dance in duple time, possibly derived from the Lat. pavo, a peacock. In Dekker's Fortunatus iii. 1, Cyprus asks the Insultado to dance; "I have heard the Sh. dance is full of state"; to which the Sd. replies: "Verdad, Senor; la danza espaniola es muy alta, majestica, y para monarcas; vuestra Inglesa, baja, fantastica, y muy humilde." When he has finished his dance, Agrypine says, "The Sd.'s dance is, as his deeds be, full of pride." In Middleton's Blurt iv. 2, Lazarillo dances the "Sh. pavin." In Devonshire i. 2, an English merchant says of S.: "She played the Sh. pavins Under our windows, we in our beds lay laughing." Dekker, in News from Hell, says the Devil "shall now for my pleasure tickle up the Sh. pavin."

Personal Appearance, Dress, &c.—In L. L. L. i. 1, 174, the K. refers to "tawny S." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Subtle says of the disguised Surly: "He does look too fat to be a Sd."; and goes on to speak of his "scurvy, yellow Madrid face." In Barnes' Charter iv. 3, Lucretia says, "Oft have I wished the colour of this hair More bright and not of such a Sh. dye." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico commends "the Sd. for a little foot." In Greene's Quip, p. 230, the barber asks: "Will you have your worship's hair cut like a Sd., long at the ears, and curled like to the 2 ends of an old cast periwig?" In Webster's White Devil ii. 4, Flamineo says of the Sh. ambassador: "He carries his face in's ruff, as I have seen a serving man carry glasses in a cypress hatband, monstrous steady, for fear of breaking; he looks like the claw of a blackbird, first salted and then broiled in a candle." Nash, in Wilton K. 1, says: "From Spain what bringeth our traveller? A full-crowned hat of the fashion of an old deep porringer, a diminutive Alderman's ruff with short strings, a close-bellied doublet coming down with a peak behind as far as the crupper, and cut off before by the breastbone like a partlet or neckercher, a wide pair of gascoynes which ungathered would make a couple of women's riding kirtles, huge hangers that have half a cowhide in them, a rapier that is lineally descended from half a dozen Dukes at the least. He hath in either shoe as much taffeta for his tyings as would serve for an ancient," i.e. an ensign or flag. In T. Heywood's Lucrèce iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The Sd.'s constant to his block," i.e. the shape of his hat. In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Lazarillo asks: "Are you not a Portuguese born, though now your blockhead be covered with the Sh. block, and your lashed shoulders with a velvet pee?" In their Friends i. 1, Marius says that he has not spent 5 years in travelling "to bring home a Sh. block Or a French compliment." In Peele's Jests we are told how someone found George "in a Sh. platter-fashioned hat." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 5, Phantastes describes the "fantastical gull" as wearing "a Sh. felt." In Trag. Richd. II ii. 3, 91, Richd. and his favourites are described as wearing "French hose, Italian cloaks, and Sh. hats." Rabelais, in Gargantua prol. says, "There are of those who wear Sh. caps who have but little of the valour of Sds. in them."

In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Surly, disguised as a Sd., wears "a deep ruff" and "a short cloak." In iv. 2, Face says, "Your Sh. stoup is the best garb; your Sh. beard is the best cut; your Sh. ruffs are the best wear." In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, Luke taunts the ladies with their "Hungerford bands And Sh. quellio ruffs," i.e. ruffs for the neck. In Shirley's Love Maze v. 5, Thorney describes his master as "in a Sh. ruff and long French stockings." In Brome's City Wit iv. 1, Crasy speaks of "your tiffany dress, Sh. ruff, and silver bodkin." In Band, Ruffe, Band says to Ruffe, "There's ne'er a Sh. ruff of you all can do it." In Shirley's Fair One ii. 1, the Tutor says, "Are not Italian heads, Sh. shoulders, Dutch bellies, and French legs the only notions of your reformed English gentleman?" In B. & F. Captain iii. 3, Frank describes the old footman "in his old velvet trunks and his sliced Sh. jerkin, like Don John." In T. Heywood's Lucrèce iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The Sd. loves his ancient slop," i.e. breeches. In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 4, Ananias says of Sh. slops: "They are profane, lewd, superstitious, and idolatrous breeches"—all this because S. was a Roman Catholic country. In Marmion's Companion i. 4, when the Tailor says to Careless, "You'll have your suit of the Sh. fashion?" he replies, "What, with 2 wallets behind me? No, by this air!" Dekker, in Hornbook i., says that in the Golden Age "there was neither the Sh. slop nor the skipper's galligaskin." In his Northward iii. 1, Doll says, "St. Anthony's fire light in your Sh. slops!" In T. Heywood's Challenge iii., Manhurst speaks of "a Sh. slop, good easy wear, but they are loose and somewhat too open below." In Ado iii. 2, 33, Don Pedro describes Benedick as "a Sd. from the hip upward, no doublet." Probably he means that he wore a Sh. cloak, often used as a disguise, which would cover his doublet. In Peele's Ed. I i., Elinor says, "I mean to send for tailors into S. That shall confer on some fantastic suits." In Middleton's Blurt ii. 2, Curvetto speaks of "a dapper cloak with Sh.-buttoned cape." In Devonshire v. 1, Pike says, "There's a Sh. shirt, richly laced and seamed." Carey, in Present State of England (1627), denounces "the Sh. shoes with glittering roses." In B. & F. Prize i. 4, Livia says to Rowland, "If I want Sh. gloves It may be I shall grace you to accept them." In Chapman's Consp. Byron i. 1, the Archduke of Austria is reported to have presented every gentleman in the embassy with "a pair of Sh. gloves." In Brief Concept of English Policy (1581), it is said: "There is no man that can be contented now with any other gloves than be made in France or in Spayne."

The leather of Cordova was celebrated from the time of the Moors, and was used for shoes, gloves, wallets, etc. Hence comes our word "cordwainer" for a shoemaker. In H4 A ii. 4, 80, Prince Hal describes the Host of the Boar's Head as "This leathern-jerkin, crystal-button, nodd-pated, agate-ring, puke-stocking, caddis-garter, smooth-tongue, Sh.-pouch"; which probably means that he carried at his girdle a pouch of Sh. leather. In B. & F. Shepherdess i. 1, the shepherd boy puts on "His hanging scrip of finest Cordovan." In Jonson's Devil iv. 1, Wittipol talks of "Sh. pumps of perfumed leather." In his Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Fastidius Brisk has a pair of boots "being Sh. leather, not subject to tear." In Massinger's Madam i. 1, Lady Frugal has given orders for some shoes, to be made "of the Sh. perfumed skin." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A i. 2, Fustigo says, "We Milaners love to strut upon Sh. leather." In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 2, Marina speaks of one of her suitors as "That base Italian, That Sh.-leather spruce companion," i.e. wearing Sh.-leather shoes. In B. & F. Thomas v. 1, Thomas cries to the blackamoor whom he finds in his bed, "Plague o' your Sh.-leather hide!" meaning that it is tawny. In Stucley 321, Stucley says "I will draw you on a weasel as a squirrel's skin will draw on a Sh. shoe." Gascoigne, in Steel Glass 374, denounces "Our knit silk socks and Sh.-leather shoes" as marks of luxury. In Cooke's Good Wife iii. 3, Fuller says, "My Sh. shoe was cut too broad at toe." In Webster's Wyat, p. 46, Brett says, "Wear your own neat's-leather shoes; scorn Sh. leather; cry A fig for the Sd.!" In Marston's Courtizen i. 1, Malheureux says, "Do not suffer thy sorrowful nose to drop on thy Sh.-leather jerkin." In Greene's James IV iv. 3, Slipper says, "My mother was a Sd., and being well tanned and dressed by a good fellow, an Englishman, is grown to some wealth; as when I have my upper parts clad in her husband's costly Sh. leather, I may be told to kiss the fairest lady's foot in this country." In Middleton's Blurt i. 2, Pilcher says, "I am follower to that Sh.-leather gentleman," i.e. Lazarillo. In iii. 3, when Lazarillo talks Sh., Imperia says, "Nay, 'tis Greek to me; I never had remnant of his Sh.-leather learning." In Dekker's Match me ii., Bilbo says, "There's not any Deigo that treads upon Sh. leather goes more upright." In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Meercraft has a plan "for medicining the leather to a height of improved ware, like your borachio of S." The borachio was a wine-skin made of goat's leather. Greene, in Quip, p. 219, speaks of "a costly pair of velvet breeches whose panes was drawn out with the best Sh. satin." In Ital. Gent. i. 3, one of the ingredients of Medusa's love-charm is "cinders of fine Sh. silk."

The Sh. ladies made great use of perfumes, fucuses, and face-washes. In Jonson's Staple i. 1, Fashioner the Tailor scents his suits with "Right Sh. perfume, the Lady Estifania's." In his Devil iv. 1, Wittipol says that the Sh. fucuses are infinite; and spends 20 lines in enumerating their varieties; but above all, he says, "is the water of the white hen of the Lady Estifania's," for which he proceeds to give the recipe. In his Underwoods iii. 12, he tells of a lady who never "got Sh. receipt to make her teeth to rot." In his Alchemist iv. 2, Face says, "Your Sh. titillation in a glove [is] The best perfume." In his Cynthia v. 2, the Perfumer says, "The gloves are right, Sir; they shall still retain their first scent, true Sh." In Shirley's Hyde Park iv. 3, Mrs. Carol says of a pair of gloves: "I'll have 'em Sh. scent." In Goosecap ii. 1, Tales promises "He will perfume your gloves most delicately and give them the right Sh. titillation." In Jonson's Devil iv. 1, Wittipol talks of "your pivetti, Sh. coal, to burn and sweeten a room." It was a kind of perfume used for fumigation. In Ado i. 3, 62, Borachio, whose name is Sh., tells how he overheard the Prince's conversation, "Being entertained for a perfumer, as I was smoking a musty room."

The Sh. language is one of the Romance group, and was derived from the Latin. One of the Knights in Per. ii. 2, 27, bears on his shield the motto thus, in Sh., "Piu por dulzura que por fuerza," i.e. more by gentleness than by force; but piu is not Sh., but Italian: the Sh. would be mas. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. ii. 2, the Clown says he will conjure in Sh.: "That roars best and will appear more dreadful." In Shirley's Courtier ii. 2, Volterre says, "Yo sol el vestro servidor"; Depazzi asks: "What's this?" and Giotto answers: "Between Goth and Vandal Sh."

Trade and Manufactures.—The Pistolet was the Sh. écu or crown, and was worth about 6/- . In Lust's Dominion iv. 5, Philip says, "I will load thee with Sh. pistolets." Gold was found in the sands of the Tagus in ancient times; hence, in Tiberius 149, Asinius offers to Tiberius "gold of S." Sh. steel was the best in the world, and was used for the manufacture of needles, pikes, and swords. The swords of Toledo were famous during the 16th and 17th cents., and the manufacture of them is still carried on there. In Jonson's New Inn iii. 1, Tipto says that hinges will crack "though they be Sh. iron"; in i. 1, the Host talks of dissecting a cheese-mite "with a neat Sh. needle." Greene, in Quip, p. 237, says, "I spied a tailor's morice pike on his breast, a Sh. needle." Later, he says that the tailor formerly "had no other cognizance but a plain Sh. needle with a Welsh cricket [i.e. a louse] on the top." In Lyly's Gallathea iii. 3, Raffe says to the Alchemist, "Did you not promise me That of a Sh. needle you would build A silver steeple?" In Rawlins' Rebellion i., Virmine says, "If virmine slip from the back of a tailor, spit him with a Sh. needle." In Middleton's Blurt ii. 1, Truepenny asks: "Did my mistress prick you with the Sh. needle of her love?" In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "The creature you talk of is a needle, a very Sh. needle." In Nabbes' C. Garden iii. 1, a tailor is called "the knight of the Sh. needle." In Ford's Queen i. 170, Bufo says, "I will shred you both so small that a very botcher shall thread Sh. needles with every fillet of your itchy flesh." In B. & F. Pestle v. 2, Hammerton is armed with "a corselet and a Sh. pike." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 2, Face says, "For your Sh. pike and Sh. blade Let your poor captain speak." In B. & F. Cure i. 2, Bobadilla says, "He shall to the wars, use his Sh. pike." In Goosecap iv. 1, Kingcob says, "From the Sh. pike to the Sh. needle he [Sir Gyles] shall play with any knight in England," i.e. he could both fence and do embroidery! In Devonshire v. 1, Pike speaks of "a glass as deep as a Sh. pike is long." In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Folly says, "He is a French gentleman that trails a Sh. pike: a tailor," where pike is used jestingly for a needle. In Oth. v. 2, 251, Othello says he has "a sword of S., the Isebrook's temper" (see under INNSBRUCK). In Rom. i. 4, 84, Mercutio speaks of "Sh. blades"; though Armado, in L.L.L. i. 2, 183, confesses that "Cupid's butt-shaft is too much odds for a Sd.'s rapier." Parolles, in All's iv. 1, 52, carries "a Sh. sword." In Ford's 'Tis Pity i. 2, Vasques says to Grimaldi, whom he has worsted in a duel, "Spoonmeat is a wholesomer diet than a Sh. blade." In B. & F. Custom ii. 3, Duarte says, "I'll show you now the difference between a Sh. rapier and your pure Pisa." In Shirley's Imposture iii. 2, Bertold says, "He had better eat my Sd. than mention me with any scruple of dishonour." In Day's B. Beggar v., Playnster says, "You have been in S. And well are practised in the desperate fight Of single rapier." Hall, in Sat. iv. 4, tells of one rushing into a quarrel "With a broad Scot or proking-spit of S." In Work for Cutlers, Sword says of Rapier: "Hang him, I defy him, base Sd.!" Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit., p. 140, mentions "the Sh. rapier" as part of the equipment of a fashionable gentleman.

Cottons were first manufactured in Italy after the art had been introduced from the East; the Sh. cottons were of inferior quality. In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 4, Lance speaks of cloth of silver being "Turned into Sh. cottons for a penance." Possibly there is a reference to the cotton robes worn by the victims at the Autos da Fe.

Foods and Natural Products.—Wines were made in S., the most important being the Sherry or Sack from Xeres. The wine from the Canaries, which belonged to S. at this time, was also much esteemed. In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "The Sd. tastes his sherry." In Middleton's Gypsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "Do not our Sh. wines please us? Italian then can, French can." In Grim ii., Castiliano says, "Let's in and hansom our new mansion house With a carousing round of Sh. wine." In Bale's Johan 268, Dissimulation says, "A better drink is not in Portugal or S." In Glapthorne's Hollander iv. 1, Fortress says, "This is legitimate blood of the Sh. grape." In Chamicleers xiii., Welcome complains: "Men had rather be drunk like the Sd. with Canary than with their own native beer." OIL was made from the berries of the olive, which is abundant in S. In Marlowe's Jew i. 1, Barabas talks of "Sh. oils and wines of Greece" as amongst the commodities in which he traded. The MIROBOLAN was a kind of dried plum; the proper spelling is Myrobolan. In Greene's Frier ix. 271, Bacon mentions, amongst other dainties, "Mirobolans of S." Greene, in Discovery of Cozenage (1591), says, "I have eaten Sh. mirobolanes and yet am nothing the more metamorphosed." Lord Bacon says that they are sweet before they are ripe. The ORANGES of Seville were especially esteemed. In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Pug says that to bring a devil from hell into Lond. "had been such a subtlety As to transport fresh oranges into S.;" cf. the phrase "to bring coals to Newcastle." The PELLITORY (Anacyclus Pyrethrum) was imported into S. from Barbary, and was supposed to be good for the toothache. In Lyly's Midas iii. 2, Motte speaks of "some pellitory fetched from S." as a remedy for toothache. In Webster's Law Case iv. 2, Sanitonella says that what she has in her bag is neither "green ginger nor pellitory of S.; yet 'twill stop a hollow tooth better than either of them." The POTATO was introduced into S. from Quito by Cardan about the middle of the 16th cent. It was regarded as a powerful aphrodisiac. Taylor, in Works i. 81, mentions "Sh. potatoes" amongst delicacies affected by ladies; and later says, "Sh. potatoes are accounted dainty" because of their rarity. TOBACCO was brought to S. from America, and thence distributed to other European countries. In Nabbes' Bride iii. 4, the 1st Blade says, "Do you disparage my tobacco? I assure you, Sir, it is right Sh." Earle, in Microcosmog. xxvii., says that a tobacco-seller's shop is "the place only where S. is commended and preferred before England itself." The SPANISH YEW was imported into England for the making of bows. Drayton, in Odes (1606) xii. 73, says, "The English archery Stuck the French horses With Sh. Yew so strong, Arrows a clothyard long."

Various Articles Specified as Spanish.—The CARRACK was a large ship of burden used by the Sds. and Portuguese for their trade to the W. Indies. In Err. iii. 2, 140, Dromio says of his kitchenmaid: "S. . . . sent whole Armadoes of carracks to be ballast at her nose." T. Heywood, in Fortune iv. 1, speaks of "any carrack that does trade for S." In B. & F. Elder B. i. 2, Andrew says that his master's books "would sink a Sh. carrack without other ballast." The CARVEL was a small, light, fast ship of war, peculiar to S. and Portugal. In Dekker's Match me iii. 1, Valasco says, "A pinnace is come to the Court, and our Sh. carvils, the Armada of our great vessels, dare not stir for her." The CAROCHE was a luxurious kind of carriage. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, the Host says, "We shall have 'em come hurrying hither in feather-beds," and explains that he means "in feather-beds that move upon 4 wheels—in Sh. Caroches." SPANISH CRICKET, or MOTHE, was used for a louse. In Wit and Wisdom i. 3, Snatch says, "My hose be full of Sh. crickets." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xiv., Folly, picking a louse from the shoulder of Crafty Conveyance, exclaims: "By the Mass, a Sh. moight [i.e. moth] with a gray list." The FIG of S. is an ejaculation of contempt, derived from the Sh. "dar la higa," i.e. to give the fig; the fig being a gesture made by thrusting the thumb between 2 of the fingers. The phrase is also used to mean a poisoned fig, as in Times Whistle iii. 1151, "Long he shall not so, if Figs of S. their force retain." Pistol uses the expression in H5 iii. 6, 61; and in H4 B. v. 3, 123, he says, "When Pistol lies, do this! [making the gesture described] And fig me like the bragging Sd.!" In Webster's White Devil iv. 1, Flamineo says, "I do now look for a Sh. fig or an Italian salad daily," i.e. he expects to be poisoned. In Essex's Ghost (1624), Essex says of Don John of Aquila: "Either with that or else by a Sh. fig the good Don discontentedly departed this life." In Shirley's Maid's Rev. i. 2, Montenegro says, "I care not a Sh. fig what you count me." Nash, in Wilton I. 4, says, "To see poor English asses, how soberly they swallow Sh. figs!" In Shirley's Ct. Secret iv. 1, Pedro says, "There's spice in your closet; or we have Sh. figs." In Noble Soldier v. 4, after the K. has drunk a poisoned goblet, Malatesta exclaims: "It is speeding, as all our Sh. figs are." The SPANISH FLY, or CANTHARIDES, was often used for poisoning people. In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 179, Saxony says, "Drink not, Prince Palatine! Throw it on the ground! It is not good to trust his Sh. flies." Readers of George Borrow do not need to be told that the GIPSIES are very numerous in S. In Middleton's Gypsy ii. 1, Alvarez says,

"We are no red-ochred rascals umbered with soot and bacon, as the English gipsies are; no, our stile has higher steps to climb over, Sh. gipsies, noble gipsies." The Sh. JENNETS were of Arab strain, and were highly valued. In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 2, Face says, "Your Sh. jennet Is the best horse." In Peele's Ed. I xxv., Gloster orders: "With Sh. steeds, as swift as fleeting wind, Convey these princes to their funeral." In Webster's Malfi i. 1, Roderigo says of Castruccio's Sh. jennet: "He is all fire"; and Ferdinand adds: "I think he was begot by the wind; he runs as if he were ballasted with quicksilver." In B. & F. Valentin ii. 1, Chilar wagers his horse, "the dappled Sd." Dekker, in Hornbook v., advises the would-be gallant to ride to the Ordinary "upon your galloway-nag or your Sh. jennet." In Noble Soldier ii. 1, the old soldier Baltasar calls the courtiers "mere Sh. jennets." In Devonshire ii. 4, Dick says, "My Devonshire worship shall teach your Sh. jennet an English gallop." In Sampson's Vow i. 1, 140, Ursula says, "We must be coupled in wedlock like your Barbary horse and Sh. gennet, for breed's sake." In B. & F. Thierry i. 1, Theodoret compares Brunhalt's lovers to "Sh. jennets." In their Princess i. 1, Piniero speaks of the great pride "we Portugals or the Sds." take "in riding, in managing a great horse." The name for the CULEX MOSQUITO is Sh., and it is often distinguished as the Sh. mosquito. Phillips, in Hakluyt 568, says, "we were also oftentimes greatly annoyed with a kind of fly . . . the Spanyards called them Musketas." In O. B. Repl. Libel (1600) iii. 7, 35, it is said: "He is like a fly, or rather, because he speaketh so much for Sds., a Sh. mosqueta." In Devonshire iv. 1, Buzzano curses "your Sh. flies, the pocky stinging musquitoes."

SPALATO, or SPALATRO. A spt. in Dalmatia on the E. coast of the Adriatic, opposite to Ancona. The palace, built by Dioclesian after his abdication, is still fairly well preserved. The Cathedral was once the Temple of Jupiter. It is the seat of an Archbishopric; and Antonio, Bp. of S., is the Fat Bp. in Middleton's Chess. In iii. 1, he says, "Expect my books against you Printed at Douay, Brussels, or S." In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Thomas reports: "There is a legacy left to the King's Players . . . by the Right Reverend Archbp. of S." The reference is to Middleton's play.

SPARAGUS GARDEN. See ASPARAGUS GARDEN.

SPARTA (Sn. = Spartan), or LACEDÆMON. The capital of the ancient Greek LACONIA, situated on the right bank of the Eurotas, at the foot of Mt. Taygetus, abt. 20 m. from the sea. Apollo, as the leader of the Dorian migration to the Peloponnesus, was regarded with special veneration at S.; and this city was the birthplace of Leda, the swan-mother of Helen. Helen became the wife of Menelaus, the K. of S., and her rape by Paris was the cause of the Trojan war. It was through the legislation of Lycurgus in the 9th cent. B.C. that S. became one of the leading cities of Greece. It was governed by 2 kings and a body of 5 Ephors, who gradually usurped almost all the executive power. The object of Lycurgus was to make the Sns. warriors; to that end their food was coarse and simple, their black broth being famous throughout Greece; the boys were trained to endure hardship and were encouraged to steal, though they were severely punished if they were caught. The story of the boy who let a stolen fox gnaw his vitals rather than let it be discovered that he had stolen it, is well known. The Sn. brevity of speech, or Laconism, was also characteristic; and their women had the reputation of being the most chaste in Greece, though precisely the opposite is alleged of them by Euripides and others. Hunting in the ranges of Taygetus and Parnon was encouraged, and the hounds of Sn. breed were the best in the world. S. took part in the repulse of the Persians in 480 B.C., and the exploit of their K., Leonidas, at Thermopylae is one of the best-known incidents in Greek history. Later, S. became the great rival of Athens, and the war between them filled the Greek world from 431 B.C. until the ascendancy of Philip of Macedon put an end to the internecine quarrels of the Hellenes. S. was taken by Alaric in A.D. 396, and was finally deserted by its inhabitants in the 13th cent., when they migrated to Mistra, 2 m. to the W. Latterly the site has been again occupied by New S. The heir to the throne of Greece holds the title of D. of S.

In Barclay's Lost Lady i. 1, the Physician says, "These noble kingdoms, Thessaly and S., Have still been emulous and jealous." The scene of Ford's Heart is laid at S., but no particular time is indicated, and the play has no historical basis. In iv. 1, Fecnicus exclaims "O S.! O Lacedæmon! double-named, but one in fate!" In B. & F. Mad Lover iv. 4, the K. of Paphos says, "The Sns. are in arms and like to win all." Here again the story is entirely unhistorical. In Per. ii. 2, 18, "a knight of S." appears.

In Lyly's Maid's Meta. iii. 1, Apollo, telling the story of the death of Hyacinthus, says: "Accursed be the time When I from Delphos took my journey down To see the games in noble S. town." Hyacinthus was the son of Amyclas, K. of S., and was accidentally killed by Apollo as he was throwing the discus. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5395, Juno says, "Thebes Afforded an Alcmena; S. nursed A swan-like Leda." Milton, P. L. x. 674, speaks of Castor and Pollux as "the Sn. twins." They were the sons of Tyndareus of S., and were buried there. In Fair Infant 26, he calls young Hyacinth "the pride of Sn. land." In Chettle's Hoffman C. 4, Austria says, "Saxon's proud wanton sons were entertained Like Priam's firebrand [i.e. Paris] at S." In Troil. ii. 2, 183, Hector says, "If Helen then be wife to S.'s K. . . these moral laws Of nature and of nations speak aloud To have her back returned." In Richards' Messalina iii. 1309, Montanus speaks of a beauty: "More delicate than was the Sn. queen," i.e. Helen. Tofte, in Laura (1597) ii. 3, 1, calls Helen "that Sn. lass, The flower of Greece, Dan Paris' costly joy." In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "Lycurgus reduced the Spartans unto civility." In Wilson's Cobler 563, Clio records "The love Lycurgus bore to Sns.' state." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 210, Aristophanes says of Diogenes: "If the Ephori and Kings of S. invited him to their mess, he would for indecency's sake eat their broth without a spoon." In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 1, Albumazar says of theft: "The Sns. held it lawful." In Massinger's Guardian iii. 6, Calipso says, "Like a truebred Sn. boy With silence I endured it." Donne, in Sat. iv. 68, says, "S.'s fashion To teach by painting drunkards, doth not taste now." In Randolph's Muses i. 4, Mime relates: "The Sns. when they strove t'express the loathsomeness Of drunkenness to their children, brought a slave, Some captive Helot, overcharged with wine, Reeling in thus." The Sns. were said to have taught their boys sobriety by exhibiting drunken helots in their presence. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 225, the Londoner says to the Parisian, "Your nation affects not such brevity of speech as was practised by the Sns." In the same play, p. 205, Diogenes says to the Athenians, "You have now heard 'em as forwardly as you used to hear the ambassadors of S., from whom you seldom like anything but their brevity." Sidney, in Astrophel xcii. 3, asks: "Do you cutted Sns. imitate?" Cutted means abbreviated. In Massinger's Milan i. 3, Sforza compares Marcella to "those canonized ladies S. boasts of." In B. & F. Thierry iv. 2, Martell says that in Ordella "All was that Athens, Rome, or warlike S. Have registered for good in their best women." In their Corinth iv. 3, Theonor says, "As for my fear . . . Our mother was a Sn. princess born That never taught me . . . such a word." Herrick, in Vision (1647), says of his mistress: "Her dress Was like a sprightly Spartaness."

In M. N. D. iv. 1, 119, Hippolita says, "I was with Hercules and Cadmus once When in a wood of Crete they bayed the bear With hounds of S.; never did I hear such gallant chiding." Theseus answers: "My hounds are bred out of the Sn. kind, So flewed, so sanded; and their heads are hung With ears that sweep away the morning dew. . . . A cry more tunable Was never holla'd to nor cheered with horn In Crete, in S., nor in Thessaly." In Oth. v. 2, 361, Lodovico addresses Iago: "O Sn. dog, More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sea"; "dog" here being a term of contempt, and "Sn." an equivalent for "unfeeling." In Day's Gulls ii. 2, Darnetas says, "He expects your presence to see the fleshing of a couple of Sn. hounds." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Carlo says, "There's a fellow now, looks like one of the patricians of S.; a good blood-hound, a close-mouthed dog, he follows the scent well." In B. & F. Wild Goose i. 3, Mirabel says, "My dogs must look their names too, and all Sn., Lelaps, Melampus; no more Fox and Bawdy-face!" In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iii. 1, the Clown says, "A pack of the bravest Sn. dogs in the world, if they do but once open, it will make a forest echo as if a ring of bells were in it; admirably flewed and for dewlaps they are as big as vintners' bags." In Jonson's Satyr, the Satyr says, "The dog [was] of S. bred and good As can ring within a wood." In Tiberius 256, Tiberius says, "Never could S. glory of such prey As for to have an Emperor at bay." See also LACONIA, LACEDÆMON.

SPETIA (i.e. SPEZIA). A spt. on the W. coast of Italy, on the gulf of the same name, 50 m. South-E. of Genoa. It has a fine harbour. In Barnes' Charter i. 1, Charles says to Montpansier, "March with your regiments To Pontremols. There shall you find the Swiss With their artillery newly by sea Brought unto Spetia."

SPERCHIUS, more properly SPERCHEIUS. A river in Thessaly, now the Elladha, flowing from Mt. Tymphrestus into the Malian Gulf. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Medea goes to gather simples "By the swift Sperchius stream."

SPITAL. See SPITTLE.

SPITALFIELDS. The fields belonging to the Spittle of S. Mary (see SPITTLE). About 1650 they began to be built over, and in 1685, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, were occupied by French refugees (Huguenots), who were engaged in silk-weaving. It is now a densely populated and poor dist., extending from Bishopsgate to Bethnal Green. There were silk-weavers there as early as 1620, as the first quotation shows. In Middleton's Tennis, the scholar speaks of "Job, a venerable silk-weaver, Jehu, a throwster [i.e. a twister of silk fibres] dwelling i' the S." In Armin's Moreclacke D. 1, Tutch says, "The winter nights be short And brickhill beds Does hide our heads As spittell fields report." The clay from the fields was made into bricks, and the warm kilns were used for sleeping-places by tramps. In Day's B. Beggar i., Lady Elinor says, "Walk before me into Spittle-fields."

SPITTLE, or, later, SPITAL (Sl. = Spital). An aphetic form of hospital. It is used generically for any place for the reception of the sick; but it came to mean a lazaret-house for the poorest classes, and specially for those afflicted with various forms of venereal disease. To found such institutions was considered a worthy form of philanthropy. In Nobody 304, the Servant says that Nobody "gives to orphans and for widows builds Alms-houses, Ss., and large Hospitals." Burton, A. M. iii. 1, 3, 1, says, "Put up a supplication to him in the name of . . . an hospital, a s., a prison." Chapman, in Hum. Daysc. 7, speaks of iron and steel as "good s.-founders, enemies to whole skins." In Massinger's Dowry iii. 1, Romont says, "I will rather choose a s. sinner, Carted an age before, though 3 parts rotten." Nash, in Summers G. 2, says, "It is the S.-houses' guise Over the gate to write their founders' names." In Tim. iv. 3, 39, Timon speaks of the wappened widow "whom the s.-house Would cast the gorge at." In H5 v. 1, 86, Pistol laments: "My Nell is dead i' the sl. Of malady of France." In Dekker's Satiro iii. 1, 289, Tucca calls Mrs. Miniver "My Lady ath' Hospital." Specifically it is used for the Hospital of St. Mary, or St. Mary's S., founded in Lond. by Walter Brune and his wife Rosia in 1197. It stood on the N. side of what is now Sl. Square. It was surrendered to the K. at the time of the dissolution of the Monasteries, and then had beds for 180 sick people. The buildings were destroyed, but the churchyard, which occupied Sl. Sq., remained, and the pulpit cross at its N.E. corner, from which the annual S. sermons were preached on Good Friday, and Easter Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. The Lord Mayor and Corporation attended in their robes, and the boys from Christ's Hospital were always brought there. The Cross was destroyed in the Civil Wars, but the sermon was continued, first at St. Bridget's, Fleet St., and then at Christ Ch., Newgate St. The dist. in the neighbourhood of the hospital was called the S., and the name survives in Spitalfields. It had a bad reputation as a haunt of thieves and loose women. In Eastward v. 5, Quicksilver sings, "So shall you thrive by little and little, Scape Tyburn, Compters, and the S." In Davenport's New Trick i. 2, Slightall, wanting a whore, bids Roger go "Search all the Allies, S., or Turnball." Nash, in Pierce, says, "I commend our unclean sisters in Shoreditch, the S., Southwark, Westminster, and Turnbull St. to the protection of your [the devil's] portership." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Knowell says of his son's letter, which is dated from the Windmill: "From the Bordello it might come as well, The S., or Pitchatch."

References to the S. sermons are numerous. Skelton, in Colin Clout 1186, says, "At Saynt Mary Spytell They set not by us a whistle." In More i. 1, Lincoln says, "You know the S. sermons begin the next week; I have drawn a bill of our wrongs and the strangers' insolencies"; and George adds: "Which he means the preachers there shall openly publish in the pulpit." In i. 3, Cholmeley says, "This follows on the doctor's publishing The bill of wrongs in public at the S." Jonson, in Underwoods ix., tells of a poet that "commended the French hood and scarlet gown The Lady Mayoress passed in through the town Unto the S. sermon." In his Magnetic i. 1, Polish says of Placentia: "She would dispute with the Doctors of Divinity at her own table, and the S. preachers." In Cartwright's

Ordinary i. 1, Slicer, anticipating civic honours, says, "I shall sleep one day in my chain and scarlet at St.-sermon." Armin, in Ninnies, says, "On Easter Sunday the ancient custom is that all the children of the hospital [i.e. Christ's Hospital] go before my Lord Mayor to the S. that the world may witness the works of God and man in maintenance of so many poor people." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 270, John says, "Once in a year a man might find you quartered between the Mouth at Bishopsgate and the preaching place in the S." In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, Frisco says, "Your French spirit is up so far already that you brought me this way because you would find a charm for it at the Blue Boar in the S."

SPOLETO. A city in Italy in Umbria, on the Marseggia, a tributary of the Tiber, 61 m. N.E. of Rome. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, the Pope offers to Charles "to render presently the citadels of Terracina, Civita Vecchia, and Spoleto."

SPREAD EAGLE. The sign of a bookseller's shop in St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond. The 2nd quarto of Trail, was "Imprinted by G. Eld for R. Bonian and H. Walley, and are to be sold at the spread Eagle in Pauls Churchyard over against the great N. door. 1609." B. & F. Shepherdess was "Printed at Lond. for R. Bonian and H. Walley, and are to be sold at the spread Eagle over against the great N. door of S. Pauls." Middleton's Five Gallants was "Imprinted at Lond. for Richd. Bonian, dwelling at the sign of the Spread-Eagle right over against the great N. door of St. Pauls ch."

SPRING GARDEN. A garden in Lond., laid out abt. A.D. 1600 between St. James's Park and Whitehall. It was so called from a spring which was set going by the pressure of the foot of the passer-by on a hidden board, and sprinkled plentifully all who were in its neighbourhood. There is a metal tree in the grounds of Chatsworth House which plays a similar trick. In 1629 a bowling green was added to the attractions of the garden, which became a fashionable resort for the ladies and gentlemen of the early Stuart times. After the Restoration the ground was built over, but still retained its old name. The offices of the Admiralty and the London County Council are there. In B. & F. Triumph Death i., Sophocles says, "Sophocles would . . . Like a s.-g., shoot his scornful blood into their eyes, durst come to tread on him." In Alimony iv. 2, Caveare says, "It might be styled the S. G. for variety of all delights." In Shirley's Hyde Park ii. 4, Mrs. Carol bargains: "I'll not be Bound from S.-g. and the 'Sparagus.'" In his Ball iv. 3, Winfield says to the ladies, "I do allow you Hyde Park and S. G." In Brome's M. Beggars ii. 1, Vincent proposes: "Shall we make a fling to Lond. and see how the spring appears there in the S. G.?" In Mayne's Match i. 4, Newcut says that Aurelia has been thrice in the field to answer challenges of wit "in S. G." In Davenant's Wits i. 2, the elder Palatine says, "So live that usurers shall call their monies in, remove their bank to Ordinaries, S.-g., and Hyde Park." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 2, Careless says, "Let's go walk in S.-g." John Milton lodged for a time in 1649 "at one Thomson's, next door to the Bull Head Tavern at Charing Cross, opening into the S. G."

SPRUSE (another form of PRUCE, or PRUSSIA, q.v.). Chaucer, in Death of Blanche 1025, praises the Duchess because "She wolde not . . . send mea into Walakye, To Spreuse and unto Tartarye" in order to prove their devotion to her. In Bale's Johan 182, Sedition says, "The Pope's ambassador am I continually . . . In Pole, Spruse, and Berne." Fuller, Holy War v. 3, 233, says, "The Teutonic order defended S.-land against the Tartarian." Hence it is used of anything obtained from Prussia, as S. beer, S. leather, S. fir, etc. Nash, in Works ii. 221, speaks of "a broker in a s.-leather jerkin." In his Prognostication, he predicts: "Many shall have more S. beer in their bellies than wit in their heads." The land of S. appears to be used, like the land of Cockayne, for a place where all sorts of good things are plentiful. In Chapman's Mid. Temp. 30, Capriccio says, "He shall live in the land of S., milk and honey flowing into his mouth sleeping."

SQUILMAGIANS. An imaginary name for one of the peoples whom Gelasimus intended to visit. In the old Timon v. 1, Gelasimus reads from his guide-book: "From Gurgustidonia to the S. 83, from the S. to the Pigmies 80½ m."

SQUIRELS. Probably the Three Squirrels is meant, a tavern in Southwark, the exact location of which is uncertain (see THREE SQUIRELS). In Brome's Moor iv. 2, Quicksands says he knows his wife's haunts "At Bridge-foot Bear, the Tunnes, the Cats, the Squirels."

STAFFORD. The county town of Staffs., on the Sow, 123 m. N.W. of Lond. In the reign of William the Conqueror, William de S., the ancestor of the famous S. family, took his name from the town, and rebuilt the old castle, 1½ m. South-W. of it, which was destroyed in the Civil War by the Parliament but has recently been rebuilt. S. blue was a kind of blue cloth, made there; a S. knot is the true-love-knot, the badge of the S. family; S. law is club law, with a pun on staff. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i., p. 80, Howard says of the Tanner of Tamworth: "His son lies prisoner in S. jail." Tamworth is in Staffs., 25 m. South-E. of S. In his Captives iii. 2, Ashburne says, "I will lay thee prostrate Beneath these staves and halberts." "Is this law?" asks Mildew; "Yes," answers Godfrey, "S's. law." In Hay and Work (1589) A. 3, we have: "I threatened him with blows and to deal by s. law." In Towneley M.P. iii. 200, we have: "Thou were worthy be clad in S. blue; for thou art away adread."

There is an entirely mythical S. in Middleton's Queenborough. The Lord S. whom Douglas claims to have killed at Shrewsbury in H4 A. v. 3, and who, in H4 B. i. 1, 18, is falsely said to have fled the field, is Edmund de S., the 5th Earl. In H6 B. i. 4, 55, the S. to whom the custody of the Duchess is committed is Sir Humphrey S., who, along with his brother William, was murdered by Cade and his followers, as is implied in H6 B. iv. 3. In H6 C. i. 1, 7, York says, "Lord Clifford and Lord S., all abreast, Charged our main battle's front"; and in line 10 Edward says, "Lord S.'s father, D. of Buckingham, Is either slain or wounded dangerously." This S., D. of Buckingham, is the Buckingham of H6 B.; he was Humphrey, 6th Earl of S., and was created D. of Buckingham in 1444. He was not killed, as Shakespeare here implies, at St. Alban's, but 4 years later, at the battle of Northampton. His son, Sir Humphrey S., was killed at St. Alban's in 1455; he is the Lord S. of H6 C. i. 1, 7. The S. mentioned in H6 C. iv. 1, 130, is Sir Humphrey S. of Southwick, cousin to the 2 brothers who were killed in the Cade Rebellion; he was beheaded in 1469. The Buckingham of R3 was also 7th Earl of S., being the son of the Humphrey killed at St. Alban's. He was beheaded in 1483; but his honours were restored to his son Edward, 8th Earl, in 1486. This Edward is the Buckingham of H8, who was beheaded in 1521. In H8 i. 1, 200, he is correctly described as "The D. of Buckingham, and Earl of Hereford, S., and Northampton."

STAFFORDSHIRE. A county in the midlands of England. The great industries of the "Black Country" and the Potteries are comparatively modern; the county meant for our dramatists merely a rustic and uncultivated part of the English out-land. In H4 B. iii. 2, 20, "Little John Doit of S.," mentioned by Justice Shallow as one of his boon-companions in his law-student days, was probably an acquaintance of Shakespeare's during his early life at Stratford; for Stratford is only 20 m. from the nearest point of S. In Middleton's Trick to Catch ii. 1, the Widow Medler is described as "the rich widow in S." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Inland, a country fellow, says, "All S. cannot show her equal." In Dekker's Northward iii. 2, Squirrel says that a man can get no more hold of a woman's honesty "than of a bull 'noited with soap and baited with a shoal of fiddlers in S." He is thinking of the famous annual bullchase at Tudberry, q.v.

STAGIRA (Se. = Stagerite). A city on the E. coast of the Chalcidic peninsula, on the Sinus Strymonicus in Macedonia. It was the birthplace of Aristotle. Jonson, in Underwoods lxi. 90, speaks of Poetry as having been "lighted by the Stagirite." In Davenant's Platonic ii. 4, Buonatesta speaks of Aristotle as "the learned Stagirite." Cowley, in Motto (1656) 27, says, "Welcome, great Stagirite, and teach me now All I was born to know." In Dekker's Satiro iv. 1, 165, Tucca says to Horace (Jonson), "When the Ses. banished thee into the Ile of Dogs, thou turnedst Bando, and ever since bitest." Ses. is used here punningly for writers for the stage, with a reference to Aristotle as the greatest of dramatic critics. So in Richards' Messalina i. 571, Messalina asks: "What is that Se's name, he that last night in the play Did personate the part of Troylus?"

STAINES. A town in Middlesex, on the N. bank of the Thames, 17 m. W. of Lond. by road. It was a favourite place for a jaunt with the Londoners. Nearly opposite to it, on the South bank of the river, is the strip of land known as Runnymede, where K. John signed Magna Charta in 1215. In H5 ii. 3, 2, the hostess says to Pistol, who is about to start from Lond. to Southampton on his way to France, "Prithee, honey-sweet husband, let me bring thee to S." In Massinger's Madam ii. 1, Luke speaks to young Goldwire of "The raptures of being hurried in a coach To Brentford, S., or Barnet." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Laxton asks Moll to go with him "to Brainford, S., or Ware" for a jaunt together. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift professes to teach a man how to inhale 3 whiffs of tobacco, and then "expose one at Hounslow, a 2nd at S., and a 3rd at Bagshot." In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough boasts that he could have had a whore on his way from Cornwall to London at "Maidenhead in Berkshire; and did I come in by Maidenhead to go out by S.?" The puns are too obvious to need explanation. In Davenport's Matilda ii. 4, Fitzwater relates how John signed the Charter "in a field called Running-mead 'Twixt S. and Windsor." Raleigh, in Prerogative of Parl., says, "The K. was forced to grant the charter of Magna Charta at such time as he was environed with an army in the meadows of Staynes."

STAMFORD. A mkt. town in Lincs., on the borders of Rutland, 89 m. N. of Lond., on the Welland. One of the Elinor Crosses was erected here, but was destroyed by the Puritans. There were 3 great fairs for horses and stock held annually in February, Lent, and August. During the reign of Edward III a number of Oxford professors and students migrated to S., and started a rival University there. The K. interfered and broke up the fledgling University in 1335; but it was still regarded with suspicion, and a University Statute, as late as 1425, compelled all teachers in Oxford to swear that they would not lecture or read at S. In H4 B. iii. 2, 43, Shallow asks: "How a good yoke of bullocks at S. Fair?" Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 35, quotes a prophecy, alleged to have been uttered by Merlin, that the Welland "shall see S., though now homely hid, Then shine in learning more than ever did Cambridge or Oxford." Drayton, Polyolb. viii. 61, speaks of K. Bladud as "He from learned Greece that by the liberal arts To S., in this isle, seemed Athens to transfer."

STAMFORD HILL. A hill 4 m. N. of Lond., between Stoke-Newington and Tottenham, on the North Road. It commands a fine view of Lond. Here James I was met by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen on his first public entry into Lond. in May 1603.

STANDARD. A water-conduit in Cheapside, E. of the Cross, opposite the end of Milk St. It was in the form of a pillar with a dome-shaped top; statues adorned its sides, and a figure of Fame, blowing a trumpet, stood on the summit. It was repaired, or rather re-erected, about 1620. It was often used as a place of execution (see also under CHEAPSIDE). In Contention i., Haz., p. 502, Cade says of Lord Saye: "Go take him to the S. in Cheapside and chop off his head." In More iii. 1, a Messenger brings orders that a gibbet "be erected in Cheapside hard by the S." In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 1, Shortyard says, "Sometimes I carry my water all Lond. over, only to deliver it proudly at the S." In his No Wit ii. 1, Weatherwise says, "At S. she sold fish, where [her husband] drew water." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity says, "I will fetch thee a leap from the top of Paul's steeple to the S. in Cheap." In Phillip's Grissil 34, Politick Persuasion tells how, when he was saved from destruction as he fell from the sky, "The Cross in Chepe for joy did play on a bagpipe, and the S. did dance." In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Water-Camlet says there is nothing new in Cheapside "but the S."; and in his Aries he tells how his Lordship "was gracefully conducted toward the new S."

STANGATE. A part of Lambeth, W. of Westminster Bdge., where St. Thomas's Hospital now stands. It was on the old Roman Rd. from Lond. to the Sussex coast, and was infested by highwaymen. It lay just opposite to the Palace of Westminster. The st. at the back of the Hospital still retains the name. Howes, in his Annales, tells of the masquers from the Inner Temple at the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth in 1613 that "they had 3 peaks of ordnance in 3 several spaces upon the shore, viz. when they embarked, as they passed by the Temple, and at Strangate when they arrived at Court"; where Strangate is an obvious misprint for S. Stubbes, in Anat. Abuses, p. 53, speaks of men who "will either sell or mortgage their lands" and then try to recover their fortunes "on Suters Hill and S. hole, with loss of their lives at Tyburne in a rope." Latimer, in his 3rd Sermon to Edward VI., says, "Had they a standing at Shooter's Hill or at Stangate Hole to take a purse?" Hall, Sat. vi. 1, 67, says that the traveller hopes "The vale of Standgate or the Suters Hill, Or W. plain are free from feared ill."

STAPLE INN. An old Inn of Chancery in Lond., connected with Gray's Inn, on the South side of Holborn, opposite the end of Gray's Inn Road. In 1884 it was sold to the Prudential Assurance Society, which has restored its fine timbered front, one of the best remaining examples of the former street architecture of Lond. Milkmaids was "printed by Bernard Alsop for Lawrence Chapman, and are to be sold at his shop in Holborne over against Staple Inne, hard by the Barres. 1620."

STAR. A Lond. tavern sign. There was a S. in Bread St. with an entrance from Cheapside; and another in Coleman St. where Cromwell and the Puritans met in 1648 to arrange for the trial of the K. In T. Heywood's Lucece ii. 5, Valerius, in his list of taverns, sings, "The shepherd to the S." He is thinking of the shepherds and the S. of Bethlehem. In his F. M. Exch. ii. p. 22, Flower says, "He entreats me to meet him at the Starre in Cheapside." In More ii. 1, Harry says that he broke Garret's usher's head "when he played his scholar's prize at the Starre in Bread St." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iv. 1, Matthew, when his authorship of his verses is questioned, says, "Ask Capt. Bobadill; he saw me write them at the S. yonder." In the quarto of 1601, it is "at the Mitre," q.v.

STAR. A Lond. booksellers' sign. Chawnticleers was "printed for Simon Miller at the Star in St. Paul's churchyard. 1659." The Hog hath lost was printed "for Richd. Redmer at the W. door of St. Paul's at the sign of the Star. 1614."

STAR CHAMBER. The ancient Council Chamber of the Royal Palace of Westminster; it stood parallel with the river on the E. side of New Palace Yard. It was probably so called from the golden stars which decorated the ceiling. It was rebuilt by Elizabeth, and over the door was a rose on a star, the initials E.R., and the date 1602. It was pulled down in 1836, and the oak-panelling and chimney-piece were bought by Sir Edward Cust and taken to decorate his dining hall at Leasowe Castle in Cheshire. It is chiefly memorable for the fact that it was used by the King's Council, sitting as a Court of Justice; and the Court itself was consequently called the Court of the S. C. It was first established in the reign of Edward III, and sat in the Chambre de Estodes. In Henry VI's reign we find it spoken of as the King's Council "in camera stellata." It was re-organized by the Act of 3 Henry VII, and revived in 31 Henry VIII. Its constitution and jurisdiction were vague; but as it proceeded without any attention to the usual methods of the Common Law and could inflict any penalty short of death it became a monstrous instrument of tyranny under the first 2 Stuart kings, and was abolished by Parliament in 1641.

Skelton, in Why Come ye not to Court 185, says of Wolsey: "In the C. of Stars All matters there he mars." In M. W. W. i. 1, 2, Shallow threatens "Sir Hugh, persuade me not; I will make a S.-c. matter of it." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Carlo advises Sogliardo, "Now you are a gentleman, never discourse under a nobleman; though you saw him but riding to the S.-c. it's all one." In Wise Men vi. 2, Antonio says, "I fear the S.-c. because she hath witness [of his swindling]." In Brome's Moor i. 2, Nathaniel asks about Quicksands, the money-lender: "Is he then hoisted into the S.-c. for his notorious practices?" In Jonson's Magnetic iii. 4, Compass speaks of "one that hath lost his ears by a just sentence of the S.-c., a right valiant knave, and has an histrionical contempt of what a man fears most."

The reference is to William Prynne, who was sentenced by the S. C. to lose both his ears, pay a heavy fine, and suffer imprisonment for life for the publication in 1632 of his Histrio-matrix; he endured the cutting off of his ears with remarkable fortitude. In his Epig. liv. 2, he says, "Cheveril cries out my verses libels are, And threatens the S. C." Shirley, in C. Maid v. 1, says, "You have conspired to rob, cheat, and undo me; I'll have you all s.-chambered." Dekker, in Belman, speaks of the S.-c. as a haunt of foists and pickpockets. The term is generalized to mean any Court of Justice, especially the Last Judgment. In Day's Parl. Bees xii. prol., we have "Oberon in his S.-C. sits." In Ed. III ii. 2, the Countess says, "When to the great Starre-c. o'er our heads The universal session calls to count This packing evil, we both shall tremble for it." In Tourneur's Atheist v. 1, D'Amville says, "I'll prove thee forger of false assurances; In yon S. C. thou shalt answer it." It is also used for the open air under the starry sky. In Webster's A. and Virginia i. 4, 7, Virginius says, "This 3 months did we never house our heads But in yon great s.-c."

STATE-HOUSE. The Hotel de Ville at Antwerp; a fine building in the Italian style on the W. side of the Grande Place, opposite the Cathedral. It was partially destroyed in the siege of 1576, and rebuilt in 1581. In Larum A. 4, Danila orders his gunner to fire at "the State-house where the Dutch Sit swilling in the pride of their excess."

STATES, or STATES GENERAL. The governing body of the Netherlands, first constituted by Philip the Good in 1464. The word is not used for the United Provinces themselves, as we use United S. for the Republic of America, but for the Council that governed them. In B. & F. Span. Cur. i. 1, Leandro says, "'Tis now in fashion to have your gallants set down in a tavern what defence my lords the S. prepare." In Davenant's Wits v. 3, Thwack tells of an ape which "came aloft for Spain and would not for the S." Various animals were trained to give indication of their masters' political and religious sympathies by mounting a pole or shaking their heads, when the cause they favoured was mentioned. In Scot. Presb. ii. 1, Anarchy says, "How bravely Holland thrives, guided by S., where people rule the people." Hall, in Epp. ii. 2, speculates "whether it were safer for the S. to lay down arms, and be at once still and free."

STEPNEY. Formerly a very extensive parish in the E. end of Lond., including Stratford, Whitechapel, Shadwell, Mile End, Poplar, Spitalfields, Ratcliff, Limehouse, and Bethnal Green. It was thus practically co-extensive with the E. End of Lond., N. of the Thames. The parish ch. was St. Dunstan's, built in the 14th cent. There is a popular tradition that all persons born in English ships at sea belong to this parish; as the old rhyme says, "He who sails on the wide sea Is a parishioner of S." In Look about xxv., Lady Fauconbridge says, "At S. by the summer house There is a tavern which I sometimes use; It is the Hind." In ii., Gloucester says to Richd.: "You'll think of him [Fauconbridge] if you can step Into his bower at S." In Day's B. Beggar i., Playnseys says, "Sir Robert Westford lies at S." Dekker, in Wonderful Year, tells a ghost story about the sexton of S. Possibly the raisin wine called Stepony took its name from S. Blount, in Glossogr. s.v., defines Stipone as "a kind of sweet compound liquor, drunk in some places of Lond. in the summer time."

STEWES. Generically for any house of ill-fame, but used specifically for the collection of such houses on the Bankside in Southwark, known also as the Bordello. Fuller, Church Hist. v. 16, 39, says that the name was derived from certain stewes, or fishponds, which were once there, and that there were 16 houses "distinguished by several signs." Attempts to regulate these infamous places were made from time to time; and in 1545 they were suppressed by statute; but it was soon evaded and became a dead letter. Fuller, in Holy State v. 1, says, "Some conceive that when K. Henry VIII destroyed the public s. in this land, which till his time stood on the Bank's Side in Southwark, next the Bear-Garden, he rather scattered than quenched the fire." In S. Rowley's When you A. 3, Wolsey asks: "Are those proclamations sent For ordering those brothels called the Stewes?" In World Child 180, Folly says, "Over Lond. Bdge. I ran And the straight way to the S. I came." In R2 v. 3, 16, young Prince Hal is reported as saying "he would unto the S. And from the common'st creature pluck a glove And wear it as a favour." In H4 B. i. 2, 60, Falstaff, having got a horse in Smithfield and a servant in Paul's Walk, says, "An I could get me but a wife in the S., I were manned, horsed, and wived." Langland, in Piers A. vii. 65, speaks of "Jacke the jogelour and Jonete of the stuyues." In Towneley M. P. xxx. 350, the author apostrophises: "Ye Janettys of the stewys and lychoures on lofte." Skelton, in Magnificence 1226, says, "Some of them runneth straight to the stuse." See also BANKSIDE, BORDELLO, SOUTHWARK, WINCHESTER HOUSE.

STILLYARD, or STILLIARD. A hall in Lond. where the merchants of the Hanseatic League had their headquarters. They obtained a settlement in Lond. in 1250, and later were granted certain privileges by the City on condition of their keeping Bishopsgate in repair, and helping to defend it when necessary. The feeling against aliens, however, led to attacks upon them in the reign of Henry VIII, and their monopoly was taken away by Edward VI. In 1597 they were expelled from the country; and the Hall then became a favourite resort for the drinking of Rhenish wines. Neats' tongues and other provocatives of thirst could be obtained there. The S. stood in Upper Thames St. on a site now covered by Cannon St. Station. It was a stone building with 3 arches towards the st. In the Hall were Holbein's paintings of Riches and Poverty.

In S. Rowley's When you D. 2, the Constable reports: "There are 2 strangers, merchants of the S., Cruelly slain." In Underwit iii. 3, Engine says, "Oh, the neats' tongues and partargoes that I have eaten at S.!" In iv. 1, there is a song with these lines: "The S.'s Rhenish wine and Divell's white, Who doth not in them sometimes take delight?" In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Bagniofi says, "They transported from Lambethia land [i.e. Lambeth] Fall anchor at the S. tavern." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says to Judith, "Meet him this afternoon at the Rhenish wine house i' th' S." In v. 2, Birdlime wants to speak "with the gentlewomen that drunk with your Worship at the Dutch house of meeting," i.e. the S., where ii. 3 takes place. In Shirley's Ball iv. 2, Rainbow says that Bostock "curses tapsters For failing you at Fish-st. or the S." In his Pleasure v. 1, Bornwell says, "By that time we shall whirl in coaches To the Dutch magazine of sauce, the S., Where deal and backrag and what strange wines else They dare but give a name to in the reckoning Shall flow into our room . . . and drown Westphalias, tongues, and anchovies." In Ford's Queen iii. 1770, Pynto says, "The good man was made drunk at the S. at a beaver of Dutch bread and rhenish wine." Nabbes, in Bride ii. 6, says, "Who would let a cit breathe upon her varnish for the promise of a dry neat's tongue and a pottle of Rhenish at the S.?" Nash, in Pierce F. 1, says, "Men when they are idle and know not what to do, saith one 'Let us go to the S. and drink Rhenish wine.'" In Brome's Moor iv. 2, Quicksands says he saw his wife "at the S. With such a gallant, sousing their dried tongues In Rhenish, Deal, and Backrag." Deloney, in Newberie ii., says, "Rennish wine at this wedding was as plentiful as beer or ale; for the merchants had sent thither 10 tunnes of the best in the S."

STIX, STICKS. See STYX.

STOADE, or STADE. A city in Hanover, 22 m. W. of Hamburg, on the Schwinge, near its junction with the Elbe. The port dues of Hanover used to be collected at the mouth of the Schwinge. The English merchants removed their headquarters from Hamburg to S. towards the end of the 16th cent., through a quarrel with the Hamburg people. Heylyn, writing in 1621, says, "The English house is now at S., being by reason of the wars in these parts removed from Antwerpe." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 1, Pisaro says, "What, shall I have these cloths? For I would ship them straight away for S." In ii. 2, Heigham says to Vandal the Dutchman, "Your best way were to ship yourself for S., and there to barter yourself for a commodity." In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Justiniano says, "I have sold my house; I am going for S. next tide." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Peregrine says, "There was a whale discovered in the river as high as Woolwich, that had waited there for the subversion of the Stode fleet," i.e. in order to sink the fleet that was bound from Lond. for S.

STOA PECILE, or PAINTED COLONNADE. A colonnade in Athens, lying E. of the Pnyx and South of the Areopagus, at the N.W. corner of the Agora. It had 3 walls which were covered with famous paintings. It was here that the philosopher Zeno lectured; and from this his followers derived their name of Stoics. In Milton P. R. iv. 253, the Tempter says to our Lord, as he shows him Athens, "Within the walls then view The schools of ancient sages . . . painted Stoa next." In line 280, he speaks of "the Stoic severe"; and in Comus 707, of "Those budge doctors of the Stoick fur." In Shrew i. 1, 31, Tranio says, "Let's be no Stoics nor no stocks, I pray."

STOCKS, THE, or STOCKS MARKET. A fish and flesh mkt. in Lond., on the site of the present Mansion House, between Walbrook and St. Swithin Lane. It was established in 1282, and Stow, in his Survey 178, says that it took its name from a pair of S. which formerly stood there. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and rebuilt as a fruit market. In 1737 it was removed to Farringdon St., where it was known as Fleet Mkt. Sir Philip Sidney, in Remedy for Love, says of the fragrance emitted by Philoclea and Pamela: "No such-like smell you, if you range To th' S. or Cornhill's square Exchange." Dekker, in Bellman, mentions it as a haunt of pick-pockets. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 282, Tawnie-coat says, "'Tis in this lane; I turned on the right hand, coming from the S." Later in the play Hobson says, "I am old Hobson, a haberdasher, and dwelling by the S."

STOKA. Some dist. is intended in the neighbourhood of the Dniester (Tyras) and Podolia. There is a river

Stokhod flowing N. through the N.W. of Volhynia and the South-W. of Minsk into the Pripiet; and the dist. watered by it would suit the context fairly well. On the other hand, -stok is a not uncommon termination of Slavonic place-names (Bialystok, Vladivostok) which Marlowe may have seized upon. Codemia may conceivably be a perversion of Colomea in Galicia. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Theridamas reports: "By the river Tyras I subdued Stoka, Podolia, and Codemia."

STOLDEN. Apparently some river in Poland or W. Russia is intended; but the topography of this play is almost all fictitious. In Suckling's Brennoralt i., Iphigene says, "Would we were again By Stolden banks in happy solitude."

STONEHENGE. The famous Druidical circle in Wilts., 9 m. N. of Salisbury. It is said by Geoffrey of Monmouth to have been erected by the magic art of Merlin. It was the scene of the massacre of the Britons by Hengist; and Aurelius, one of the last of the British kings, was said to have been buried there. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge i. 120, says, "Upon the plain of Salysbury is the stonege, which is certain great stones, some standing, and some lying overthwart." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 66, tells the story of Hengist's massacre, and says that he who lists "Th' eternal marks of treason may at Stonheng view." In the next stanza he tells how "Aurelius . . . now entombed lies at Stonheng by the heath." Drayton, Polyolb. iii. 43, says that Salisbury Plain "Hath worthily obtained that Stonendge there should stand." A play entitled Stonehenge, by John Speed, was acted at Cambridge in 1636. See also HANGING STONES, SALISBURY PLAIN.

STONY STRATFORD. A town in Bucks., almost at its junction with Bedford and Northants, on the Ouse, 52 m. N.W. of Lond., along Watling St., the next stage northwards from Fenny Stratford. It is abt. 17 m. South of Northampton, and 30 N.W. of St. Alban's. In R3 ii. 4, 2, the Archbp. of York says of the young K. and his train: "Last night, I hear, they lay at Northampton; At S. S. will they be tonight." In True Tragedy, p. 76, Richd. says, "Let us take post horse to S. S., where happily I'll say grace to the Princes' dinner." In Oldcastle v. 3, the scene of which is St. Alban's, the Hostler says, "O, Tom is gone from hence; he's at the Three Horse-leaves at S. S." In the Partian iii. 5, Edmund says, "Why, look you, I should marry a Poticary's daughter, and 'twas told me she lost her maidenhead at S. S.;" where, of course, a pun is intended.

STRACHY. A hitherto unsolved Shakespearian riddle. Nobody has yet discovered the source of the allusion, or the location of the Strachy; it has a Scotch look about it; but the only hope is that some one may come across the story somewhere or other. In Tw. N. ii. 5, 45, Malvolio says, "The lady of the Strachy married the yeoman of the wardrobe."

STRAITS. Generically any narrow passage or water-way between 2 larger bodies of water; but in our period used specifically of the S. of Gibraltar between the South of Spain and N. Africa at the entrance of the Mediterranean. All the commerce of the Levant came through the S., and they were infested with Spanish and Moorish pirates who made attacks on the merchant ships passing through. In Wit Woman 326, Giro says to Ferio, "You were to go to the port about your pinnaces that is lately come in from the Straites." In Wilson's Cobler 100, Sateros says, "The coal-black Moor that revels in the Straights Have I repelled." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 2, Callapine promises his keeper "A thousand galleys I freely give thee, which shall cut the S. And bring armadoes from the coasts of Spain." In Dekker's Match me v. 1, Gazetto says, "Once hence, you may fly to the Straights and then cross o'er to Barbary." In his Lanthorn, he tells of a prostitute trying to inveigle merchants into her house by saying that her husband "put in at the Straytes or at Venice or Scanderoon," i.e. is far away. In T. Heywood's Fortune iii. 3, the Merchant says, "I am now upon a voyage to the S. myself." In W. Rowley's New Wonder iii., Stephen says, "I want some English traffic; my voyage is to the S." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pisaro speaks of the terror the Spanish pirates "Have made the S. 'twixt Spain and Barbary." In B. & F. Subject iii. 4, Theodore asks: "What would ye give now To find the rich Moluccas' to pass the S.?" where perhaps the S. of Malacca are intended. In Thomas iv. 5, Francisco asks the sailors "Whither are ye bound, friends?" and they answer: "Down to the Straights." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Valentine says that wives ruin their husbands "beyond redemption from the Indies, the Straights, or Barbary." In B. & F. Scornful ii. 3, Savil says to his master, who is proposing to sell his lands to get means for his drinking and gambling, "If you'll turn up the S., you may; for you have no calling for drink there but with a cannon; not no scoring but on your ship's sides." In Massinger's Urnat. Com. i. 1, Malefort asks: "Who sunk the Turkish gallies in the straights But Malefort?" Hall, in Heaven upon Earth (1624) 25, says, "Thy goods are embarked; now thou wishest a direct N.-wind to drive thee to the Strayts; and then a W. to run in."

The word is used figuratively for a difficult situation. In Armin's Moreclacke D. 1, Sir William says, "Thou art in the S., Moll; and the pirates' shots will sink thee." The name was applied in current slang to the alleys and courts off the Strand and Fleet St., in Lond.; partly because of their narrowness, but more particularly because they were infested with adventurers of all kinds in quest of money, like the pirates that attacked the merchant-ships in the S. In Jonson's Barthol. ii. 1, Overdo says, "Look into any angle of the town, the Straights or the Bermudas, where the quarreling lesson is read, and how do they entertain the time but with bottle-ale and tobacco?" In his Underwoods xxx., he says, "These men . . . turn pirates here at land, Have their Bermudas and their Straights i' the Strand." It is also applied, with a reference to the S. of Magellan, to a disreputable dist. somewhere near Bunhill Fields, Lond. In B. & F. Friends i. 2, Blacksnout says that he got a wound in the groin "at the siege of Bunnil, passing the straights 'twixt Mayor's Lane and Terra del Fuego, the fiery isle"; where I suggest that Mayor's Lane is a misprint for Magellan.

STRAND. A st. in Lond., running W. from the Griffin which marks the site of Temple Bar to Charing Cross. As the name implies, it was close to the strand or shore of the Thames, and was the means of communication between Lond. and Westminster. In Chancery Rolls (1246) it is mentioned as "Vicus qui vocatur le Stronde." Properly it only extended from Essex St. to Charing Cross, the part between Essex St. and Temple Bar being called Temple Bar Without. It was first paved in 1532, as it had become very dangerous and "full of pits and sloughs." Its condition was not improved by the brooks which ran across it at frequent intervals, draining the fields to the N.; some of them were broad enough to require bridging, 2 of the best-known bds. being Strand Bdge. at the end of Strand Lane, and Ivy Bdge. by Ivy Lane. Immediately W. of Temple Bar was Butchers' Row, named from the butchers' stalls which occupied its Southern side, facing into the S. Next came the ch. of St. Clement Danes, and W. of it again Holywell St. A little further on, opposite Somerset House, was the Maypole, which occupied the site of the old S. Cross. The Ch. of St. Mary-le-S. was built at this point in 1714, to take the place of the old Ch. of the Nativity of our Lady and the Innocents pulled down by Protector Somerset to make room for his palace, Somerset House. The South side of the S. was at first occupied chiefly by the town houses of some of the Bps., whose sacred character made them safer from attack, and who therefore ventured to live outside the walls of the city. As times became more secure, these sites were taken over by various noblemen. Starting from Temple Bar, there were on the South side of the S., in order, Essex House, Arundel House, Somerset House, which was built on the sites of the houses of the Bps. of Chester, Llandaff, and Worcester, the Savoy Palace—used during our period as a hospital and almshouse—with a school and chapel attached; Worcester House, formerly the residence of the Bps. of Carlisle; Salisbury House, built by Robert Cecil, 1st Earl of Salisbury; Durham House, the Inn of the Bps. of Durham, taken possession of by Henry VIII and occupied for a time first by the Princess Elizabeth, and then by Sir Walter Raleigh; on the site of its stables, fronting the S., James I built his New Exchange, or Britain's Bourse; the site of the palace itself is now occupied by the Adelphi. Next came York House, of which the handsome water-gate still remains on the Thames Embankment; it was successively in the possession of the Bps. of Norwich, Brandon, D. of Suffolk, Heath, Archbp. of York, from whom it got its name, and George Villiers, D. of Buckingham. Last came Northumberland House, the palace of the Percys, which survived till 1874. On the N. side, in the time of Elizabeth, were mainly open fields; though Wimbledon House, built by Sir Edward Cecil, was erected about the close of the 16th cent., to the W. of Catherine St.; and next to it was Burleigh, or Cecil House, on the site of which the Exeter Change was built in the reign of William and Mary. During the reign of James I the S. came to be the fashionable residential quarter of Lond., the West End of those days. The N. side was gradually taken up by houses, and shops were also established, chiefly to supply the needs of the fashionable folk of the neighbourhood. There were, however, shops between Temple Bar and St. Clement Danes before this, especially in Butcher's Row, which appears to date from the reign of Edward I. Sylvester, in his translation of Du Bartas' Divine Weeks and Works (1590) iii. 2, 2, says, "Here to the Thames-ward, all along the S., The stately houses of the nobles stand."

In H8 v. 4, 55, the porter's man says, "[The woman] cried out Clubs, when I might see from far some 40 truncheoners draw to her succour, which were the hope of the S., where she was quartered." These would be prentices from the shops near Temple Bar. In B. & F. Pestle iv. 5, the citizen's wife suggests that Ralph shall "dance the Morris for the credit of the S." Accordingly Ralph appears dressed as a may-lord and says, "By the common counsel of my fellows in the S. With gilded staff and crossed scarf the Maylord here I stand." Pasquil's Palinodia (1619) says, "Within the spacious passage of the S. Objected to our sight a summer-brooch Ycleaped a Maypole." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity suggests to Pug, "If thou hadst rather to the S. down to fall 'Gainst the lawyers come dabbled from Westminster Hall." In Underwit iii. 3, Courtwell talks of "marching with the pusses to Westminster In our torn gowns embroidered with S. dirt, To hear the law." In Jonson's Epicoene i. 1, Clermont says of the fop La-Foole: "He has a lodging in the S. for the purpose of inviting his guests aloud out of his window, as they ride by in coaches." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 1, Sir Lionel Rash says, "To-morrow I remove into the S. There for this quarter dwell." In Middleton's Chaste Maid v. 1, Mrs. Allwit says, "Let's let out lodgings then And take a house in the S." In Shirley's Pleasure i. 2, Celestina says, "I live i' the S., whither few ladies come, To live and purchase more than fame. I will Be hospitable then, and spare no cost . . . I'll have My house the Academy of Wits . . . my balcony Shall be the courtier's idol." In Underwit i. 1, Device says, "There's a ball to-night in the S." In Brome's Ct. Beggar i. 1, Charissa upbraids Mendicant for giving up the delights of a country life "for a lodging in the S." In his Northern ii. 5, Pate says, "I will acquaint thee with an old ladies' usher in the S. that shall give thee thy gait, thy postures, and thy language." In his Sparagus iv. 10, Sam says that Mrs. Brittleware has gone "down towards the S. in a new litter with the number one-and-twenty in the breach of it." In Nabbes' Totenham ii. 3, Mrs. Stichall says, "By my S.-honesty, I'll to Totenham Court after my husband." In Middleton's Hubbard, p. 77, the young gallant is advised that "his lodging must be about the S. in any case, being remote from the handicraft of the City."

In Mayne's Match i. 4, Plotwell says to the 2 young Templars, "In these colours you set out the S. and adorn Fleet-st." In Marston's Malcontent Ind., Sinklow says of his feather: "I have worn it up and down the S. and met [the herald] 40 times, and yet he dares not to challenge it." In Stucley 364, we are introduced to "Blunt of the S., the buckler-maker." In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Otter says of his wife: "Both her eye-brows [were made] in the S." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Bellamont says, "There is a new trade come up for cast gentlewomen, of periwig-making; let your wife set up in the S." In Glapthorne's Wit iv. 1, Valentine says, "'Tis a peruke; I saw it at the Frenchman's in the S." In his Gamster v. 1, Hazard says of a frail lady: "Let her make the best on't; set up shop i' the S. or Westminster." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 3, Bloodhound sends his boy to a tallow-chandler's "in the S." to recover a debt; probably he lived in Butchers' Row.

STRAND-BRIDGE. A bidge. that crossed the brook running from St. Clements Well across the S. and down S. Lane, Lond. The landing-place at the foot of the lane was also called S.-bdge.; this is the bidge. intended in the quotation. In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, Lady Bornwell says, "You may take water at S.-bdge."

STRANGATE. See STANGATE.

STRATFORD-AT-BOW. See Bow. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Canby says, "Go take my horse at the Bell at S." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 5, the Lord Mayor says, "Spend these 2 angels in beer at S.-B." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 27, Club says, "Tell them, they come, Instead of pudding pies and S. cakes To make's a banquet here." Kemp, in Nine Days' Wonder, says that he went through S. on his dance to Norwich "to keep a custom that many hold, that Mile End is no walk without a recreation at S.-B. with cream and cakes." In Penn. Parl. 59, it is provided "that you suit yourselves handsomely against goose-feast; and if you meet not a fair lass betwixt St. Paul's and S. that day, we will bestow a new suit of satin upon you."

STRATFORD-BRIDGE. The bidge. over the Lea at S.-at-Bow, from the arches or bows of which the village had its name (see Bow). In Merry Devil i. 4, Fabel says, "I'll make the brined sea to rise at Ware And drown the marshes unto S. Bidge."

STRATFORD-ON-AVON. A town in South Warwicksh., 10 m. South-W. of Warwick, and 95 m. N.W. of Lond. by road, lying on the Avon, which is crossed by a fine stone bidge. of 14 arches built by Sir Hugh Clopton, a native of S., who became Lord Mayor of Lond. in 1492. It was widened in 1844. Here Shakespeare was born, almost certainly in the house still preserved in Henley St. He was christened in the Ch. of the Holy Trinity, April 26th, 1564, and went to the King Edward Grammar School, where Thomas Hunt was master from 1572 to 1577. In 1597 he bought New Place, one of the finest mansions in the town, built by Sir Hugh Clopton. The house has gone, but the site is preserved as a public garden. Here he died on April 23rd, 1616, and was buried in the ch. of the Holy Trinity. The Harvard House and the Guild Chapel remain as they were in his time; and his memory has been perpetuated by the American Memorial Fountain in Rother St. and the fine Memorial Theatre erected in 1877. Digges, in Verses prefixed to the 1st Folio edition of Shakespeare, speaks of the day when "Time dissolves thy S. monument."

STREATHAM. One of the Southern suburbs of Lond., formerly a vill. on the Brighton Rd., South of Wandsworth Common, abt. 6 m. in a direct line from St. Paul's. Nash, in Summers i. 1, speaks of "the finest set of morris-dancers that is between this and Streatham."

STREIGHTS. See STRAITS.

STREMONIA (the STREMON). One of the largest rivers in Macedonia, and at one time its E. boundary. It runs South from Mt. Scornius, and enters the sea near Amphipolis. Philippi lies abt. 40 m. E. of it. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Antony says of Cassius: "Silver Stremonia shall echo the terror of thy dismal flight." The reference is to the battle of Philippi, in which Antony defeated Brutus and Cassius 42 B.C. Spenser, in Ruines of Time 593, extols the swans "Of white Strimonian brood."

STRIGONIUM. The Latin name of Gran, a city in Hungary, 25 m. N.W. of Pesth, on the right bank of the Danube. It is the see of the Primate of Hungary. St. Stephen, 1st K. of Hungary, was born here; and it was long the residence of the Kings. It was often taken by the Turks, and again retaken; but it was not till 1683 that it was finally wrested from them. It was, however, temporarily recovered in 1596, and it is this occasion to which Bobadil refers in Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 1, when he boasts that he was "at the beleaguering of Strigonium where 700 resolute gentlemen lost their lives upon the breach." Sir Thomas Arundel greatly distinguished himself at this siege, and was made a Count of the Empire by Rudolf, and Lord Arundel of Wardour by Elizabeth, in consequence.

STROUD. A town in Gloucestersh., 9 miles South of Gloucester. It was the centre of the W. of England cloth manufacture. In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xii., Fancy says, "Her eyen glent From Tyne to Trent, From Stroude to Kent," i.e. through the whole length and breadth of England.

STURBRIDGE. A field abt. $\frac{1}{4}$ m. square, lying just N. of Cambridge, between it and Chesterton, on the Sture. A great fair was held here annually on Sept. 19th, and continued a fortnight. It was one of the most frequented fairs in England, and during its continuance hackney coaches ran from Lond. day and night to bring the citizens to it. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 258, Hobson asks: "What's the news At bawdy Barnwell and at S. Fair?" In Wise Men ii. 3, Vulcano says, "I can chop Logick as I list; I learnt it at S. Fair." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 6, Phantastes says, "I wonder that you presented us not with the sight of Nineveh, Babylon, London, or some S. Fair monsters." Nineveh and the rest were motions, or puppet shows. In iv. 6, Tactus says, "There is such calling for fardingales, kirtles, busk-points, shoe-ties, etc., that 7 pedlars' shops, nay, all S. fair, will scarce furnish her." In Groundwork of Conny-Catching (1592), we are told of a new trick by which "one got a bag of cheese the last S. Fair." In Dekker's Dead Term, Lond. says, "Many coming thither [i.e. to S. Fair] have taken that place for myself, and have not stuck to call it by the name of Little Lond." In his Northward i. 1, Bellamont says, "I have observed very much with being at S.; it hath afforded me mirth beyond the length of 5 Latin comedies"; and proceeds to give a lively description of it. In B. & F. Prize ii. 6, Pedro declares: "There are more women marching hitherward than e'er turned tail at S.-fair." Earle, in Microcosmog. lxxviii., says that the gull-citizen "bears a pretty kind of foolish love to scholars, and to Cambridge especially for S. fair's sake." Randolph, in Conceited Pedlar (1630), says, "I am a pedlar and I sell my ware This brave Saint Barthol or S. fair." Drayton, Polyolb. xxi. 70, makes Gogmagog promise the nymph Granta "Besides, at S. Fair chill buy thee many a thing."

STYX (Sn. = Stygian). In the Greek mythology, one of the rivers of the Infernal regions. According to Vergil it flowed through a vast marsh, or pool, and encircled Hell 9 times. Disembodied spirits were ferried across by Charon. The oath by the S. was the most binding that could be taken, and could not be broken, even by Zeus himself. There is an actual S. in N.E. Arcadia, which forms the highest waterfall in Greece; it is known now as Mauraneria, and is still regarded with superstitious awe by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Like Dante, the Elizabethans transferred the scenery and rivers of the Greek Hades to the Christian Hell; and the adjective Stygian is used as a synonym for infernal. In Troil. iii. 2, 10, Troilus says, "I stalk about her door, Like a strange soul upon the Sn. banks, Staying for waftage. O, be thou my Charon!" In v. 4, 19, Troilus cries to Diomed: "Fly not! for shouldst thou take the river S., I would swim after." In Tit. i. 1, 88, Titus asks: "Why sufferest thou thy sons, unburied yet, To hover on the dreadful shore of S.?" It was believed that the souls of those whose bodies had not been buried could not secure passage across the S. into Hades. In R3 i. 4, 45, Clarence says, "My soul Passed methought the melancholy flood With that grim ferryman which poets write of." In T. Heywood's Gold. Age v., Homer says, "Pluto's made Emperour commanding Hell Where S. and Lethe flow." In Suckling's Goblins iii., the Thief says of the Poet: "He hath made such a description of S. and the Ferry, and verily thinks he hath passed them." In Wilson's Cobler 620, Charon says to the Cobler, "Come, if thou wilt, over S."; and he replies, "Over stix, ay, and over stones!" Later, in line 677, Charon says that to accommodate the crowds that are coming to Hell "Cocytus, Lethe, Phlegeton, shall all be digged into S." In Jonson's Cynthia i. 1, Cupid says to Mercury, "You have the marshalling of all the ghosts too that pass the Sn. ferry, and I suspect you for a share with the old sculler there." In Lochrine iv. 4, Humber invokes, "You ghastly devils of the ninefold Sticks." In Kirke's Champions iv., Leonides says, "There the Thracian [i.e. Orpheus] sits Hard by the sullen waters of black S., Fingering his lute." In Massinger's Actor iii. 2, Caesar says, "I'll afflict your souls And force them groaning to the Sn. lake." In the old Timon iv. 2, Timon says, "I'll head-long tumble into S. his lake."

Milton, P. L. ii. 577, names as the first of the rivers of Hell "Abhorred S., the flood of deadly hate." In i. 239, Satan and Beelzebub are represented as "glorying to have scaped the Sn. flood"; in ii. 506, the assembly of fallen angels is described as "The Sn. council"; and in 875 they are called "the Sn. powers." In iii. 14, the poet speaks of himself as having "Escaped the Sn. pool, though long detained In that obscure sojourn." In x. 453, the devils are "the Sn. throng." In L'Allegro 3, Melancholy is "Of Cerberus and blackest Midnight born In Sn. cave forlorn." In Comus 182, Comus says, "the dragon womb Of Sn. darkness spews her thickest gloom." In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron talks of "the Sn. flood" of the envies of his foes. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. v. 1, Bajazet says, "O life more loathsome to my vexed thoughts Than noisome parbreak of the Sn. snakes." In Jonson's Catiline iii. 2, Cicero calls Catiline's conspiracy "a Sn. practice." In Chapman's Chabot v. 2, 37, the Advocate speaks of the Chancellor as "The very fen and Sn. abyss" of corruption. In Philotus 123, Flavius conjures the spirits "By Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, By Lethe, S., and Acheron." In Webster's White Devil v. 6, Flamineo says, "What a religious oath was S., that the gods never durst swear by and violate." In T. Heywood's S. Age v., Jupiter swears "By dreadful S., an oath I cannot change." In Greene's Alphonso iii. 2, 367, Medea says, "I conjure thee By stinking S. and filthy Phlegeton." In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, Byron says of the K.: "By his vows And oaths so Sn. [he] had my nerves and will In more awe than his own." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faust swears "by the kingdoms of infernal rule, Of S., of Acheron, and the fiery lake Of ever-burning Phlegethon." In his Tamb. A. v. 1, Bajazet speaks of a star that "countermands the gods More than Cimmerian S. or destiny." In Beaumont's Salmasius, Venus "made Vulcan swear By dreadful S., the oath that gods do fear." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 6, 24, makes Phoebe say, "By Sn. lake I vow, whose sad annoy The gods do dread." In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 2, 46, Byron says, "'Twas . . . a repulse As miserably cold as Sn. water That from sincere earth issues, and doth break The strongest vessels, not to be contained But in the tough hoof of a patient ass." Pliny says that the waters of the S. corroded everything except the hoof of an ass.

SUBURBS (Sb. = Suburb). The districts immediately outside the walls of a city; especially those in the outskirts of Lond. As the city-gates were closed during the night, the s. were left very much to themselves; and the state of things that prevailed can be readily imagined. Hence the word is almost always used by the dramatists in a bad sense, and implies a dist. where loose living is the rule. Chettle, in Kind Hart's Dream (1592), says, "The s. of the city are in many places no other but dark dens for adulterers, thieves, murderers, and every mischief-worker." In Meas. i. 2, 98, Pompey tells of an edict that "all houses in the s. of Vienna must be pulled down"; where houses of ill-fame are meant. In ii. 1, 65, Elbow says of Pompey: "He is one that serves a bad woman, whose house, Sir, was, as they say, plucked down in the s." In H8 v. 4, 76, the Lord Chamberlain says to the Porter, "There's a trim rabble let in; are all these your faithful friends of the s.?" In J. C. ii. 1, 285, Portia asks Brutus: "Dwell I but in the s. of your good pleasure?" If it be no more, Portia is Brutus' harlot, not his wife." Nash, in Christ's Tears (1593) ii. 148, asks: "Lond., what are thy s. but licensed Stews?" In Nobody i., we are told: "Here's queans maintained in every sb. street." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. 3, Knowell says of Stephen: "If I can but hold him up to his height, It will do well for a sb.-humour." In B. & F. Friends ii. 2, Philadelphia says, "To yield At first encounter may befit the state Of some suburban strumpet." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Goshawk says, "He keeps a whore in the s." In Sharpham's Fleire ii. 29, Fleire says, "They scorn to have a Suburbian bawd lead 'em a taffaty gown." In B. & F. Wild Goose ii. 3, Rosalura says to Mirabel, "It seems ye are hot; the s. will supply ye." In their Thomas ii. 2, Dorothea advises Thomas, "Get a new mistress, Some sb. saint, that 6d. and some oaths Will draw to parley." In their Cure ii. 1, Pacheco says, "I have found a thief or a whore there, when the whole s. could not furnish me." In their Prize iv. 5, Pedro speaks of "one of those that multiply i'th' s. for single money." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says, "The s. and those without the Bars have more privilege than they within the freedom." In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, Compass says, "Blackwall . . . can't hold out always, no more than Limehouse or Shadwell or the strongest s. about Lond." In Strode's Float. Isl. v. 11, Prudentius says, "Melancolico and Concupiscence Shall keep their state; i'th' s. or New-England." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says, "These Sb. sinners have no lands to live upon but their legs." W. Rowley, in Search 37, says, "We should return back to the suburban bordello." Massinger, in Madam iii. 1, talks of "swaggering suburban roasters." In Randolph's Muses iv. 2, Anaistytia boasts that she has had "good practice in the S., where they are very subject to "the French disease."

SUCCOTH (i.e. THE BOOTHS). A vill. in Palestine, now Tell Deir Allah, 1 m. N. of the Jabbok and abt. 3 m. E. of the Jordan. In Milton S. A. 278, the Chorus recalls "How Succoth and the fort of Penuel Their great deliverer contemned, The matchless Gideon." (See Judges viii. 5-16.)

SUCOR DE TUPEA (CULLERA). A town in Valencia, on the E. coast of Spain at the mouth of the Xucar, from which river it got its alternative name, Xucar or Sucor. In Peele's Alcazar iii. prol., we are told: "At Sucor de Tupea He [the K. of Spain] met in person with the Portugal [i.e. Sebastian] And treateth of a marriage with the K." The next scene describes this meeting.

SUDBURY. A town in Suffolk on the left bank of the Stour, 17 m. E. of Ipswich. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report says, "I have been at S., Southampton, at Shooters Hill." In Tarlton's News out of Purgatory, we read that he saw there "certain women hanged up by the tongue for scolding, and especially one Botcher's wife of S., who was an archgossip in that faculty." Lyly, in Puppe with an Hatchett, Eliz. Pamph. p. 54, says, "At S. the Martin-mongers swarmed to a lecture like bears to a honey-pot." Puritanism was strong in Norfolk and Suffolk.

SUDELEY. A vill. in Gloucestersh., 18 m. N.E. of Gloucester, and near to Tewkesbury. In its ruined ch. Katharine Parr was buried. There are also the remains of an ancient castle dating from the reign of Henry VI. In Thersites, Anon. Pl. i. 217, the hero says, "Tom Tumbler of Tewkesbury will wipe William Waterman, Simon Sadler of Sudeley that served the sow."

SUEVIA, or SUABIA. An ancient Duchy in South-W. Germany, extending from the angle of the Rhine at Bâle, northwards to the Danube. It included Wurtemberg, Baden, and Hohenzollern, with part of Bavaria. Its capital is Augsburg. It was one of the 10 "circles" into which Germany was divided in 1512. The Heroine of Marston's Insatiate is an entirely fictitious Isabella, "Countess of Suevia."

SUFFOLK. The county on the E. coast of England between Norfolk and Essex. It formed the Southern portion of the old kingdom of E. Anglia, and suffered much from the incursions of the Danes. It is almost entirely agricultural, and was famous for its cheeses and other dairy produce. Like Norfolk, it was in the main Puritan in its sympathies. In Brewer's Lovesick v. 1, Alured reports that the Danes have "planted themselves in Norfolk, S., and Cambridgesh." In H6 C. i. 1, 156, Northumberland speaks of the power of Warwick in "Essex, Norfolk, S., and Kent"; and in iv. 8, 12, Warwick sends Clarence to "stir up in S., Norfolk, and in Kent The knights and gentlemen to come with thee." In Middleton's Quiet Life ii. 1, Mrs. Knavesby says, "I am a S. woman, my Lord." In Brome's Moor iv. 5, Quicksands says, "I placed no child in Norfolk nor S., nor any folk." In Greene's Friar i., Prince Edward says of Margaret of Fressingfield: "A bonnier wench all S. cannot yield." In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Jolly says, "There's Jack Careless, he carried out as good staple-manners as any was in S., and now he is returned with a shrug and a trick to stand crooked." Drayton, Polyolb. xix. 3, 99, says, "From the Suffolkean side yet those which Stour prefer Their princely Orwell praise." In Davenant's Wits iii., Snore says, "My watch are above at Trea Trip for a black pudding and a pound of S. cheese." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 259, Tawnie says, "A long slender poking-stick is the all in all with your S. Puritan." In Day's B. Beggar iv., Strowd says, "There were a sort of tumblers at Windham Fair last year, and they have made it so stale in Norfolk and S. that every wench is turned tumbler."

S. is a territorial title in the English Peerage. The Earl of S. (who is wrongly called D. of S.) in Oldcastle i. 2, ii. 2, etc., is Michael de la Pole, 2nd Earl of that family. He was killed at Harfleur on Sept. 18th, 1415. The Earl whose death at Agincourt a little more than a month later is described in H5 iv. 6 was Michael de la Pole, son of the preceding Earl. The S. who, in H6 A. v. 3, woos Margaret of Anjou for the K. and falls in love with her himself is William de la Pole, son of the foregoing; he was created Marquis in 1444, and D. in 1448. In H6 B. i. 1, 45, he is called "William de la Pole, Marquess of S."; and in line 64 the K. says, "We here create thee the 1st Duke of S." He forfeited the K.'s confidence by his plot against Gloucester, and was taken and beheaded at sea in 1450, as described in iv. 1. The S. who was High-Steward at the coronation of Anne Boleyn in H8 iv. 1, and with whom the K. was left playing primer⁸ in v. 1, 8, was Charles Brandon, created D. in 1514. He married Mary Tudor, daughter of Henry VII and Q. Dowager of France. He appears in Cromwell as the messenger who brings to Cromwell the news of his knighthood; and he is prominent in S. Rowley's When You. He died in 1545. On his death the title became extinct, and was conferred by Edward VI on the Marquis of Dorset, the father of Lady Jane Grey, who was beheaded in 1554. He is one of the characters in Webster's Wyat. Thomas Drue produced a play entitled The Duchess of S. about 1620. The Earldom came into the Howard family, its present holders, in 1603.

SUMMER LAY. A meadow lying somewhere South-E. of Bethnall Green, between the Whitechapel Rd. and Limehouse. In Day's B. Beggar iv., young Strowd says, "I'll but cross o'er the Summer lay by the Broom-field." See BROOMFIELD.

SUN. A Lond. tavern sign. Taylor, in Works i. 125, says, "I have fared better at three Suns, in Aldersgate St., Cripplegate, and New Fish St." In Middleton's No Wit ii. 1, Pickadill says, "Your sun-cup? Some cup, I warrant, that he stole out of the Sun-tavern." Herrick, in Ode to Jonson, speaks of "those lyric feasts Made at the Sun, the Dog, the Triple Tun." In Wit Woman 1636, Braggardo orders: "Go you to the Sunne and fetch me a gallon of Ipocras." In B. & F. Custom iii. 3, Jaques says that the Dane "lies at the sign of the Sun to be new-breeched." This was at Lisbon. Brereton, Marginalia on B. & F., plausibly suggests Tun, in allusion to the tubs used in treating his malady.

SUN. A bookseller's sign in Lond. An early edition of Colin Clout was "imprinted at Lond. in Paules churchyard at the sign of the Sunne by Anthony Kytson." Lodge's Wounds of Civil War was "Printed by John Dauter and are to be sold at the sign of the Sunne in Paul's Churchyard. 1594." The 2nd Quarto of Pericles was "Imprinted at Lond. for Henry Gosson and are to be sold at the sign of the Sunne in Paternoster Row. 1609."

SURAT. A city in Gudjerat on the W. coast of India, 160 m. N. of Bombay. It was founded in the early part of the 16th cent., and rapidly rose to be an important commercial port. It lies on the South bank of the Tapi, about 14 m. from its mouth. It was held by the Portuguese from 1573 to 1612; but when Webster's play was written it had passed into the hands of the English East India Company. It was one of the most populous cities in India in the 18th cent., but most of its trade has since been absorbed by Bombay. In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, Compass says, "If you'll believe me, I have been at Surat."

SURGEONS HALL (see BARBER SURGEONS HALL). It was not until 1745 that the Surgeons separated from the Barbers and got a Hall of their own, first in Stationers Hall, then in the Old Bailey, and finally in Lincoln's Inn Fields.

SURREY. A southern county of England, lying South of the Thames between Middlesex and Sussex. The part of Lond. to the South of the Thames is in S.; and as that side of the river was outside the jurisdiction of the Middlesex magistrates, who were strongly opposed to the Theatres, the actors migrated to the Bankside in Southwark and built there the Globe, the Rose, and the Swan. S. is a territorial title in the English Peerage. In R2 iv. 1, S. defends Aumerle against the charges of Fitzwater. This was Thomas Holland, 3rd Earl of Kent, created D. of S. in 1397. For his share in the plot against Henry IV he was degraded by Parliament in 1399, and beheaded at Cirencester in the following year. He is one of the characters in Trag. Richd. II. The Earl of S. mentioned in H4 B. iii. 1, was Thomas Fitzalan, son of Richard Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel and S., who was beheaded in 1397 and his title conferred on the Thomas Holland named above; but on Holland's death it was restored to the Fitzalans in the person of Thomas. He died in 1415.

In R3 v. 3, the Earl of S. appears as commanding a division for Richd. at the Battle of Bosworth. This was Thomas Howard, created Earl in 1483. He was taken prisoner at Bosworth and imprisoned in the Tower for 3½ years. He then made his peace with Henry, and was restored to his Earldom in 1489. He appears in Ford's Warbeck as one of the K.'s supporters. He commanded the English forces at Flodden, and was in consequence restored to his father's title of D. of Norfolk in 1514. He thereupon surrendered the title of Earl of S. to his son, Thomas Howard, for the term of his own life. On his death, in 1524, Thomas became D. of Norfolk, and the courtesy title of Earl of S. passed to his son, Henry Howard, the poet. Henry was beheaded on Tower Hill in 1547, though his father Norfolk escaped through the death of the K. On the death of Norfolk in 1554, Henry's son and heir became D. of Norfolk and Earl of S.; he was attainted and beheaded in 1572 for conspiring against Elizabeth. The S. who appears in More i. 3 is the hero of Flodden. In Shakespeare's Henry VIII there is some confusion. The D. of Norfolk of i. 1 is, of course, Thomas of Flodden fame. In ii. 1, 43, we are told that the Earl of S. was sent to Ireland, and in haste, too, lest he should help his "father." This was Thomas, the son of the Flodden man, and son-in-law of Buckingham, who is the "father" spoken of. He himself says, in iii. 2, 253, "Thy ambition . . . robbed this bewailing land of noble Buckingham, my father-in-law. . . . You sent me deputy for Ireland far from his succour." But this scene is supposed to take place in 1529, when Thomas Howard was D. of Norfolk. Shakespeare, however, introduces the D. of Norfolk in the same scene; so that it looks as if by S. he means Henry Howard, though this throws all his facts wrong; for it was Thomas who was son-in-law to Buckingham and Deputy for Ireland. At the coronation of Anne Boleyn in iv. 1, the D. of Norfolk acts as Earl Marshal, and the Earl of S. bears the Q.'s sceptre with the Dove. This was in 1533, and S. is the poet-peer.

SUS. A province in South-W. Morocco, South of the Atlas range. In Stucley 2446, Muly Hamet calls himself "K. of mighty Sus." Milton, P. L. xi., 403, mentions "The kingdoms of Almansor, Fez, and Sus."

SUSA. The capital of the ancient Kings of Persia, founded by Darius Hystaspes on the site of an older city destroyed by Assur-bani-pal. It is now a mass of mounds on the left bank of the Shahr, 15 m. South-E. of Dizful, and 250 South-E. of Bagdad. It is Shushan the Palace of the book of Esther. In Hester 286, the scribe calls it "Susus, our noble city of might." In Cyrus B. 3, Panthea is described as "wife unto the absent Susan k., Abracadate." In Nero iii. 3, Seneca says, "We beg not now To have our consuls tread on Asian kings Or spurn the quivered S. at their feet." Milton, P. L. x. 308, speaks of Xerxes coming to attack Greece "From S., his Memnonian palace high." S. is called Memnonia by Herodotus (v. 54) because it was built by Tithonus, the father of Memnon. In P. R. iii. 288, the Tempter points out to our Lord "S. by Choaspes' amber stream."

SUSIANA. A large province lying between the Persian Gulf and Media, W. of Persia. It corresponds roughly to the modern Fars; its capital was Susa. Milton, P. R. iii. 321, describes the forces of the K. of Parthia as coming partly from "the south of Susiana."

SUSSEX. The county in England on the South coast between Kent and Hampshire. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, Palatine says, "My clothes, they are rags; yet they will serve for the winter, Sir, when I ride post in S. ways." A pamphlet published in 1614 tells of "a strange and monstrous serpent or dragon lately discovered in S., 2 m. from Horsam, in a wood called St. Leonard's Forest, and 30 m. from Lond." It is stated to have been 9 ft. long, with large feet, and to have "cast his venom about 4 roods from him." In Jonson's New World, the factor speaks of "your printed conundrums of the serpent in S." In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 4, Lance suggests as a topic for Francisco to write about "Dragons in S." In Braithwaite's Whimsies (1631), we read of "a S. dragon drawn by some Shoe-lane man." In Work for Cutlers, when Sword derives his pedigree from "St. George his sword that killed the dragon," Rapier says, "Ay, the dragon in S. th'other day." S. was a territorial title in the English Peerage. Warren, Earl of S., appears in Greene's Friar. But the play takes place in the latter part of the reign of Henry III, and there was no Earl of S. from 1243, when the last of the de Albini family died, until 1283, when John Plantagenet, or De Warren, was made Earl of Surrey and S. No doubt this man is intended; but he was not Earl of S. during Henry's reign. He appears in Peele's Ed. 1, when he gives £500 to the King's College for maimed soldiers. The scene, however, takes place immediately on Edward's return from Palestine in 1274; so that there is again an anticipation of the title. Iron-smelting was carried on in some parts of S. Jonson, in Underwoods lxi. 184, demands that Vulcan should be condemned "to some hill-foot (out in S.), to an iron mill."

SUTERS HILL. See SHOOTERS HILL.

SUTTON-COPHILL. The popular pronunciation of Sutton-Coldfield, a town in N. Warwicksh., 26 m. N.W. of Warwick, and a short 20 m. N.W. of Coventry, on the road to Shrewsbury. In H4 A. iv. 2, 3, Falstaff, on the way to Shrewsbury with his contingent, says, "Bardolph, get thee before to Coventry; fill me a bottle of sack; our soldiers shall march through; we'll to S.-C. tonight." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 45, Hobs, the tanner of Tamworth, says, "I am just akin to S. windmill; I can grind which way soe'er the wind blow." S.-Coldfield is about 7 m. South of Tamworth. Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "S.-coldfield in Warwicksh., where I was once a grammar scholar, stands loco ingrato et sterili, but in an excellent air, and full of all manner of pleasures."

SUTTON'S HOSPITAL. Another name for the Charterhouse school, founded by Thomas Sutton in Lond. in 1609 (see CHARTER HOUSE). Dekker, in Rod for Runaways (1623), says, "He lay upon straw under Sutton's Hospital wall near the highway."

SWAFFHAM. A town in Norfolk, 27 m. W. of Norwich. In Mankind 23, Nought, who is going out to steal horses, says, "I shall go to William Patrick of Massingham; I shall spare Master Allington of Bottisham, and Hammond of Swaffham."

SWAN. A booksellers' sign in London. Impatient Poverty was "imprinted at Lond. in Paul's churchyard at the sign of the S. by John King 1562." Nice Wanton has the same imprint in 1560. At the same sign and in the same year was printed The Proud Wives Paternoster. Harcourt's Voyage to Guiana was "printed by John Beale for W. Welby, and are to be sold at his shop in Paul's Churchyard at the sign of the S. 1613." T. Heywood's Dialogues was "printed by R.D. for R.H. and are to be sold by Thomas Slater at the S. in Duck Lane."

SWAN. A London tavern sign. There were several S. taverns in Lond. The most important were: The S. in Newgate; it stood on the N. side of Newgate near the Gate. In Hycke, p. 100, Frewyl says of Imagination: "He was lodged at Newgate at the swanne, And every man took him for a gentleman." Marmion's Leaguer was "printed at Lond. by L.B. for John Grove, dwelling in S. Yard within Newgate. 1632." The S. in Old Fish St. In the list of Taverns in News Barthol. Fair we find "Old Fish st. at the S." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Leatherhead says that "Hero is come over into Fish-st. to eat some fresh herring; Leander says no more, but as fast as he can Gets on all his best clothes and will after to the S." The S. in Dowgate; it is mentioned as "a Tavern well known." This is probably the S. of Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, where Hans says, "Bringt Master Eyre tot det signe un Swannekin," i.e. Bring Master Eyre to the sign of the S. He was to meet a ship-captain there. The S. at Charing Cross. Aubrey, iii. 415, tells how Ben Jonson wrote a grace, ending: "God bless me and God bless Raph." When the K. asked him who Raph was he "told him 'twas the drawer at the Swanne Tavern by Charing Cross."

There were other Swans: in the Strand near Somerset House, in Snow Hill near Holborn Bridge, on the south of Long Lane near Aldersgate St., and on the E. side of Norton Folgate. It is not possible to say which of them all is intended in the following passages: In Tom Tyler i. 2, Strife says, "The ale-wife of the S. is filling the can." In Nabbes' Bride i. 4, Rhenish says, "And Rhenish, the S. hath none better." Lyly, in Pappe with an Hatchett, p. 57, mentions: "My old hostess of the Swanne in Warwick."

SWAN STAIRS. Commonly called the Old S.; a landing place on the N. bank of the Thames, just above Lond. Bdge. The name still remains in Old S. Pier. It was usual to disembark at the Old S. and walk round to Billingsgate, in order to avoid the peril of shooting the Bdge. Nash, in Prognostication, says, "Watermen that want fares shall sit and blow their fingers till their fellows row betwixt the Old S. and Westminster." Selinus was "printed by Thomas Creede dwelling in Thames St. at the sign of the Katherin Wheel near the old Swanne."

SWAN THEATRE. A theatre in Lond., projected in 1594 and probably built in 1596. It stood in Paris Garden, q.v. It was used for plays till 1620, and was still standing, though in a ruinous condition, in 1632. Its main interest arises from the fact that it was visited in 1596 by a certain John de Witt. He made a sketch of its interior, which was discovered in the library of the University of Utrecht a few years ago. The S. on the flag identifies it. The drawing has been often reproduced, and has given rise to a voluminous discussion on the staging of Elizabethan plays, which is not yet over. De Witt says that it was built of flint stones, and held 3000 persons. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Moll says, "There's a knight lost his purse at the last new play in the S." Goodman, in Marmion's Leaguer (1632), speaks of the theatre as "now fallen to decay and, like a dying Swanne hanging down her head, seemed to sing her own dirge." Taylor, Works (1632), speaks of "poor old Vennor . . . who acted England's Joy first at the S." England's Joy was a play, probably by N. Breton, now lost.

SWEATHLAND. See SWEDEN.

SWECHLAND. See SWEDEN.

SWEDEN. The country on the E. of the Scandinavian peninsula. It was called in Old English, Sweoland; in the 12th cent. we find Suane or Swane; in the 14th it becomes Swetherland or Sweathland; and in the beginning of the 17th S. comes into use. The modern kingdom of S. may be said to have been founded by Gustavus Vasa (1523-1560). Under Charles IX. (1600-1611) it became definitely Protestant, and his son, Gustavus Adolphus (1611-1632), was the leading champion of Protestantism in the Thirty Years War. In 1630 he led 15,000 men into Germany, and achieved many victories; but his meteoric career was cut short by his death at the Battle of Lutzen, and he was succeeded by his daughter Christina. Heylyn (s.v. SWETHLAND) speaks of the Swedes as valiant and hospitable. In Clyomon, Clamydes is the "son of the K. of Suavia," probably a misprint for Suania; at any rate the context shows that S. is intended. The time is the reign of Alexander the Gt., and the story is wildly unhistorical. In Barnavelt iii. 5, Barnavelt has letters from "the K. of Swechland and the Count of Solesm." In Glapthorne's Wallenstein i. 1, Leslie says, "Wallenstein has given to death that thunderbolt of war, the Swedish k." In Mayne's Match iv. 1, Seathrift says, "You did follow the Elephant so long and K. of S., that people at last came in to see you." From the context the K. of S. would seem to have been a puppet-play on the life and death of Gustavus Adolphus. Milton, in Sonnet to Skimmer 8, advises him not to trouble about "what the Swede intend and what the French." In all these passages Gustavus Adolphus is the K. referred to.

S. produced excellent iron. In Alimony iii. 6, the Ghost says to Crinon, "Thy gain Has lined thy shoulders with a Swedish chain." Swedish, or Sweathland, horses were beginning to be imported into England, but they were not, according to Markham, well-conditioned, and were mostly pied, their legs being white and their bodies another colour. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 4, Carlo says, "You shall sweat there in courting your mistress as well as in all the stoves in S." These stoves, or what we should call Turkish Baths, are most often referred to as Russian; but the same thing is meant. S. shared with Iceland and other N. lands the reputation of being the home of witchcraft. In Marmion's Leaguer v. 4, Trimalchio excuses himself from fighting with Miscellanio on the ground that "he has lain with an old witch in S., and is grown stick-free," i.e. invulnerable.

SWINSTEAD (more properly SWINESHEAD). A vill. in Lincs., 7 m. South-W. of Boston. It was a spt. in the reign of John, but it is now some distance from the coast through the silting up of the shore. Half a mile E. of the vill. was a Cistercian Convent, founded by Robert de Greslei in 1134, which has completely disappeared. According to the story in Trouble. Reign, the K. was poisoned at S. Abbey by a monk, and died there; and Shakespeare followed this account. But as a matter of fact he came to the Abbey after his disaster in crossing the Wash, and was there seized by a fever; he went on, however, to Sleaford, and thence to Newark Castle, where he died. In Bale's Johan 267, the monk who poisoned John is called Dissimulation; but says, "Simon of Swynsett my very name is perdee." In Trouble. Reign, Haz., p. 314, the Monk, in offering the poisoned cup to the K., says, "Wassell, my Liege, and as a poor monk may say, welcome to S." After John's death the young K. Henry says, "Let not a stone of S. Abbey stand, But pull the house about the Friars' ears." In K. J. v. 3, the K. says, "Set on towards S."; and the scene of his death is laid in the orchard in S. Abbey.

SWITHIN'S, SAINT. A ch. in Lond. on the N. side of Cannon St. It is known to have existed as early as 1331. It was rebuilt by Sir John Hind about 1400. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. Lond. Stone (q.v.) is built into the wall of the ch. In Middleton's Aries, one of the city fathers whose memory is honoured is "John Hinde, a re-edifier of the parish ch. of S. Swithin by Lond. Stone."

SWITHIN'S, SAINT (WINCHESTER). A curious old ch. built by K. John over the postern of St. Michael, or King's Gate. Doubtless it was from it that Brewer took the name of the supposed Abbey. In Brewer's Lovesick i. 1, the aged father of St. Swithin's Abbey mounts the walls of Winchester in order to urge the soldiers to fight.

SWITZERLAND (Sr. = Switzer, Ss. = Swiss). A confederation of 22 cantons in the mountainous dist. in the heart of Europe lying between France, Italy, Austria, and Germany. Its history begins with the Everlasting League formed in 1291 by the three Forest Cantons—Uri, Schwyz, and Nidwald—for mutual protection against the house of Hapsburg. The great victory of Morgarten over the Austrians in 1315 extended their influence; and in 1353 the league was joined by Lucerne, Zurich, Zug, Glarus, and Berne. The decisive victory of Sempach in 1386 led to their complete deliverance from the Hapsburgs in 1394. For the next hundred years they were fighting for similar freedom from the Empire, and practically gained it in 1499, though it was not formally granted till 1648. The number of Cantons rose to 13 in 1513, to 19 in 1803, and to 22—Neuchâtel, the Valais (Treaty of Westphalia), and Geneva being the last three to join—in 1815. During the 16th cent. the practice began of hiring the Ss. as mercenaries, chiefly by the French and Milanese; and they became famous throughout Europe as men who would fight for anyone who paid them. The body-guard of the French kings was composed of Srs. till the Revolution; and they still form the domestic Guard of the Pope. Heylyn (s.v. HELVETIA) says, "The people are very warlike; and since by reason of their situation they have no vent of men by traffic, they use to employ themselves in the service of any which will hire them." In Shirley's Opportunity iii. 1, Pimponio, who is very drunk, cries: "Now let all the cantons of Ss. come!" In Massinger's Dowry i. 2, Romont speaks of the services rendered by the late Marshall at Granson, Morat, Nancy, "Against the subtle fox of France, the politic Louis, Or the more desperate Ss." These battles were won by the Ss. in alliance with Louis of France against Charles the Bold of Burgundy in 1475-7, and laid the foundation of the Ss. nationality and resulted in their practical emancipation from the Empire in 1499. Shakespeare, in defiance of chronology, gives Hamlet's uncle a bodyguard of Ss. in Ham. iv. 5, 97, the K. cries: "Where are my Srs.? Let them guard the door." In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 231, Anjou says, "Srs., keep you the streets; And at each corner shall the K.'s guard stand." In B. & F. Double Mar. iv. 1, the D. of Sesse says, "Thus attired like Srs., we may be admitted among his [the D. of Naples'] guard," and adds: "'Tis the profession Of all our nation to serve faithfully Where they're best paid."

In Chapman's Rev. Bussy i. 1, Monsieur calls Clermont "A fellow only that consists of sinews; Mere S., apt for any execution." In Trag. Byron i. 1, Henri says of Byron: "At 14 years of age he was made Colonel To all the Suisses serving then in Flanders." In iii. 1, D'Escures brings word that the K. has "sent to his ambassador, De Vic, To make demand in S. for the raising With utmost diligence of 6000 men." In Marston's Malcontent i. 7, Passarello says, "He'll lie like to your Sr. or lawyer; he'll be of any side for most money." In Davenport's Survey of Sciences, he says, "Law, Logic, Srs., fight on any side." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Honeysuckle says, "I will make more haste home than a stipendiary Sr. does after he's paid." In Barnes' Charter i. 1, Charles orders Montpensier: "March with your regiments To Pontremore. There shall you find the Ss. With their artillery, newly brought by sea unto Spetia." In B. & F. Gentleman iii. 1, when Jacques says that Marine is a D., Clerimont asks, mockingly: "Was it not clerk to the great band of marrow-bones That people call the Srs.?"—where marrow-bones means pugilists. In Davenant's U. Lovers iii. 1, Rangone says, "It [the fort] is fortified with 2 regiments of Switz." In his Siege ii. 1, Ariotto says, "Had I not seen thee I had maintained the combat still with those 7 Srs." In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 271, Saxony threatens to attack Alphonsus "With Saxon lansknechts and brunt-bearing Srs." Hall, in Sat. iv. 4, talks of a man coming into a quarrel "for a hungry Sr.'s pay." In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Brachiano says to Francisco de Medicis, "All thy loud cannon and thy borrowed Srs. Durst not supplant her." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Cable says, "If this Switz had but a two-handed sword, he would depopulate the island." One of these Ss. mercenaries is the hero of Wilson's Switzer, the scene of which is laid in Lombardy.

The Ss. are represented as slovenly in dress and wearing beards. In Goosecap i. 1, Bullaker says that Rudesby is "as slovenly as a Sr.; and somewhat like one in face too; for he wears a bush beard." In Ford's Lover's Melan. ii. 2, Trolio says, "I could clip the old ruffian; there's hair enough to stuff all the great cod-pieces in S." The Srs.' codpiece was a part of the uniform of the Ss. body-guard of the French kings. Coryat, in Cruities (1611) 44, says that Lewis XI. in 1476 "ordained that they should ever after wear suits and cod-pieces of those variegated colours of red and yellow" in memory of their foolish behaviour at the battle of Granson. Coryat also says, p. 386, "You shall not find one man in all Zurich from a boy of 10 years old to an old man of the age of 100 years, but he weareth a cod-piece." In Webster's Malfi ii. 2, a servant reports: "There was taken even now a Sr. in the Duchess' bedchamber with a pistol in his great cod-piece." Dekker, in Wonderful Year, says, "Those goblins have bladder-cheeks puffed out like a Switzer's breeches." In his Hornbook i. he mentions, among fashionable garments, "the Sr.'s blistered Cod-piece." Rabelais, Pantagruel iv. 52, mentions "your big, outstrouting Srs.' breeches." In Dekker's Catchpol, the Masquers had a drum that "sounded like a Sr.'s kettledrum." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. Ind., Asper mentions "the Sr.'s knot on his French garters" as part of a dandy's dress. One of the chief products of S. was dairy produce. In Davenant's Wits iv., Engine mentions among other table dainties, "Cream of S. and Genoa paste."

SWYNSETT. See SWINSTEAD.

SYANA. A small island in the Gillolo Passage between the N.W. of New Guinea and Celebes; more commonly called Syang. The Prince of Syana is one of the suitors for the hand of Quisara, the daughter of the K. of Tidore, in B. & F. Princess.

SYBARIS. An ancient Greek colony on the W. coast of the Gulf of Tarentum in South Italy. It rose to a great height of opulence, and the luxury of its inhabitants in food and dress became proverbial. It was destroyed by the men of Crotona in 510 B.C., and has never been rebuilt. Nash, in Summers, p. 69, speaks of people like the Sybarites who "do nothing all one year but bid guests against the next year." In his Lenten, p. 312, he says, "Hydra Herring will have every thing Sybarite dainty," and adds in a note: "The Sybarites never would make any banquet under a twelvemonths' warning." Hall, in Satires v. 2, speaks of a house "All dumb and silent like the dead of night, Or dwelling of some sleepy Sybarite." Gosson, in School of Abuse (Arber), says, "The Sicilians . . . found out such descant in S. instruments, that by dancing and skipping they fell into lewdness of life."

SYBARIS. A river on the W. side of the Gulf of Tarentum in South Italy, now the Coscile. The city of Sybaris was near its mouth, and took its name from it. In Davenant's U. Lovers v. 4, Hildebrand says, "He I encountered in a battle on the banks of Sibaris."

SYCION. See SICYON.

SYDON. See SIDON.

SYENE. The modern Assouan, on the E. bank of the Nile, just below the Great Cataract, on the frontiers of Egypt and Nubia. The ancient geographers believed it to be exactly on the Tropic of Cancer, though it is really a little N. of it in lat. 24° 5' 23". Milton, P. R. iv. 70, speaks of embassies coming to Rome "some from farthest South, Syene, and where the shadow both ways falls, Meroe, Nilotic isle."

SYLLA. See SCYLLA.

SYMERONS, or CIMAROONS. A tribe of Central America, descendants of escaped negroes and Indian women. The English sailors called them Maroons. They helped Drake in his expeditions in the neighbourhood of Port Pheasant and Nombre de Dios. In Davenant's Playhouse, one scene is "a rocky country of the Symérons who were a Moorish people, brought formerly to Peru by the Spaniards as their slaves."

SYMPLEGADES. The clashing rocks; a name given to the cliffs at the entrance of the Thracian Bosphorus, which were supposed to clash together and destroy ships attempting to pass through the Straits. Lyly, in Euphemes Anat. Wit, p. 16, speaks of his hero as "ready, if thou shun Syrtis, to sink into Symplegades."

SYNAGOGUE, OLD. See OLD SYNAGOGUE.

SYNAY. See SINAI.

SYNOPE, or SINOPE. A Greek colony on the coast of Paphlagonia, on the South shore of the Black Sea; it is now called Sinab. It was the birthplace of Diogenes the Cynic. In T. Heywood's Dialogues xiii. 4267, Mausolus addresses Diogenes: "O Synopesian."

SYRACUSE, or SYRACUSA. A city in Sicily, about midway down the E. coast. It was a colony from Corinth, and was at first built on the island of Ortigia, on which the modern city stands, though in the time of its glory it spread to the adjacent mainland. In 485 B.C. it fell under the tyranny of Gelon of Gela, who transmitted his power to his brother Hiero (478-467). Hiero made S. one of the most brilliant and successful of the Greek cities; and his victories in the Games at Pythia and Olympia had the glory of being celebrated by Pindar. His successor, Thrasybulus, was driven out the year after his accession and a free government re-established. The failure of the great siege by the Athenians in 415-413 added to the fame and power of the city. But in 406 the tyranny was seized by the famous Dionysius, who held it till his death in 367. He raised the city to its highest point of glory, but the remembrance of his cruelties has overshadowed his fame. His son and successor, the younger Dionysius, was expelled by Timoleon in 343, and this great general and patriot also defeated the threatening power of Carthage and restored S. to her former splendour. Another Hiero, Hiero II, made himself K. in 270, and governed with wisdom and kindness for 50 years. His grandson Hieronymus having allied himself with Carthage against Rome, Marcellus besieged the city in 214, and after 2 years took it and gave it up to sack. It was in this sack that the famous mathematician Archimedes perished, whilst he was pursuing his studies unconscious of the presence of the enemy. Henceforward S. was a city of the Roman empire, and had no separate history. It was destroyed by the Saracens in A.D. 878, and since has been confined to its original island seat on Ortigia.

The scene of Lyly's Sapho is laid at S. in some indeterminate early period, Sapho being "princess of S." But S. is really a pseudonym for Lond. The prologue of Edwards' Damon says, "Lo, here in S., the ancient town which once the Romans won, Here Dionisius' palace within whose court this thing most strange was done." The servant of the 2 heroes says later, "We three this day arrived at Siracusae in Sicilia, that ancient town." In Marlowe's Jew v. 4, Calymath speaks of "Sicily, Where Siracusan Dionysius reigned." In Davenant's Siege iii. 2, Ariotto says, "The tyrant of S. was not so envious to men." The scene of Massinger's Bondman is S. and the adjacent country, and the play tells the story of Timoleon's deliverance of the city from the Carthaginians. In Err., Aegeon is a merchant of S.; in this Shakespeare follows Plautus, whose Menachmi is the original of his play. The supposed date of the Menachmi is fixed by an allusion to Hiero II as still reigning. In Massinger's Believe v. 1, the scene is laid at S. shortly after its capture by Marcellus; the fugitive Antiochus comes thither and is imprisoned by Marcellus. In Jonson's Magnetic i. 1, Palate says, "Another '88 [i.e. a Spanish Armada] threatening his country with ruin would no more work upon him than S.'s sack on Archimede." In Brome's City Wit i. 2, Sarpego speaks of Cornelius Tacitus as "an Areopagit of Sa."—a statement made on his own authority. In May's Heir, the scene of which is laid in Sicily in modern times, in act iv. Alphonso asks Francisco: "Tell me how thou hast lived in S. these 5 years here since that unlucky storm divided us at sea." Gosson, in School of Abuse (1579), p. 19 (Arber), says, "The Syracusans used such variety of dishes in their banquets that, when they were set . . . they were many times in doubt which they should tooth first or taste last."

SYRIA (Sn. = Syrian). The country at the E. end of the Mediterranean between the sea and the Arabian desert. The name has been supposed to be a shorter form of Assyria; but it is far more likely that it is connected with Sor, the Phœnician name of Tyre, and that it meant in the first instance the dist. round that city. The ancient kingdom of S., which, under the Hazaels and Benhadads, was a powerful rival of the Israelitish kingdoms, had its capital at Damascus; but it was destroyed by the Assyrians in the 8th cent. B.C., and the dist. annexed to the Assyrian empire. In succession it passed to the Persians and then to Alexander, after his defeat of Darius of Persia in 330 B.C. On his death it fell to the share of the Seleucid family; and they built Antioch as its capital. Pompeius annexed it to the Roman empire in 64 B.C. It was over-run by the Parthians in 41 B.C., but re-conquered by Ventidius, the lieutenant of Antonius, in 39. Antonius governed it by successive officers (Sossius, Plancus, and Bibulus) until his defeat at Actium in 31. In A.D. 639 it was conquered by the Saracens; and during the 10th cent. it formed part of the Fatimite Khalifate, the capital being at Cairo. After many vicissitudes, amongst which were the establishment of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem in the 12th cent. and the invasion by Timur in 1400, it was finally added to the Ottoman Empire by Selim I in 1516. Since the break-up of the Turkish Empire in 1919 it is under the Protectorate of France. During our period there was considerable trade with the West through Beyrout and Alexandretta, Aleppo being its centre.

Milton, P. L. i. 421, speaks of "the brook that parts Egypt from Sn. ground," i.e. the Wady-el-Arish. In Epitaph on March. of Winchester 63, he compares her to Rachel, "That fair Sn. shepherdess Who after years of barrenness The highly favoured Joseph bore To him that served for her before." In P. L. i. 448, he refers to "the Sn. damsels" lamenting the death of Adonis in Antioch. In xi. 218, he relates the story of the heavenly hosts that appeared to defend Elisha in Dothan "against the Sn. king" (see II Kings vi. 8-17). In P. L. i. 474, he refers to the altar which Ahaz saw in Damascus (II Kings xvi. 11) as "one of Sn. mode." In Per. i. prol. 18, Gower says, "This Antioch then; Antiochus the Gt. Built up this city for his chiefest seat, The fairest in all S." In Ant. i. 2, 103, a messenger announces "Labienus . . . hath with his Parthian force Extended Asia from Euphrates; His conquering banner shook from S. To Lydia and Ionia." In iii. 1, 18, Ventidius, returning from the conquest of the Parthians, says, "Sossius, One of my place in S., his [Antony's] lieutenant, For quick accumulation of renown . . . lost his favour." This is not true; Sossius was made governor of S. by Antony in 38 B.C., and continued in his favour until the end. In iii. 6, 10, Caesar says that Antony has made Cleopatra "Of lower S., Cyprus, Lydia, Absolute q." And in line 16, he says, "To Ptolemy he assigned S., Cilicia, and Phœnicia." In v. 2, 200, Dolabella announces to Cleopatra, "Caesar through S. intends his journey." In Brandon's Octavia 489, Octavia asks Antony: "What caused my lord in S. make such stay, Since he 'gainst Parthia did his forces bend?"

In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, Amurack says, "You, Bajazet, go post away apace To S., Scythia, and Albania . . . and all other lands Which owe their homage to high Amurack." The date is the latter part of the 14th cent. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 2, Tamburlaine says to the Egyptian princess, "You shall be in better state Than if you were arrived in S., Even in the circle of your father's arms, The mighty Soldan of Aegyptia." In Ford's Lover's Melan. ii. 1, Aretus announces to the Prince of Cyprus, "Those near parts Of S. that adjoin muster their friends And by intelligence we learn for certain The Sn. will pretend an ancient interest Of tribute intermitted." It is impossible to find any historical foundation for this romantic play. In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 1, Moore says, "The Spanish galleys have beset our ships That lately were bound out for S." In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Deianeira says she does not fear "The Hyrcan tigers or the Sn. wolves." The wolf was common in S., as the parable of the Good Shepherd shows. In Dekker's Babylon 277, the Empress says, "O Sn. panthers! you spend breath most sweet But you are spotted o'er from head to feet." The idea that the panther's breath was fragrant is often met with. In Lyly's Sapho ii. 1, Sybilla speaks of "the Sn. mud which, being made white chalk by the sun, never ceaseth rolling till it lie in the shadow"—a typical bit of Euphuistic natural history. The author of Thracian i. 2 speaks of "that Sn. flower That buds and spreads and withers in an hour." This is a borrowing from Greene's Menaphon.

In Chapman's Trag. Byron iii. 1, Byron says, "In my rising, not the Sn. star That in the Lion's mouth undaunted shines And makes his brave ascension with the sun Was of the Aegyptians with more zeal beheld And made a rule to know the circuit And compass of the year, than I was held When I appeared from battle." The Sn. star is Sirius, the Dog-star, known to the Egyptians as Sothis. In ancient Egypt the length of each year was computed from one heliacal rising of this star to another. But Chapman is mistaken in supposing that it has anything to do with S.; it was called Sirius from its Greek name Seiros, i.e. the hot or scorching star. The constellation of the Dog is not far from that of the Lion, and so the Dog-star may be said to shine undaunted in the Lion's mouth. Spenser, Mother Hubbard 5, calls the Dog-star "the hot Sn. dog": falling into the same error. In Tiberius 152, Asinius speaks of "Sithian baths"; but a comparison with line 167 shows that Sithian is a misprint for Sn., the reference being to such medicinal baths as the Pool of Bethesda at Jerusalem. S., like the rest of the East, was rich in spices. Herrick, in Ode to John Wickes (1647), says, "Crown we our heads with roses then And 'noist with Sn. balm." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit 47, speaks of an imaginary "oil of S. that bereaveth hearing." On p. 101 he says, following Pliny, "Balsamum [will grow] only in S." The Syriac language is akin to the Hebrew, and boasts a very considerable body of literature, especially connected with the early Christian ch. In B. & F. Elder B. i. 2, Andrew explains that Charles's notebooks are "The Sn. character or the Arabic." Very few scholars then knew Syriac.

SYRTES. The old name for 2 bays on the N. coast of Africa, the Syrtis Major being the present Gulf of Sidra and the Minor the Gulf of Gabes. They were supposed to be very dangerous to ships on account of their sandbanks and shallows. The danger was exaggerated; but the coasts are certainly inhospitable.

SYTHIA

SYTHIA

In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says of Alexander : " The Lybick sands and Afric Sirts he passed." In Selimus 462, Baiazet says, " Sooner will the Syrteis' boiling sands Become a quiet road for fleeting ships Than Selimus' heart agree with Selim's lips." In Marmion's Companion iii. 4, Fido says that the Capt. is " as glad he has escaped from me As from the Syrtes." Lyly, in Euphues

Anat. Wit, p. 16, speaks of Euphues as " ready, if thou shun Syrtis, to sink into Symplegades." The word is used generically for a quicksand, or bog. Milton, P. L. ii. 939, speaks of Satan on his flight through Chaos being " Quenched in a boggy Syrtis, neither sea Nor good dry land."

SYTHIA. See SCYTHIA.

TABARD. The famous Inn in Southwark, on the E. side of the Borough High St., opposite to St. Margaret's Ch. It was burnt down in 1676, but rebuilt, its sign being changed to The Talbot. It disappeared in 1876, but its site is marked by Talbot Inn Yard. The old Kent St. has also been re-christened T. St. in its memory Speight, in his edition of Chaucer (1598), says, "A T. is a jacket or sleeveless coat, worn now only by heralds. It is the sign of an inn in Southwarke by Lond., within the which was the lodging of the Abbot of Hyde by Winchester. This was the hostelry where Chaucer and the other pilgrims met together, and with Henry Bailey their host accorded about the manner of their journey to Canterbury." Chaucer, C. T. A. 20, relates how he lay on the night before the pilgrimage "in Southwark at the T." Taylor, in Carrier's Cosmogr., mentions another T. "in Gracious St. near the Conduit."

TÆNARUS, more properly TÆNARUM. The southernmost promontory in Europe, at the south extremity of the Peloponnesus; now Cape Matapan. It was sacred to Poseidon, and the ruins of his temple are still there. Close to the temple was a cave, which was supposed to be the entrance to the infernal regions through which Herakles dragged up the hell-hound Cerberus. In Selimus 1314, Baiazet speaks of "Avernus' jaws and loathsome T. From whence the damned ghosts do often creep." In T. Heywood's S. Age iv., Arethusa says, "My streams issue forth From Tartary by the Tenarian isles." The spring of Arethusa at Syracuse was supposed to have risen in the infernal regions and come to the upper world in the Peloponnesus, whence it flowed under the sea to Sicily. In his Mistress iv. 1, Cupid says, "Not far from T., whose barren top Is crowned with clouds of smoke, there lies a mead." In Lochrine iv. 4, 43, the ghost of Albanact says, "Back will I post to hell-mouth T." In Tiberius 2342, Sejanus says, "Had mounting T. with the snowy Alps And high Olympus overwhelmed the cave, Yet would Sejanus, like Briarius, Have been embowelled in this earthy hell To save the life of great Tiberius." Donne, Elegy xiv. (1600), says of Julia: "Her breath like to the juice in T. That blasts the springs."

TAGUS. The longest river in the Iberian peninsula, rising in the centre of Spain, and falling, after a generally westerly course of abt. 550 m., into the bay of Lisbon. The ancients believed that its sands were rich in gold; but the amount now found in them is inconsiderable.

In Fisher's Fuinus iv. 4, Cæsar says, "In vain doth T. yellow sand obey, If we recoil from hence": where it stands for the whole Iberian peninsula. Cockayne, in verses on Massinger's Emperor, says "Live long, To purify our slighted English tongue, That both the nymphs of T. and of Po May not henceforth despise our language so," i.e. the poets of Portugal and Italy. In Peele's Arraignment ii. 2, Juno promises Paris, "The mould whereon thou treadest shall be of T. sands." In Val. Welsh ii. 4, Caradoc says, "Soldiers have mines of honourable thoughts Beyond the value of rich T. shore." In Cyrus B. 2, Araspes says of Penthea: "Her hair as radiant is as T. sand." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 78, Brandemart speaks of "The sands of T., all of burnished gold." In T. Heywood's Maid of West B. 352, Mullisheg promises "Streams of rewards, richer than T. sands." Dekker, in London's Tempe, speaks of "T. whose golden hands clasp Lisbon walls." In Jonson's King's Entertainment, Tamesis talks of "sands more rich than

T. wealthy ore." In his Poetaster i. 1, Ovid writes of "The banks o'er which gold-bearing T. flows." In his Cynthia v. 3, Crites sentences the actors to "pass, not as Midas did, To wash his gold off into T. stream; But to the well of knowledge, Helicon." This is a curious slip for a scholar like Jonson to make; it was in the Pactolus, not the T., that Midas washed off his gold. In B. & F. Philaster iv. 4, Philaster says, "'Tis not the wealth of T. can weigh down That virtue." In Tailor's Hog hath Lost v. 1, Lightfoot says, "Take then this silver out of hand And bear it to the river T. . . . Whose golden sands upon it cast Transform it into gold at last." In Shirley's Honor iv. 1, Squanderbag says, "Would I were in Pactolus' streams or T., That were a lasting element." In Mason's Mulleasses 2247, Mulleasses speaks of "A carpet richer than . . . T. yellow channel." In Cowley's Riddle iv., Alupis says, "He'll leave that [i.e. poesie] straight When he has got but money; he that swims In T. never will go back to Helicon."

TAILORS HALL. See MERCHANT-TAILORS HALL.

TALBOT. A kind of hunting-hound, used as a book-seller's sign in Lond. It was the badge of the T. family. Three Ladies was "printed by Roger Wade dwelling near Holbourne Conduit at the sign of the T. 1584." T. Heywood's Witches was "printed by Thomas Harper for Benjamin Fisher and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the T. without Aldersgate. 1634."

TALGARTH. A town in Brecknocksh., 8 m. N.E. of Brecknock, close to which rises abruptly the range called the Black Mountains. In Jonson's Wales, when Jenkin asks Evan to "reckon his madestee some of the Welse hills, the mountains," Evan replies: "Why, there is Talgarth." It is possible that either Evan or Jonson confused it with Talsarn, one of the highest peaks in the Black Mountains, in the same county.

TAMAR. A river in S.W. England, forming for a large part of its course the boundary between Devonsh. and Cornwall, and flowing into Plymouth Sound. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 31, calls it "the speedy T. which divides The Cornish and the Devonish confines." Drayton, Polyolb. i. 204, says, "Proud Tamer swoops along, with such a lusty train As fits so brave a flood two countries that divides." In some of the old chroniclers the T., or Tambre, is named as the scene of Arthur's last battle; but it is probable that we should read Cambre for Tambre, and understand the Camel. Hughes, in Misfort. Arth., follows this tradition; in v. 2, Arthur says, "T.'s flood with dropping pace doth flow."

TAME, or THAME. A tributary of the Thames, rising in Bucks., and flowing S.W. into the Thames at Dorchester. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 34, makes "the ancient Thame" the father, and the Isis the mother, of the Thames. Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxiii. 9, says, "Cotswold commends her Isis to the T." It is possible, however, that by T. he means the upper Thames.

TAMES STREET. See THAMES STREET.

TAMWORTH. A town on the borders of Staffs. and Warwicksh., at the junction of the Tame and the Anker, 110 m. N.W. of Lond. and 25 W. of Leicester. Its ancient castle, now the property of the Marquess Townshend, was for a long time the residence of the Kings of Mercia. R3 v. 2 is laid in the camp of Richmond, near T., and, in line 13, Richmond says that Richd. "lies . . . Near to the town of Leicester ; . . . From T. thither is but one day's march." There was an old ballad containing the story of K. Henry IV and the Tanner of T. The story is transferred to Edward IV in T. Heywood's play of that name ; and the Tanner asks : " Didst never hear of John Hobs, the Tanner of T. ? "

TANAIS (now the DON). A large river, rising in a small lake, Ivanofskoe, S. of Moscow, and flowing in a circuitous course of abt. 880 m. to the N.E. corner of the Sea of Azov. The ancients thought that its current was so swift that it never froze ; but it is actually a sluggish stream, and its waters are very muddy. It was regarded as the boundary between Europe and Asia. In Cyrus D. 4, Dinon says to Libanio, " Rather than thou shalt be touched by him, I'll bear thee hence as far as T." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, Marsilius speaks of " T., whose swift-declining floods Invirons rich Europa to the N." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 4, Cato speaks, very inappropriately, of " silver-streaming T." In Marston's Insatiate v. 1, Sago mentions T., Nilus, and Tioris [i.e. Tigris] as amongst the great rivers of the world. In Marlowe's Ed. II iv. 2, the Q. says to Sir John of Henault, " Even to the utmost verge Of Europe, or the shore of Tanaise, Will we with thee to Henault." In May's Agrippina ii. 57, Otho says that if Poppæa lay beyond " The Indian Ganges, Scythian T.," she would draw the Emperor thither. Drayton, Polyolb. xv. 249, says, " Europe and Asia keep on T. either side."

TANEER (i.e. TANGIER). The principal spt. of Morocco, on the Straits of Gibraltar, 14 m. E. of Cape Spartel. It is on the site of the Roman Tingis. In Stucley 2195, Antonia speaks of " Three thousand threescore special men of arms, The garrison of Taneer"—evidently a misprint for T. In 2568, Abdelmelek says, " Fetch me one drop of water, any man, And I will give him T.'s wealthy town."

TANGAY. Possibly the language of Tangier, the Moorish name of which is Tanja ; or it may be the Taranji dialect of the Turkish language, spoken in part of central Asia ; or the Tunguse dialect of central Siberia. In Ford's Sacrifice iii. 2, Mauroccio says of the disguised Roselli : " Had you heard him deliver whole histories in the Tangay tongue, you would swear there were not such a linguist breathed again."

TANGIER (see TANEER). In Peele's Alcazar i. 2, 58, the Moor says, " Our Moors shall sail in ships and pinnaces From Tangier-shore unto the gates of Fess."

TANTON. See TAUNTON.

TAPHIAE. A group of islands off the W. coast of Greece, between Leucas and Acarnania. They were originally called the Teleboides, and were said to have been subdued by the Theban hero, Amphitryon. In Hercules iv. 3, 2310, Amphitruo exclaims : " Did I conquer the Taphians ? "

TAPPINGTON. A manor-house in Kent, near Wootton, 7 m. N.W. of Dover. It has become famous through the Ingoldsby Legends ; but it is doubtful whether Jonson had any particular place in his mind in this jingle from his Gipsies, where the Patricio describes the Gipsies as " Born first at Niglington, Bred up at Filching-ton, Boarded at Tappington, Bedded at Wappington."

TAPROBANE. The old Greek name for the island of Ceylon. In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 3, Marsilius speaks of the lands " From sevenfold Nilus to Taprobany." It is the scene of Greene's Alcida, where it is described as " an island situated far S. under the pole Antartick, where Canopius the fair star gladdeth the heart of the inhabitants." Harrison, in Descrip. of England (1587), says, " Many strange herbs, plants, and annual fruits are daily brought unto us from the Indies, Americans, T., Canary Isles, and all parts of the world." Drayton, in a note on Polyolb. x. 220, speaks of " the East-Indian Taproban, now called Sumatra." This is a mistake. Milton, P. R. iv. 75, calls it " utmost Indian isle T."

TARENTUM, now TARANTO. An important spt. in S. Italy, at the N.W. point of the Gulf of T., 260 m. S.E. of Rome. It was originally a Spartan colony, but eventually fell under the sway of Rome. After many vicissitudes it was taken by Robert Guiscard in 1063, and from that time onward formed part of the kingdom of Naples. It formerly had a fine harbour, and was an important naval station in the time of the later Roman republic ; but the harbour is largely silted up, and few remains are left of the ancient city. It is the see of an Archbp. The wool of T. was of the finest quality. In Ant. iii. 7, 22, Antony asks : " Is it not strange That from T. and Brundisium He [Cæsar] could so quickly cut the Ionian Sea And take in Tornyne ? " In Brandon's Octavia 218, Titus says, " The seas Delivered unto us the perfect view Of dreadful Tarent, where for us did wait Antonius' fleet." In Massinger's Very Woman, one of the characters is Don John Antonio, Prince of Tarent, and in i. 1, the Viceroy says to him, " Though you are Prince of Tarent, Yet, being a subject of the K. of Spain, No privilege of Sicily can free you From the municipal statutes of that kingdom." In B. & F. Double Mar. i. 1, Juliana says, " I have heard that he [Ferrand of Naples] sold the bishopric of Tarent to a Jew for 13,000 ducats." Hall, Sat. iv. 4, says, " Who had seen the lambs of Tarentine May guess what Gallio his manners been." Fynes Moryson, Itin. iii. 3, 142, says that the wool of Lemster is the best in Europe " excepting Apulia and T."

TARIFA. A fortified maritime town at the extreme S. point of Spain, 16 m. W. of Gibraltar. In Peele's Alcazar iv., the Moor says, " Say you do march upon Tarifa now, The foe . . . will let the passage of the river." The Qq. read Tarissa, which I suspect is a misprint for Tarifa, facilitated by the long s's which are so easily confused with f's. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, John says, " I am a bull of Tarifa, wild, mad for thee."

TARLTON. The sign of an inn in Colchester, named after the famous clown, Richd. T. Here Cuckqueans was first performed. In the prologue, spoken by T.'s Ghost, he speaks of " My countryman Mr. Pigot his Inn, even the right well-known and kenne'd resemblance or statue of the right worshipful Mr. T., in Colchester."

TARPEIAN ROCK. A steep cliff of the Capitoline Hill at Rome ; some place it at the W. edge of the Hill, where the Piazza Montanara now is ; others more probably locate it on the S.E. of the Hill near Sta. Maria della Consolazione. It is often used as a synonym for the Capitol itself, on which stood the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. It was the custom in ancient Rome to hurl condemned criminals from the T.R. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii., Earth asks : " Where's Pharos' isle ? where's the T. mass, A structure none more famous ? " In Fisher's Fuimus v. 6, Caesar says, " Now the T. r. o'erlooks the world." In B. & F. Friends ii. 1, Titus says, " On his high altar, to T. Jove, A milk-white bull with gilded horns we'll offer." Milton, P. R. iv. 49, says, " There the Capitol thou seest Above the rest lifting his stately head On the T. r., her citadel Impregnable." In Cor. iii. 1, 213, Sicinius says of Coriolanus : " Bear him to the rock T. and from thence Into destruction cast him." In line 266, he says, "He shall be thrown down the T. r." In iii. 2, Coriolanus says, "Let them . . . pile 10 hills on the T. r. . . yet will I still Be thus to them"; and in iii. 3, 88, "Let them pronounce the steep T. death." In iii. 3, 103, Sicinius says, "We banish him our city In peril of precipitation From off the rock T., never more To enter our Rome gates." In Barnes' Charter iii. 1, Philipppo says, "I'd rather choose from the Tarpayan Hill My vexed body to precipitate."

TARRACON, now TARRAGONA. A spt. on the E. coast of Spain, abt. 45 m. S.W. of Barcelona. It was founded by the Carthaginians, but it was taken by Scipio in the 2nd Punic War. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 5, a messenger brings word: "New Carthage, Sagunt, Locris, Tarracon, All these are re-o'ercome by Scipio."

TARSUS. An ancient city of Cilicia in S.E. Asia Minor, on the Cydnus. It was the residence of the Kings of Cilicia, and was reputed to be wealthy and luxurious. It was here that the meeting of Antony and Cleopatra took place described so vividly in Ant. ii. 2. It is most celebrated as the birth-place of the apostle Paul. In Per. i. 2, 115, Pericles announces: "I to T. Intend my travel"; i. 4 and iv. 1 are laid at T. In i. 4, 21, Cleon the Governor says, "This T., o'er which I have the government, A city on whom plenty held full hand, For riches strewed herself even in the streets, Whose towers bore heads so high they kissed the clouds." He goes on to tell of its present miseries, and warns other prosperous cities that "The misery of T. may be theirs." In ii. 1, prol. 11, Gower informs us that Pericles "is still at T." Milton, P. L. i. 200, speaks of "Typhon whom the den By ancient T. held." Pindar, Pythian Odes i. 16, places the home of Typhoeus in a cave in Cilicia. In S. A. 515, the chorus compares Dalila to "a stately ship of T." Milton is probably thinking of the ships of Tarshish, often mentioned in the Old Testament; Ramsay identifies Tarshish with T., but others prefer Tartessus in Spain, or Tiras, i.e. Tyrrhenian.

TARTARIA, or TARTARY (Ty. = Tartary, Tr. = Tartar, Ta. = Tartaria, Tan. = Tartarian). The country of the Tartars, or, as it should be spelt, Tatars—the extra r was probably inserted through the influence of the Greek-Lat. Tartarus. As a geographical term, Ty. was used somewhat vaguely by the Elizabethans for the part of Asia N. of the Caucasus and the Himalayas. Heylyn speaks of it as stretching from the Eastern Sea to Muscovy, and from the North Sea to the Caucasus. The Trs. were first known in Europe through the conquests of Jenghiz Khan in the 13th cent., and all his motley crowd of Mongols, Turks, and Trs. proper were included under the one common name. In Peele's Old Wives 885, Eumenides says, "I sailed up Danuby As far as Saba, whose enhancing streams Cut 'twixt the Trs. and the Russians." So in Greene's Orlando i. 1, 67, Mandrecarde says, "I crossed up Danuby As high as Saba, whose inhancing streams Cuts 'twixt the Tartares and the Russians." The Saba is the modern Save. In Dekker's If it be 277, Ruffman says, "A Shalkan Tr. being my grandfather Men call me Shalkan Bohor." Hycke, p. 88, claims to have travelled in "Caldey, Tartare, and Inde." Milton, P. L. iii. 432, speaks of "the roving Tr. whose home is bounded by the snowy ridge Of Mt. Imaus," i.e. the Bolor range running from the N.E. corner of Afghanistan to the Arctic Ocean.

In Chapman's Alphonsus iv. 2, 6, Alphonsus, who has been poisoned, cries: "Water, I say! Water from forth the cold Tan. hills!"

Chaucer's Squire's Tale is located "At Sarray in the land of Tartarye," i.e. Tzarev, near Sarepta, where Batu Khan, one of the grandsons of Jenghiz Khan, held his court and ruled over S. Russia in the early part of the 13th cent. But Chaucer confuses him with the other grandson of Jenghiz, Kublai Khan, whose capital was Cambaluc, now Peking. Moreover, he calls him Cambinskan, "this Tartre"; which is a corruption of Jenghiz Khan. Milton, referring to Chaucer's story, in Il Pens. 115, speaks of the "wondrous horse of brass On which the Tr. k. did ride." In Dekker's Fortunatus ii. prol., the chorus informs us that Fortunatus "has feasted in the Tr.'s palace." As the date is the reign of Athelstan, this is a little anachronistic. In Selinus 53, Baizet says, "Ramirchan The Tan. emperor, gathering to him A number numberless of big-boned Trs., Encountered me." There is a fictitious K. of Ty. in Kirke's Champions. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Cosroes says to his brother, the K. of Persia, "Now Turks and Trs. shake their swords at thee"; and in iii. 3, Zabina speaks of Tamburlaine as "the great Tn. thief." He was the great-great-grandson of Karachar Nevian, the commander of the forces of Jenghiz Khan. He was born near Samarcand, and his victorious career covered the 2nd half of the 14th cent. In B. & F. Subject ii. 3, a post brings word to the Russian Court: "The Tr.'s up, and with a mighty force Comes forward like a tempest." Milton, P. L. x. 431, describes the Tr. retiring "from his Russian foe By Astracan, over the snowy plains." The Russians and Trs. were constantly at war. The K. or emperor of Ty. was called the Cham or the Gt. Cham. The word is derived from the Turkish Khan or Chagan, meaning Lord. The title was first assumed by Jenghiz in the 13th cent., when he became chief of the Mongols and Trs. In Ado ii. 1, 277, Benedick says that, rather than face Beatrice, "I will fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard." In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 5, Albumazar pretends that he has been engaged in "casting the nativity o' th' Cham of Ty." In Shirley's Imposture v. 1, Pandolfo proposes "a health to the Grand Cham of Ta." In Beguiled 760, Sophos speaks of "The great Tan. emperor, Tamor Cham," i.e. Timur, or Tamburlaine. Heylyn says of the Trs.: "The people are very warlike, strong in matters of action, fearless of the greatest dangers, and patient of labour and want." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar says, "Thee [Rome] The stern Tan., born to manage arms, Doth fear." They were, like the Cosacks, famous riders. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine boasts of his "Brave horses bred o' the white Tan. hills."

They were reputed to be excellent archers. In M. N. D. iii. 2, 101, Puck says, "Look how I go Swifter than arrow from the Tr.'s bow." In Rom. i. 4, 5, Benvolio says, "We'll have no Cupid hoodwinked with a scarf Bearing a Tr.'s painted bow of lath." In B. & F. Hum. Lieut. i. 1, Antigonus says of his son: "He shall make their fortunes, all as sudden As arrows from a Tr.'s bow, and speeding." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 11, 26, says, "In his flight the villain turned his face, As wounts the Tr. by the Caspian lake When as the Russian him in flight does chase." Spenser was thinking of the Parthian bowmen, who shot backwards at their pursuing foes. The Trs. were nomadic in their habits. Heylyn says, "They count it great misery to stay longer in a place than the pastures afford meat for their cattle. They live together in troops which they call hordes." In Davenant's Wits i. 2, Thwack talks of having "a volatile ache that removes oftener than the Trs.' camp." In Davenant's Albivine iii. 1, Grimold says, "I travel like a Tr. with all my family about me." In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Jolly says to Cutter and Worm, "If ye lived like Trs. in a cart . . . your home could not be more uncertain." The cruelty and savagery of the Trs. were proverbial. Heylyn says, "They are barbarous everywhere in behaviour." In Merch. iv. 1, 62, the D. speaks of "stubborn Turks and Trs., never trained To offices of tender courtesy." In All's iv. 4, 7, Helena says, "Gratitude Through flinty Tr.'s bosom would peep forth And answer, Thanks." In Ed. III i. 1, the K. speaks of "such sweet laments that it may raise drops in a Tr.'s eye." In Kirke's Champions iii. 1, Ormandine speaks of the "cruel Tr. and Arabian kings"; and the lord mentions the Trs.' cruelty and Tr. tyranny. In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Vittoria says, "Let me appeal then from this Christian court To the uncivil Tr."

They were reported to be specially cruel and heartless in their treatment of their wives and daughters. In Davenant's Albivine ii. 1, Hermagils says, "The dry Tr. yokes his female's neck With rusty iron." In Massinger's Lover i. 2, Gonzaga says of his daughter: "I should unnaturally forget I am a father If, like a Tr., or for fear or profit, I should consign her as a bondwoman To be disposed of at another's pleasure." The Trs. are described by Heylyn as "swarthy, not so much by the heat of the sun as their own sluttishness; ill-favoured, thick-tipped, slit-nosed, broad-shouldered, swift of foot, laborious, and vigilant." Hakluyt speaks of their "long black hair, broad faces, and flat noses." In M. N. D. iii. 2, 263, Lysander cries to Hermia: "Out, tawny Tr.!" In Muc. iv. i. 29, amongst the ingredients of the witches' cauldron are "Nose of Turk and Tr.'s lips." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. ii. 1, Hippolito taunts Bellafront with enduring the love of any man: "Be he a Moor, a Tr., though his face Looked uglier than a dead man's skull." Tan. is used in the sense of a thief. In Merry Devil i. 2, the Host says to Sir Arthur, "there's not a Tan. nor a carrier shall breathe upon your geldings." In Wandering Jew i. 1, the Hangman says to the Jew, "If any thieving Tan. shall break in upon you, I will with both hands nimbly lend a cast of my office to him." This is perhaps the meaning in M. W. W. iv. 5, 21, where the Host calls to Falstaff, in reference to poor innocent Simple, "Here's a Bohemian-Tr. carries the coming down of thy fat woman." In Cowley's Cutter v. 2, Worm, disguised as an African merchant, pretends that he has been taken prisoner in Guinea by "the Tans." When Jolly objects "They live up in the N.," Puny replies: "These were another nation of Tans. that lived in the S.!" Cloth of Tars or Ty. was a silken stuff imported from China. In Chaucer's C. T. A. 2160, the "cote armure" of Emetrius, the K. of Inde, is "of clooth of Tars." Lydgate, in Min. Poems 30, says, "Thi Chekes hangen, thyn eyene was read as wyne, And wel belyned with good read tartyne."

TARTARUS, or TARTARY (Ty. = Tartary, Tr. = Tartar). According to Homer, a prison as far below Hades as Hades is below the earth, where Zeus confined the Titans after their rebellion. Later writers use it as the name of the place of punishment for the wicked; and so it comes to be a synonym for Hell. In Tw. N. ii. 5, 225, when Maria says, "If you will see it, follow me," Sir Toby rejoins: "To the gates of Tr., thou most excellent devil of wit." In H5 ii. 2, 123,

Henry says the devil "might return to vasty Tr. back And tell the legions 'I can never win A soul as easy as that Englishman's.'" In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Pope Alexander speaks of "counsels held with black Tartarian fiends." In Ev. Wom. I. ii. 3, Acutus says, "She that loves true learning and impiet disdains Treads on T. and Olympus gains." In T. Heywood's Gold. Age ii. 1, Homer says, "Pluto the youngest . . . was sent to Ty., Where he in process a strange city built And called it Hell." In Brewer's Lovesick iv., Grim says of his colliers: "They are honest Tartarians," i.e. they are honest, though they look black like devils. In Grim i. 1, Malbecco's Ghost addresses Pluto as "Infernal Jove, great prince of Ty." In T. Heywood's S. Age iv., Arethusa says, "My streams issue forth from Ty." (see ARETHUSA). In Lochrine i. 1, 75, Thrasimachus says, "We will boldly enterprise the same Were it to enter to black T. Where triple Cerberus with his venomous throat Scareth the ghosts." In Trouble. Reign. Haz., p. 270, Arthur says to Hubert, who is about to burn out his eyes, "Let the black tormentors of deep Ty. Upbraid them with this damned enterprise." In Milton P. L. ii. 859, Sin says that God "hath hither thrust me down Into this gloom of T. profound." In vi. 54, the place into which the fallen angels were precipitated is "the gulf Of T." Milton uses the forms Tartarean and Tartareous to mean hellish; in P. L. ii. 69, Moloch proposes to make war on the Almighty, that he may see "His throne itself Mixed with Tartarean sulphur and strange fire"; and in vii. 238, the poet speaks of "The black, Tartareous, cold, infernal dregs" of Chaos. In Mason's Mulleasses 1756, Borgias bids Timocles "Like a Fury post to T." Spenser, F. Q. i. 7, 44, speaks of "An huge great dragon, horrible in sight, Bred in the loathly lakes of T." T. is used for any prison. In Err. iv. 2, 32, Dromio says of his master, who has been arrested: "He's in Tr. limbo, worse than hell."

TARTARY. See TARTARIA and TARTARUS.

TARTESSUS. A town and dist. in ancient Spain, near the mouth of the Guadalquivir, a little N. of Cadiz. It has been by some identified with the Tarshish of the Old Testament. In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises Physander, amongst other delicacies, "Tartesian lampreys."

TARTOLE, or TARTOLI. A fishing town on the E. coast of Sardinia, abt. 60 m. N.E. of Cagliari. In Nash's Summers, p. 70, Christmas, providing for his feasts, says "I must rig ship . . . to Tartole for lampreys."

TAUNTON. A town in Somerset on the Tone, in the lovely valley of T.-Deane, 163 m. S.W. of Lond. Its castle was founded by Ine, K. of the W. Saxons; but the oldest part of the present buildings dates from the reign of Henry I. In Ford's Warbeck v. 1, Dalvell tells Katharine, the wife of Warbeck, "Your husband marched to T., and was there affronted by K. Henry's chamberlain." In J. Heywood's Weather 100, Merry Report says, "I have been at T., at Tiptree, and at Tottenham." In Brome's Sparagus ii. 3, Hoyden says, "I was counted a pretty spark at home. Did you never hear of little Tim of T.?" In v. 13, Tom says, "Who comes here? My brother Tim, drest like Master Mayor's wife of T.-Deane." Brome, in epilogue to Ct. Beggar, says of himself: "He has made the Antipodes; and (oh! I shall ne'er forget!) Tom Hoyden of T. Deane." Tom should be Tim, who is a comic personage in the Sparagus Garden. Drayton, Polyolb. iii. 418, asks: "What ear so empty is that hath not heard the sound Of T.'s fruitful Deane? not matched by any ground."

TAURIC POOL

TAURIC POOL. The Sea of Azov, the ancient Palus Mæotis, q.v. It lies E. of the Tauric Chersonese, now the Crimea. Milton, P. R. iv. 79, speaks of the "Sarmatians north Beyond Danubius to the Tauric Pool."

TAURIS, now TABREEZ. A city in N.W. Persia, on the Aigi, 36 m. E. of Lake Urumiyeh. It was once a very important place, and had a population of over half a million. Milton, P. L. x. 436, speaks of the Bactrian Sophi, i.e. the Sultan of Persia, retreating from the Turks "To Tauris or Casbeen."

TAURUS. A range of lofty mountains in S.E. Asia Minor between Cappadocia and Cilicia. The highest peaks are snow-clad all the year round. In M. N. D. iii. 2, 141, Demetrius says, "That pure congealed white, high T. snow, Turns to a crow when thou hold'st up thy hand." In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 1, Cæsar says, "Stern Mars, roar as thou didst at Troy, Which Pindus may re-beat and T. lough the same": where lough means low, in the sense of bellow, doubtless with a reference to the meaning of T., a bull; though the name of the range is not derived from that, but from the Armenian Tur, a high mtn. In Tiberius 2154, Maximus relates that in his journey to Armenia Germanicus came to Lisimachium; "Thence to the mtn. T. marched by land."

TAURUS. The Tauric Chersonese; the old name of the peninsula on the N. shore of the Black Sea now called the Crimea. In Coventry M. P. of the Nativity, one of the 3 Kings who come to visit the infant Christ is "K. of T., Sir Jaspar." In Nero ii. 2, Cornutus says, "Oh! let me go And dwell in T., dwell in Ethiopie, So that I do not dwell at Rome with thee."

TAVISTOCK. A town in Devonsh., 15 m. N. of Plymouth. It grew up round the Abbey of SS. Mary and Rumon, founded in 961. The Abbey ch. was rebuilt in 1285, and the Abbey itself in 1457. Sir Francis Drake was a T. man, and so was William Browne, author of the masque Ulysses and Circe (1615). In Thersites 219, Mater, in her charm for worms, invokes "The tapper of T. and the tapster's pot." In Devonshire i. 2, the Devonshire merchant says, "Would all the sacks we have bought were in Devonshire turned to small beer, so we were but in T. to see it drawn out." The hero of the play is Richard Pike of T.

TEDBURY. See TUDBURY.

TELASSAR, i.e. the hill of Assur, a city in Mesopotamia, stated, in II Kings xix. 12, to have been the home of the "children of Eden." Beth-Eden, or Bit-Adini, was in W. Mesopotamia, S. of Edessa, between the Balikh and the Euphrates, E. of Aleppo. Milton, P. L. iv. 214, says that Eden extended from Auran to "where the sons of Eden long before Dwelt in Telassar."

TELEBOIANS. The inhabitants of the islands called Teleboides, a small group off the W. coast of Greece, between Leucas and Acarnania. They were said to have been subdued by Amphitryon of Thebes, and are mentioned in Plautus' play Amphitruo, in which Jupiter impersonates Amphitryon. In T. Heywood's S. Age ii. 1, Jupiter says, "I, as great general to the Theban k., Marched 'gainst the Teleboans." In Hercules prol. 81, Mercury says, "This is Amphitruo his house, A great lord of this country, under K. Creon, And now at this instant his deputy-general Of his army against the Teleboians."

TEMES STREET. See THAMES STREET.

TEMPE. A valley in N.E. Thessaly between Mts. Olympus and Ossa. It is a narrow gorge abt. 5 m. long, and at its narrowest part not more than 100 yards wide. The river Peneius runs through it. Its natural beauty is a common theme with the classical poets, and the tradition has passed to the moderns; though, as a matter of fact, it is rather rugged and grand than silvan and pastoral. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar says, "The flying Pompey to Larissa hastes, And by Thessalian T. shapes his course Where fair Peneus tumbles up his waves." This was after the battle of Pharsalia. In Brome's Lovesick Ct. iii. 3, Philargus writes: "Meet me within 3 hours in the north vale of T." The scene of the play is laid in Thessaly. In Noble Ladies, Cyprian says, "We'll ride together to fruitful Thessalia where in fair T. we'll sport us under a pavilion of Tyrian scarlet." In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5240, Io says, "Here, Daphne, by your father Peneus' streams Which, falling from the top of Pindus, Waters Hemonian T., let us sit." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 4, Fastidius Brisk promises: "He shall behold all the delights of the Hesperides, the Insulæ Fortunatæ, Adonis' gardens, T., or what else." In Shirley's Master iii. 3, Octavio says to Domitilla, "All the delights that dwell in blessed T. Divinely bud and blossom in your cheek." In his Pleasure v. 1, Celestina talks of a valley "that shall shame All the delights of T." In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 5, Scipio says, "Spring should always dwell within your gardens as if T. were translated thither." In Ford's Lover's Melan. i. 1, Menaphon says, "The tales Which poets of an elder time have feigned To glorify their T. bred in me Desire of visiting that paradise. To Thessaly I came." Sidney, in Astrophel lxxiv. 2, says, "I . . . never did in shade of T. sit." Drayton, in Idea liii. 13, says, "Fair Arden, thou my T. art alone." Drayton was born in the Arden dist. of Warwicksh. In Mason's Mulleasses 2246, Mulleasses speaks of "A carpet richer than the breast of T."

TEMPLE, LONDON (Tr. = Templar). A piece of land in Lond., lying S. of the W. end of Fleet St., between it and the Thames, and extending from Bouverie St. to Essex St. Formerly it included the Outer T., to the W. of Essex St. In 1118 the Knights Trs. obtained a settlement in Lond., in Holborn; this Old T. stood on the site now occupied by Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, and extended as far as Holborn. In 1184 they removed to the site S. of Fleet St. which was long called the New T., and included the Outer, Middle, and Inner T. There they built a Refectory, afterwards used as the Inner T. Hall, and the glorious ch. which, happily, still remains. The Hall was rebuilt on the old foundations in 1870. The first portion of the Ch. to be erected was the W. end, known as the Round; it was designed in imitation of the Ch. of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, and dates from 1185. The Oblong, or Choir, was added in 1240. After suffering many things at the hands of restorers, the worst of which was the destruction in 1825 of the chapel of St. Anne S. of the Round, it was brought back, as nearly as possible, to its original condition in 1842, and many disfiguring accretions were removed. In the Round are the cross-legged effigies of many of the old Knights; and many other distinguished people are buried there, including William of Pembroke and his 2 sons, the learned Selden, and Richd. Martin, to whom Jonson dedicated his Poetaster. During our period the Round was used, like the middle aisle of St. Paul's, as a meeting-place for lawyers and their clients. When the Trs. were suppressed in 1313 Edward II granted their property to Thomas of Lancaster; when he was beheaded in 1322

it went to Aylmer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, and from him to Hugh le Despenser. In 1324, however, it was handed over by Act of Parliament to the Knights Hospitallers of St. John, though they did not actually get possession till 1338; and they leased the Inner and Middle T. to the lawyers, the Outer having been already given to the Bp. of Exeter for his town-house. It is not certain whether the 2 Inns of Court, as they were now called, were originally separate, but they were early divided into the 2 Legal Colleges of the Inner and Middle T. Henceforward a Tr. means not a warrior-priest, but a gentleman of the Long Robe. The Inner T. used the Refectory of the old Knights as its Hall; but both this and most of the other buildings of the Inner T. perished in the Gt. Fire. The gate-house in Fleet St. erected in the 5th year of James I escaped—and still remains at 17 Fleet St. turned into a hairdresser's shop. The Ch. was used in common by the 2 Inns. The Middle T. Gate was erected in 1684 and replaced an older gate built by Wolsey. The Hall was built in 1572, and is one of the finest specimens of Elizabethan architecture surviving at the present day. In it Tw. N. was first performed on Feb. 2nd, 1601. The T. Gardens, lying between the buildings and the Thames, and including the famous Fountain Court, are still as delightful as ever. It was customary to hold "revels" in the Halls of the T. from time to time; and the Trs. not infrequently prepared Masques on a magnificent scale to present before the King and Court. Noteworthy amongst them are Chapman's Masque of the Middle T. and Lincoln's Inn and Beaumont's Masque of the Inner T. and Gray's Inn, both presented in 1613 in honour of the wedding of the Princess Elizabeth; Browne's Ulysses and Circe, an Inner T. Masque of 1615; Marston's Inner-Middle T. Masque of Heroes of 1619; and Shirley's Triumph of Peace, given by all the Inns of Court in 1634. Amongst our dramatists, Francis Beaumont and William Browne were members of the Inner, John Marston and John Ford of the Middle T. Chaucer is said to have belonged to the Inner T., but the evidence is not conclusive. One of his Pilgrims (C. T. A. 567) was "A gentil Maunciple of a t. Of maistres hadde he mo than thries ten That weren of lawe expert and curious." Spenser, in Prothalamion 133, commemorates "those bricky towers The which on Thames broad, ancient back do ride Where now the studious lawyers have their bowers; There whilom wont the Templer Knights to bide, Till they decayed through pride."

The Temple in General. In H6 A. ii. 5, 19, the gaoler says to Mortimer, "Richd. Plantagenet, my lord, will come; We sent unto the T., unto his chamber." Jonson, in Underwoods xxx., satirizes the land-pirates who "man out their boats to the T., i.e. go there to beg, borrow, or steal money. In Mayne's Match i. 1, Seathrift says of his nephew: "I have not forgot his riots at the T." Students were students then as now, and had their raggings and riots from time to time. In Davenant's Wits v., Mrs. Snore says, "I was fain to invite thy clerk to a fee-pie, sent me by a T.-cook, my sister's sweetheart." A T.-cook is a lawyer, a fee-pie a writ. In Stucley 149, Old Stucley says, "I'll to the T. to see my son." But Stucley was never a member of the T. In Brome's Damozelle ii. 1, Oliver asks: "Where is Brookall's son? He had a hopeful one, and at 16 A student here i' the T."

Templar in the sense of a Knight Templar.—Fynes Moryson, Itin. i. 84, speaks of "the Priory of St. John, belonging of old to the Templary Knights, and now to the Knights of Rhodes or Malta." Blount, Glossogr. (s.v. TEMPLARIES) says, "These Trs. first founded and built the Temples or Tr's. Inne in Fleet-street." In Rabelais i. 5, Gargantua says, "I drink no more than a sponge; I drink like a T. Knight."

Tr. in the Sense of a Lawyer.—In Puritan i. 2, Pyebord says, "Let's spend with judgment, like a sober and discreet Templer." In Ret. Pernass. ii. 4, Stercutio says, "You must pardon me—I did not know you were a gentleman of the T. before." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 1, Moll, who is dressed as a man, professes to be "one of the T." In his Michaelmas ii. 3, Quomodo says his son "was a Cambridge man; but now he's a Templer." In Cartwright's Ordinary ii. 1, Have-at-all, boasting of the valour he intends to display in a st. fight, says, "None shall hold back this fatal arm; the Templers shall not dare to attempt a rescue." In Cuckqueans i. 2, Shift says, "If so I see a Termer trudgeth toward the T., I take him by the sleeve."

The Temple Church.—In B. & F. Captain ii. 2, Clara says, "I would have him buried, even as he lies, Cross-legged, like one of the Trs." In Brome's Couple i. 1, Careless says, "I will rather walk down to the T. and lay myself down alive in the old synagogue cross-legged among the monumental knights." In Penn. Parl. 38, it is provided: "The images in the T. ch., if they rise again, shall have commission to dig down Charing Cross with their fauchions." In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Face says, "Here's one desires You meet him in the T. ch. some half-hour hence And upon earnest business." Later he says, "The T. ch., there have I cast my angle." Surly, however, fails to appear, and in iii. 2, Face says, "I have walked the Round till now, and no such thing!" Middleton, in Hubbard, p. 67, says, "He had made choice of a lawyer, a mercer, and a merchant, who that morning were appointed to meet in the T. ch." W. Rowley, in Search 27, says, "Now we were entred the T. . . . there the pillars were hung with poor men's petitions; nay, the very T. it self stood without his cap and so had stood many years; . . . somewhat had been gathered in his behalf, but not half enough to supply his necessity." The building had fallen into disrepair in the early part of the 17th cent.

The Temple Hall.—In H4 A. iii. 3, 223, Prince Hal says, "Jack, meet me tomorrow in the t. hall at 2 o'clock in the afternoon." In H6 A. ii. 4, 3, Suffolk says, "Within the T.-hall we were too loud; The garden here is more convenient." In both cases the Inner T. Hall is historically the one intended.

The Temple Gate.—In Killigrew's Parson i. 1, the Capt. says of a beggar: "He would dive at Westminster like a dab-chick, and rise again at T.-gate."

Temple Gardens.—The scene of H6 A. ii. 4 is laid in the T. Garden, where the white and red roses are plucked that are to be the badges of the rival houses of York and Lancaster. In line 125, Warwick says, "This brawl today, Grown to this faction in the T. garden, Shall send, between the red rose and the white, A thousand souls to death." In Davenant's Wits iv., Thrift says that nothing is needed for the funeral but "a little rosemary, which thou may'st steal from the T. garden." In Middleton's Hubbard, p. 67, he says, "They appointed us near the T. Garden to attend their Counsellor." In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Jolly chaffs Cutter and Worm on taking "melancholy turns in the T. walks" and saying to the people they meet: "You wonder why your lawyer stays so long."

The Temples Distinguished by Name.—In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 2, Warwick asks: "Where shall this meeting be?" and the Archbp. replies: "At the New T." This was before the coming of the lawyers to the T.; it is called New in distinction from the Old T. in Holborn. In Ret. Pernass. iii. 1, Sir Raderick says, "I am going to speak with an unthrif I should meet at the Middle T. about a purchase." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 323, a Lord says of Dr. Parry: "He did intend the murder of a gentleman, one Mr. Hare here, of the Inner T."

Temple Masques and Revels.—In Dekker's Satiro. v. 2, 238, Sir Vaughan says to Horace (Jonson): "You shall swear not to bumbast out a new play with the old linings of jests stolen from the Ts.' revels." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 2, Sim suggests that Bloodhound should make the bones of a delinquent debtor into dice, "and then 'tis but letting Master Alexander carry them next Christmas to the T., he'll make 100 marks a night of them." Gambling became so rife in the T. that it was forbidden except during Christmas.

Booksellers Near the Temple.—Dekker's Wonder was "printed by Robert Haworth for Nicholas Vavasour and are to be sold at his shop in the T. near the Ch. door. 1636." Noble Soldier was "printed for Nicholas Vavasour and are to be sold at his shop in the T. near the Ch. 1634." Davenant's Platonic was "printed for Richd. Meigen next to the Middle T. in Fleet St. 1636." See also INNER TEMPLE, INNS OF COURT, MIDDLE TEMPLE.

TEMPLE BAR. A gate marking the limit of the jurisdiction of the city of Lond., at the W. end of Fleet St. It was probably at first merely a set of posts and a chain, and is first mentioned in Rolls of Parliament (1314-5) as "La barre du Novel T. de Lundres." But a building of some sort must soon have been erected, for in 1358 we find it used as a prison. In 1381 it was burned down by Wat Tyler and his crowd; and was replaced by what Stow describes as a house of timber erected across the st., with a narrow gateway, and an entry on the S. side under the house. This was the T. B. as Shakespeare knew it. In 1670 it was taken down and a new gate of Portland stone built from Wren's designs. Until 1753 it was closed every night. Traitors' heads were exhibited on the top of it until as late as 1772, when the last of these grisly trophies was blown down. The Gate was removed in 1878 because of its obstruction to traffic, and its place marked by the notorious Griffin. Happily it was re-erected at Theobalds in 1888, each stone having been marked so that it could be exactly replaced. For a long time the room over the Gate was occupied by Child's Bank and used as a store-room for old ledgers and account-books. Skelton, in Colin Clout 821, scoffs at Dr. Daupatus for not being able to tell "How far T. B. is From the seven starris." In his Elynor Rummyn iv., drunken Alice tells "that there hath been great war between T. B. and the Cross in Cheape." The reference is to the fights between the law students of the T. and the prentices of Cheapside, like the Town and Gown fights at Oxford and Cambridge. In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says, "A number of better things between Westminster Bdge. and T. B. are fallen to decay since Charing fell." In Trag. Richd. II v. 3, 75, Nimble says, "Nay, I have studied for my learning; I can tell you, my lord, there was not a stone between Westminster Hall and T. B. but I have told them every morning." The law-students spent their time between the Inns of Court in the T. and the Courts in Westminster Hall. In Marmion's Companion v. 2, Lackwit says of a newly-married couple: "If I had not been they had been as far asunder as T.-B. and Aldgate," i.e. the whole width of the city. In Brome's Northern ii. 5, Pate promises: "Thou shalt start up as pretty a gentleman usher as any between T.-B. and Charing Cross." The Strand was then the fashionable quarter of Lond. In Shirley's Pleasure i. 2, Celestina, who is intent on becoming a lady of fashion with a house in the Strand, says, "My balcony Shall be the courtiers' idol, and more gazed at Than all the pageantry at T. B.," i.e. the traitors' heads exposed there, which people used to come to see—so much so that some ingenious persons used to hire out spy-glasses to them, so that they could get a better view.

The laundresses who waited on the Templars had not too good a reputation for chastity. In Dekker's Witch iv. 1, Cuddy says, "The Devil in St. Dunstan's will as soon drink with this poor cur as with any T.-b. laundress that washes and wrings lawyers." The Devil Tavern (q.v.) was next to T. B. In Killigrew's Parson iv. 7, the Parson talks of "the wainscot chamber-maids with brooms and bare-foot madams you see sold at T.-b. and the Exchange." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i., Bloodhound bids his son, "As you come by T.-b., make a step to the Devil." In Cowley's Cutter i. 6, Worm says that Cutter was "Cromwell's agent for all the taverns between King's-st. and the Devil at T. B." In Prodigal ii. 4, Oliver proposes: "Let's meet at the Rose at T.-b.; that will be nearer your counsellor and mine" (see ROSE TAVERN). In Middleton's Inner Tem. 19, Fasting-Day says, "The butchers' boys at T. B. set their great dogs upon me." Butcher Row was just outside T. B. on the N. side of the Strand; it was cleared away in 1802.

In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, a watchman tells of a monster "very like the mandrake was shown at T.-B." Fleet St. was the favourite place for the exhibition of curiosities like this. Lupton's All for Money was "printed by Roger Warde and Richard Munadee dwelling at T. Barre anno 1578."

TEMPLE OF JEHOVAH. The temple built by Solomon at Jerusalem on the Eastern Hill called Mt. Moriah. It occupied the site now covered by the Mosque of Omar, and the Sacred Rock under its dome was the site of the great Altar. The T. was destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar when he took the city 586 B.C. On the Return from the Captivity in Babylon, the people, by the permission of Cyrus and under the leadership of Zerubabel, rebuilt the T.; and in 20 B.C. Herod the Gr. replaced this 2nd T. by his own magnificent structure. This was destroyed by the Romans at the siege of Jerusalem, A.D. 70.

Milton, P. L. i. 402, tells how Moloch led Solomon to build a t. for him "right against the t. of God, On that opprobrious hill." In xii. 334, it is predicted that Solomon shall "in a glorious t." enshrine the Ark of God; and how God would later expose to the scorn of Babylon "his t. and his holy ark"; and how later again, the dissensions amongst the priests, "pollution brings Upon the t. itself." In P. R. i. 211, our Lord tells how at 12 years of age "at our great feast I went into the T."; and in 256 it is said that Simeon and Anna "found thee in the T." In iv. 546 it is said, "The Holy City lifted high her towers And higher yet the glorious t. reared Her pile . . . like a mount of alabaster." Its destruction in A.D. 70 is described in Heming's Jewes Trag.; in line 2081 Jehochanan cries: "Give fire to the T. ! Give fire to the T. !" In Darius, p. 89, Zorobabell says to Darius: "Thy mind was to build the T. again." Darius is confused with Cyrus. See Ezra i. 2.

TEMPLE, PARIS. The headquarters of the Knights Templars in Paris. It was situated on a piece of marshy land, E. of the city; the Boulevard de T. still preserves the name Fynes Moryson, Itin. i. 190, speaking of Paris, says, "The 2nd gate towards the East is the gate of the T."

TEMS. See THAMES.

TENARIAN ISLES, TENERUS. See TÆNARUS.

TENEDOS. An island off the N.W. coast of Asia Minor, 15 m. S.W. of the Dardanelles, and abt. 3 miles from the nearest point of the coast of the Troad. It was sacred to Apollo Sminthius, who had a temple there. It was visited by the Argonauts on their return from the quest of the Golden Fleece. According to one form of the story, it was the naval base of the Greeks in the siege of Troy. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 6353, Apollo says, "Delphos is mine, Pharos, and T." In his B. Age iii., Anchises reports that the Argonauts are returned and are landed "at T." In Troil. prol. 11, it is said of the Greeks: "To T. they come; And the deep-drawing barks do there disgorge Their warlike fraughtage." In Lochrine iii. 2, Segar says, "The Brittaines come With greater multitude than erst the Greeks Brought to the ports of the Phrigian Tenidos." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 4, Tamburlaine speaks of Helen, "whose beauty summoned Greece to arms And drew a thousand ships to T." In Shrew i. 1, Aurelius speaks of "Helena, For whose sweet sake so many princes died That came with thousand ships to T." In May's Heir iii. 1, Philocles says, "A face, not half so fair As thine . . . brought a thousand ships to T. To sack lamented Troy." In Jonson's Poetaster i. 1, Ovid says, "Homer will live while T. stands and Ide." In Marlowe's Dido ii., Æneas tells how the Greeks became discouraged at Troy, "And so in troops all marched to T." Evidently Marlowe thought that T. was on the mainland of the Troad.

TENERIFF. The largest island in the Canary group in the Atlantic Ocean, 90 m. N.W. of Cape Bojador. The Peak of T. reaches the height of 12182 feet; it was proverbial for its height and size. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Medea goes to gather simples on "high T." In Webster's A. & Virginia iv. 1, Virginius prays: "O you gods, Extinguish it with your compassionate tears, Although you make a 2nd deluge spread And swell more high than T.'s high head." Nash, in Lenten, p. 309, says that Yarmouth has risen "from a mole-hill of sand to a cloud-crowned Mt. T." Donne, in Anat. of World (1611) 286, asks: "Doth not a T. or higher hill Rise so high like a rock, that one might think The floating moon would shipwreck there and sink?" Burton, A. M. ii. 3, 5, says, "It concerns me not what is done with me when I am dead. Let them set mine head on the pike of T., and my 4 quarters in the 4 parts of the world." In ii. 2, 3, he asks: "The pike of T. how high it is? 70 m., or 50, as Patricius holds, or 9, as Snellius demonstrates?" Milton, P. L. iv. 287, says, "Satan . . . dilated stood, Like T. or Atlas, unremoved." Browne, Brit. Pastor ii. 5, speaks of "That sky-scaling pike of Teneriffe, Upon whose top the harneshew bred her young."

TENNIS COURT. A quadrangular building for the playing of tennis. There were at least 14 tennis-courts in Lond. at the beginning of the 17th cent. They are given in a list from a MS. of 1615 as follows: Whitehall (two), Somerset House, Essex House, Fetter Lane, Fleet St., Blackfriars, Southampton House, Charterhouse, Powles Chain, Abchurch Lane, Lawrence Pountney, Fenchurch St., and Crutched Friars. In Puritan ii. 1, Simon says that Edmund "is at vain exercise, dripping in the T.-c." In H4 B. ii. 2, 21, Prince Hal, talking about Poins' shirts, says, "That the T.-c. keeper knows better than I; for it is a low ebb of linen with thee when thou keepest not racket there."

TEREDON. An ancient city at the head of the Persian Gulf near the mouth of the Euphrates. In Milton, P. R. iii. 292, the Tempter points out to our Lord as cities "built by Emathian or by Parthian hands, Artaxata, Teredon, Ctesiphon."

TERGOES, TER-GOW, or GOUDA. A fortified town in S. Holland on the Gowe, 11 m. N.E. of Rotterdam. It was besieged by the Spanish in 1574, but made a gallant and successful resistance. Gascoigne, in Dulce Bellum 97, says, "I was again in trench before Tergoes"; this was in 1574.

TERNATA. A small island in the Moluccas, on the W. coast of Gilolo; it gives its name to the whole group. The Sultan of T. was once the most powerful prince in the Moluccas, and ruled over the whole group as well as a large part of Celebes. The town of T. is on the E. coast of the island. Fuller, Holy State ii. 22, tells how in 1578 Drake "coasted China and the Moluccas, where, by the K. of Terrenate, a true gentleman-pagan, he was most honourably entertained." Montaigne (Florio's trans. 1603) i. 5, says, "In the kingdom of Ternates, among those nations which we so full-mouthed call barbarous, the custom beareth that they never undertake a war before the same be denounced." In B. & F. Princess, the Governor of T. plays a considerable part; and the scene of the greater part of Act ii. is laid in T. In Milton, P. L. ii. 639, Satan, in his flight, is compared to "a fleet . . . Close sailing from Bengala, or the isles Of Ternate and Tidore, whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs."

TERRACINA. A town in Italy on the N. shore of the Gulf of Gaeta, 60 m. S.E. of Rome. It is on the site of the ancient Anxur. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, Caesar Borgia advises the Pope to offer Charles VIII "The strength of T. for a pledge." In iii. 3, Frescobaldi says, "At T. I broke a glass upon the face of Capitaneo Boccansacchi."

TERRA DEL FUEGO. "The land of fire" discovered by Magellan in 1520, and so called from the number of fires he saw along the coast. It is a group of islands at the S. extremity of S. America, separated from the mainland by the Straits of Magellan. It is used jocularly for some haunt of loose women in Lond., in the neighbourhood of Bunhill Fields; possibly Shoreditch. In B. & F. Friends i. 2, Blacksnout says that he got a wound in his groin "at the siege of Bunnill, passing the straights 'twixt Mayor's Lane and Terra del Fuego, the fiery isle." Probably we should read Magellan for Mayor's Lane.

TERRENE SEA (the MEDITERRANEAN SEA, q.v.). In Taming of Shrew, Haz. p. 513, Ferando speaks of "Italian merchants that with Russian stems Ploughs up huge furrows in the Terren Main." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, Bajazeth boasts that he has as many troops "As hath the Ocean or the T. Sea Small drops of water." In Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes talks of "The T. Main wherein Danubius falls"; a slight slip, as the Danube falls into the Black Sea. In i. 2, Callipine, who is at Alexandria, proposes to "put forth into the T. Sea."

TERRHENE. See TYRRHENE and TERRENE.

TERSEIRA, or TERCEIRA. The most N.E. island in the Azores, q.v. In Kyd's Span. Trag. i. 3, the Viceroy of Portugal says of Alexandro: "Perchance because thou art Teseraes lord, Thou hadst some hope to win this diadem." Terceira first became known in England about 1582, through its brave resistance against the Spanish attacks on it.

TESELLA (i.e. TESEGDEL). A town in S. Morocco, 30 m. S. of Mogador, and 20 m. from the coast. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles reports: "From strong Tesella unto Biledull All Barbary is unpeopled for thy sake."

TEUTON. The name of a tribe who are first found in Jutland, and afterwards along with the Cimbri ravaged Gaul and attacked Italy at the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. About the middle of the 17th cent. the word is used as equivalent to German. The Teutonic Knights were a military order, founded in 1191 as the Teutonic Knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem. Their first headquarters were at Acre; they settled later at Marienburg on the Vistula, and carried on a crusade against the heathen Prussians and Livonians. After the 15th cent. they rapidly declined in power, until they were formally abolished in 1809. Their habit was a white mantle with a black cross. Fynes Moryson, Itin. i. 61, says, "Prussen of old was subject to the order of the Teutonic Knights."

TEWKESBURY. A town in Gloucestersh. at the junction of the Severn and the Avon, 126 m. W. of Lond. The glory of the town is the old Abbey Ch., consecrated in 1125, where Prince Edward, who was killed after the battle of T. on May 4th, 1471, and George, D. of Clarence, who was one of his murderers, are both buried. The mustard of T. had a high reputation. In Thersites 216, Thersites says, "Tom Tumbler of T. will wipe William Waterman." In H6 C. v. 3, 19, Edward says, "We are advertised That they do hold their course toward T.; . . . we . . . Will thither straight." Scenes 4 and 5 take place on the plains near T.; and Edward, Gloucester, and Clarence stab young Prince Edward in turn. In R3 i. 2, 242, Gloucester confesses: "Edward, her lord, I . . . Stabbed in my angry mood at T." In i. 3, 120, Margaret reproaches Gloucester: "Thou slewest Edward, my poor son, at T." In i. 4, 56, Clarence dreams that Edward appears to him and exclaims: "Clarence is come, That stabbed me in the field by T." In ii. 1, 111, Edward IV says of Clarence: "In the field by T., When Oxford had me down, he rescued me." In v. 3, 120, Young Edward's ghost appears to Richd. and says, "Think how thou stabbed'st me in my prime of youth At T." The battlefield is about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the town. In H4 B. ii. 4, 262, Falstaff says of Poin: "His wit's as thick as T. mustard." In Brome's City Wit iii. 1, Crasy says, "I'll lay all my skill to a mess of T. mustard she sneezes thrice within these 3 hours." Fynes Moryson, Itin. iii. 3, 139, says that T. is famous "for excellent mustard."

THAMES. The river on which Lond. stands. The name was originally Tamesis, and became in English Temes; the h was inserted through the influence of French about the beginning of the 16th cent., but it has never been pronounced, and the river is still called, as it always has been, the Temz. It rises in Gloucestershire and, until it joins the Thame near Dorchester, is often called the Isis. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 24, speaks of the Thame and Isis as being the father and mother of "the noble T."

but this is all nonsense—the river was called Tamesis, or T., from its source to its mouth. On its way to Lond. it passes Oxford, Abingdon, Reading, Henley, Maidenhead, Eton, Windsor, Staines, Kingston, Teddington, and Richmond. It reaches Lond. Bdge. after a course of abt. 170 m., and is now at high tide 800 ft. wide and 30 ft. deep. From the Bridge to Rotherhithe it is called the Upper Pool; thence to Cuckold's Point, the Lower Pool; thence to Deptford, Limehouse Reach; then come Greenwich Reach and Blackwall Reach. Then, passing Woolwich and Gravesend, it reaches the North Sea between Sheerness and Shoeburyness, the beginning of the estuary being marked by the Nore Light, 40 m. below Lond. In Lond. the chief objects of interest on the banks of the river were, on the N. side, starting from Westminster: Westminster Hall and Palace, Whitehall, Scotland Yard, York House, Durham House, Ivy Lane, Russell House, the Savoy Palace, Somerset House, Arundel House, Essex House, The Temple, Whitefriars, Bridewell Palace, Blackfriars, Baynard's Castle, Queen Hythe, The Three Cranes, the Sullyard, Cole Harbour, Old Swan, London Bdge., St. Magnus Ch., Lion Key, Billingsgate, the Custom House, and the Tower. On the S. side, Lambeth Palace stood opposite Westminster; then came the long stretch of Lambeth Marsh, the Bankside at Southwark and the Theatres, Winchester House, and the Ch. of St. Mary Overy. It was crossed by one bdge. only in Lond., the famous Lond. Bdge. (q.v.), and through its narrow arches the tide ran with great noise and violence, making the shooting of the Bdge. a perilous adventure. The other bdes. that are mentioned were merely gangways leading to the various landing stages. The river was navigable up to the Bdge. for the largest vessels of the time, and the Pool was filled with the shipping of all the world. Though all the sewage of the city fell into the river, most of it by the Fleet Ditch, it was nevertheless a clear stream, in which salmon and other fish could be caught, and on whose bosom a multitude of swans sailed to and fro. It was also constantly used for swimming and bathing; indeed, the citizens had no other means of getting a bath. It was the main thoroughfare of Lond., and watermen kept up an unintermitting cry of "Eastward Hoe!" or "Westward Hoe!" as the case might be. Stow estimates that there were 2000 wherries and 3000 watermen employed. It was not often frozen over; but this did sometimes happen, owing partly to the obstruction of the current by the piers of the Bdge. Such frosts are recorded in 1564, 1608, 1634, and some half a dozen later years.

Jonson, in the verses prefixed to the 1st Folio of Shakespeare, says, "Sweet swan of Avon, what a sight it were To see thee in our waters yet appear, And make those flights upon the banks of T. That so did take Eliza and our James." The reference is to the acting of plays at the palaces of Greenwich and Whitehall. In Middleton's R. G. iv. 1, Moll says she will sing to the viol "like a swan above bdge; For, look you, here's the bdge. [i.e. of the viol] and here am I." Drayton, in Idea xxxii. 1, says, "Our floods' queen, T., for ships and swans is crowned." In M. W. W. iii. 3, 16, Mrs. Ford gives her men directions to empty the clothes-basket in which Falstaff was hidden "in the muddy ditch close by the T. side." In iii. 5, 6, the fat knight exclaims: "Have I lived to be carried in a basket and to be thrown in the T.;" and begs for some sack to pour "to the T. water." Later on, he tells Ford how he "was thrown into the T. and cooled, glowing hot, in that surge like a horse-shoe"; yet he vows: "I will be thrown into Etna, as I have been into T., ere I will leave her thus." In H5 iv. 1, 120, Bates says of the K.: "I believe he could wish himself in T. up to the neck." In H6 B. iv. 8, 3, Cade cries: "Up Fish st. ! Down St. Magnus corner ! Throw them into T. ! " In T. Heywood's Fortune v. 1, the Purser greets the river: "Fair T., Queen of fresh water, famous through the world." In his Ed. IV A. i., the Mayor asks: "What if we stop the passage of the T. With such provision as we have of ships ? " i.e. to stop the Kentish rebels from crossing. In Dekker's London's Tempe, Oceanus says, "The Grand Canale a poor landscip is To these full braveries of Thamesis." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says, "Isis wept to see her daughter T. Change her clear christal to vermillion sad." In Webster's Weakest i. 2, Bunch says, "I was an ale-draper, as T. and Tower Wharf can witness." In Nobody 754, Nobody boasts that he will fence Lond. with a wall of brass "and bring the Tems through the middle of it." In More iii. 3, More tells how Erasmus, on leaving for Rotterdam "with tears Troubled the silver channel of the T." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii. 2, the Clown says, "Mine eyes are Severn; the T., nor the river Tweed, are nothing to them." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, describes the marriage between "the noble Thamis," the K. of all English rivers, and the Medway. Milton, in Vac. Exercise 100, calls it "Royal-towered T."

In St. Hilary's Tears (1642), we read: "The coaches now seem like western barges on the T. at a high tide, here and there one." The barges for the W. would have gone up with the tide, and few of them would be left. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 217, the Parisian says of the T.: "The pleasure of it will hardly be in the prospect or freedom of air, unless prospect, consisting of variety, be made up with here a palace, there a wood-yard, here a garden, there a brew-house; here dwells a lord, there a dyer." On p. 228, the Chorus sings of Lond.: "She is cooled and cleansed by streams Of flowing and of ebbing T." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Justiniano says, "Come, drink up Rhine, T., and Meander dry." In Kirke's Champions v. 1, the Clown says, "I find whole oxen boiled in a pottage pot that will hold more water than the T." Nash, in Lenten, p. 291, says, "Every man can thrash corn out of the full sheaves, and fetch water out of the T." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, Frederick says, "We'll have music; I love noise. We will outroar the T. and shake the Bdge." See also under LONDON BIDGE. Jonson, in Epilogue to Ev. Man O., says, "Our city's torrent [i.e. the Fleet Ditch] bent to infect The hallowed bowels of the silver T. Is checked by strength and clearness of the river Till it hath spent itself e'en at the shore." In his Epicoene iv. 2, Daw asks: "Is the T. the less for the dyers' water ? " In Broome's Damoiselle i. 2, Bumpsey says, "Let him throw money into the T., make ducks and drakes with pieces, I'll do the like." In Webster's Weakest i. 3, Bunch says, "Ye base butter-box, ye Smelt, your kinsfolk dwell in the T., and are sold like slaves in Cheapside." In H4 B. iv. 4, 125, Clarence says, "The river hath thrice flowed, no ebb between; And the old folk . . . Say it did so a little pime before That our great-grand sire, Edward, sicked and died." Holinshed says that this took place on October 12th, 1412; but there is no authority for the statement that it happened before the death of Edward III. Dekker, in Raven's, says, "When the T. is covered over with ice, then mayst thou be bold to swear it is winter." In Mayne's Match v. 2, Dorcas says to Warehouse, "They would just find you as hot as the sultry winter that froze o'er the T. They say the hard time did begin from you." In Hall's Characters, one of the topics of the Busybody's conversation is "the freezing of the T." Drayton, in Elegy of his Lady (1627) says, "The T. was not so frozen yet this year As is my bosom." W. Rowley, in Search Intro., says that his readers "in the hard season of the great frost . . . slid away the time upon the T."

The T. stands for England. In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 5, Nennius prays: "Grant T. and Tiber never join their channels"; and in ii. 1, he says, "Rhine and Rhône can serve And envy T. his never-captive stream." Daniel, in Epist. Prefatory to Cleopatra, says, "How far T. doth outgo declined Tibur," i.e. in poetry.

THAMES STREET. In Lond., running along the N. bank of the T., from Blackfriars to the Tower. It was divided into Upper T. St. above, and Lower T. St. below, Lond. Bdge. It was thronged with the carts bringing merchandise to the warehouses, or taking it away; and the combined smell of tar and fish made it specially unsavoury. Starting from the W. end it contained, in order, the churches of St. Benet, St. Peter, St. James, and All Hallows the Great; and below the Bdge. St. Magnus and St. Dunstan in the E. Other important buildings were, in the same order, Baynard's Castle, Vintners Hall, Cold-harbour, the Steelyard, Billingsgate Market, and the Custom House. The chief landing stages were Broken Wharf, Queen Hythe, and Old Swan Stairs. Chaucer was probably born at his father's tavern, which was at the spot where the Cannon St. Station now crosses the st. The whole st. from Pudding Lane westward was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. In Fair Women ii. 787, a lord reports "that a merchant's slain, one Master Sanders, dwelling near Tames st." The title of one of Yarrington's Two Tragedies is "The Murder of Master Beech, a chandler in T.-st." Dekker, in Wonderful Year, tells a ghastly story of the death of "the church-warden in T. st." In J. Heywood's Johan and Tib, p. 70, Johan, the husband, boasts how he will beat his wife; but on her return says he has been talking of "beating stock-fish in Temmes st." The part of the st. near the Bdge. was sometimes called Stockfishmonger Row.

In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 1, Wellbred says, "Would we were e'en pressed to make porters of and serve out the remnant of our days in T. st. or at Custom House key, in a civil war against the carmen." In Feverisham v. 1, Will says, "In Temes st. a brewer's cart was like to have run over me." In B. & F. Scornful ii. 3, Savil says, "Come home, poor man, like a type of T. st., stinking of pitch and poor-john." In their Prize v. 1, Livia says, "O what a stinking thief is this! T.-st. to him is a mere pomander." In their Nightwalk iv. 3, Toby says, "You think you are in T.-st. justling the carts." In Cavendish's Wolsey vii., Wolsey's route from York House to Greenwich is described: "He landed at the Three Cranes in Vine-tree, and from thence he rode upon his mule along T.-st., until he came to Billingsgate; there he took his barge, and so to Greenwich." There were some booksellers in the st. Selimus was "printed by Thomas Creede dwelling in T. st. at the sign of the Kathern wheel near the old Swan. 1594." The 1st edition of Howleglas about 1550 was "imprinted at Lond. in Tamestreete at the Vintre on the three-crane Wharf."

THAPSUS. A maritime city in N. Africa, about 100 m. S. of Carthage, where Cæsar defeated the Pompeians, 46 B.C. In Kyd's Cornelia v., the messenger says, "At Thapsus we began to intrench."

THARSUS (i.e. TARSISH). Some place or dist. in the W. of the Mediterranean, variously identified with the S. of Spain, and more recently with the Tyrsenian, or Tyrrhenian, lands on the W. coast of Italy. At all events it meant for the Jew some land in the far W. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass iii. 1, Jonas says, "To Joppa will I fly And for a while to T. shape my course." See Jonah i. 3. Greene, in Never too Late, speaks of "minerals of Egypt, waters from T."

THARSUS (see TARSUS). In J. C. v. 3, 104, Tharsus is an obvious error or misprint for Thasos, q.v.

THASOS. An island in the N. of the Aegean Sea 3 or 4 m. from the coast of Thrace. The town of T. is on the N. coast of the island. In J. C. v. 3, 104, Brutus, after the death of Cassius at Philippi, gives order: "Come therefore, and to Tharsus send his body." But it is obvious from the parallel passage in Plutarch that the right reading is Thassos or T. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius says, "Laodicea With Tursos veiled to us her vaunted pride. Fair Rhodes, I weep to think upon thy fall!" Tursos is a mistake for T., which was taken by Brutus and Cassius just before the battle of Philippi. In Rabelais, Pantagruel iii. 13, Pantagruel affirms that "those that inhabit the land of T. (one of the Cyclades) . . . never dreamed."

THEATRE, THE (Tr. = Theater). The first London play-house, erected in 1576 by James Burbage and John Bayne. It stood somewhere on the piece of land between Curtain Rd., Holywell Lane, and Gt. Eastern St., close to the road leading from Bishopsgate to Shoreditch ch. It was an amphitheatre in design, with a movable stage of trestles. It was closed in July 1597, and the timber taken over in 1598 to the Bankside, and used in the erection of the Globe. The price of admission was 2d. John Stockwood, in a Sermon at Paul's Cross (1578), speaks bitterly of "the gorgeous playing-place erected in the fields" called "a Tr." . . . "a shew-place of all beastly and filthy matters." In a letter from William Fleetwood to Lord Burghley, June 18th, 1584, complaint is made of a disturbance "very near the Tr. or Curtain at the time of the plays"; and it is related that 2 aldermen were sent to the court "for the suppressing and pulling down of the Tr. and Curtain." Lyly, in Puppe, p. 73, says of a certain play: "If it be shewed at Paules, it will cost you 4d.; at the Tr. 2d." In Tarlton's News, we have: "Upon Whison Monday last I would needs to the Tr. to a play." Nash, in Pierce E. i, says, "Tarlton at the Tr. made jests of him," to wit, a certain astrologer. Lodge, in Wits Miseries (1596), says, "He looks as pale as the visard of the ghost which cries so miserably at the T., like an oyster-wife, 'Hamlet, revenge!'" This was probably not Shakespeare's play, but an earlier version of the Hamlet story. In Skialetheia (1598), the author says, "See, yonder one, like the unfrequented T., walks in dark silence and vast solitude." Middleton, in Black Book, says, "He had a head of hair like one of my devils in Dr. Faustus, when the old T. crackt and frightened the audience."

THEBES, now THIVÆ (Tn. = Theban). An ancient city in Boeotia, 44 m. N.W. of Athens. It lay between the 2 streams of Ismenus and Dirce, and was well supplied with water. It was surrounded by a wall with 7 gates; hence it is often called "seven-gated T." In prehistoric times it seems to have been very powerful; and the legends associated with it are numerous. It was said to have been founded by Cadmus; another account made Amphion and Zethus its founders, and told how the stones of the wall moved into their places to the music of Amphion's lyre. In Lyly's Midas iv. 1, Apollo speaks of "Amphion that by music reared the walls of T." In his Campaspe i. 1, Timoclea says, "O T., thy walls were raised by the sweetness of the harp, but razed by the shrillness of the trumpet." In Marlowe's Faustus vi. 28, Faust says, "Hath not he, that built the walls of T. With ravishing sound of his melodious harp, Made music with my Mephistophilis?" In Shirley's Imposture v. 1, Volterino speaks of "the dolphin that was in love with a fiddler's boy of T. who carried him across the seas on her back." Shirley evidently confuses Amphion with Arion, who is the hero of the dolphin story but had nothing to do with T. In his Master iii. 3, Octavio says, "T., as to Amphion's lute, stoops to the magic of your voice." In his Bird iii. 3, Donella says, "They say music built the walls of T." Lodge, in Answer to Gosson, p. 16, has this jingle: "Amphion, he was said of T. the founder, Who by his force of lute did cause The stones to part asunder." Sidney, in Eng. Helicon (1614), p. 147, says, "Stones good measure danced, the Tn. walls to build, To cadence of the tunes which Amphion's lyre did yield."

Amphion married Niobe, but their children were all killed by Apollo, and Amphion slew himself and was buried at T. In Marlowe's Dido ii. 1, Aeneas says, "Tn. Niobe, Who for her sons' death wept out life and breath, Had not such passions in her head as I." Heracles was born at T., Zeus having visited his mother Alcmena during the absence of her husband Amphitryon and begotten the hero. He took a leading part in the fight between the Centaurs and Lapithæ at the marriage of Peirithous and Hippodameia. Tortured to madness by the shirt of Nessus, he flung himself into a funeral pyre on the top of Mt. Oeta and was taken up to heaven by Zeus. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5395, Juno says, "T. afforded an Alcmena and a wanton Semele." In his S. Age ii. 1, Homer says, "Our scene is T.; here fair Alcmena dwells"; and the story of the birth of Heracles follows. The scene of Hercules, a translation of the Amphitruo of Plautus, is laid at T. In Lyly's Woman in Moon iii. 2, Stesias desires to "Mingle the wine with blood and end the feast With tragic outcries like the Tn. lord Where fair Hippodamia was espoused." In Nabbes' Hannibal v. 3, Hannibal cries: "Would this were Oeta, that, like the furious Tn., I might build mine own pile and the flame, as it ascends, transform itself into a constellation."

It was in the reign of Amphitryon that Oephalus was persuaded by him to lend the Tns. his famous dog, that they might capture the wolf, or fox, that was ravaging the land. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 3, the Soldan says he is going against Tamburlaine as "Cephalus with lusty Tn. youths Against the wolf that angry Themis sent To waste and spoil the sweet Aonian fields." Dionysus (Bacchus) was born at T. as the result of the visit of Zeus to Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. His appearance to her in all his splendour of thunder and lightning brought about her death and the premature birth of her son, who was, however, saved from the fire and concealed in the thigh of Zeus. Many of the legends centre themselves around the family of Oedipus. He had been exposed, when an infant, on Mt. Cithæron, but he was rescued by a shepherd, and afterwards returned to T., solved the riddle of the Sphinx, who flung herself in vexation over the cliffs, ignorantly killed his father Laius, married his mother Jocasta, and became

K. When he discovered his parentage he put out his own eyes and abdicated in favour of his 2 sons, Eteocles and Polynices. They quarrelled, and Polynices organized the famous expedition of the Seven against T.: the 7 chieftains being Adrastus of Argos, Tydeus, Amphiarus, Capaneus, Hippomedon, Parthenopaeus, and Polynices himself. This was shortly before the Trojan war. The 2 brothers were killed in mutual conflict, and all the other leaders perished, except Adrastus: Capaneus, in particular, being struck by lightning as he was scaling the walls. During the siege, Menecius (the son of Creon, who had assumed the kingship on the death of Eteocles) flung himself from the walls in order to fulfil the oracle which had promised victory to T. if one of the descendants of Cadmus would devote himself to death. After the repulse of the Seven, Theseus of Athens attacked Thebes and compelled Creon to give burial to his dead foes.

In Tiberius 1697, Julia asks if a monster like "Thebane sphinx or Memphis crocodile" lurks in the orchard of Tiberius. Spenser, F.Q. v. 11, 25, speaks of "that monster whom the Tn. knight . . . Made kill herself for very heart's despite That he had red her riddle." Milton, P.R. iv. 572, speaks of "that Tn. monster that proposed Her riddle, and him who solved it not devoured." In P.L. i. 578, he speaks of "the heroic race . . . that fought at T. and Ilium"; and in Il. Pens. 99, he pictures Tragedy "presenting T., or Pelops' line, Or the tale of Troy divine." In Brewer's Lingua ii. 4, Memory says, "I remember about the wars of T. and the siege of Troy." In Tiberius 1877, Vonones says, "Renew as oft your wearied legions As Polynices or the Tn. wall"—where we should probably read "on" for "or." In Cæsar's Rev. i. chor. 2, Discord boasts: "Twas I that caused the deadly Tn. war And made the brothers swell with endless hate." In Rawlins' Rebellion iii. 1, Machvile says that he will play "The Tn. Creon's part, and on Raymonde mean to plot what he did on the cavilling boys of Oedipus." In Jonson's Catiline iv. 5, Cethegus says, "If they were like Capaneus at T. They should hang dead upon the highest spires." In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomatiscus says, "Menecius the son of Creon refused not voluntary death when he understood that the same might redeem the city of T. from utter subversion." Chaucer's Knight's Tale, and Kinsmen, tell the story of two Tn. knights who were captured by Theseus when he attacked T.; and 2 of the scenes of the play are laid in T. and its neighbourhood. In M.N.D. v. 1, 51, Theseus says, "That is an old device; and it was played When I from T. came last a conqueror." In Marlowe's Dido iii., Aeneas says of his son: "Might I live to see him sack rich T. And load his spear with Grecian princes' heads." The scene of Gascoigne's Jocasta is laid at T., or Thebs, as he spells it. In Lochner v. prol. 4, Ate says, "Medea, seeing Jason leave her love And choose the daughter of Thebane K., Went to her devilish charms." But it was the daughter of Creon, K. of Corinth, that Jason married—quite a different person from Creon, K. of T.

In historical times T. appears as the 3rd city in Hellas, Athens and Sparta alone being her superiors. In the Peloponnesian War she was opposed to Athens, but about the beginning of the 4th cent. B.C. she changed her policy and joined Athens in resisting Sparta; and in 394 she defeated Sparta in the battle of Coronea. In 371 the success was repeated at Leuctra, where the Spartan K. was killed. The Tn. leader was Epaminondas, and under his guidance T. enjoyed 10 years of undisputed supremacy. But in 364 Pelopidas, the colleague and friend of Epaminondas, was killed at Cynoscephalæ; and 2 years later Epaminondas fell at Mantinea. In 338 Philip of Macedon appeared upon the scene and defeated the united Athenians and Tns. at Chaeronea. In 335, the Tns. having rebelled against Alexander of Macedon, he took and destroyed the city, preserving only the house of the poet Pindar, who was born at T. about 522 B.C. In Chapman's Bussy i. 1, Monsieursays, "If Epaminondas, Who lived twice twenty years obscured at T., Had lived so still, he had been still unnamed; But, putting forth his strength, like burnished steel After long use he shined." In Massinger's Bondman, the hero is "the bold Tn., far-famed Pisander." The date is about the middle of the 4th cent. B.C., but Pisander is not an historical person. In Lyly's Campaspe i. 3, Alexander says that he has come "from T. to Athens, from a place of conquest to a palace of quiet." In Kyd's Soliman iv., Soliman says, "Alexander spared warlike T. for Pindarus." This is an exaggeration—he spared the poet's house, but nothing else. Spenser, F.Q. ii. 9, 45, speaks of "T., which Alexander did confound." The Boeotians, and the Tns. amongst the rest, were supposed to be particularly dense and stupid by the more brilliant Athenians. In Lear iii. 4, 162, Lear calls Edgar, the supposed madman, "this same learned Tn." In Jonson's Pan., the Fencer says, "There is a tinker of T. coming, called Epam, with his kettle will make all Arcadia ring of him." Epam is no doubt meant to be short for Epaminondas; and the Arcadians overwhelm the Boeotians and their leader, and send them home "with their solid heads." In Club Law i. 6, Kettlebasen says, "My gossip Thirtens went on Wednesday to T. to buy some fells at the leather fair." Probably Lond. is meant.

THEBES. The greatest city of ancient Egypt, on the Nile, abt. 450 m. S. of Alexandria. Its fame early reached Greece, and Homer tells of its hundred gates. It was the capital during the splendid xviii. and xix. dynasties, and its ruined temples at Luxor and Karnak, and the mortuary chapels of its kings are amongst the wonders of the world. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii., Earth asks: "Where's the hundred-gated town called T., Where's the Colosse of Rhodes?" Milton, P.L. v. 274, compares Raphael to "A phoenix . . . When to enshrine his relics in the sun's Bright temple, to Egyptian T. he flies."

THEBES, or THEBE. An ancient town in Mysia, S. of Mt. Placius. It was taken in the Trojan war by Achilles. In T. Heywood's Iron Age A. v., Ulysses, claiming for himself the conquests of Achilles, says, "'Twas I sacked Thebes, Chriseis, and Scylla with Lernessus walls."

THEBEZ. Used by Milton, P.R. ii. 313, as the name of the birthplace of Elijah, "that prophet bold, Native of T." According to I Kings xvii. 1, Elijah was a "Tishbite, who was of the sojourners of Gilead." The place has not been identified, but was evidently E. of the Jordan. There was a T., now Tubas, in Samaria, 9 m. N.E. of Shechem; but this cannot be the place intended. Possibly Milton made a slip in the name.

THECOA, or TEKOA. A vill. in Judah, 5 m. S. of Bethlehem, now Khirbet-Tequa. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 3, the widow of Thecoa tells David the story of her 2 sons, as recorded in II Samuel xiv.

THEOBALD'S. A vill. near Cheshunt, in S.E. Herts., abt. 12 m. N. of Lond. Near it Lord Burghley built a magnificent palace, where his son Robert entertained King James I on his arrival in England. In 1605 James created Robert Earl of Salisbury, and in 1607 gave him Hatfield House in exchange for the palace at T., which thenceforth was his favourite summer residence. The word is pronounced Tibbald's. Temple Bar, taken down in 1878, was re-erected at the entrance to Sir H. B. Meux's grounds at T. Elizabeth visited T. in 1591, and was greeted in a series of short poems written by George Peele. Hentzner describes his visit to T. in 1597, when he rode out from Lond. in a coach. In Jonson's Gipsies, one of the Gipsies sings of "the finer walled places, As St. James's, Greenwich, Tibals, Where the acorns, plump as chibals, Soon shall change both kind and name." Jonson wrote a Masque for the entertainment of the 2 Kings of Great Britain and Denmark at T. in 1606; and another for the K. and Q. when the palace was delivered up to them in 1607.

THERMODON. A river of Pontus in Asia Minor, now the Thermeh, flowing into the Black Sea near Themiscyra. The Amazons were supposed to have lived in the neighbourhood of this river and their capital was Themiscyra. In Selimus 2398, Selimus speaks of "The Amazonian Menalip, Leaving the banks of swift-streamed Thermodon To challenge combat with great Hercules."

THESPIÆ. A town in Boeotia, at the foot of Mt. Helicon. Close by was the fountain of Aganippe, which was sacred to the Muses. There was a Temple of The Muses in the city, and the Latin writers consequently often call them Thespiades. Jonson, in Forest x., refers to them as "the ladies of the Thespian lake."

THESSALY (Tn. = Thessalian). The dist. in ancient Greece lying between the Cambunian range and Mt. Othrys, and extending from the sea to the Pindus range. It was famous for its fertility and its luxuriant crops and flowers; and the vale of Tempe, proverbial for its beauty, lay within its bounds. Its horses and hounds were the best in Greece, and hunting was largely practised in its forests and plains. In many ways it resembled Arcadia; and the poets treated it as the home of rural simplicity and pastoral beauty. In spite of the wealth of its inhabitants it took little part in the history of Greece. It was from T. that the famous boar came which ravaged the plains of Calydon and was hunted to death by Meleager and his companions. In Ant. iv. 13, 2, Cleopatra says that Antony is "more mad Than Telamon for his shield; the boar of T. Was never so embossed." The Muses were said to have been born at Pieria in N.E. Thessaly, but, when their worship was transferred to Mt. Helicon in Boeotia, the name Pierian was also bestowed on the sacred spring there. Its waters were supposed to communicate to the drinker the gifts of Art and Poetry. In Histrio iii. 198, Chrisogonus says, "O age, when every scrivener's boy shall dip Profaning quills into Thessalians spring." The scene of the death of Hercules was Mt. Oeta in T.; hence Milton, P. L. ii. 544, says that in his death-agony he "tore Through pain up by the roots Tn. pines." It was in T. that Daphne, fleeing from the embraces of Apollo, was turned into a laurel-tree. Spenser, in Amoretti xxviii. 10, says, "Proud Daphne, scornning Phœbus' lovely fire, On the Tn. shore from him did fly." In Wilson's Cobler 1369, it is reported that "The Argives and the men of T." are invading Boeotia. This is entirely unhistorical. In Marlowe's Dido iii. 1, Dido affirms that one of her suitors "was the wealthy K. of T."—again a fictitious person.

Pharsalia, the scene of Pompey's defeat by Cæsar in 48 B.C., was in T. Chaucer, in Monk's Tale B. 2869, speaks of mighty Cæsar's fight "in Thessalie agayn Pompeius." In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 4, Cicero, who was a Pompeian, says, "Thessalia boasts that she hath seen our fall." In i. 3, Cæsar says, "The flying Pompey to Larissa hastes And by Tn. Tempe shapes his course." In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 4, 124, the K. of T. comes to offer his services to Pompey—but there was no K. of T. at this time; it was a Roman Province. In v. 1, 69, Pompey and Demetrius take refuge at Lesbos disguised as "Tn. augurs" . . . "their heads all hid in hats Of parching T., broad-brimmed, high-crowned." This broad-brimmed hat, or Kausia, was characteristic of the Macedonians and Thessalians. Davies, in Orchestra (1594) xci. 5, says, "The wise Tns. ever gave The name of Leader of their Country's dance To him that had their country's governance." The technical name of the chiefs of T. was Tagus; but Davies is probably thinking of the Archi-theoros, who presided at the festival held at Tempe every 9th year.

In M. N. D. iv. 1, 119, Theseus boasts that his hounds were "dew-lapped like Tn. bulls"; and adds: "A cry more tuneable Was never holla'd to . . . In Crete, in Sparta, nor in T." In T. Heywood's B. Age ii., Adonis speaks of "The fierce Tn. hounds with their shag ears Ready to sweep the dew from the moist earth." E. D., in trans. of Theocritus (1588) xviii., compares Helen of Sparta to "A steed of T." In the old Timon i. 4, Pseudocheus says, "Upon the mountains of Thessalia I do remember that I saw an oak That brought forth golden acorns of great price." In B. & F. Valentin iv. 4, Maximus erects a funeral pyre "greater than T. [can feed] with flowers." Their Shepherdess has its scene in T.; and in i. 1, Clorin describes himself as "The truest man that ever fed his flocks By the fat plains of fruitful T." In Lochrine ii. 1, 39, Estrild, praising Britain, says, "The birds resounding heavenly melody Are equal to the groves of T. Where Phœbus with the learned ladies nine Delight themselves with musick-harmony." In Noble Ladies, Cyprian says, "We'll ride together to fruitful Thessalia, where in fair Tempe we'll sport us under a pavilion of Tyrian scarlet." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, Mandrecarde compares his army to a swarm of grasshoppers in the "plains of watery T." T. was subject to plagues of locusts; Topsell says that jackdaws were kept at the public expense to devour them.

T. had a sinister reputation as the home of witchcraft and poisonous drugs and herbs. In Lyly's Endymion iii. 1, Cynthia promises, "If the enchanters of T. can find remedy, I will procure it." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. v. 1, Tamburlaine says that the sight of the corpses of his enemies is "as baneful to their souls As are Tn. drugs or mithridate." In Peele's Old Wives, p. 185, Sacrapant says, "In T. was I born and brought up; My mother Merce hight, a famous witch." In Webster's White Devil i. 2, Cornelia says, "O that this fair garden Had with all poisoned herbs of T. At first been planted." In Marmion's Companion ii. 1, Spruce says, "Not all the drugs of T. Can ease my grief." In Nabbes' Hannibal iii. 4, Massanissa says that Sophonisba's tear "hath in't sufficient virtue to convert All the Tn., Pontick, Phasian aconites Into preservatives." In Rabelais' Pantagruel iii. 16, Epistemon says that Panzoist abounds "more with sorceries and witches than ever did the plains of T." In Greene's Orlando i. 2, 365, Orlando says of Rodamant: "Here lies he, like the thief of T., Which scuds abroad and searcheth for his prey, And, being gotten, straight he gallops home." No one has succeeded in identifying this person; probably he existed only in Greene's imagination. T. is the scene of Daborne's Poor Man's Comfort; Brome's Lovesick Ct.; Barclay's Lost Lady; and B. & F. Shepherdess.

THETFORD. A town on the borders of Suffolk and Norfolk, on the Little Ouse, 30 m. S.W. of Norwich. It was an important town in the old Kingdom of E. Anglia, and a Synod was held there in 669. It was 3 times burned and sacked by the Danes. Edmund, Earl of T., is one of the characters in Brewer's Lovesick. In Day's Beggar ii., young Strowd says of his companions: "They can talk of nothing but what price pease and barley bears at T. market."

THEWLE. See THULE.

THIEVING LANE. A short st. in Westminster, curving round from the W. side of King St. to Broken Cross. It was the way by which thieves were taken to the Gatehouse prison: hence the name Thieven L., corrupted into T. L. It was also called Bow St. from its semi-circular course. It corresponded to certain parts of the present Gt. George St. and Princes St. It was a poor st., chiefly occupied by dealers in 2nd-hand goods. In Dekker's Edmonton v. 1, Cuddy says to his dog, "If thou goest to Lond., I'll make thee go about by Tyburn, stealing in by T. L." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, the servant says to Credulous, "I'm charged to see you placed in some new lodgng about T.-l." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i., Bloodhound says, "Run to Master Barlack's the informer, in T.-l., and ask him what he has done in my business."

THISBITE, or TISHBITE. Apparently means an inhabitant of Tishbe, an unidentified vill. in the land of Gilead, E. of the Jordan. In Conf. Consc. i. 2, Philologus says, "Elias the T. for fear of Jezabel did fly to Horeb" (see I Kings xvii. 1). Milton, P. R. ii. 16, speaks of Elijah as "the great T., who on fiery wheels Rode up to heaven." See also THESEZ.

THOGARMAH. A place or tribe mentioned in Gen. x. 3, and Ezekiel xxvii. 14. It is not certainly identified, but was probably in W. Armenia. In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 3, Doll, who is pretending to talk in a fit of inspiration, mentions amidst her farrago of nonsense "the K. of Thogarmah and his habergions brimstony, blue, and fiery."

THOMAS, SAINT. One of the Virgin Islands in the W. Indies, discovered by Columbus in 1494. It lies 38 m. E. of Porto Rico, and is a possession of Denmark, by whom it was occupied in 1672; previously it had been held by Dutch buccaneers. In Shirley's Brothers ii. 1, Carlos says, "His ships may rise again, were sunk by the Hollander and's fleet from St. Thomas."

THOMAS (SAINT) APOSTLES. A ch. in Lond. in Knight-rider St., built in 1371. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and not rebuilt, the parish being included in that of St. Mary Aldermary. In Middleton's R. G. iii. 1, Moll says to Trapdoor, "Follow me to St. T. A.; I'll put a livery cloak upon your back the first thing I do." The clothiers' shops were in this neighbourhood. In Peele's Jests, we are told: "They parted, she home, George into St. T. A., to a friend of his." There was another St. T. A.—on the N. side of St. Thomas St., Southwark. The sculptor of the bust of Shakespeare in the church at Stratford was "Gerard Johnson, a Hollander, in St. T. Apostells."

THOMAS (SAINT) A WATERINGS. A watering place for horses at the 2nd milestone out of Lond. on the Old Kent Rd., where it crossed a small stream. The name was given to it because the Pilgrims to the shrine of St. T. à Becket at Canterbury passed this way. The exact point was the junction of the Old Kent Rd. and Albany Rd. It was the boundary of the borough liberties, and was the place of execution for the county of Surrey, as Tyburn was for Middlesex. Regular executions were discontinued about the middle of the 18th cent., but 2 men were hanged here for a murder in Chester in 1834. Chaucer, in C. T. A. 826, says, "Forth we riden, a litel more than paas, Unto the wateryng of Saint T."

In Peele's Ed. I xii., the Farmer says, "I am his [St. Francis's] receiver and am now going to him; a bids St. T. a w. to breakfast this morning to a calve's head and bacon." The reference is to the hanging which the Farmer was about to earn by robbing the Friar of St. Francis. In Hester, Anon. Pl., p. 267, Adulation speaks of him "that from stealing goeth to St. T. Watering"; and, later, Handy-dandy says, "They gave you all their pride and flattering, And, after that, St. T. Watering, There to rest a tide." In Fulwell's Like, Dods. iii. 324, Newfangle proposes to Tossplot and Royster the acquisition of a piece of land called "St. T. a W. or else Tyburn Hill." In Hycke, 195, Frewyll says of highwaymen: "At St. T. of Watrynge an they strike a sail, Then must they ride in the haven of hemp without fail." In Jonson's New Inn i. 1, the Host says, "He may perhaps take a degree at Tyburn; come to read a lecture upon Aquinas at St. T. a W., and so go forth a laureat in hemp circle." Aquinas was St. T. Aquinas; and there is a pun on Aquinas, from Latin aqua (water), and Waterings. In Owl's Almanac 55, it is said, "A fair pair of gallows is kept at Tyburn; and the like fair (but not so much resort of chapmen and crackropes) is at St. T. a Waterings." Lyly, in Pappe, p. 73, says of Vetus Comedia: "If it be shewed at Paules it will cost you 4d.; at the Theatre 2d.; at Saint T. a Waterings nothing." The suggestion is that Penry (Martin Marprelate), against whom this pamphlet was written, will be hanged at St. T. a W.; which actually came to pass in 1593. Taylor, Works i. 77, says, "I have seen many looking through a hempen window at St. T. W."; and in ii. 162, "He at St. T. W. may go swing." In Puritan i. 1, Moll, mocking at her mother's lamentations for her dead husband, says, "A small matter bucks a handkercher—and sometimes the spittle stands too nigh St. T. a Waterings." She means that a widow who weeps extravagantly often comes to be a prostitute, and has to be sent to the Spittle.

THOMAS (SAINT) FORT. A fortress on the S.E. coast of Malta, on the promontory between Marsa Scala and St. Thomas's Bay. In B. & F. Malta ii. 5, Valetta says to Miranda, "St. T. F., a charge of no small value, I give you, too, in present, to keep waking Your noble spirits."

THOMAS (SAINT) OF AKERS, ACRES, or ACON. A ch. and hospital in Lond., on the N. side of Cheap-side, near the corner of Ironmonger Lane, where now is the Mercers' Hall and Chapel. It was built by Agnes, sister of T. à Becket, on the site of the house in which he was born. The name was given to it because Becket's mother, of whom the well-known and pathetic story is told how she followed her lover to Lond., knowing only his name Gilbert, and found him by repeating it, was born at Acon, or Acre; another and less likely account is that it is said that St. T. assisted miraculously in the capture of Acre. On the dissolution of the Monasteries, Henry VIII sold it to the Mercers' Company, who made it into their chapel. In Latimer's Sermon before Edward VI, April 12th, 1547, he tells a story of a lady who said "I am going to St. Tomas of A., to the sermon. I never failed of a good nap there." In Skelton's Colin Clout, the prelates complain, "At St. T. of Ackers They carp us like crackers." The 4th Merry Jest of the Widow Edyth (1525) tells how she "deceived a Doctor of Divinity at St. T. of A. in Lond. of 5 nobles he laid out for her." In Deloney's Reading xi., a report is brought to Colebrook "that Lond. was all on a fire, and that it had burned down T. Becket's house in W. Cheape." As the supposed date is in the reign of Henry I, this is a curious anachronism. Milton, in Areopagitica, p. 41 (Hales), refers to it as "our London trading St. T."—from its connection with the Mercers.

THONG CASTLE. An ancient castle in Kent, near the estuary of the Swale, 2 m. E. of Sittingbourne. It is said to have derived its name from the bargain made by Hengist and Horsa with Vortigern, that he would give them as much land on which to build a castle as could be encompassed by a bull's hide. They then, like Dido, cut the hide into strips, or thongs, and so won a spacious site for their fortification. There are, however, 2 or 3 other T., or Tong, Castles about which the same story is told; and the whole legend is probably an adaptation of the Dido story in Vergil, Aen. i. 369. In Middleton's Queenborough iii. 3, Vortigern says, "That your building may to all ages carry The stamp and impress of your wit, it shall be called T. C."

THOUS, or THOAS. An ancient name of the river Achelous, q.v. In T. Heywood's B. Age i. 1, Achelous speaks of "Thous our grand seat."

THRACE (Tn. = Thracian). A country N. of ancient Greece, extending from the Propontis and the Aegean to the Danube, and from the Black Sea to the Strymon. It thus corresponds roughly to the modern Bulgaria and Rumelia. The word was sometimes used in a wider sense to include Mœsia and Dacia; but it is in the former sense that our dramatists employ it. It was governed by local chiefs, of whom the most powerful were the Kings of the Odryse in the centre and N. of the country. The Greeks founded several colonies on the coast, notably Byzantium, Selymbria, Abdera, and Amphipolis. Darius of Persia conquered the country about 508 B.C., but after the defeat of Xerxes the Persians were expelled. Philip of Macedon made himself master of T. about 340 B.C., and it remained connected with Macedonia until the fall of the Macedonian kingdom at Pydna in 168 B.C. Henceforward it was governed by the Romans, who for a time allowed certain of the chiefs to assume the title of Kings, much as England has done in India; but in the reign of Vespasian it was formally reduced to a Roman Province. It fell to the Eastern Emperors on the division of the Empire. Finally, in A.D. 1353, it was conquered by the Turkish Sultan Amurath and annexed to his Empire. In Cyrus A. i, Cyrus boasts, "We have trod down the Thrasian pride," but he was never nearer to T. than Lydia. In Ant. iii. 6, 71, "the Tn. k., Adallias" is mentioned as one of Antony's allies. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 4, 126, the K. of T. comes to offer his services to Pompey. In Selimus 2491, Selimus says, "Mars Scatters the troops of warlike Tns. And warms cold Hebrus with hot streams of blood." In Com. Cond. 216, Conditions says, "Clarisia, having an uncle Montanio, k. of T., will no longer here abide." Montanio is an imaginary potentate.

Many of the Greek legends are connected with T. Orpheus, the inventor of the lyre, lived in T. at the time of the Argonautic expedition; according to one form of the story, he was K. of the Odryse. He went down to Hades, and by his playing "half regained" his lost Eurydice, and he was finally torn to pieces by the Tn. Mænads. In M. N. D. v. 1, 49, one of the shows offered to Theseus was "The riot of the tipsy Bacchanals Tearing the Tn. singer in their rage." In Tit. ii. 4, 51, Marcus says, "He would have dropped his knife, and fell asleep, As Cerberus at the Tn. poet's feet." In Kirke's Champions iv. 1, Leopides says, "There the Tn. sits, Hard by the sullen waters of black Styx, Fing'ring his lute." In Locrine iii. 1, 5, Locrine cries: "O that I had the Tn. Orpheus' harp For to awake out of the infernal shade Those ugly devils of black Erebus." In Tiberius 2405, Sejanus says, "Not Menus with the frantic dames of T. That in their Dionisian sacrifice Mangled the body of poor Pentheus, Raved like Julia." The author confuses Pentheus with Orpheus. In Dist. Emp. i. 1, Charlmayne speaks of "the Tn. Orpheus whose skill Had power o'er ravenous beasts." In Val. Welsh. i. 4, Caradoc says, "The Tn. Orpheus never entertained More joy in sight of his Eurydice." In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 3, Trimalchio apprehends: "They'll tear us as the Tns. did Orpheus." In Cockayne's Obstinate iv. 1, Phylander says, "The fatal raven's hoarse crying is 'Tn. music unto your reply.'" In Nero iii. 2, the Emperor boasts that, if Orpheus heard him play, "he then should see How much the Latin stains the Tn. lyre." In Davenant's Italian v. 3, Altamont exclaims: "Hark, how the Roman organ seems to invoke The Tn. lyre." In Lady Mother iv. 2, Marlowe says that revenge is "sweet as the strains falls from the Thrasian lyre."

Tereus, who married first Procne, and then, after concealing her, her sister Philomela, and subsequently killed himself, was a K. of the Tns. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 4, Zabina says, "May this banquet prove as ominous As Progne's to the adulterous Tn. K." Procne made him eat the flesh of his own child. W. Smith, in Chloris (1596) xxxiv. 1, calls Philomela "The bird of T., which doth bewail her rape And murdered Itis, eaten by his sire." Rhesus was a prince of T. who came with horses white as snow to the siege of Troy, where they were stolen by Ulysses and Diomed. In H6 C. iv. 2, 21, Warwick says, "Ulysses and stout Diomed With sleight and manhood stole to Rhesus' tents And brought from thence the Tn. fatal steeds." Polymnestor, K. of the Tn. Chersonese, at the siege of Troy killed Polydorus, the son of Priam, and was, in revenge, blinded in his tent by Hecuba. In Tit. i. 1, 138, Demetrius speaks of "the gods that armed the q. of Troy With opportunity of sharp revenge Upon the Tn. tyrant in his tent." The K. of the Bistones, who lived in S.W. Thrace, used to feed his horses on the flesh of his guests; Heracles killed him and threw his body to the horses. Spenser, F. Q. v. 8, 31, tells of "the Tn. tyrant, who, they say, Unto his horses gave his guests for meat Till he himself was made their greedy prey And torn in pieces by Alcides great."

The Tns. were devoted to the worship of Ares (Mars) and Dionysus (Bacchus), which means that they were great warriors and great drinkers. They had the reputation of being utterly barbarous and cruel, and of giving way to the utmost licence in their Bacchanalian revels. Chaucer, Knight's Tale A. 1970, describes the "grete temple of Mars in Trace." In Massinger's Picture ii. 2, Eubulus says, "Famine, blood, and death, Bellona's pages, [are] Whipt from the quiet continent to T." So in Actor i. 4, Caesar says, "Now the god of war And famine, blood, and death, Bellona's pages, [are] Banished from Rome to T." In Kyd's Cornelia i., the Chorus speaks of "the mtn. tops of warlike T." In Davenant's U. Lovers i. 2, Amaranta has heard "news so sad Would make a fierce young Tn. soldier weep." In Locrine v. 4, 135, Sabren asks: "What Tn. dog, what barbarous Mirmidon, Would not relent at such a ruthless case?" In Jonson's New Inn iv. 3, Lord Latimer asks: "What more than Tn. barbarism was this?" In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Ithamore, the barbarous Moor, says he was born "in T." In Pembroke's Antonie i. 50, Antony defies Caesar to do his worst: "make me My burial take in sides of Tn. wolf." The wolf was sacred to Mars. Milton, P. L. vii. 34, speaks of "the race Of that wild rout that tore the Tn. bard In Rhodope." In Wilson's Inconstant iii. 4, Romilia says, "The waters shall, like so many Bacchanalian nymphs, Dance thee a Thrasian round."

T. was a mountainous country, but was rich in oxen and sheep; and its breed of horses was specially esteemed. In Chapman's Widow's Tears iii. 1, Lysander wagers with Tharsalia "a chariot With 4 brave horses of the Tn. breed." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Puatavolo is to prove that he has been at Constantinople by his cat's bringing back "the train or tail of a Tn. rat." Pliny mentions a gem that was found in T., apparently a kind of bloodstone, which made the wearer immune from disaster and grief. In Greene's James IV iv. 5, Andrew says, "The fairies gave him the property of the Tn. stone; for who toucheth it is exempted from grief." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit. ii. 90, says, "There is a stone in the flood of Thracia that, whosoever findeth it, is never after grieved." According to the pseudo-Plutarch Of Rivers and Mountains, it was called Pausilypus, i.e. Stayer of Grief. Democritus, the laughing philosopher, was born at Abdera, in T., 460 B.C. In Davenant's Platonic iii. 4, Fredolen speaks of "The merry top of T. that always laughed, Pretending 'twas in vanity." The scene of Thracian is laid in T. In Day's Gulls, Demetrius and Lysander are represented as Tns.

THRASIMENE. The Lacus Trasimenus, the largest lake in Etruria, lying W. of Perugia, abt. 90 m. N. of Rome; now called Lago di Perugia. Here Hannibal defeated Flaminius, the Roman consul, in 217 B.C., in what Livy characterizes as one of the most noted routs of the Roman people. In Marlowe's Faustus prol., the Chorus begins, "Not marching now in fields of T., Where Mars did mate the Carthaginians"; where "mate" evidently means "matched in fight." The reference is almost certainly to some lost play. In Kyd's Cornelia v., Cornelia speaks of "the proudest Hannibal Who made the fair T. so desert." Kyd apparently did not know that it was a lake. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 4, the Lady professes, "Had I at Cannæ been, or T., I would have kept the side of Hannibal."

THREADNEEDLE STREET. Lond. It ran from the Stocks Market, where the Mansion House now stands, to Bishopsgate. The W. end has been absorbed by the approach to the Royal Exchange. The name appears to have been originally Three Needle St., from the arms of the Needlemakers' Company, viz., "Three needles in a fesse argent." On the S. side were the Royal Exchange and the Merchant-Tailors' Hall; on the N. the hospital of St. Anthony, where the Bank of England is now, and St. Bartholomew's Ch. The street was famous for its taverns, which were 20 or more in number, and included the Cock, the Crown, and the King's Arms. Hence the allusion in Jonson's Christmas, where Christmas, introducing the Masquers, says, "This, I tell you, is our jolly Wassel, And for Twelfth Night more meet too. She works by the ell, and her name is Nell, And she dwells in T. St. too." In his Magnetic v. 5, Sir Moth says, "We met at Merchant-tailors-hall at dinner in T.-st."

THREE BEARS. A tavern sign in Lond. From the quotation it appears that there was a Three Bears in the neighbourhood of St. Katharine's, q.v. In Jonson's Augurs, Notch says, "His project is that we should all come from the three dancing bears in St. Katharine's hard by where the priest fell in, which ale-house is kept by a distressed lady whose name will not be known."

THREE COLTS. A tavern at Mile-end Green, Lond. There was another on the S. side of Bevis Marks. In Day's B. Beggar iv., Strowd says, "Go thy ways to Mile-end-green to my father's lodgings at the Three Colts."

THREE CRANES. A famous Lond. tavern, in Upper Thames St., just below the present Southwark Bdge., at the top of T. C. Lane. It was named after the three cranes of timber on the adjacent Vintry Wharf, which may be seen in Vischer's View of London (1616). There was only one crane on the wharf until some time between 1550 and 1560, for Foxe, in Acts and Monuments (1552) vi. 293, calls the Wharf "the Crane in the Vintry." The 2 others were added soon after 1550. The sign of the tavern was punningly blazoned as 3 birds of the crane species. It seems to have been a resort both of wits and of thieves. There were several printing establishments in the neighbourhood. An undated black-letter edition of Bevis of Hampton was "imprinted at Lond. in the Vinetre upon the thre Crane Wharfe by William Coplande"; and the 1st edition of Howleglas was "imprinted at Lond. in Tamestrete at the Vintre on the three-Craned Wharfe." The date is soon after 1550. In Yarrington's Two Trag. i. 3, Williams says, "I will seek some rest at the T. C." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "You shall find whole congregations of thieves at St. Quintens, the T. C. in the Vintry." In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit says, "A pox o' these pretenders to wit, your T. C., Mitre, and Mermaid men!" In his Augurs, Urson, the master of the bears, sings: "Nor the Vintry-C., Nor St. Clement's Danes, Nor the Devil can put us down." There was a constant feud between the dramatists and the promoters of bear-baiting, which interfered with the attendance at the plays. The Vintry C. and the Devil are taverns frequented by the wits, and St. Clement's Danes stands for the lawyers of Clement's Inn, who would be on the side of the playwrights. In his Devil i. 1, Iniquity says to Pug, "From thence [Billingsgate] shoot the bridge, child, to the C. in the Vintry And see there the gimlets, how they make their entry." In Abington iv. 3, Nicholas says, "Patience in adversity brings a man to the T. C. in the Vintry." In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 3, Morose says of his nephew: "It knighthood shall go to the C. or the Bear at the Bridge-foot, and be drunk in fear." Harman, in Caveat 24, speaks of it as a haunt of morts and doxies. See also VINTRY.

THREE CUPS. A common tavern sign in Lond. There was one in St. Giles's, another in Holborn, where 16 to 21 Featherstone Buildings now stand; others in St. John St., Broad St., and Goswell St. In B. & F. Wit S. W. ii. 4, Witty-pate says, "You know our meeting at the T. C. in St. Giles's." In Merry Jest of the Widow Edyth the 12th Jest shows "how this widow Edyth deceived the good man of the T. C. in Holburne."

THREE FURIES. An imaginary sign of an apothecary's shop in ancient Rome. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, Crispinus says that his apothecary "dwells at the Three Furies by Janus' Temple." Janus' Temple was in the Forum opposite the Curia.

THREE HORSE-LOAVES. The sign of a tavern at Stony-Stratford. In Oldcastle v. 3, the Hostler says: "Tom is gone from hence; he's at the T. H.-l. at Stony-Stratford." H.-l. were made of beans, and were sold at two a penny.

THREE PIGEONS. A famous tavern at Brentford, or Brainford as it used to be called, which was at one time kept by John Lowin, one of the first actors in Shakespeare's plays. It was a favourite resort of Londoners intent on a day's outing in the country. In Jonson's Alchemist v. 2, Subtle says to Doll, "We will turn our course to Brainford westward: we'll tickle it at the P." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 1, Laxton says to Moll, who appears in man's dress, "thou'rt admirably suited for the T. P. at Brainford." In iv. 2, Mrs. Goshawk tells how she has heard that her husband "went in a boat with a tilt over it to the T. P. at Brainford, and his punk with him." In Peele's Jests, "My honest George" is said to be "now merry at the T. P. in Brainford."

THREE PIGEONS. A bookseller's sign in Lond. Davenant's Love and Honour was "printed for Hum. Robinson at the Three Pigeons. 1649."

THREE SQUIRRELS. A tavern in Southwark the exact position of which is uncertain. In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Urinal says of the brothel: "The T. S. in the town I warrant a very sanctuary to it." In iii. 1, Sconce calls the same tavern "the Three skipping Conies in the town." In both cases the town means Southwark, as distinguished from the city of Lond. In Brome's Moor iv. 2, Quicksands says he knows his wife's haunts "at Bridgfoot Bear, the Tunnes, the Cats, the Squirrels."

THREE TUNS. The arms of the Vintners' Company, and therefore a favourite Tavern sign in Lond. The most famous T. T. was in Guildhall Yard, but there were many others, including one in Southwark. In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Compass says, "T. T. do you call this tavern? It has a good neighbour of Guildhall." This is the tavern celebrated in Herrick's lines "Ah Ben! Say how or when Shall we thy guests Meet at those lyric feasts Made at the Sun, the Dog, the triple Tunne?" In Deloney's Craft ii. 3, Margaret "got Robin to go before to the t.-Tunnes." In the list of Taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we have "T. T., Newgate Market." In Brome's Moor iv. 2, Quicksands says that he knows his wife's haunts "at Bridgfoot Bear, the Tunnes, the Cats, the Squirrels." This refers to the T. T. in the Borough High St., Southwark, near St. George's Ch.

THRIPPERSTOWN. A vill. in Norfolk, near Norwich. In Brome's Moor iii. 1, Phillis was born at T.

THRUTTON. Possibly Thurton or Thurlton is intended. A vill. in Norfolk, 11 miles S.E. of Norwich. In Thersites 220, Mater mentions, amongst other witches, "Maud of Thrutton."

THULE. An island in the farthest North, discovered by Pytheas, 6 days N. of the Orcaades. Most geographers think that Iceland is meant. At all events it stood to the ancients for the N. limit of the world. Chaucer, in Boece B. m. 5, 5, speaks of "the last ile in the see, that highte Tyle." In Wilson's Pedler 1179, the Pedler asks: "Did you never hear of an island called Thewle near to the Orcaades?" In Fisher's Fuimus i. 3, Rolloano prays: "Some god transport me Beyond cold T." In Tiberius 2837, Agrippina says, "Sail unto T. or the frozen main." Milton, in Reform in England (1641), p. 21, recalls how "the northern ocean, even to the frozen T., was scattered with the proud shipwrecks of the Spanish Armada."

TIBALS. See THEOBALD'S.

TIBER. A river of central Italy, rising in the Apennines near Tiferum, and flowing S. along the boundary of Etruria until its junction with the Anio, when it turns S.W. and reaches the sea 27 m. after passing Rome. Its total length is abt. 200 m. At Rome it is 300 ft. wide, and from 12 to 18 ft. deep. It is a turbid stream, and deserves the epithet flavus (yellow) which the Roman poets give it. Its one glory is that it is the river of Rome. The old city lay entirely on its left bank, but the modern Rome has extended across it, especially on the N.W. It was crossed by 8 or 9 bridges, the oldest being the Pons Sublicius outside the Porta Trigemina.

In the list of rivers in Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 21, it appears as "Tybris, renowned for the Romans' fame." In Cor. iii. 1, 262, Menenius says of the plebeians: "I would they were in T." In J. C. i. 1, 50, Marullus speaks of the shouts which greeted Pompey so loudly "That T. trembled underneath her banks." In line 62, Flavius exhorts the people to assemble their friends "to T. banks and weep your tears Into his channel." In i. 2, 101, Cassius tells how Cæsar challenged him to swim across the river "upon a raw and gusty day, The troubled T. chafing with her shores"; and how he had to bear the tired Cæsar "from the waves of T." In iii. 2, 254, Antony announces that Cæsar has left to the people "His private arbours and new-planted orchards On this side T." They were really on the other side of the T. from the Forum; but Shakespeare was misled by North's Plutarch, where the same mistake is made. In Ant. i. 1, 33, Antony cries: "Let Rome in T. melt And the wide arch of the ranged empire fall!" In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar addresses the river: "O beauteous T., with thine easy streams That glide as smoothly as a Parthian shaft." In Ep. Wom. i. ii. 3, Graccus says, "As I cross T., my waterman shall attach it [his story]; he'll send it away with the tide; then let it come to an oyster-wenche's ear, and she'll cry it up and down the streets." The writer is obviously thinking of Lond. and the Thames; there were no watermen or oyster-wenches in Rome. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar boasts: "Proud T. and Lygurian Poe Bear my name's glory to the Ocean main." In Barnes' Charter iii. 1, Philippo says, "I'd rather choose within the river T. To drown myself." In Brandon's Octavia 656, Octavia says that Antony has sworn that "T. should his flowing streams recall" before he would prove faithless. In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Cæsar predicts that into the stream of Roman poetry "Shall T. and our famous rivers fall With such attraction that the ambitious line Of the round world shall to her centre shrink To hear such music." In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Constant, chaffing the Capt. about his alleged travels, says, "Yes, yes, and have seen And drank, perhaps, of T.'s famous stream." In Nero i. 4, Lucan prophesies, "my verse shall live When Nero's body shall be thrown in T." In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Francisco says, "We fear, When T. to each prowling passenger Discovers flocks of wild ducks." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Mephistophilis says of Rome: "Just through the midst runs flowing T.'s stream With winding banks that cut it in 2 parts." In his Ed. ii. 3, Edward prays: "Proud Rome! With slaughtered priests may T.'s channel swell!" In Tiberius 2664, Tiberius commands: "Hie to the altars, the Aegerian wood, The bidge. of T. and Prometheus lake."

T. is used by metonymy for Rome herself. In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 5, Nennius prays: "Grant Thames and T. never join their channels!" Daniel, in Cleopatra Prol. 66, exclaims: "How far Thames doth outgo declined Tybur!" sc. in poetry. In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar says, "Henceforth T. shall salute the seas, More famed than Tiger or swift Euphrates." Jonson, in Poetaster iii. 1, uses T. for Thames: when Histrio says that the play-houses of Rome "are on the other side of T." he is thinking of the Lond. theatres, which were almost all on the Bankside in Southwark across the Thames. T. is used in the sense of water. In Cor. ii. 1, 53, Menenius says he is one "that loves a cup of hot wine with not a drop of allaying T. in't."

TIBERIAS, now TABARIEH. The chief town of Galilee, on the W. coast of the Sea of Galilee; it was built by Herod Antipas in honour of the Emperor Tiberius, after whom it was named. It was famous for its beauty and fruitfulness. In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 54, Mandrecarde says, "I . . . am Mandrecarde of Mexico, Whose climate fairer than Tyberius." In his Friar ix. 272, Bacon promises for Frederick's banquet "Conserves and suckets from Tiberias."

TIBORNE, TIBURNE. See TYBURN.

TIBUR. The modern Tivoli, an ancient city of central Italy on the Anio, 20 m. E. of Rome. It was famous for its cascades and its fine natural scenery, and many of the Romans of the early empire had villas there. Its apple-orchards were celebrated, and the epithet pomosus (rich in apples) was more than once applied to it. It gave its name to Tiburtine, or Travertine, a kind of limestone that was quarried there. In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Autumn says, "Tibur shall pay thee apples and Sicyon olives."

TICHFIELD. A town in Hants. on the Aire, 8 m. S.E. of Southampton. The mansion house was built of the materials of an ancient abbey there. Shakespeare dedicates his Venus and Adonis to "The right Honourable Henry Wriothesley Earl of Southampton and Baron of Tichfield." It now gives its name to a Marquessate which forms one of the titles of the D. of Portland.

TICINO. A river rising in S. Switzerland and flowing through Lake Maggiore to the Po, which it joins just below Pavia. It is abt. 120 m. long. In Chapman's Consp. Byron i. 1, Picote tells a story of the meeting of the Spanish Legate and the D. of Savoy "Where the flood Ticin enters into Po."

TICKHILL. A town in W. Riding Yorks., on the borders of Notts., 37 m. S. of York, near the Torn. On the S.E. of the town are the ruins of a castle in which John of Gaunt at one time resided. In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Robin Hood says, "At Blithe and Tickhill were we welcome guests."

TIDORE. An island in the Ternate group in the Moluccas, lying off the W. coast of Gillolo, S. of Ternate. Its sultan was once a powerful ruler and controlled the whole group and a part of the adjacent island of Celebes. T. is the scene of the greater part of B. & F. Princess, and the heroine is the sister of the K. of T. Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 3, says, "If he be rich, he is the man; she will go to Jacakres or T. with him," i.e. to any place, however remote. Milton, P. L. ii. 639, speaks of "a fleet . . . Close sailing from Bengala, or the isles Of Ternate and T., whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs."

TIGRAMENTA, or TIGRANOCERTA. A city in Armenia on the Nicephorus, built by Tigranes as his capital. It lay abt. 250 m. due S. of the extreme E. end of the Black Sea. It was taken by Lucullus 72 B.C., and later by Germanicus in his Armenian expedition A.D. 18. In Tiberius 1822, Germanicus says, "Tigramenta, were it proud Babylon . . . Germanicus would never leave assault." In line 1857, Vonones says, "Tigranocerta by the die of war Should never make my realm unfortunate."

TIGRIS. A famous river in Asia, rising in the mtns. of Armenia, and flowing in a S.E. direction past the site of Nineveh and Bagdad to join the Euphrates abt. 70 m. above their common mouth at the head of the Persian Gulf. Its current is very rapid, especially in the lower part of its course; whence its name, which is derived from the Zend tighri, an arrow. It is the biblical Hiddekel. Its total length is abt. 1150 m. Spenser, in the river-list in F. Q. iv. 11, 20, calls it "T. fierce whose streams of none may be withstood." In Greene's Orlando iv. 2, 1143, Orlando says, "Else would I set my mouth to Tygres streams And drink up overflowing Euphrates." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. v. 2, Callapine says, "Now our mighty host Marcheth in Asia Major, where the streams Of Euphrates and T. swiftly run." In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar says, "Henceforth Tiber shall salute the seas More famed than Tiger or swift Euphrates." The name has nothing to do with "Tiger," except that perhaps the word "tiger" may also be connected with the Zend tighri. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Cæsar describes "nimble T.", running for wager with the wind that skims his top." In Marston's Insatiate v. 1, Isabella says that "Tioris swift" could not wash the blood from her hands; where Tioris is a manifest misprint for T. In B. & F. Lover's Prog. iv. 4, Lisander asks: "Can all the winds of mischief from all quarters, Euphrates, Ganges, T., Volga, Po, Make it swell higher?" In Tiberius 2162, Maximus, describing the victory of Germanicus over Vonones near Tigranocerta, says, "Between our armies T. swiftly ran." Milton, P. L. ix. 71, says, "There was a place . . . Where T., at the foot of Paradise, Into a gulf shot underground." The Hiddekel, or T., was one of the rivers of Paradise (see Gen. ii. 14).

TILBURY. A town on the N. bank of the estuary of the Thames, just opposite to Gravesend. It was here that in 1588 Elizabeth reviewed the troops assembled to repel the attack of the Spanish Armada. It was subsequently strongly fortified by Charles II. In Cuckqueans ii. 7, Rafe, talking of the coming of the Spaniards, says, "Her Majesty herself is in person at T., gathering there together the horns of her power to suppress them." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 337, Q. Elizabeth says, "Be this then styled our camp at Tilbery." In Dekker's Babylon 268, Titania (Elizabeth) says, "Over that camp at Beria we create you, Florimell, lieutenant-general." A note explains that Beria means T. In Killigrew's

Parson ii. 7, Jolly says, "Q. Bess, of famous memory, in '88 rode to T. on that bonny beast, the mayor."

TILMONT (TIRELMONT is intended). An ancient city in Belgium, 27 m. E. of Brussels. It is a walled town, and suffered many assaults and sieges in the Thirty Years War. There are several monasteries and nunneries there. In Glaphthorne's Hollander iv. 1, Sconce says, "If there had been any mercy in a Dutchman, the nuns at Tilmont had not been used so horribly last summer."

TILT-YARD. A piece of ground close to Whitehall Palace, used for tournaments in the first instance, but also employed in the reigns of Elizabeth and James for Masques; and even for bull- and bear-baitings. It occupied the part of the parade in St. James's Park just S. of the Horse-guards, over against the Banqueting House. It was the scene of a great Tournament held by Henry VIII in 1540; and during Elizabeth's reign an annual festival was held there on her birthday. In H4 B. iii. 2, 347, Falstaff says of Shallow: "He talks as familiarly of John a Gaunt as if he had been sworn brother to him; and I'll be sworn 'a ne'er saw him but once in the T.-y.; and then he burst his head for crowding among the Marshall's men." In H6 B. i. 3, 62, the Q. says sarcastically of Henry VI: "His study is his t.-y." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift promises his pupil in the art of drinking tobacco: "I will undertake in one fortnight to bring you that you shall take it plausibly in any Ordinary, Theatre, or the T.-y." In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, Loveless says of Abigail: "She heard a tale how Cupid struck her in love with a great lord in the t.-y., but he never saw her." In Marston's Malcontent Ind., Sinklow explains the pride he has in the feather he is wearing, "because I got it in the t.-y., there was a herald broke my pate for taking it up." In the Triumph of Charles (1641), mention is made of "the T.-y. over against His Majesty's palace of Whitehall." In Shirley's Servant ii. 1, Lodovick asks: "When shall we dance and triumph in the T.-y. In honour of the nuptials?" In Dekker's Satiro i. 2, 479, Asinius says of Horace (Jonson): "He was dashed once worse, going in a rainy day with a speech to the T.-y." In Middleton's Five Gallants ii. 1, Pursnet says that Fitzgrave is at "some pageant-plot or some device for the T.-y." In Partiall i. 5, a woman asks: "Which is the way to the T.-y.?" The scene is in Corsica.

TIMBRIA. The second of the 6 gates of Troy. Shakespeare took his list from Caxton's Recuyel of the Histories of Troy. In Troil. Prol. 16, the list runs: "Dardan and Timbria, Helias, Chetas, Troien, and Antenorides."

TIME. A bookseller's sign in Lond. The figure no doubt was the familiar one of an old man with a scythe and hour-glass. Lyly's Love's Meta. was "Printed by William Wood dwelling at the W. end of Paules, at the sign of Time. 1601."

TIMNA, now TIBNEH. A town in the Philistine dist. on the border of the tribe of Judah, abt. 18 m. W. of Jerusalem. It was here, according to Judges xiv. 1, that Samson found his first wife. In Milton's S. A. 219, Samson, speaking of his wives, says, "The first I saw at Timna, and she pleased Me, not my parents." Later, in 1018, the Chorus calls her "the Timnian bride."

TINE. See TYNE.

TINGINTANIA, or TINGITANA. A province on the N. coast of Africa, of which the capital was Tingis, now Tangiers. It corresponds roughly to Morocco. In the old Timon iii. 3, Pseudocheus promises "If anything can help thee that doth grow Upon the mtns. of Armenia, In Dacia, or Tingintania, It shall be had forthwith." In iii. 1, he says, "So speak the Tingitans that inhabits The mtns. of Squilmagia"; this last being an altogether imaginary place.

TINMOUTH. See TYNEMOUTH.

TIORIS. A misprint for TIGRIS, q.v.

TIPTREE. A farm in Essex in the parish of Tollesbury, N. of the estuary of the Blackwater. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report says he has been "at Tiptree."

TIVERTON. A town in Devonsh. at the confluence of the Exe and the Lowman, 14 m. N. of Exeter. Part of the ancient castle built in 1106 still remains, and the ch. of St. Peter has a fine Norman doorway. It was formerly a great centre of the woollen trade. It was partially burnt down in 1598. Nash, Lenten (Preface), speaks of a pamphlet entitled The Lamentable Burning of Tiverton.

TLAXCALLA. An independent State, enclosed in the Aztec Empire (Mexico), on the Papagallo, 70 m. E. of Mexico. After some hesitation, the Tlaxcalans joined Cortez against Mexico. In Cockayne's Obstinate ii. 1, Lorece, in his absurd account of his imaginary travels, says, "I was in Asia, at Tlaxcallan; there we took ship and in a pair of oars sailed to Madrid." This is, of course, intentional nonsense.

TMOLUS. A mtn. range in W. Asia Minor, S. of Sardis. It was famous for its vines; and was the source of the Pactolus. It was the scene of the contest between Apollo and Pan, where Midas, having decided in favour of Pan, was endowed by Apollo with a pair of asses' ears. Plutarch, De Fluvii vii., says that a stone was found there which secured the chastity of its possessor. In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Autumn says, "Thou shalt command The Lydian T. and Campanian mts. To nod their grape-crowned heads into thy bowls." In Greene's Alphonsus v. 2, 1618, Alphonsus says, "Rich Pactolus, that river of account, Which doth descend from top of T. mt., Shall be thy own." In Lyly's Midas v. 3, Midas relates: "Coming at last to the hill T., I perceived Apollo and Pan contending for excellence in music among nymphs." In his Euphues Anat. Wit 63, Lucilla boasts: "Yet have I the stone that groweth in the mt. T., the upholder of chastity."

TOBOSO. A town in Spain, 60 m. S.E. of Toledo. It has been immortalized by Cervantes, who calls the mistress of Don Quixote, Dulcinea del T. In Shirley's Honorata v. 1, the Serjeant speaks of "a pipe shining more than the forehead of Dulcinea del T." In Glaphthorne's Wit i. 1, Thorowgood asks: "Who's that? Some fair Dulcinea de T.?"

TOLEDO. A city in Spain, the chief town of the province of the same name, and at one time the capital of all Spain. It stands on the Tagus, 37 m. S.W. of Madrid. The river surrounds it on 3 sides, and on the 4th, to the N., it is defended by 2 ancient walls. It is the see of the Primate of Spain, and its cathedral, commenced in 1227 and completed in 1492, stands second to that of Seville only. The Alcazar, or royal palace, is a prominent feature of the city. It was the seat of a University. It was specially famous for the manufacture of the finest swords, known as Ts., and the industry is still carried on in the Fabrica de Armas, a mile or so N.W. of the Cambron gate. In H8 ii. 1, 164, a gentleman states that Wolsey is proposing the divorce of Catharine of Aragon in order to revenge himself on the K. of Spain "For not bestowing on him . . . The Archbishopric of T." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 2, D'Avolos reports that Roseilli has gone "to visit his cousin, Don Pedro de T., in the Spanish court." In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "Is Seville close-fisted? Valladolly is open; so Cordova, so T." In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Pacheco asks Alguazier: "Are you not he that was whipt out of T. for perjury?" In Chapman's Alphonsus, the Emperor's secretary is called Lorenzo de T.; there was no such person, but it is true that Alphonsus frequently resided at T.

In B. & F. Cure iii. 5, Bobadilla says, "Send him to T., there to study, For he will never fadge with these Ts," i.e. swords. In Span. Trag. v. 1, Hieronimo says, "When in T. there I studied, It was my chance to write a tragedy." In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Folly says that the Spaniard is "a confitmaker of T., and sells berengenas of T.," i.e. the fruit of the egg-plant. Greene, in Quip, p. 239, suggests to the cutler to "sell a sword or rapier new overglased, and swear the blade came either from Turkie or T." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 2, Brainworm offers Stephen a sword to buy, which he vows "is a most pure T.," though it is really a Fleming only worth a guilder. In Stucley 574, Sharp declares "William Sharp for bilboes, foxes, and T. blades." In Dekker's Fortunatus iii. 1, Agryppine says, "The Spanish prisoner hath sworn to me by the cross of his pure T. to be my servant." In Webster's White Devil v. 6, Flameneo asks: "O, what blade is't? a t. or an English fox?" In Massinger's Maid Hon. ii. 2, Sylli says, "I'll give him 3 years and a day to match my T., and then we'll fight like dragons." In Devonshire iii. 1, we are told of the buying of "a hundred of the best Ts." In Middleton's Blurt iii. 3, Lazarillo boasts: "If any spirits rise, I will conjure them in their own circles with T." In B. & F. Cure i. 2, Bobadilla says, "He shall to the wars, and, when he is provoked, draw his T. desperately." In Davenant's Stege ii. 1, Mervole says, "When I have fleshed thee with this metal of T., thou may'st justle the General." In his Italian iv. 1, Stoccata says, "Steel of T. is all we manage." In Webster's Law Case v. 4, Romelio asks: "Can you tell me whether your T. or your Milan blade be best tempered?" In B. & F. Elder B. v. 1, Cowsy says, "I have . . . paid for several weapons, Turkish and T., 2000 crowns." Milton, in Colast, says, "What do these keen doctors here but cut him over the sinews with their Ts.?" The scene of B. & F. Maid in Mill is laid at T.

TOLLESBURY. A vill. in Essex, just N. of the estuary of the Blackwater, near the coast. Robert Greene, the dramatist, is said to have been the vicar of Tollesbury for a year.

TOPHET. A place in the valley of Hinnom, probably at the point S.E. of Jerusalem where the Tyropeon Valley debouches into it. It seems to mean "the place of burning," and was very likely the spot where Moloch was worshipped; though both the exact site and the derivation of the word are uncertain. See II Kings xxiii. 10. Milton, P. L. i. 404, says that Moloch "made his grove The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell."

TORK. i.e. Torjok. A town in the province of Tver in Russia, 250 m. S.E. of Petrograd. In Suckling's Bromwell iii., we are told that "the Palatines of Tork and Minsk are in rebellion against the K. of Poland, Sigismund."

TORKE. See TURKEY.

TORMOYLE STREET. One of the many variations on the name of Turnbull or Turnmill St., q.v. In Dekker's News from Hell, his Ghost speaks of "a pot of that liquor that I was wont to drink with my hostess at the Red Lattice in Tormoyle St."

TORTOSA. A city in Spain on the left bank of the Ebro, 25 m. from its mouth. It was strongly fortified. From the 10th cent. onward it was held by the Moors and was a rendezvous for privateers and a peril to Italian commerce. Pope Eugenius III proclaimed a Crusade against it, and it was taken in 1148 after a famous siege, in which the Genoese took a decisive part. In the 1st (quarto) edition of Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 1, Bobadil says that the siege of Ghibelletto "was the best leaguer that ever I beheld, except the taking of T. last year by the Genoways." In the edition of 1616, Bobadil forgets its name and says "the taking of—what do you call it—last year." The quarto was published in 1598, but I can find no siege of T. in 1597, and suspect that Bobadil was simply playing on the ignorance of his hearers by referring to the famous siege of 1148 as if it had just happened. Mr. Percy Simpson thinks that T. means Orthosia, a tn. in Syria 12 m. N. of Tripoli, now Ortosa, which was taken by Saladin in 1188.

TORYNE. A town on the coast of Epeirus, opposite to Corcyra; it was abt. 50 m. N.W. of Actium, and Octavian gathered his fleet there before the battle of Actium. In Ant. iii. 7, 24, Antony expresses his surprise that Octavian "could so quickly cut the Ionian Sea And take in T." In line 56 a Messenger announces "Cæsar has taken T."

TOTHILL FIELDS, TOTHILL ST. See TUTTLE FIELDS, etc.

TOTNAM. See TOTTENHAM.

TOTNESS. An ancient town in Devonsh., on the Dart, 23 m. S. of Exeter. It was a very loyal place; hence the proverb "T. is turned French" for something quite unexpected and unlikely. Puttenham, Art of Poesie iii. 18, instances as a proverbial speech "Totnesse is turned French" for an unexpected change. But J. Heywood, in Prov. 14, quotes it as "Totnam was turned French"; and it is found in this form in A. Hall's Iliad (1581) iv. 60, and in Fuller's Worthies, Middlesex ii. 178.

TOTTENHAM (Tm. = Totnam). A village abt. 5 m. N. of Lond. on the North Road, between Stamford Hill and Edmonton. The full name of the place is T. High Cross, from the ancient Cross at the N.E. end of the Green. This Cross is mentioned as early as 1456; it was first made of wood, but early in the 16th cent. was rebuilt in brick, which in 1809 was covered with stucco. The river Lea flows past T. and used to be a favourite resort of the followers of Izaak Walton, who himself describes its beauties with enthusiasm. Bruce Castle, now a school, is on the site of an ancient castle once in the possession of Robert Bruce. The Ch. of All Hallows dates from the 14th cent.

In Merry Devil i., Fabel says, "I'll make my spirits dance such nightly jigs Along the way 'twixt this [Edmonton] and Tm. Cross, The carriers' jades shall cast their heavy packs." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Satan taunts Pug for priding himself on such paltry feats as "crossing of a market-woman's mare 'Twixt this and T." In Tomkis' Albumazar, Trincalo has a farm at Tm. for which he pays a rent of £10; and the Epilogue invites the audience "to come to Tm. and ask for Trincalo at the sign of the Hogshead." In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report claims to have been "at T." In Oldcastle iii. 2, Acton reports that the rebels are quartered "some with us in Hygate, some at Finchley, Tm.," etc. In Marston's Mountebanks, the Mountebank says, "I could encounter thee with Tottam Hie Cross or Cheape Cross." J. Heywood, in Proverbs 14, says, "Their faces told toys that Tm. was turned French." A. Hall, in Iliad iv. 60 (1581), says, "Do what thou canst, the time will come that Tm. French shall turn," i.e. the unexpected will happen. See, however, under TOTNESS. The burlesque Turnament of Tottenham is the subject of a 15th cent. ballad preserved in the Percy Reliques ii. 1. In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Quarloss says, "She may ask your blessing hereafter, when she courts it to Tottenham to eat cream." In Brome's Academy ii. 1, Valentine says to Hannah, "When shall we walk to Tm., or cross o'er the water, or take a coach to Kensington or Paddington or to some one or other o' th' city outleaps for an afternoon?" In both these passages it is possible that T. Court is meant; but I think it more likely that the reference is to T. See under TOTTENHAM COURT.

TOTTENHAM COURT. An ancient manor-house which stood at the junction of T. C. Rd. and Hampstead Rd., on the site now occupied by the Adam and Eve Tavern. It is mentioned in Domesday Book as the property of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's; and is called, up to the time of Elizabeth, Totten, Totnam, or Totting Hall, but never T. It was leased to Elizabeth, and was thereafter called Totten Court; and ultimately, through confusion with T., T. Court. During the 17th cent. it became a favourite resort of Londoners who went out along the country lane, now T. C. Rd., to eat cakes and cream. George Wither, in Britain's Remembrancer (1628), speaks of the cakes and cream at "Totnam C." In the books of St. Giles's Parish (1645), Mrs. Stacey's maid is fined a shilling "for drinking at Tottenhall C. on the Sabbath day." In Nabbes' Bride ii. 4, Squirrel says, "This is some hide-bound student that wencheeth at T. C. for stewed prunes and cheese-cakes." The passages quoted above under T. from Jonson and Brome probably refer to T. In Jonson's Tub, Squire Tub, of Totten-court, is one of the leading characters; the scenes of i. 1 and v. 3 are laid before his house at Totten-court. Nabbes wrote a play entitled Tottenham C., the scene of which is for the most part laid there.

TOURAINE. A province of France on the middle course of the Loire, round the city of Tours, between Maine, Anjou, Aquitaine, and Blois. It came to Henry II of England through his father, Geoffrey of Anjou, and remained a possession of the English Crown until 1204, when it was taken from John by Philip of France. It was recaptured by Henry V, but lost again in the reign of his successor. In K. J. i. 1, 11, the French ambassador claims for Arthur "Poitiers, Anjou, T.," and the claim is repeated by Lewis in ii. 1, 152. In ii. 1, 487, John offers "Anjou and fair T., Maine, Poitiers" as the dowry of the Lady Blanche, if Lewis and she are married. In Davenport's Matilda i. 2, Fitzwater taunts John with the loss of "Anjou, Brittain, Main, Poictou, and Turwin." In H6 A. i. 2, 100, La Pucelle says, "Here is my keen-edged sword The which at T., in St. Katharine's churchyard, Out of a great deal of old iron I chose forth." According to Holinshed, she got this sword "from St. Katharine ch. of Fierbois in Tourain." Rabelais, in Pantagruel ii. 9, calls T. "the garden of France."

TOURNAI. A city in Belgium on the Scheldt, 53 m. S.W. of Brussels. The Flemish name is Doornik, from which is derived Dornick, meaning a kind of tapestry manufactured there. It was the birthplace of Perkin Warbeck. It has a fine cathedral dating from the 12th cent. It was besieged and taken by Henry VIII in 1513, and became one of Wolsey's many Bishoprics. In True Trag., in a prophetic epilogue, a messenger says of Henry VIII (Haz., p. 127): "He entered France, and to the Frenchman's costs He won Turwin and Turney." Hall, in Sat. iv. 3, 17, says, "Cite old Ocland's verse, how they did wield The wars in Turwin or in Turney field." Ocland published a Latin poem, Anglorum Prælia, in 1582, in which Henry's victories in 1513 were celebrated. In Ford's Warbeck i. 3, Henry describes Warbeck as "This airy apparition first dis-cradled From T. into Portugal."

TOURS. The ancient Caesarodunum; a town of France on the S. bank of the Loire, 120 m. S.W. of Paris. It was the capital of the province of Touraine. It was the seat of an Archbp., and was frequently visited by the Kings of France during the 15th cent. Its cathedral is one of the finest in France and the 2 towers of St. Martin and of Charlemagne are part of the ancient basilica of St. Martin of T., erected in the 5th cent. It was at T. that Margaret of Anjou was married by proxy to Henry VI. T. was the seat of the manufacture of a kind of taffeta, which was highly esteemed. It was also authorized to mint money, which was one-fifth less in value than that coined at Paris. In H6 A. iv. 3, 45, York blames the delay of Somerset for the loss of T. In H6 B. i. 1, 5, Suffolk reports: "As I had in charge To marry Princess Margaret for your Grace, So, in the famous ancient city T., I have performed my task." In i. 3, 53, Margaret says to Suffolk, "When in the city T. Thou ran'st a tilt in honour of my love, I thought K. Henry had resembled thee." One thinks of Guinevere and Lancelot. In S. Rowley's When you D. 2, Brandon reports that the K.'s sister Mary has landed in France and been "bravely brought to the K. at Towers." In Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, Henri says, "He was received High Admiral of France In that our parliament we held at T." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 1, 34, describes the walls of Castle Joyeous as "round about apparelled With costly cloths of Arras and of Toure." Blount, Glossgr. (1656), s.v., defines Tournois as "a French penny, the tenth part of a penny sterling. In France they say so much money Tournois, as we say sterling."

TOWER. The ancient fortress in Lond., on the N. bank of the Thames, at the S.E. corner of the old city walls, something less than $\frac{1}{2}$ -mile below Lond. Bdge. A common legend attributed its foundation to Julius Cæsar; this is impossible, but it is likely that there was a fortress here in the Roman times. The present building, however, dates from William the Conqueror, who erected the central keep, called the White T., and some part at least of the inner wall, or Ballium. His architect was Gundulf, Bp. of Rochester. Henry III made considerable additions to it, including the embankment and the wharf. Edward I rebuilt the ch. of St. Peter; and by the time of Elizabeth the T. presented much the same appearance as at present, except that the Royal Palace, then lying S. of the White T., was pulled down by Oliver Cromwell. The whole fortress was surrounded by a moat, which was filled from the river. The entrance was at the S.W. corner through the Middle and Byward Ts. The Ts. in the Inner Wall, starting from the Byward T., were, on the W. side, the Bell, Beauchamp or Cobham, and Devereux or Devilin Ts.; on the N., the Flint, Bowyer's, Brick, and Martin or Jewel Ts.; on the E., the Constable, Broad Arrow, and Salt Ts. and on the S., the Lanthorn, Record or Hall, and Bloody T. In the outer wall along the river front were, from E. to W., St. Thomas's T., under which was the Traitors Gate, which gave admission to boats from the river; the Cradle T., the Well T., and two Ts. protecting the iron gate at the S.W. corner. At the S.W. corner of the White T. was the building called Coldharbour; on the E., the Wardrobe T. S. of the White T. were the buildings of the Royal Palace, of which only the Hall T. is left. Between the outer gate and the Middle T. on the S.W., was the famous menagerie, started by Henry III with 3 leopards, to which lions and other animals were added from time to time; in 1834 they were transferred to Regent's Park, and the refreshment room and ticket office now occupy the site. In the White T., on the 1st and 2nd floors, is the chapel of St. John, one of the finest examples extant of Norman architecture. Above it was the Council Chamber. Near the N.W. corner of the White T. is the Chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula, opposite the door of which is the spot on T. Green where the block used to be placed for the execution of prisoners; amongst those who suffered there were Lady Jane Grey, Anne Boleyn, and the Earl of Essex. The T. was without and independent of the jurisdiction of the city. It was at once a fortress; a royal palace; a State prison; a mint; an armoury; the treasury of the Crown jewels, which were at this time kept in a small building S. of the White T., but were removed by Charles I to the Martin T.; and the storehouse for the records of the Courts.

The Origin of the Tower.—In R2 v. 1, 2, the Q. says, "This is the way To Julius Caesar's ill-erected T. To whose flint bosom my condemned lord Is doomed a prisoner"; though, as we learn from line 52, Richard was sent "to Pomfret, not unto the T." In R3 iii. 1, 69, Prince Edward says, "I do not like the T. of any place. Did Julius Caesar build that place, my lord?" to which Buckingham replies: "He did, my gracious lord, begin that place, Which, since, succeeding ages have re-edified." In Peele's Ed. I v., Lluellen says, "Lluellen May chance to shew thee such a tumbling cast As erst our father, when he sought to scape, And broke his neck from Julius Caesar's T." Griffin, Prince of Wales, tried to escape from the White T., but fell and was killed. In More iv. 5, More says, "I will subscribe to go unto the T. . . and thereto add My bones to strengthen the foundation Of Julius Caesar's palace." In Deloney's Reading vi., the clothiers' wives "went to the T. of Lond., which was builded by Julius Caesar, who was Emperor of Rome."

The Tower as a Royal Palace.—H6 C. iv. 4 should be laid in the T., which was a favourite residence of Edward IV; and Stowe says that in 1470 the Q. "stole secretly out of the Towre by water to Westminster"; iv. 6 is also in the T. In R3 iii. 1, 65, Gloucester counsels the young K., Edward V., to repose himself "at the T.," and sends word to the Q.-mother to come to him there. In line 172, Gloucester sends a summons to Lord Hastings "tomorrow to the T.," and in the next scene Hastings and Stanley go thither together. In iii. 4, the Council is held in the chamber in the White T., at which Hastings is condemned to death and led away to the block on T. Green. In iii. 5, Gloucester and Buckingham appear on the T. walls to meet the Mayor and Catesby. Act iv. sc. 1 is laid before the T. In iv. 2, 75, Richard commissions Tyrrel to kill

"those bastards in the T.," and in the next scene their death is described and Tyrrel reports: "The Chaplain of the T. hath buried them." The traditional place of their death is a room in the Bloody T.; they were first buried near the gateway wall, then re-interred by Richd. under a staircase in the White T.; there Charles II found their bones and had them removed to Henry VII's chapel at Westminster. In v. 3, 151, their Ghosts appear to Richd. and bid him "Dream on thy cousins smothered in the T." The scene of Ford's Warbeck ii. 2 is the Council Chamber in the T.

The Tower as a State Prison.—In Nobody 1431, Vigenius anachronistically condemns Elidune to live "within the T." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Edward says of the Bp. of Coventry: "He shall to the T., the Fleet, or where thou wilt." In Oldcastle iv. 3, the Bp. orders: "To the T. with him," i.e. Oldcastle. H6 A. ii. 5 is laid in the T. where Mortimer is confined. But Edmund Mortimer was not a prisoner in the T. at any time, nor did he die there. He was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in 1422, and died in 1424 at Trim Castle. In H6 B. iv. 9, 38, the K. promises York that he will send "D. Edmund to the T.," i.e. the D. of Somerset; and he was so sent in 1453. In H6 C. iii. 2, 120, Edward commands that Henry should be "conveyed unto the T." Henry was released by Warwick in 1471; but in iv. 8, 57, Edward once more says of Henry: "Hence with him to the T.; let him not speak." In v. 5, 50, Gloucester leaves the field of Tewkesbury exclaiming, "The T. ! the T. ! " and in line 85 Clarence says he has gone to Lond. "To make a bloody supper in the T." In v. 6, the scene is in the T.; and Gloucester murders Henry there. This was on May 21st, 1471; though it is doubtful whether the K. was murdered or died a natural death. In R3 i. 1, 45, Clarence comes in under arrest and, as he is going to the T., Gloucester suggests that he is to be re-christened there; and in line 68 recalls how Hastings had been sent to the T. Clarence's arrest took place in 1478; it is not certain that Hastings was sent to the T. at all. In i. 3, 116, Gloucester says, "I dare adventure to be sent to the T.,"; in line 119 Margaret accuses him: "Thou slewest my husband Henry in the T." In i. 4, Clarence is introduced in his cell in the T., and his murder there by drowning in a butt of Malmsey is related. The traditional scene of the murder is a room in the Bowyer's T. In H3 i. 1, 207, Brandon informs Buckingham: "'Tis his Highness' pleasure You shall to the T." In i. 2, 192, the Surveyor gives evidence of what Buckingham had said he would do if he were committed to the T. In v. 1, 107, the K. bids Cranmer for the present "make your house our T." In v. 3, 54, Gardiner proposes to commit Cranmer to the T., and this is agreed to. In S. Rowley's When you, the K. gives order about Brandon: "Bid the Capt. of our guard Convey him to the T." The scene of More iv. 4 is the T. on the occasion of the arrest of Fisher, Bp. of Rochester; he was confined in the vaults of the White T. In iv. 3, Lady More tells of her dream in which she shot the bidge. in a boat, and then "our boat stood still just opposite the T., and there it turned, Till that we sank." v. 1 takes place at the T.-gate when More is brought there in custody. In v. 4, More says: "Here's a fair day toward; It were fair walking on the T.-leads." Skelton, in Colin Clout 1160, says, "I say, Lieut. of the T., Make this lurdain for to lower; Lodge him in Little Ease; Feed him with beans and pease." Little Ease was a cell in the vaults of the White T., so small that the prisoner could neither stand, lie, nor sit with comfort. In Roister i. 2, Merrygreek says, "The toure could not you so hold But to break out at all times ye would be bold." In Webster's Law Case iii. 2, the Surgeon says, "This is like one I have heard in England was cured of the gout by being racked in the T."

The Tower as outside the jurisdiction of the City.—In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iv. 6, Wellbred sends to his sister Bridget to meet him "at the T. instantly"; for, he says, "we must get our fortunes Committed to some larger prison, say; And, than the T., I know no better air; Nor where the liberty of the house may do us More present service," i.e. he and his lady could be married there. Deloney, in Newberie xi., tells of a couple whose marriage "was solemnized at the T. of Lond."

The Tower as a Fortress. In Straw i., the K. says to Morton, "You shall in our T. of Lond. stay." In Oldcastle iii. 4, the K. says, "Command the postern by the T. be kept." In Trag. Richd. II v. 2, 212, Bushy, after the defeat of the K. by Lancaster, says, "Let's fly to Lond. and make strong the T." H6 A. i. 3 is laid before the T., where Gloucester demands that the gates should be opened to him and is resisted by Winchester. In H6 B. iv. 5, the scene is the T.; the Lord Mayor sends to Lord Scales to get "aid from the T. to defend the city from the rebels"; and he replies: "The rebels have assayed to win the T." In iv. 6, 17, Cade exhorts the rebels: "Burn down the T. too." It was defended by guns mounted on the walls. Middleton, in Hubbard, says, "His pen lay mounted behind his ear like a T. gun." In his R. G. v. 2, the messenger, who brings word that the runaway lovers have gone to the T.-stairs, does it "With a full-charged mouth like a culverin's voice." In Davenport's New Trick ii. 1, Changeable says to his wife, "I never hear thy tongue but I think of the T. ordnance." Jonson, in Underwoods xc. 1, says, "This is K. Charles his day. Speak it, thou T. Unto the ships and they from tier to tier."

The Tower as an Armoury.—In H6 A. i. 3, 67, Winchester says that Gloucester "would have armour here out of the T." In Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions, among the sights of Lond., "The lance of John a Gaunt, and Brandon's still i' the Towere."

The Tower as the Mint.—Chaucer, C. T. A. 3256, says of the Carpenter's wife: "Ful brighter was the shynyn of hir hewe Than in the Tour the noble yforged newe." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 4, Subtle fears that he and his accomplices may all be "locked up in the T. for ever To make gold there for the state." Barnfield, in Pecunia (1598), says, "New coin is coined each year within the T." Fuller, Holy State ii. 19, 120, says, "He knows, if he sets his mark (the T.-stamp of his credit) on any bad wares, he sets a deeper brand on his own conscience."

The Tower Lions.—In Braithwaite's Barnaby's Journal, "The lions in the T." are mentioned as one of the 7 sights of Lond. In Webster's White Devil v. 6, Flameneo says, "Let all that belong to great men remember the old wives' tradition, to be like the lions in the T. on Candlemas Day; to mourn if the sun shine, for fear of the pitiful remainder of winter to come." Candlemas day is February 2nd, when the winter is by no means over. Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1641), says of a discontented man: "He cannot stand still, but, like one of the T. wild beasts, is still walking from one end of his room to the other." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Peregrine says it is true "of your lion's whelping in the T.," which Sir Politick considers quite a prodigy. The lioness in the T. whelped on August

5th, 1604; and again on February 26th, 1606. In Dekker's Hornbook vii. he speaks of "a country gentleman that brings his wife up to learn the fashion, see the tombs at Westminster, the Lyons in the T." In Two Gent. ii. 1, 28, Speed says, "You were wont, when you walked, to walk like one of the lions." In Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Holland says, "He hath seen Paris Garden and the Lions."

TOWER DITCH. The moat round the T. of Lond., made by the Bp. of Ely in the reign of Richd. I. The City moat, or Town D., which was practically a common sewer, sometimes overflowed into the T. D. and filled it with filth. In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Chough prays for Priss that she "may die sweetly in T.-d." Jonson, in Epigram to Inigo Marquis Would-be (i.e. Inigo Jones), says, "When . . . Thou canst of truth the least entrenchment pitch We'll have thee styled the Marquis of T.-d." W. Rowley, in Search 16, says, "Return if ye be wise, you fall into the d. else." The searchers were in Rosemary Lane, hard by the T.

TOWER HILL. The hill on the W. and N. of the T. of Lond. At the top of it, N.W. of the T., a scaffold was kept in perpetuity for the execution of state prisoners, on which much of the noblest blood of England has been shed. The last execution was that of Simon Lord Lovat, on April 9th, 1747. In Ford's Warbeck iii. 1, the K. commands: "Let false Audley be drawn upon an hurdle from the Newgate to T.-h.; there let him lose his head." This was in 1497. The scene of v. 3 is the T.-h., where Warbeck is put into the stocks. The execution of Sir T. More on T. H. is the subject of v. 4 of the play of that name. In Webster's Wyat x., Lady Jane Grey says to Guildford, "Out of this firm grate you may perceive The T.-h. thronged with store of people." This was at the execution of Northumberland. In xii., Winchester sentences Guildford and Lady Jane: "You shall lose your heads Upon the T.-h." Guildford was beheaded there, but the Lady Jane suffered on T.-Green. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. A. i., p. 221, Elizabeth asks: "Is yet the scaffold standing on T. H. Whereon young Guildford and the Lady Jane Did suffer death?" In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xxv., Liberty says of those who oppose him: "Some fall preaching at the Toure H." In Overbury's Vision (1616) 84, it is spoken of as "that T.'s fatal h. Whereon That scaffold stands, which e'er since it hath stood Hath often licked up treason's tainted blood."

In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Dodger says to Lacy, "My lord, your uncle on the T.-h. stays With the Lord Mayor and the aldermen, And doth request you to hasten thither." In Houghton's Englishmen i. 2, Heigham says, "This walk o'er T. H., Of all the places Lond. can afford, Hath sweetest air, and fitting our desires"; and Harvey rejoins: "Good reason so, it leads to Crutched Friars Where old Pisaro and his daughters dwell." In Middleton's No Wit ii. 1, Weatherwise says, "She was brought a-bed at the Red Lion about T.-h." In Sharpham's Fleire iii. 347, Fleire mentions among his customers "Master Match the gunner of T.-H." In Cowley's Cutter v. 2, Worm, pretending to have just returned from Africa, says, "Little thought I to see my old house upon T.-H. again." In H8 v. 4, 65, the Porter says, "These are the youths that thunder at a playhouse and fight for bitten apples; that no audience, but the tribulation of T.-h., or the limbs of Limehouse, their dear brothers, are able to endure." Apparently the Tribulation of T. H. was a nickname for the crowd of hooligans who attended the executions there; what would be called here in Melbourne "the T. H. push." Nash, in Lenten, p. 296, speaks of "T. H. water at Lond., so much praised and sought after." This came from a spring near the T. Postern. Deloney, in Craft i. 14, mentions "the Abbey of Grace on T. H." See GRACE, ABBEY OF.

TOWER POSTERN. A gate between George Yard and the T. Ditch, at the S. end of Lond. Wall, N. of the T. It was originally built of Kent and Caen stone, when the T. was erected; and was finally taken down in 1720. Deloney, in Craft i. 14, tells how John "got him presently to the Constable of the Postern Gate, and told him that Nick had laid a man for dead in T. st."

TOWER STREET, now GREAT TOWER ST. Lond., running W. from T. Hill to Eastcheap. In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, the hero says, "I am Simon Eyre, the mad shoemaker of T. St."; and later he exhorts Ralph, "Fight for the mad knaves of Bedlam, Fleet-st., T.-st., and Whitechapel." From iv. 3, we learn that Eyre lived "at the sign of the Last in T.-st." In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, Heigham says to Frisco, "How, loggerhead, is Crutched-Friars here? I thought you were some such drunken ass, that come to seek Crutched-friars in T.-st." For reference in Deloney's Craft, see above.

TOWER WHARF. A wharf along the river-front of the T. of Lond., 1,200 ft. long, with 3 stairs: the T. stairs at the W. end, the Queen's stairs beneath the Byward T., and the Galleymen stairs under the Cradle T. It was erected by Henry III. In Webster's Weakest i. 2, Bunch says, "I was an ale-draper, as Thames and T.-w. can witness." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Puntarvolo says, "Upon my return [from Constantinople] and landing on the T.-w., I am to receive 5 for 1." In Davenant's Wits iv., Thwack speaks of "midnight lectures preached by wives of comb-makers and midwives of T.-w." In St. Hilary's Tears (1642), in the title, "from the T.-stairs to Westminster Ferry" is used for the whole extent of Lond. The T. ordnance, from which salutes were fired on occasions, were mounted on the walls overlooking the w. In Jonson's Epicoene i. 1, Truewit advises Dauphine to have Morose "drawn out on a coronation day to the T.-w., and kill him with the noise of the ordnance." In iv. 2, Morose is willing, if he can get rid of his wife, "to do penance in a belfry, at Westminster Hall, in the Cockpit, the T.-w., when the noises are at their height and loudest." In Overbury's Vision (1616), it is said of the T.: "On the w. fast by Those thundering cannons ever ready lie."

TOWERS. See TOURS.

TOWN, THE. Sometimes used of the Borough of Southwark, as distinguished from the City of Lond. In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Urinal speaks of "the Three Squirrels in the town." See SQUIRRELS, THREE.

TOWNBULL STREET. A variant for Turnbull St., q.v.

TOWN DITCH. The moat surrounding the City of Lond. See HOUNDSDITCH, SHOREDITCH.

TRALLEIS, more usually TRALLES. A city in Caria, a little N. of the Scamander, abt. 30 m. W. of Ephesus. Its inhabitants were very wealthy, and the Asiarchs were generally chosen from them. The ruins at Ghissel Hisar are all that is left of the place. In Chapman's Cæsar iii. 2, 59, Crassinus says to Cæsar, "In Tralleis, Within a temple built to Victory There stands a statue with your form and name, Near whose firm base, even from the marble pavement, There sprang a palm-tree up in this last night." The story is taken from Plutarch, Vit. Cæsar 47.

TRANSALPINE. On the other side of the Alps. It was at first used from the point of view of Rome and Italy to mean on the N. of the Alps. In Greene's Orlando i. 3, 402, a soldier speaks of the wealth of Charlemagne drawn from his mines "Found in the mountains of T. France." Fynes Moryson, Itin. (1617) iii. 47, says, "The divine law came from Italy to the Ts." Later it came to be used, from the English point of view, for the Italians. Blount, Glossogr., defines T. as "over or beyond the Alps, foreign, Italian, on the further side of the mtns." In B. & F. Coxcomb i. 2, Antonio speaks of himself and his companion as "Travellers that know T. garbs," i.e. Italian fashions. Nash, in Lenten, p. 306, speaks of "the Transalpiners with their lordly Parmasin," i.e. cheese of Parma, as contrasted with the Hollanders with their Dutch cheese.

TRANSYLVANIA, or SIEBENBURGEN. The E. portion of Austro-Hungary, lying between Hungary proper, Moldavia, and Wallachia. It became subject to Hungary in A.D. 1004, but gained its independence under John Zapolya in 1538, and was supported by the Turks against the Hungarians during the 16th cent. The population is extremely mixed, including Magyars, Saxons (i.e. Germans), Wallachians, and a large number of Gipsies. It was finally incorporated with Hungary in 1868. In Per. iv. 2, 22, the Pander announces: "The poor Tn. is dead that lay with the little baggage." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor says that there served with him against the Turk at the siege of Belgrade "many Hungarians, Moldavians, Vallachians, and Tns." In Shirley's Imposture v. 1, Hortensio says to Pandolfo, "You are the very same to whom his Holiness gave a pension for killing 6 great Turks in T." In the 17th cent. there were many Protestants in T.; the leading magnate of the country, Bethlem Gabor, taking some part against Austria in the early years of the Thirty Years War. Milton, Areopagitica, says, "Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Tn. sends out yearly . . . not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language and our theologic arts."

TREBIZOND. The Greek Trapezus; a city near the S.E. corner of the Black Sea. It was the point where Xenophon and his 10,000 reached the sea after their famous retreat from Mesopotamia. In A.D. 1204 Alexius Comnenus established an empire with T. as its capital, which lasted till the city was taken by Mohammed II in 1461. It was famous for its gorgeous palace, its lovely gardens, and its fine library. It is often mentioned in the old romances as the scene of tournaments between the Christian knights and the Saracens. In Selimus 163 a messenger announces: "Selim, the soldan of great Trebisond, Sends me." In Markowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes speaks of "Danubius stream that runs to Trebizon"—not a very exact statement, as the Danube enters the Black Sea at its N.W. corner, diametrically opposite to T. In Kirke's Champions ii., Anthony and Andrew defeat "the Emperor of Trebizon." In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 4, Pandolfo speaks of Albumazar as "an Indian, far beyond Trebesond and Tripoli, close by the world's end." Milton, P. L. i. 584, speaks of "all who since, baptized or infidel, Jousted in Aspramont or Montalban, Damasco or Marocco, or Trebisond."

TREDAGH. A vill. S. of Dundalk in Co. Louth, Ireland. In Stucley 937, Herbert orders: "Bid Capt. Gainsford guard the southern port Toward Tredagh."

TREGENVER. A farm in the parish of Falmouth in S. Cornwall. In Cornish M. P. i. 2593, Solomon gives to the Carpenter "T. ha Kegyllek," i.e. T. and Kegyllek.

TREHEMBYS. Probably the same as Tenbrise, a part of the property of the Carnsew family, in S. Cornwall, near Falmouth. In Cornish M. P. i. 1311, David says to the messenger, "Carn suyow ha T., Chatur annethe thy's gura," i.e. Carnsew and T., Make of them a charter for thyself.

TREMISEN, now TLEMECEN. A town on the N. coast of Africa, in the extreme W. of Algiers, near the bay of the same name. It was formerly a place of some importance, and has an ancient citadel of great strength. The Knight in Chaucer, C. T. Prol. 62, had "foughten for oure feith at Tramysse in lystes thries." Milton, P. L. xi. 404, names "Marocco and Algiers and Tremisen" amongst the kingdoms of N. Africa.

TRENT. A river in England, rising near Burslem in Staffs. It flows S.E. through Staffs., then suddenly turns E.N.E., and finally N., falling into the Humber after a course of 144 m. It was absurdly supposed to derive its name from its having 30 tributaries, or from the 30 kinds of fish which were found in it. It forms the natural division between the N. and S. of England. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 35, calls it "bounteous T. that in himself ensembles Both 30 sorts of fish and 30 sundry streams." Drayton, in Idea xxxii. 3, speaks of "The crystal T., for folds and fish renowned." In Polyolb. 28, he mentions the "30 floods of name" that flow into it. Milton, Vac. Exercise 93, speaks of "T., who like some earth-born giant spreads His 30 arms along the indented mead." In Sampson's Vow iv. 2, 107, Ann dreams: "Methought I walked along the verdant banks Of fertile T." Drayton, in Dowdabel 30, says that the lady's skin was white as "swan that swims in T."

In H4 A. iii. 1, 74, Mortimer announces that the part of England N. of T. and Severn is to be assigned to Hotspur; but Hotspur objects to the behaviour of the river N. of Burton, which cuts "me A huge half-moon, a monstrous cantle out," and proposes to dam it up and cut a new channel in which "the smug and silver T. shall run fair and evenly"; and at last Glendower consents: "Come, you shall have T. turned." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 11, Elizabeth refers to the petition of the men of Nottingham to make the T. navigable from Nottingham to Gainsborough; and the Mayor supports it by saying that "Harry the fifth And Percy fell at odds; in which division, Dividing of the land, Glendower began To stop the water-courses of flowing T." This refers to the repeated windings of the river just S. of Gainsborough; and it is possible that Shakespeare also had this in mind. In Nobody 254, Vigenius proposes to divide Britain between himself and Peridure in a similar way; "All beyond T. and Humber shall suffice One moiety." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 216, the K. says to Scroope, "From T. to Tweed thy lot is parted thus." In Brome's Damoiselle iv. 1, Phillis says, "Nell is as bonny a beggar's name as ever came from beyond T." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xii., Fancy says, "Her even giant From Tyne to T."; i.e. all through the N. of England. In Kinsmen prol. it is said of Chaucer: "a poet never went More famous yet 'twixt Po and silver T." T. stands for England, and has the advantage of rhyming with "went."

TRENT, or TRIENT. The ancient Tridentum. A city in the Austrian Tyrol, on the Adige, abt. 80 m. N.W. of Venice. The famous Council of T., which rejected the doctrines of the Reformation and further defined those of the Catholic Ch., was held here in the ch. of Sta. Maria Maggiore 1545-1563. Donne, in Preface to Progress of Soul (1601), says, "I forbid no reprehender, but him that like the T. Council forbids not books but authors." Milton, in Son. on New Forcers of Conscience 14, says that the plots and packings of the Westminster Assembly were "worse than those of T."

TRENTAM, or TRENTHAM. A vill. on the Trent in Staffs., near to Stoke. In John Evangel. 357, Eugenio says, "Farewell! Yonder cometh Sir William of Trentam." Probably he was the priest of the parish in which the Interlude was acted.

TRIER. The old Augusta Trevirorum, now Treves. The most ancient city in Germany, lying on the right bank of the Moselle, 60 m. S.W. of Coblenz. The Roman remains include the gateway called Porta Nigra, dating from the 1st cent.; the baths of the palace; the great amphitheatre; and the piers of the Bidge. The mediaeval age is well represented by the Cathedral, the oldest part of which belongs to the 4th cent. Here is preserved the famous holy coat, said to have been worn by our Lord at His crucifixion. The Archbp. was one of the Seven Electors of the Empire. The University was founded in 1473 and flourished until 1798. In Marlowe's Famstus vii., Faust relates how he has "Passed with delight the stately town of T., Environed round with airy mtn. tops, With walls of flint and deep-entrenched lakes, Not to be won by any conquering prince." In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 1, 130, Lorenzo says, "For T. and Brandenburg, I think of them As simple men that wish the common good." In i. 2, 36, the Archbp. introduces himself as "Frederick, Archbp. of T., D. of Lorraine, Chancellor of Italy." As a matter of fact, his name was Arnold von Isenberg, and he was not D. of Lorraine. The archbp. appears as one of the Electors in W. Smith's Hector.

TRIG STAIRS. A landing place on the N. bank of the Thames, at the bottom of T. lane, which runs S. from 34 Upper Thames St. to the river. It was named after one John Trigge, who owned it in the reign of Edward III. In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Littlewit explains how, in his puppet play, "Leander spies her [Hero] land at T.-s. and falls in love with her." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 2, Tim says, "My sister's gone; let's look at T.-s. for her."

TRINACRIA. An old name given to Sicily from its triangular shape (see SICILY). Hall, in Sat. v. 2, speaks of Pluto "when in Trinacry I ween He stole the daughter of the harvest q." Milton, P. L. ii. 661, speaks of "Vexed Scylla bathing in the sea that parts Calabria from the hoarse Trinacrian shore."

TRINIDADO. The most southerly of the W. Indies, lying just off the E. coast of Venezuela, from which it is separated at its N. and S. extremities by channels abt. 15 m. wide. It was discovered by Columbus in 1496 and remained a Spanish possession until 1797, when it was taken by the British and confirmed in their possession by the Treaty of Amiens. It was famous for its tobacco during the 16th cent., which, Heylyn says, was of the best fashion; but it does not export any tobacco now.

In Brewer's Lingua iv. 4, Olfactus introduces tobacco : "This is the mighty emperor Tobacco, K. of T., that, in being conquered, conquered all Europe." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 2, Bobadil says, "For your green wound, your Balsamum and your St. John's wort are all mere gulleries and trash to it [i.e. tobacco], especially your T." Dekker, in Hornbook Proem, says, "The phantastick Englishmen [are] more cunning in the distinction of thy Rowle T., Leaf, and Pudding than the whitest Blackamoor in all Asia." In B. & F. Malta iii. 1, the soldier's song has the lines "To thee a full pot, my little lance-prisado, And when thou hast done, a pipe of T." Taylor, in Works ii. 229, says, "All their talk is smoking T.," and again, "Thine heir will feast, carousing Indian T. smoke." In Sharpham's Fleire iii. 270, Petoune swears "by this T."—which he is then smoking.

TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE. The largest college in the University of Cambridge, on the W. side of T. St., between St. John's and Caius. It was founded in 1546 by Henry VIII. By a statute of 1560 a comedy or tragedy was directed to be performed in the College every Christmas. In 1546 the Pax of Aristophanes and Christopherson's Jephthes were played. In 1581 Wingfield's Pedantius was given; and Nash, in Saffron Walden, says of Harvey: "I'll fetch him aloft in Pedantius, that exquisite comedy in T. C." Cowley's Naufragium Jocularis was produced in 1638. Amongst the dramatists who were members of this C. were John Tomkis, Tomkiss, or Tomkins, and Thomas Randolph.

TRINITY COLLEGE, OXFORD. University of Oxford, standing a little back from the E. side of St. Giles St., between Balliol and St. John's. It was founded by Sir Thomas Pope in 1554 on the site of the old Benedictine Durham College. Gascoigne's Supposes was acted at Trinity in 1582. Thomas Lodge and George Chapman were Trinity men.

TRINOBAINT. See TROYNOVANT.

TRINOBAINTES. An ancient British tribe, inhabiting what is now Essex and the S. part of Suffolk. In Fisher's Faunus i. 4, Hirildas speaks of "Landora the Trinobantic lady." In iv. 4, Mandubratius says to Caesar, "By me the Trinobants submit and Segontiacs."

TRIPOLI. A state in N. Africa, lying along the coast from Egypt to Tunis and Algeria. The capital, Tripoli, is on the coast, due S. of Sicily. T. was taken by the Arabs in the 12th cent., captured from them in 1510 by Spain, and in 1523 given to the Knights of St. John; they were expelled by the Turks in 1553, and thenceforward the port became a nest of pirates who were the terror of the Mediterranean commerce. It must not be confounded with Tripolis in Syria; usually, but not invariably, it is spelt by our authors T., whilst the Syrian town has a final s. It now belongs to Italy. In Shrew iv. 2, 76, the Pedant says he is going from Padua to Rome, "And so to T., if God lend me life." In B. & F. Malta i. 1, Zanthia produces a letter "sent from T. by the great Bashaw, which importunes her love unto him and treachery to the island" (sc. Malta). In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pisaro, hearing that his ships have been taken by Spanish galleys as they were coasting along Italy, says, "What made the dolts near Italy? Could they not keep the coast of Barbary, Or, having past it, gone for T., Being on the other side of Sicily As near as where they were unto the Straits?"

For by the globe both T. and it Lie from the Straits some 25 degrees." Twenty degrees would be more exact, but obviously the African T. is meant. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, the Basso announces that the Sultan has "10,000 Janisaries Brought to the war by men of T." In Green's Orlando i. 1, 5, Mandrecarde speaks of his country Mexico as having a climate "fairer than Tyberius [i.e. Tiberias] Seated beyond the sea of T." The Mediterranean is meant; and is probably so called from its being infested by the pirates of T.; but it is possible that the Syrian Tripolis is intended. The phrase "to come from T." means to cut capers and leap high. Nares thinks it is connected with the apes which came from N. Africa, and means to play monkey-tricks; but I suspect it is nothing but a pun on T. and trip. Jonson, in Epigram cxv., characterizes the Town's Honest Man as one who "Can come from T., leap stools, and wink." In B. & F. Thomas iv. 2, Sebastian exhorts Thomas: "Get up to that window there, and presently, like a most complete gentleman, come from T." In Jonson's Epicoene v. 1, La-Foole says, "I protest, Sir John, you come as high from T. as I do; and lift as many joined stools and leap over them, if you would use it."

TRIPOLIS. An ancient city on the coast of Syria, abt. 50 m. N. of Beirut. It was founded by the Phœnicians on the coast, but in 1289 it was destroyed by the Sultan of Egypt, and the present city was commenced 2 m. inland. Its harbour is Al-Mina. It carried on an extensive trade in the Elizabethan times with the ports of the Mediterranean and with England. In Merche i. 3, 18, Shylock tells us that Antonio "hath an argosy bound to T." In iii. 1, 106, Tubal reports that he "hath an argosy cast away, coming from T." In iii. 2, 271, Bassanio exclaims: "What, not one hit? From T., from Mexico and England, And not one vessel scape?" The "eager Turk of T." is one of the competitors in the tournament in Kyd's Soliman i. 1. See also TRIPOLI.

TRIVIGI, i.e. TREVISO. A town in N.E. Italy, abt. 15 m. N. of Venice. It has a considerable trade in cattle, corn, and fruits. In Cockayne's Trapolin v. 1, Trapolin sings: "Vience wine and Padua bread, Trivigi tripes, and a Venice wench in bed."

TROGLODYTES. A tribe who lived in caves on the S. shores of the Red Sea. They are represented by the Greek writers as barbarous in their manners, and occupied chiefly in incessant raids on one another and on travellers. The Barnagas on the frontiers of Abyssinia are their modern representatives. The name is used for a degenerate and degraded person. In Locrin iv. 1, 30, Corineus says, "If the brave nation of the T. . . Should dare to enter this our little world, Soon should they rue their overbold attempts." Fynes Moryson, Itiner. iii. 3, 124, says, "The T. live in caves of the earth and their kingdom is at this day called Adel." Raleigh, in Hist. of World i. 52, speaks of the region of "Prester John and the T." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 263, speaks of "the Troglodytae which digged in the filthy ground for roots and found the inestimable stone Topason." See Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 32. In Dekker's Satiro iv. 2, 107, Tucca calls Horace (Jonson) "My long-heeled Troglodite."

TROIEN. One of the 6 gates of Troy. In Troil. prol. 16, they are enumerated as "Dardan and Tymbria, Helias, Chetas, Troien, and Antenorides." The list is taken from Caxton's Recuyel.

TROIJAN. See TROY.

TROY (Tn. = Trojan, Tyn. = Troyan). The capital of the Troad, a dist. in the N.W. corner of the coast of Asia Minor, W. of the Ida range. The city of T. has been identified with Hissarlik, where Schliemann excavated 6 successive cities, of which he considered the 2nd from the bottom to be the Homeric Ilium, the city besieged and burnt by the Greeks in the famous Tn. war. In many respects, however, the hill called Bali Dag, a little further S., complies better with the Homeric description of T. as "windy," "lofty," "beetling," etc. According to the legends, T. was founded by Teucer, but the walls were built by Apollo and Poseidon for K. Laomedon. Laomedon refusing to pay the stipulated price, Poseidon sent a sea-monster to ravage the land; but Herakles, arriving opportunely, rescued Hesione, the K.'s daughter, and slew the monster. Laomedon had promised him his horses as a reward, but again tried to evade his obligation; whereupon Herakles slew him and all his sons, except Priam, who consequently became K. In his reign took place the famous Tn. War. It originated in the golden apple "for the fairest" thrown by Ate into the midst of the marriage feast of Peleus and Thetis. Paris, the husband of Oenone, awarded it to Aphrodite, who had bribed him with the promise of the fairest woman in Hellas. Consequently he was enabled by the goddess to carry off Helen, the wife of Menelaus of Sparta. Hereupon the Greeks, under the leadership of Agamemnon, the brother of the injured husband, besieged T., and after 10 years took it by means of the stratagem of the wooden horse. During the siege occurred the incident immortalized in Chaucer's Troilus and Cressida, and in Shakespeare's play of the same name. The chief heroes on the Greek side were Achilles, Agamemnon, Menelaus, the two Ajaxes, and Ulysses; on the Tn., Hector, Paris, Troilus, Aeneas, and Antenor. After the destruction of T., legend told that Aeneas went to Carthage, where he met Dido, but basely deserted her to go to Italy; and the Romans claimed to be descended from him and his companions. A mythical Brut, or Brutus, the great-grandson of Aeneas, was alleged to have come to Britain and given his name to the island. Some legends made the French also descendants of this Brutus. The people of T. were called Troians, or Troyans; the spelling and pronunciation Trojan does not occur until the middle of the 17th cent. though it is substituted for the older spelling in most reprints of our plays, and is used in the following references.

The Earlier Mythological Stories of Troy.—In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, 801, Belinus says, "Poor Saturn, forced by mighty Jove To fly his country, banished and forlorn, Did crave the aid of Troos, K. of T." It was said that Saturn came to Rome after his expulsion by Jupiter; but I can find no authority for Greene's story. In Merch. iii. 2, 56, Portia compares Bassanio to "young Alcides when he did redeem The virgin tribute paid by howling T. To the sea-monster." In Shirley's Imposture ii. 2, Volterino talks of "Don Hercules that killed the K. of T.'s great coach-horse with a box o' the ear" (see Iliad v. 640). Spenser, F. Q. iii. 11, 34, tells how Jove snatched from Ida hill "the Tn. boy so fair," i.e. Ganymede.

Stories of the Siege of Troy.—In Shakespeare's Lucrece 1431, the tapestry shows how "From the walls of strong-besieged T. When their brave hope, bold Hector, marched to field, Stood many Tn. mothers," and portrays the whole siege; whilst Lucrece "feelingly weeps T.'s painted woes." In Merch. v. 1, 4, Lorenzo describes how Troilus

"mounted the Tyn. walls And sighed his soul towards the Grecian tents." In Per. i. 4, 93, Pericles speaks of the "Tn. horse . . . stuffed within With bloody veins." In M. W. W. i. 3, 83, Pistol asks: "Shall I Sir Pandarus of T. become?" when he is sent with a letter from Falstaff to Mistresses Page and Ford. In the Masque in L. L. L. v., Armado presents "Hector of T." as one of the Seven Worthies. In All's i. 3, 75, the Clown sings of Helen: "Was this fair face the cause, quoth she, Why the Grecians sacked T.?" In R2 v. 1, 11, the Q. compares the fallen K. to "the model where old T. did stand," i.e. the mere ground-plan of the ruined city. In H4 B. i. 1, 73, Northumberland says to the messenger who tells him of Percy's death, "Even such a man Drew Priam's curtain in the dead of night And would have told him half his T. was burnt." In ii. 4, 237, Doll says to Falstaff, "Thou art as valorous as Hector of T." In H6 B. i. 4, 20, Bolingbroke says it was deep night "when T. was set on fire." In iii. 2, 118, the Q. says that Suffolk has bewitched her as Ascanius bewitched Dido when he unfolded to her "His father's acts commenced in burning T." In H6 C. ii. 1, 51, the messenger tells how the D. of York fell, but stood against his foes "as the hope of T. [i.e. Hector] Against the Greeks that would have entered T." In iii. 2, 190, Gloucester says, "I'll, like a Sinon, take another T." In iv. 8, 25, K. Henry calls Warwick "my Hector and my T.'s true hope." In Tit. i. 1, 136, Demetrius appeals to the gods "that armed the Q. of T. With opportunity of sharp revenge Upon the Thracian tyrant in his tent." Polymnestor, K. of Thrace, killed Polydorus, son of Priam, and was slain in revenge by Hecuba. In iii. 1, 69, Titus asks: "What fool . . . hath brought a faggot to bright-burning T.?" In iii. 2, 28, Titus refers to Aeneas telling the tale "How T. was burnt and he made miserable" (see Vergil, Aen. ii.). In iv. 1, 20, young Lucius says, "I have read That Hecuba of T. ran mad for sorrow." In v. 3, 84, Marcus refers to "that baleful burning night When subtle Greeks surprised K. Priam's T.," and to Sinon's "fatal engine," the wooden horse. In J. C. i. 2, 113, Cassius compares himself saving Caesar from the Tiber to "Aeneas, our great ancestor," bearing old Anchises from the flames of T. The prol. of Troil. opens: "In T. there lies the scene"; and the subject is the story of Troilus and Cressida, which is not in the Homeric cycle of stories, but is first found in Benoît de Saint-More's Roman de Troyes, circ. 1180. Chaucer based his poem mainly on Boccaccio's Filostoato, and Shakespeare followed him, with references also to Caxton, and possibly to Lydgate, and to Chapman's translation of Homer, though both the latter are very doubtful.

In Field's Amends v. 1, Subtle reports Lady Loveall as saying to him: "My fort That, like T. town, 10 years hath stood besieged And shot at, did remain unwon; but now 'Tis conquered." In Day's Parl. Bees iii., Polypragmus says, "O that my mother had been Paris' whore, And I might live to burn down T. once more." In Span. Trag. iv., Hieronimo orders: "Draw me like old Priam of T. crying, The house is a-fire!" In Jonson's Cynthia iv. 1, Anaides says, "I never saw him till this morning, and he salutes me as familiarly as if we had known together since the Deluge, or the first year of T. action." In his Volpone ii. 1, Volpone professes to have a powder for giving beauty, which was given to Helen by Venus, "and at the sack of T. unfortunately lost." In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 2, Gregory, on hearing Priscian's pretended Greek speech, says, "I do wonder how the Tyns. could hold out 10 years" siege against the Greeks; if Achilles spake but this tongue, I do not think but he might have shaken down the walls in a sennight, and never troubled the wooden horse." In Lyly's Sapho ii. 4, Sybilla says, "The wooden horse entered T. when the soldiers were quaffing." In Chapman's May Day ii. 1, Angelo says, "I looked for a siege of T. at least to surprise the turrets of her continence." In Shirley's Love's Cruelty iii. 1, Bovoaldo says, "Then drink your drink; now T. burns blue"; i.e. things are getting lively. In Respublica ii. 1, Respublica, musing on the mutability of things, says, "Now [is] a champion field where noble T. was." In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 3, Rollano speaks of the wooden horse which "did T. dis-troy." In Brewer's Lingua ii. 4, Memory says, "I remember about the wars of Thebes and the siege of T." In T. Heywood's Witches iii. 1, Bantam says to the fiddlers, "Enter the gate with joy, And, as you enter, play The sack of T."; evidently some popular tune. In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 3, Agurtes says, "They drop away, as if they leapt out from the Tn. horse." In Conventy M. P. of Mary Magdalene 368, Satan says, "The snares that I shall set were never set at Troye." Milton Il Pens. 100, refers to the tragedies which "told the tale of T. divine." In Marston's Insatiate ii. 1, Herod says, "His study door will grow more hard to be entered than old T."

In Massinger's Guardian iii. 1, Durazzo says, "I will do something for thee, though it savour Of the old squire of T."; i.e. Pandarus. In Middleton's Blurt ii. 1, Hippolito says to Truopenny, "Is't you, Sir Pandarus, the broking knight of T.?"

In Cæsar's Rev. i. chor. 2, Discord boasts: "Twas I that did the fatal apple fling Betwixt the 3 Idæan goddesses, That so much blood of Greeks and Tns. spilt." In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass ii. 1, 423, Alvida says, "The beauties that proud Paris saw from T. Mustering in Ida for the golden ball Were not so gorgeous as Remilia." In Selimus 2480, Selim says, "When the coward Greeks fled to their ships . . . the noble Hector Returned in triumph to the walls of T." (see Iliad xv. 415). In Kyd's Soliman v., Basilisco asks: "Where is the eldest son of Priam, that abraham-coloured Tn. Dead!" Hector is represented as having auburn hair. In Lady Mother ii. 1, Lovell says, "Hector drew Achilles 'bout the walls of T. at his horse tail"—an inversion of the facts. Milton, P. L. ix. 16, speaks of his subject as "more heroic than the wrath Of stern Achilles on his foe pursued Thrice fugitive about T. wall." In Cowley's Cutter i. 6, Worm says of Cutter: "He was soundly beaten one day, and dragged about the room, like old Hector o' T. about the town." In Phillips' Grissil 1824, Diligence avers that Grissil's daughter is "as beautiful as ever the Greekish Hellin was Whom Paris the Troyean hath won in fight." In May's Heir iii., Philocles says, "A face not half so fair As thine . . . brought a thousand ships to Tenedos To sack lamented T." In Tailor's Hog hath lost v., Hog says, "O to recount, Sir, will breed more ruth Than did the tale of that high Troyan D. To the sad-fated Carthaginian q." The tale told by Aeneas to Dido is recited in Vergil, Aen. ii. In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "The truth of the Tn. history accuseth Aeneas, Ateenor, and certain others as most unthankful traitors to their country." By later writers both these Tns. were accused of having made terms with the Greeks and betrayed their city. In Bromes' Covent G. iii. 2, Katharine says, "He promised her marriage, and so, like the slippery Tn. [i.e. Aeneas], left her." In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Sad says that Jolly, having been to Italy, "can tell us how large a seat The goddess fixed her flying Ts. in."

In Val. Welsh. ii. 2, the Bardh says, "Cassandra did at T. Foretell the danger of the Grecian horse." In Richards' Messalina ii. 436, Syllana calls Paris "T's firebrand, falsely that forsook Unpitied Oenon." In Greene's Orlando iv. 2, 1172, Orlando speaks of fearful shapes "More dreadful than appeared to Hecuba When fall of T. was figured in her sleep." Before the birth of Paris Hecuba dreamed that she had brought forth a firebrand, which would burn up T. In B. & F. Cure iii. 3, Vitelli calls Sinon "the weeping Greek That flattered T. a-fire." In Ingelend's Disobedient 51, the Father asks: "Wilt thou follow warfare and a soldier be 'pointed And so among Tyns. and Romans be numbered?" In Chapman's Rev. Bussy ii. 1, 105, Guise says, "Great T's Euphorbus was After Pythagoras." Euphorbus was the Tn. who first wounded Patroclus (Iliad xvi. 805, xvii. 9). Pythagoras claimed that the soul of Euphorbus transmigrated into himself, and that he could remember the siege of T. The scenes of Troil., and of Shirley's Ajax and Ulysses, are laid in T. at the time of the Tn. war. In M. N. D. i. 1, 174, Hermia swears "by that fire which burned the Carthage q. When the false Tyn. under sail was seen." In H6 A. v. 5, 106, Suffolk, going to woo Margaret for K. Henry, compares himself to Paris, and hopes to "prosper better than the Tyn. did." In H4 B. ii. 4, 181, Pistol absurdly talks of "Tyn. Greeks." A tale of T. is used for an improbable story. In Davenant's Wits ii. 1, Palatine says, "I have laid 2 instruments . . . that shall encounter his long ears With tales less true than those of T."

According to the old legend, the Britains were descended from Brut (see above), hence Tn. is used for a Briton. In Lochrine i. 1, Corineus says, "Where e'er the light illuminates the world The Tyns' glory flies with golden wings." In Chapman's D'Olive ii. 2, D'Olive speaks of "all true Tns., from whom we claim our descent." The French had also a tradition of Tn. descent, but Chapman was probably thinking of his English audience. In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. ii. 1, Nuntius describes Britain as "the stately type of T." The title of Fisher's Fuimus Troes—we were Tns.—depends on this legend; and in ii. 4, Cæsar says, "I grieve to draw my sword Against the stock of thrice-renowned T."

The Romans also claimed descent from Aeneas and his Tns. In Ev. Wom. i. iv. 2, the Host says, "Show thyself a brave man of the true breed of T., a gallant Agamemnon." The scene is in Rome. In Nero iii. 4, Nero says, when he has set Rome on fire, "Ay, now my T. looks beauteous in her flames."

Tn. is used as a slang name in a jocular sort of way, but without any very definite meaning; it is sometimes taken in a disparaging sense, but very often means a jolly good fellow. It is often preceded by such epithets as true, honest, etc. In L. L. L. v. 2, 640, the K. says, "Hector was nothing but a Tyn. in respect of this," i.e. in comparison with Armado, who is impersonating the hero. In line 681, Costard says to Armado, "Unless you play the honest Tyn., the poor wench is cast away." In H4 A. ii. 1, 77, Gadshill says, "There are other Tyns. that thou dream'st not of, the which for sport sake are content to do the profession some grace." In H5 v. 1, 20, Pistol addresses Fluellen: "Dost thou thirst, base Tn., To have me fold up Parca's fatal web?" and in 32, "Base Tn., thou shalt die." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon i. 1, Chartley addresses Boyster: "No, my true Tyn., no." In Dekker's Shoemaker's ii. 3, Eyre addresses his men: "Drink, you mad Greeks, and work like true Tyns." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iv. 2, Cob cries: "O the Justice! the honestest old brave Tn. in Lond.!" In Marmion's Companion iii. 4, Capt. Whibble calls to Fido: "Hear me, honest Tyn.!" In Ford's Lover's Melan. iv. 2, Cuculus says, "I come to speak with a young lady, as they say, the old Tyn's daughter of the house." In Dekker's Fortunatus iii. 2, Shadow says, "These English occupiers are mad Tyns; let a man pay them never so much, they'll give him nothing but the bag." In Davenant's Distresses v., Androlio says, "This old Tn.'s mode, as I conceive it, is one to both." In his Siege v. 1, Piracco says, "Thou art a Tn.; I hug thee." Kemp, in his Nine Days Wonder, says of one who met him on his dance to Norwich: "He was a kind, good fellow, a true Tyn." In B. & F. Nightwalker iii. 1, Toby says, "Sam the butler's true, the cook a reverend Tyn."

TROYES. A city in France on the left bank of the Seine, 112 m. S.E. of Paris. It was at T. that the treaty between Henry V and Charles VI was concluded in 1420, and the scene of H5 v. 2 is laid there. It was subsequently recaptured by Charles VII in 1429. It had 5 annual fairs, and it seems most probable that the so-called Troy weight was the standard employed at them. The Pound Troy contains 5760 grains, and is thus lighter than the Pound Avoirdupois, which is 7000 grains. In Massinger's Old Law iv. 1, Gnotho says, "Cressida was Troy weight, and Nell [i.e. Helen] was avoirdupois; she held more by 4 oz. than Cressida." The avoirdupois pound is 16 oz.; the Troy 12.

TROYNOVANT. A name for Lond., much used in our older authors, and derived from the legend, popularized by Geoffrey of Monmouth, that after the Trojan war a company of Trojans led by Aeneas came to Britain and became the ancestors of the British, who took their name from Brut, the great-grandson of Aeneas. This Brut was supposed to have founded Lond., and called it Troja Nova, or Troy-novant. An alternative form of the word is Trinobant, which suggests that it was the chief town of the Trinobantes, who lived in Essex. Spenser, F. Q., uses the word frequently; in iii. 9, 45, he says, "It T. is hight, that with the waves Of wealthy Thamis washed is along"; and adds that it was founded by "the Trojan Brute." In Fisher's Fuimus i. 3, Cassibelaunus says, "Androgeus, hold unto your use Our lady-city, T." In Lochrine i. 1, Corineus says, "March to T. There to provide our chieftain's funeral." In Greene's Friar xvi. Bacon predicts the glories of Elizabeth "here, where Brute did build his T." In Trouble. Reign. Haz., p. 299, Lewis calls Lond. "T., your fair metropolis." In Nobody 1104, Elidure says, "Then to T. we'll speed away." In T. Heywood's Iron Age B.ii., Hector predicts: "These shall nor honours nor just rectors want, Lombardies Rome, great Britain's T." Nash, in Pierce, calls Lond. "this great-grandmother of corporations, Madame T." In Dekker's Dead Term, Lond. says, "Brute called me T. or Trinovant, and sometimes Trinobant." In King Lear (Haz., p. 319), the servant says, "Ere we get to T., I see, He quite will tire himself, his horse, and me."

TRUMPET. A Lond. tavern, half way up Shire Lane on the W. side. It was afterwards made famous by Steele, who introduced it into the Tatler. In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater says of Mantua: "Their strong beer [is] better than any I ever drank at the T."

TRUMPINGTON. A vill. on the Cam, 2 m. S. of Cambridge. It has been immortalized by Chaucer, who makes it the scene of the Reeve's Tale. In Mankind 23, New Guise says, "I shall go to William Thurlay of Hunston, and so forth to Pilchard of T." In Youth ii. 119, Youth asks Humility: "Wert thou born at T. and brought up at Hogs Norton?"

TRYGER (i.e. TREGGAR). The dist. in Cornwall known as the shire of Trigge, lying round Bodmin. In Cornish M.P. ii. 2274, the servant says he could not find a worse master "Alemma bys yn T." (i.e. from this place to T.).

TRYPOLI. See TRIPOLI.

TUBANTES. A German tribe, settled at first between the Rhine and the Yssel, but found later in the country S. of the Lippe, where Germanicus conquered them in A.D. 16. In Tiberius 1116, Germanicus says, "Next to the Usipetes were encamped The Tubantes hovering on the mtn. side."

TUHLAND (i.e. DEUTSCHLAND, or GERMANY). In Jonson's Irish, Patrick tells K. James that the Irish will fight for him "and te frow, ty daughter, tat is in Tuchland." The Princess Elizabeth married Frederick the Count Palatine in 1613.

TUDBERRY, or TUTBURY. A town in Staffs. on the Dove, 18 m. E. of Stafford, near the borders of Derbysh. It has a fine ruined castle, built in the reign of William the Conqueror, and long the residence of the Dukes of Lancaster. In the reign of Richd. II John of Gaunt incorporated a company of minstrels, who were granted, amongst other things, the privilege of taking a bull once a year from the lands of the Prior of T., if they could catch him. The ceremony took place on August 16th, the bull being irritated to madness and then let loose; then he was pursued by the Minstrels, who tried to catch him, or at least cut off a bit of his hair; if they succeeded he was taken and baited in the Bull Ring, and his body handed over to the Minstrels. In T. Heywood's Witches iii., Whetstone says, "O brave fiddlers! There was never better scuffling for the T. bull." In Sampson's Vow v. 2, 39, Miles says, "He'll keep more stir with the hobby-horse than he did with the pipers at Tedbury bull-running." (See also STAFFORDSHIRE.)

TUILLERIES. A palace in Paris, on the right bank of the Seine, W. of the Louvre. There was a pleasure-house here as early as 1342; it was bought by Francis I, and Catharine de Medici began building a palace on the site in 1566. It was enlarged by successive kings, but was burned down by the Communists in 1871. The name was derived from the fact that it was originally a brickfield. Jonson, in Epigram cvii., satirises Capt. Hungry for his talk about "your Villeroys and Salleries, Ianins, your Nuncios, and your T." In Davenant's Rutland p. 221, the Parisian boasts of "Lunembourg and the T., no ill accommodations for the citizens of Paris."

TULLIANUM. The most ancient building in Rome. It was originally the well-house of the Capitol, but was in later times used as a prison. Here St. Peter was said to have been confined. In Loelia iv. 1, 32, Petrus says, "Est locus in carcere quod Tullianum appellatur." This is a quotation from Sallust, Catiline 55. It is quoted again in Fraunce's Victoria iv. 9, 2065.

TUN. A prison in Cornhill, Lond., opposite the end of Change Alley; it was so called from its round shape. In 1405 it was made into a Conduit or water-cistern, and a prison of timber, called the Cage, was erected over it, with a pillory for fraudulent bakers on the top. Stow, p. 189, says, "The Tunne upon Cornhill, because the same was builded somewhat in fashion of a Tunne standing on the one end."

UNBRIDGE (now generally spelt TONBRIDGE). A town in Kent, 30 m. S.E. of Lond., on the Medway. It had a strong castle, built in the reign of Henry VIII, of which some ruins still remain. It had a reputation for the manufacture of knives. In 1606 Lord North discovered medicinal springs abt. 5 m. S.W. of the town on the borders of Sussex, and they soon acquired popularity through the patronage of the Q. of Charles I. The town of T. Wells grew up near the Springs, and became in the 17th and 18th cent. a much frequented resort of Londoners. In Lyly's Bombie ii. 1, Lucio says, "Pop 3 knaves in a sheath; I'll make it a right T. case, and be the bodkin." The 3 knaves (there is an obvious pun on knives) are Dromio, Riscio, and Halfpenny; Lucio will be the bodkin or small dagger, fitted into the same case or sheath. In Bullein's Dialogue against the Pestilence (1573), Mendax says, "I was born near unto T., where fine knives are made." Probably the same pun is intended, for Mendax is a champion liar. In Cuckqueans v. 3, Pigot says, "3 knives do make up the sheath of a T. dagger." In Jonson's New World, the Herald says of the waters in the Moon: "Your T., or the Spaw itself, are mere puddle to them."

TUNIS. A country on the N. coast of Africa, between Algiers and Tripoli. Originally colonized by the Phoenicians, it passed successively under the rule of the Romans, Vandals, and Arabs. After the invasion of the latter, the native Berber tribes adopted Mohammedanism, and established a native dynasty, called the Zirite. Roger of Sicily dispossessed it in 1148, but the Normans were expelled in 1160 by the Almohade Caliph. On the decay of the Almohades, the native dynasty of the Hafsites was established in 1336, and under their rule T. grew rapidly in wealth and splendour. Chaucer, in Blanche the Duchess 310, says he would not have missed hearing the birds singing "for the tounne of Tewnes." From 1525 to 1575 the possession of the country was disputed between the Spaniards and the Turks; but it was finally annexed to the Ottoman Empire by Selim II at the last-named date. During the Turkish rule it became notorious for the daring and cruelty of its pirates, and its chief source of revenue was the sale of Christian slaves. Blake raided the port in 1655, but this only partially checked its marauding activities. In 1881 the French conquered the country and took over the administration. The capital is T., a city on the N. coast, 10 m. from the site of ancient Carthage.

From Temp. ii. 1, 71, it appears that the K. of Naples is on his way back from Africa, where he has been "at the marriage of his fair daughter Claribel to the K. of T.," and, says Adrian, "T. was never graced before with such a paragon to their Q." Gonzalo adds, "Not since widow Dido's time," and explains: "This T., Sir, was Carthage"; whereupon Sebastian says, "His word is more than the miraculous harp; he hath raised the wall and houses too." The point is that T. is really some 10 m. from the site of Carthage. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Usumcasane reports to Tamburlaine that he has brought from Africa "100,000 expert soldiers; From Azamor to T. near the sea Is Barbary unpeopled for thy sake." In Lust's Dominion v. 1, the Q. says, "Your deceased K. won T." The reference is apparently to Charles V of Spain, who conquered T. in 1535. In Messinger's Guardian v. 4, Alphonso relates how his sons have been captured "by the pirates of T. and Argiers." In Alimony ii. 3, there is a sailors' song with the refrain "To T. and to Argiers, boys! Great is our want, small be our joys!" In Vox Borealis (1641), Willie calls the Royalist troops "Hellish pirates, worse than Tunnees and Alger." Cowley, in Cutter Prol., says, "The Midland Sea is no where clear From dreadful fleets of T. and Argier." In Thersites 216, alliteration and a pun are responsible for the allusion by the hero to "The trifling tabourer, troubler of T. [quasi Tunes!] Tom Tumbler of Tewkesbury." A pun again makes Valeria, in Taming of a Shrew 532, promise "I'll yearly send you 10 tun of T. wine." Wine is made in T., but it never had any great reputation. The scene of Messinger's Renegado is laid in T., and one of the characters is Asambeg, i.e. Hassan Bey, viceroy of T.

TUNS, THREE. See THREE TUNS.

TURCHESTAN, or TURKISTAN. A dist. in central Asia, lying E. of the Caspian Sea, between Persia and China, N. of Afghanistan. It was the original home of the Turks, whence they came to the conquest of Asia Minor. Milton, P. L. xi. 396, mentions, amongst the rulers of the world, "the Sultan in Bizance, Turchestan-born."

TUREN (i.e. TYRIAN). See TYRE.

TURIA. The old name of the Guadalquivir, a river in Spain, flowing into the Mediterranean on the E. coast, close to Valencia. In Nabbes' Microcosmus iv., Sensuality says, "Translate my bower to Turia's rosy banks."

TURIN (the old AUGUSTA TAURINORUM, properly TORINO). A city in N. Italy, at the confluence of the Po and the Dora Riparia, 70 m. N.W. of Genoa. It was made the capital of Savoy by Amadeo V in 1418, and continued so till it was occupied by the French from 1536 to 1562. It then returned to the Dukes of Savoy. It remained the capital successively of Savoy, of Sardinia, of Piedmont, until 1865, when the seat of Government was transferred to Florence, and in 1870 to Rome. In Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, Byron instructs La Fin to give out that "in passing Milan and T." he was charged to negotiate the marriage of Byron with a daughter of the D. of Savoy. In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 2, Horatio, the son of the D. of Savoy, says to Prudentia, the sister of an imaginary Grand D. of Tuscany, Lavinio, "If you deny me, I never will return to T." The scene of Davenant's Love Hon. is laid in part at T., whither Evandra, the heir of Milan, has been taken by her lover, Prospero of Padua. In his Wits iv., Young Palatine mentions amongst other table dainties "your T. and your Tuscan veal."

TURKEY (T. = Turk, Th. = Turkish, Ty. = Turkey). Applied to the countries under the dominion of the Osmanli Ts. as a political rather than a geographical term. In the broader sense it included in the 16th cent. Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, N. Africa, Greece and the Balkan Provinces—and even a part of Hungary. In a narrow sense it is used for Asia Minor only. The Osmanli Ts., a clan of the Th. tribe of Oghuz, driven from their home in Central Asia by the Mongols, first appeared in the West about the middle of the 14th cent. Under Orchan they established themselves in parts of Asia Minor; and in 1358 won Gallipoli, and so secured their first footing in Europe. Servia was annexed in 1389, as the result of the battle of Kosovo, in which, however, Murad I was killed. Bayezid I, the Thunderbolt, made an attempt on Constantinople, but Timur, known to the Elizabethans as Tamburlaine, came upon the scene and defeated Bayezid, who died in captivity in 1403. Murad II recovered the Asiatic lands which Timur had conquered, but was completely routed by Hunyadi of Hungary and compelled to surrender his European possessions. In 1444, however, he won the battle of Varna, where Ladislaus of Poland and Cardinal Julian were slain. The decisive event in Th. history was the taking of Constantinople by Mohammed II in 1453, which was followed—in part, preceded—by the conquest of the Balkan Peninsula and Greece. Mohammed also attacked Rhodes, but was repelled by the Knights of St. John; and his death at the siege of Otranto put an end to his schemes for the subjugation of the West. During the reign of Bayezid II the naval power of the Ts. was greatly increased, and the reign of terror which they established over the Mediterranean began. Selim I, called the Grim, left Europe alone, but added to his empire Egypt and Syria. Under his successor, Suleyman the Magnificent, the power of the Ottoman Empire reached its highest point. He took Belgrade, captured Rhodes, won the battle of Mohacz against the Hungarians in 1529, and besieged Vienna itself, though unsuccessfully. Then he added Algiers and Tripoli to his dominions. Last, in 1565, he made an attack on Malta, but failed. Selim II took Cyprus from the Venetians in 1570, but was badly beaten in the sea-fight off Lepanto in 1571. Mohammed III won the battle of Keresztes in Transylvania in 1596. His successor, Ahmed I, had trouble with Persia, and Murad IV in 1638 carried the war into their country and won Bagdad from them. The latter history does not concern us. The following list of the Osmanli Sultans may be useful: Osman I, 1301; Orkhan, 1326; Murad (or Amurath) I, 1359; Bayezid I, 1389; Mohammed I, 1413; Murad II, 1421; Mohammed II, 1451; Bayezid II, 1481; Selim I, 1512; Suleyman I, 1520; Selim II, 1566; Murad III, 1574; Mohammed III, 1595; Ahmed I, 1603; Mustafa I, 1617; Osman II, 1618; Mustafa (restored), 1622; Murad IV, 1623; Ibrahim, 1640; Mohammed IV, 1648. During the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth a considerable trade, especially in carpets, rugs, silks, and other textile fabrics, developed between England and the Ts.; and the Levant Company was formed in 1581 to carry it on, and had an office in Smyrna.

General References.—In Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, Barabas calls Ithamore, who was born in Thrace, "the T." In Coventry M.P. of Mary Magdalene 1435, the sailor says, "Yond there is the land of Torke"; 2 lines later it is called the land of Satyllye, i.e. Attalia, on the S. coast of Asia Minor.

Historical Allusions.—Bayezid, or Bajazet, is prominent in Marlowe's Tamb.; he reigned from 1389 to 1402, when he was taken prisoner by Tamburlaine. In A. iii. 3, Zenocrate addresses Zabina, the wife of Bajazet, as "Disdainful Turkess and unreverend boss." The story of his being placed in a cage by Tamburlaine is, however, without foundation. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortune exhibits "Poor Bajazet, old Th. emperor," and describes his death in Tamburlaine's cage. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 1, Sir Lionel says his knighthood will "strike as great a terror to my enemies as ever Tamerlane to the Ts." In Greene's Alphonsus iii. prol., Belinus flies "unto the Th. soil To crave the aid of Amuracke their K." This was Murad II (1421-1451). In Span. Trag. v. 1, Hieronimo relates the story of Solymán and Perseda, and proposes to act it; the part of "great Solymán the Th. Emperor" being assigned to Balthazar. This was Suleyman I (1520-1566). In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi boasts: "At Vienna I did unhorse 3 Th. Janizaries." This would be at the siege by Suleyman in 1529. The Siege of Rhodes by Suleyman is the subject of Davenant's play with that title. In Dekker's Wonder iii. 1, we are told of "A fleet of youthful Florentines, all vowed To rescue Rhodes from Th. slavery." Malta, whither the Knights of St. John had gone after the taking of Rhodes, was attacked by Suleyman in 1551 and 1565, but without success. In Marlowe's Jew i. 1, Barabas says, "Long to the T. did Malta contribute; Which tribute . . . The Ts. have let increase to such a sum As all the wealth of Malta cannot pay." This is quite unhistorical. In Act V, the Ts., led by Selim Calymath—apparently intended for Selim, the son of Suleyman, who succeeded him as Selim II—attack Malta, but fail, and Selim is captured: a wholly imaginary incident. In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Antonio says to Bertolda, "You are a knight of Malta and, as I have heard, Have served against the T." In Barnes' Charter iii. 3, Frescobaldi says, "I fought at Malta, when the town was girt With bul-beggars of Turkie"; probably in 1551. In Oth. i. 3, 8, we learn that "A Th. fleet is bearing up to Cyprus"; and in spite of a counter-report that "The Th. preparation makes for Rhodes," it is held that "The importancy of Cyprus to the T." makes the first report the more probable; and this view is confirmed by a 2nd messenger. Consequently Othello is sent to Cyprus to meet them. In ii. 1, 10, we find that there has been "A segregation of the Th. fleet," and that "The desperate tempest hath so banged the Ts. That their designment halts"; and so "Our wars are done, the Ts. are drowned." Cyprus was attacked and taken from Venice by the Ts. in 1570, so that the action of Oth. must be supposed to be somewhat earlier than that. In Shirley's Imposture v. 1, Hortensio says to Pandolfo, "You are the very same to whom his Holiness gave a pension for killing 6 great Ts. in Transylvania." Probably he is thinking of the battle of Keresztes in Transylvania, where the Ts. defeated Sigismund in 1596. In Marlowe's Massacre p. 234, Anjou speaks of "our wars against the Muscovites, And on the other side against the T." The reference is to the wars between the Ts. and the combined forces of Europe after the capture of Cyprus by the Ts. in 1570. In Day's Travails, the adventures of Sir Thomas and Sir Robert Shirley in the E. are related, and they include the defeat of the Ts. by the Persians in the early years of the 17th cent. The following plays are based upon events in the Th. Empire: Marlowe's Tamb. (Bajazet I); Kyd's Solyman (Suleyman I); Fulke Greville's Mustapha (Suleyman I); Selim, sometime Emperor of the Turks (Selim I). Carlell's Osmond the Great Turk professes to deal with the reign of the Sultan Osman, but is quite unhistorical. Goffe's Raging Turk or Bajazet II and his Courageous Turk or Amurath I have to do with the reigns of those monarchs. Peele's Turkish Mahomet and Hiren the Fair Greek was very popular, but is, unfortunately, lost. Ts. appear in many of the plays, chiefly as pirates who carry off one of the characters into slavery or as fighting against Malta, Rhodes, Venice, and other Italian cities.

The Th. standard was the crescent moon, first used as such by Selim I. Puttenham, in Art of Poesie ii., says, "Selim, emperor of Turkie, gave for his device a croissant or new moon." Sidney, in Astrophel xxx. 1, asks: "Whether the Turkish new moon minded be To fill his horns this year on Christian coast." Dekker, in Dream (1620), says, "The Th. half-moon on her silver horns Tosses the Christian diadem." In B. & F. Span. Cur. i. 1, Leandro pictures the tavern politicians discussing the T., "And whether his moony standards are designed For Persia or Polonia." In their Malta i. 3, Valetta says, "Much blood this warlike Dane hath spent To advance our flag above their horned moons." Milton, P. L. x. 434, describes the Bactrian Sophi (i.e. the Shah of Persia) retreating "from the horns of Th. crescent."

The Th. navy began to be formidable about the beginning of the 16th cent. in the reign of Bayezid II., and consisted of large galleys of upwards of 1,000 tons, with smaller galleys and barks or fly-boats. In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Brachiano says, "The great D., because he has galleys, and now and then ransacks a Th. fly-boat, first made this match." In Ford's Trial i. 1, Futelli says, "Auria is hasting To cuff the Th. pirates in the service Of the Great D. of Florence." In Massinger's Great Duke ii. 1, Fiorinda says of Sanazarro: "Like lightning hath he fallen Upon the Th. galleys." In B. & F. Beggars iv. 3, a sailor tells of a fight between a fly-boat and "6 Th. galleys," 3 of which are sunk by a Dutch vessel that came up. In Glapthorne's Privilege i. 1, Lactantio says, "The rumour has filled all Italy with wonder how so small a number should defeat the Th. navy." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Seawit says, "Imagine we meet a Persian junk or Th. carrack, board her, take her, and force a Bashaw prisoner."

References to Christians captured by the Ts. and sold into slavery or forced to serve in their galleys are numerous. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. ii. 1, Hippolito says to Bellafront, "You are crueller than Ts., for they sell Christians only, you sell yourselves away." In v. 2, one of the madmen cries: "See, the Ts. galleys are fighting with my ships; alas, I am undone; you are the damned pirates have undone me." In Shirley's Hyde Park iv. 3, Bonavent's letter says, "I was taken by a Th. pirate and detained many years a prisoner in an island." In Massinger's Guardian v. 4, Alphonso says, "They had one design and that was In charity to redeem the Christian slaves Chained in the Th. servitude." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 1, Alberto says, "The noble favour I received from thee In freeing me from the Ts. I now account Worse than my death; for I shall never live To make requital." In v. 3, Prospero says, "My cruel fate Made me a prisoner to the Th. galleys Where for 12 years these hands tugged at the oar." He was then released by a ship of Malta. In Massinger's Very Woman v. 5, Antonio tells the story of his capture by "8 well-manned gallies . . . Of which the arch Th. pirate, cruel Dragut, Was admiral," and of his being twice sold for a slave by them. In Davenant's Favourite iii. 1, Oramont says, "A crowd of slaves Whom she redeemed from Th. chains, salute her." In Dekker's Wonder iv. 1, Torrenti says, "Your pity on a wretch 3 years a Th. galley-slave." In Day's Law Tricks i. 1, Polymetis relates how "3 armed galleys of the faithless Ts." set their men on shore on the coast of Italy near Pisa and took his sister prisoner. In v. 1, the D. of Genoa says, "He hath redeemed my daughter From the Th. servitude." In Randolph's Muses ii. 1, Colax says, rather than be a parasite, "Let me tug at the T.'s galleys."

The T. is the natural enemy of Christendom, and as such is classed with Jews and pagans. In As iv. 3, 33, Rosalind says, "Why, she defies me like T. to Christian." In R2 iv. 1, 95, Carlisle tells how Norfolk has been "Streaming the ensign of the Christian cross Against black Pagans, Ts., and Saracens." In Oth. v. 2, 353, Othello tells how in Aleppo he slew "a malignant and turbaned T." who had "beaten a Venetian and traduced the state." In Fulwell's Like (Haz. iii. 336), Virtuoso Living prays: "O gracious God, how highly art thou of all men to be praised, Of Christians, Saracens, Jews, and also Ts." In Ingelend's Disobedient 82, the Devil says, "All the Jews and all the Ts. In the end they fly hither" (i.e. to hell). In Lupton's All for Money prol., Astrology is said to be an art "not hid from the Sarisons, Pagans, and Ts." In the Collect for Good Friday (1549), we are bid to pray: "Have mercy upon all Jews, Ts., Infidels, and Heretics." In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick says, "I could show you reasons how I could sell this state now to the T., spite of their galleys"; and in v. 2, Peregrine tells him that his plot "To sell the State of Venice to the T." has been revealed to the Senate. In Webster's White Devil v. 1, Flamineo says, "I have known men that have come from serving against the Turk, for 3 or 4 months they have had pension to buy them new wooden legs and fresh plasters; but, after, 'twas not to be had." In B. & F. Span. Cur. i. 1, Leandro satirizes the tavern politicians who can tell "what course the Emperor takes Against the encroaching T." In Ital. Gent. ii. 2, Pedant parodies Medusa's list of devils with "Ottomans, Sophys, Ts., and the Great Cham." In S. Rowley's When you D. 2, Henry VIII promises the Papal Legate, "The Turke will we expel from Christendom."

The Sultan is often spoken of as The T., The Great T., or The Grand T. In All's ii. 3, 94, Lafeu says of the young fellows who refuse Helena's hand: "I would send them to the T. to make eunuchs of." In H4 B. iii. 2, 331, Falstaff says of Shallow's talk: "every 3rd word a lie, duer paid to the hearer than the T.'s tribute." The tribute exacted by the Ottomans was very strictly enforced. In H5 v. 2, 222, Henry promises to get a boy "that shall go to Constantinople and take the T. by the beard." In H6 A. iv. 7, 73, La Pucelle says of Talbot's letter: "The T., that two and fifty kingdoms hath, Writes not so tedious a style as this." In Dekker's Satiro. i. 2, 379, Tucca says to Horace (Jonson), "You must be called Asper, and Criticus, and Horace; thy title's longer a reading than the style a the Big Turkes—Asper Criticus Quintus Horatius Flaccus." In a letter from the Commissary-General of Ty., dated July 1622, the Sultan is described as "The K. of all lands and seas, dominator from the E. unto the W., commander over Meccha and Jerusalem, the most noble prince of the whole commonwealth of the inhabitants of the world," and so on for a dozen lines more. In Lear iii. 4, 94, Edgar says, "In woman I out-paramoured the T." So throughout Oth. In J. Heywood's Four PP. (A. B. D., p. 14), one of the Pardoner's relics is "an eye-tooth of the G. T.," which he affirms will preserve the eye-sight. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 2, Orlando says of his daughter: "She's more honest than one of the T.'s wenches, watched by a hundred eunuchs." In Barry's Ram iv., Smallshanks says to Capt. Face, who is being forced to pretend that he is a baboon, "Now, Sir, what can you do for the Gt. T.? Hark, he stirreth not!" Baboons were trained to lift up their hands or make other gestures when Protestants were mentioned, but to give no sign at the name of the T. or the Pope. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, John offers to do anything for Pretiosa: "kill the Gt. T., pluck out the Mogul's eye-teeth." In Massinger's Great Duke i. 2, Sanazarro announces the capture of the galleys "Appointed to transport the Asian tribute Of the Gt. Turk." In Chapman's D'Olive ii. 2, the D. says, "I will trust you now, if 'twere to send you forth to the Gt. T. with an embassy." In Beguiled ix. 285, the Nurse says, "He does strut before her as if he were a gentleman-usher to the gt. T." In Davenant's Siege v. 1, Mervole says, "The Gt. T. with all his janisaries would not be permitted to make this noise." In Shirley's Gent. Ven. iii. 1, Malipiero says, "Venice is a jewel, a rich pendant, would hang rarely at the Gt. T.'s ear." In Val. Welsh. ii. 5, Juggler predicts, "He shall subdue the T. And pluck gt. Otoman from off his throne." In Brome's Antipodes i. 4, Martha says that her husband professed to have had 3 sons, one of whom "had shook the Gt. T. by the beard." In Dekker's Babylon 242, Plain Dealing says, "The Gt. T. is a very little fellow." The reference is to Mohammed III, of whom Fynes Moryson says: "He was very corpulent and fat and seemed on horseback to be of somewhat a low stature." In line 259, Paridel says of Elizabeth: "She walks not like the T. with a Janisarie-guard." Hall, in Sat. iv. 2, 12, says, "Let giddy Cosmuis change his choise array, Like as the T. his tents, thrice in a day." In Cartwright's Ordinary iv. 1, Hearsay says, "The Gt. T. loves no music." Fynes Moryson, Itin. i., says of Selim II: "He loved music, but had not the patience to attend the tuning of instruments," and tells how he left a concert provided for him by the Venetians because the musicians had to tune. In B. & F. Span. Cur. ii. 1, when Diego pretends to remember the imaginary De Castro, Leandro says, "De-Castro is the T. to thee," i.e. You know him no more than you do the Grand T. Gt. T. is sometimes used to mean the supreme authority on any subject. In Davenant's Plymouth ii. 1, Seawit says, "We will hear you as you were the Gt. T. of eloquence."

It was the practice of the Th. Sultans to kill all their brothers on their accession. In H4 B. v. 2, 47, Henry V says to his brothers, "Brothers, you mix your sadness with some fear; This is the English, not the Th. court; Not Amurath an Amurath succeeds, But Harry Harry." In Wilson's Inconstant ii. 1, Aramant says, "The Gt. T. is now confined into 500 whores . . . and 'a must not murder More brothers—than 'a has!" Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 1, says, "Amongst the Ts. . . 'tis an ordinary thing to make away their brothers, or any competitors, at the first coming to the crown." "Bear, like the T., no brother near the throne," says Pope of Addison.

The Sultans kept their numerous wives in a Seraglio, guarded by mutes and eunuchs. In H5 i. 2, 232, Henry says, "Either our history shall with full mouth Speak freely of our acts, or else our grave, Like Th. mute, shall have a tongueless mouth." In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 1, Morose says, "The T. in this divine discipline is admirable; still waited on by mutes, and all his commands so executed." In B. & F. Sea Voyage iii. 1, Tibalt says, "Like the Grand Signior, Thus I walk in my seraglio." In Tw. N. i. 2, 69, the Capt. says to Viola, "Be you his eunuch, and your mate I'll be." In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Thorowgood says that Formal "deserves to be grand porter to the Gt. T.'s seraglio." In Davenant's Platonic iv. 2, Gridonell says, "Would I were the Gt. T. but for one month!" In his Love Hon. i. 1, Vasco says, "If the Gt. T. knew me, honest Achmet, he would trust me in his seraglio"; in ii. 1, Altesta says, "I stand like one of the T.'s chidden mutes." In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, Mayberry says "The knave has more wives than the T., he has a wife almost in every shire in England." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Bajazeth says of Tamburlaine: "He shall be made a chaste and lustless eunuch And in my sarella tend my concubines." Montaigne (Florio's trans.) i. 42, says, "What longing lust would not be allayed, to see 300 women at his dispose and pleasure, as hath the Gt. T. in his Seraille?"

"National Character of the Turks.—Heylyn (s.v. TURCOMANIA) says, "The Ts. are generally well-complexioned, of good stature, proportionately compacted, no idle talkers, no doers of things superfluous, hot and venerious, servile to their Emperor, and zealous in religion. They nourish no hair on their head. . . . Shooting is their chief recreation. As they shave their heads, so they wear their beards long, as a figure of freedom. The women are small of stature, for the most part ruddy, clear, and smooth as the polished ivory, of a very good complexion, seldom going abroad, and then masked; lascivious within doors, pleasing in matters of incontinency." Montaigne (Florio's trans.) i. 24, says, "The mightiest, yea, the best settled estate that is now in the world is that of the Ts., a nation equally instructed to the esteem of arms and disesteem of letters."

Their Warlike Character.—In R2 iv. 1, 139, Carlisle predicts: "Peace shall go sleep with Ts. and infidels And in this seat of peace tumultuous wars Shall kin with kin confound." In Davenant's Love Hon. i. 1, Vasco says, "This Prospero's a T. when his whinyard's drawn." Their swords and bows were highly esteemed. Fynes Moryson says that the Ts. were furnished "with excellent short swords whereof they have great store." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes says, "Our Ty. blades shall glide through all their throats." In Greene's Quip, p. 239, Cloth-breeches accuses the cutler of selling "a sword or rapier new over-glased" and swearing "the blade came either from Turkie or Toledo." In B. & F. Elder B. v. 1, Cowsy says, "I have . . . paid For several weapons, Th. and Toledos, 2,000 crowns." Whiting, in Albino and Bellama (1638) 108, says, "He forthwith unsheathed his trusty turke, Called forth that blood which in his veins did lurk." Chaucer, Rom. Rose 923, says, "In his hand holding Turke bowes two, fulle well devysed had he." In Sir Bevis 767, we read of "Bowes turkes and arweblast." Bacon, in Sylva viii. 704, says, "The Th. bow giveth a very forcible shoot."

Inhumanity and Treachery of the Turks.—In Merch. iv. 1, 32, the D. says that Antonio's losses might "pluck commiseration of his state From stubborn Ts. and Tartars, never trained To offices of tender courtesy." In Oldcastle iv. 2, the K. asks, "Else what's the difference 'twixt a Christian And the uncivil manners of the T.?" In Chivalry F. 4, Katharine says, "No bloody Scythian or inhuman T. But would ha' trembled to ha' touched his skin." In Cooke's Greene's Quoique, p. 562, Joice says that Rash's behaviour "is barbarous, and a T. would blush to offer it to a Christian." In Philotas 53, Emily says, "Sic creweltie has not bene knawin Among the Turkes sa rude." Dekker, in Wonderful Year, says, "They seem by their Th. and barbarous actions to believe that there is no felicity after this life." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit 42, says, "Was never any imp so wicked and barbarous, any T. so vile and brutish." Hence to T. means to treat barbarously. In B. & F. Malta ii. 1, Norandine says, "Your timely succour . . . in the nick . . . My T. had turked me else." But on the other hand, in their Cure v. 1, Lucio says, "The barbarous T. is satisfied with spoil," i.e. without torture or murder. In Massinger's Renegado iii. 5, Vitelli says, when he is betrayed by Asambeg, "The better; I expected A Th. faith."

Hence the T. was frequently brought on the Elizabethan stage as the villain of the piece. His black face, heavy moustache, white or gaily-coloured turban, and curved falchion made him a conspicuous figure. Ts.

(or Moors, for the terms are often synonymous) are found in the following plays, for the list of which I am indebted to Mr. J. Q. Adams, the editor of Mulleasses the Turk: Tamburlaine A. and B., Spanish Tragedy, Jew of Malta, Selimus, Solymán and Perseda, Alphonsus of Arragon, Lust's Dominion, Battle of Alcazar, Orlando, Mustapha, White Devil, Knight of Malta, Mulleasses the Turk, All's Lost by Lust, Two Noble Ladies, City Nightcap, Renegado, Revenge for Honour, Emperor of the East, Royal Slave, Aglaura, Osmond the Great Turk, Rebellion, Thracian Wonder, and many others whose names only have survived.

The Ts. were credited with taciturnity and gravity of demeanour. In Davenant's Rutland p. 225, the Londoner says to the Parisian, "Your nation affects not that majestical silence which is used by the Ts." In B. & F. Double Mar. iii. 2, the Boatswain says, "This senseless silent courtesy, methinks, Shows like 2 Ts. saluting one another."

Turk is constantly used as a term of abuse, an infidel. In M. W. W. i. 3, 97, Pistol apostrophises Falstaff as "base Phrygian T.!" meaning that, like the Phrygian Paris, he is hunting after another man's wife, and, like the T., he is not satisfied with one. In H4 A. v. 3, 46, Falstaff says, "T. Gregory never did such deeds in arms as I have done this day." Gregory is possibly Pope Gregory VII, or Hildebrand, who was particularly odious to Protestants; hence he is called T., i.e. renegade. In R3 iii. 5, 41, Gloucester says, "What, think you we are Ts. or infidels?" In Mac. iv. 1, 29, "Nose of T. and Tartar's lips" are ingredients in the witches' cauldron, along with "liver of blaspheming Jew." In Oth. ii. 1, 115, Iago says, "Nay, it is true, or else I am a T." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 1, Orlando says, "He's a T., that makes any woman a whore; he's no true Christian, I'm sure." In Juvenius 157, Good Councill says, "No more ungodliness doth reign In any wicked heathen, T., or infidel." In Ford's 'Tis Pity iv. 3, Putana says, "Believe me! Why, dost think I am a T. or a Jew?" In Dekker's Satiro iv. 2, 45, Tucca says, "Wilt fight, T.-a-ten-pence?" Taylor, in Works, says, "If he had a T. of ten pence been, Thou told'st him plain the errors he was in." In Marlowe's Jew iv. 4, Ithamore says, "Gentleman! he flouts me. What gentry can be in a poor T. of ten pence?" It is clear from the last three passages that "T. of ten pence" had become a proverb of contempt.

Hence to turn T. means to become an apostate, a renegade, and so to make a complete change in one's views and beliefs; to round upon one's old friends. In Ado iii. 4, 57, Margaret says to Beatrice, "Well, an you be not turned T., there's no more sailing by the star." In Oth. ii. 3, 160, Othello asks: "Are we turned Ts. and to ourselves do that Which heaven hath forbid the Ottomite?" In Ham. iii. 2, 287, Hamlet thinks he might turn actor "if the rest of my fortunes turn T. with me." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. iv. 1, Hippolito says to Bellafont, "'Tis damnation If you turn T.," i.e. relapse again into an immoral life. In Massinger's Maid Hon. ii. 2, Sylli, being insulted by a page, cries, "Tamburlaine in little! Am I turned T.?" The reference to is Tamburlaine's treatment of Bajazet, whom he used as a mounting block when he got on his horse. In W. Rowley's All's Lost ii. 6, 44, Antonio says, "Persuade me to turn T. or Moore Mahometan." In Massinger's Renegado v. 4, Pauline says to Asambeg, "There shall be no odds betwixt us; I will turn T." In Kyd's Soliman iii. 5, Soliman asks: "What say these prisoners? Will they turn T. or no?" Burton,

A. M. i. 2, 4, 6, says of a poor man: "He will betray his father, prince, and country, turn T., forsake religion, abjure God and all."

Figures like Ts. were set up for the archers in Finsbury and elsewhere to shoot at. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Hodge says, "If I stay, I pray God I may be turned to a T. and set in Finsbury for boys to shoot at." In preface to Camden's Hist. Eliz. (1569) he speaks of various sorts of archery, and amongst them "the shooting at the Turke." In Manifestation of the Archbishop of Spalato's Motives, Appendix iii. 7, it is said, "All the rest were but painted posts, and Turkes of ten pence, to fill and adorn the shooting field." (See quotations at end of preceding paragraph.)

Personal Appearance and Dress.—In Field's Weathercock v. 1, Nevill says he has got for Sir Abraham a vizard with a huge moustachio, "a very T.s." Gascoigne, in Heardes (1572), p. 346, expects to see his friend coming back from his travel with "Your brave mustachyos turned the Turkey way." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "Some like breechless women go—The Russ, T., Jew, and Grecian"; and later, "The T. in linen wraps his head." In Span. Trag. v. 1, Hieronimo says to Balthazar, who is to act the part of Soleyman in a Masque, "You must provide a Th. cap, A black mustachio, and a fauchion." Fynes Moryson, Itin. 1, describes the Th. soldiers as wearing "a cap of mingled colours in the form of a sugar-loaf." Again he says, "All Ts. in general wear white heads, called by some Tsalma, by others Tolopa, and vulgarly Tulbent. This Tulbent is made of 20 or more ells of fine linen and very white." In Middleton's Changeling iv. 3, Isabella says, "About thy head I saw a heap of clouds, Wrapt like a Th. turban." In Strophe's Float. Isl., Dame Fancy cannot decide whether to accept a Th. turbant or a Persian cydaris as her head-dress. In Cartwright's Slave, Masistes says of the women: "I hope They have not changed their sex; they are not leaped Into rough chins and tulipants." Herrick, in Temple, says that the Fairy "Dons the silkworm's shed Like a T.'s turban on his head." In Histrio iii. 1, Pride says, "Ladies, trick your trains with Th. pride." In Chapman's Hum. Day vii., Do*secer speaks of "Ignorant Th. pride, Being pompous in apparel and in mind." In Kyd's Soliman v., Lucina asks: "How chancest your Th. bonnet is not on your head?"

The Ts. were Mohammedans in religion, and the Koran or Al-Koran was their sacred book. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Henry says of Savoy: "He hath talked a volume greater than the T.'s Alcoran." In Lady Mother i. 3, Bonville says, "Labour to induce Ts. to condemn their Alcoron." Milton, in Areopagitica, p. 42, says, "The T. upholds his Alcoran by the prohibition of printing." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Carlo says, "I'll honour thee more than the T. does Mahomet." The Koran allows Polygamy, and denies that women have souls. In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Geraldine says, "The Greek wantons, Compelled beneath the Th. slavery, Vassal themselves to all men." In Massinger's Renegado i. 2, Donusa says, "Our jealous Ts. Never permit their fair wives to be seen But at the public bagnios or the mosques And even then veiled and guarded." In Swetnam iii. 1, Iago says that Swetnam "is of the T.'s opinion" that women have no souls. The Koran forbids the use of intoxicating drink. In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iv. 3, the Camel-driver says, "I fare hard and drink water; so do the Indians; so do the Ts." Bacon, in Sylvia viii. 705, says that in Ty. they drink a confection called shervet, dissolved in water, "because they are forbidden wine by their law." In Davenant's Wits iii. 4, the elder Palatine speaks of "cool sherbet, The Turk's own julep." In Rabelais' Pantagruel ii. 14, Panurge says, "These horrible Ts. are very unhappy, in that they never drink one drop of wine."

The national drink was coffee or kahveh, which was introduced into England about the middle of the 17th cent. Evelyn, in Memoirs (1636), says of a Greek, Nathanael Conopios: "He was the first I ever saw drink coffee, which custom came not into England till 30 years after." Burton, A.M. i. 2, 2, 2, says, "Their chief comfort, to be merry together in an alehouse or tavern, as . . . Ts. in their coffee-houses, which much resemble our taverns." In ii. 5, 1, 5, he says, "The Ts. have a drink called coffee (for they use no wine) so named of a berry as black as soot and as bitter which they sip still of, and sup as warm as they can suffer; they spend much time in those coffee-houses, which are somewhat like our ale-houses or taverns." They were much addicted to the use of opium. Sandys, in Travels (1615) 66, says, "The Turkes are also incredible takers of opium." In B. & F. Thierry v. 2, Bawdber says that a Spanish doctor has given Thierry "More cooling opium than would kill a T."

Turkish Trade with England in Tapestries, Carpets, Cushions, etc.—In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Wellbred says in his letter, "I have such a present for thee; our Ty. company never sent the like to the Grand Signior." When the Turkey Company was rechartered in 1605, James I. gave them £5,000 to be sent as a present to the Grand Signior. In Tomkis's Albumazar i. 5, Albumazar directs that a clock he has invented should be delivered "To a Ty. factor, bid him with care present it From me to the house of Ottoman." In Mayne's Match i. 4, Newcut describes young Plotwell, who has been compelled by his uncle to enter into business, as dressed in "A velvet jacket which hath seen Aleppo twice, is known to the Gt. T." In Shrew ii. 1, 355, Gremio boasts that he has in his house "Ty. cushions bossed with pearl." In Err. iv. 1, 104, Antipholus speaks of his desk "That's covered o'er with Th. tapestry." In Jonson's Volpone v. 1, "Ty. carpets nine" figure in the inventory of Volpone's property. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 2, Callapine says, "The pavements underneath thy chariot wheels With Ty. carpets shall be covered." In B. & F. Coxcomb iv. 3, Mother says, "Take care my house be handsome, and the new stools set out, and the Ty. carpet." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass iii., one of the merchants in Jonah's ship says, "On his [Jehovah's] altar's fume These Ty. cloths, this gas-sampine and gold I'll sacrifice," an amusing anachronism. Dekker, in Hornbook iv., advises the gallant after dinner to change his English-cloth coat "into a light Turkey-program," program being a coarse silk, or silk and wool, fabric. Nash, in Wilton 146, says, "His cloak is faced with Ty. grogeran ravelled." Euphuus, in Lyly's Euphuus England, p. 415, says to the ladies of Italy, "If I had brought . . . fine carpets from Ty. . . . you would have wooed me."

The Moors are sometimes called Ts., probably because both were Mohammedans. In W. Rowley's All's Lost, which is concerned with the wars between the Moors and Spaniards in A.D. 711-714, the Moors are often called Ts.; thus, in i. 2, 44, Julianus says to the K., "So long have you held A champion resolution 'gainst the Turke That Spain is wasted in her noble strength."

Turkey was first given as the name of the Guinea-fowl, which was originally brought into England from the Th. empire, but when the American bird, Meleagris Gallopavo, was introduced the name was transferred to it. In H4 A. ii. 1, 29, the carrier complains, "The tys. in my pannier are quite starved." In Tw. N. ii. 5, 36 Fabian says of Malvolio: "Contemplation makes a rare ty.-cock of him; how he jets under his advanced plumes!" In H5 v. 1, 16, Gower says of Pistol: "Here he comes, swelling like a ty.-cock." In Dekker's Satiro ii. 1, 55, Sir Vaughan says, "And he were a cock come out as far as Ty.'s country, 'tis possible to cut his comb off." R. C., in Time's Whistle (1616) iii., speaks of one swelling "in big looks like some turkie cock."

Ty. or Ty. Stone is used for the Turquoise. Fynes Moryson, in Itin. iv. 4, 1, tells of a man who had "3 rings on his fingers, a diamond, a Turkey, and a ruby."

In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xvii., Fancy mentions "Porcenya the proud provost of Turkey land that rated the Romans and made them ill rest." Lars Porsenna of Clusium is intended, and Turkey seems to be a misprint or error for Tuscany, i.e. Etruria.

TURNBOLIA. A humorous name for TURNBULL STREET, q.v.

TURNBULL STREET. Lond., running S. from Clerkenwell Green to Cowcross St., just E. of Farringdon Station. The Metropolitan railway has occupied the W. side of it, and it has recovered its original name, Turnmill St., derived, according to Stow, from the Fleet River, which ran down at the back of its W. side and was called Turnmill, or Tremill, Brook, from the mills which were supplied by it with water-power. In our dramatists the commonest spelling is T., but we also find Turnball, Townbull, and Tunbold as variants. It was the most disreputable street in Lond., a haunt of thieves and loose women.

In H4 B. iii. 2, 329, Falstaff says of Shallow: "This same starved Justice hath done nothing but prate to me of the wildness of his youth, and the feats he hath done about T. St." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iv. 5, Bobadil says, "They have assuaulted me as I have walked alone in divers skirts i' the town, as T., Whitechapel, Shore-ditch, which were then my quarters." In Barthol. ii. 1, Ursula says to Knockem, who is described as "Master Daniel Knockem Jordan, the ranger of T., a horse-courser," "You are one of those horse-leeches that gave out I was dead in T. St. of a surfeit of bottle-ale and tripes." In iv. 3, Ursula calls Alice "your punk of T." and "Thou tripe of T." In B. & F. Pestle iii. 4, one of the men who is being treated for syphilis says, "I fell in love with this my lady dear And stole her from her friends in T.-st." In their Scornful iii. 2, Savil says, "Here has been such dismal drinking, swearing, and whoring, we've lived in a continual Turnball St." In Greene's Thieves, Kate says, "We poor wenches are your sure props and stay. If you will not believe me, ask poor A. B. in Turnemill St." In Middleton's Chaste Maid ii. 2, one of the promoters says, "I promised faithfully to send this morning a fat quarter of lamb to a kind gentlewoman in T. St. that longs." In Field's Amends i. 1, Lady Honour says, "You talk like one of those same rambling boys That reign in T. St." In ii. 2, Subtle says, "Your whore doth live in Picket-hatch, T. St." In iii. 4, the scene is a tavern in the st., and the Drawer pleads, "Gentlemen, I beseech you consider where you are—T. St.—a civil place; do not disturb a number of poor gentlewomen!" In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Pettifog says, "This informer comes into T. St. to a victualling house and there falls in league with a wench." In Middleton's Inner Tem. 174. Dr. Almanac says, "Stand forth, Shrove Tuesday! 'Tis in your charge to pull down bawdy houses, cause spoil in Shoreditch, deface T., and tickle Codpiece Row." The Apprentices had licence on Shrove Tuesday each year to make a raid on houses of ill-fame. In his No Wit ii. 1, Weatherwise speaks of "one Taurus, a gentleman in Townbull st." In Barry's Ram iii. 3, Mrs. Taffata calls Puff "Your swaggering, cheating, T.-st. rogue." In Randolph's Muses iv. 3, Justice Nimis mentions among the sources of his income "the lordship of T." In his Hey Hon. he talks of "The whores of Picket-hatch, T., the unmerciful bawds of Bloomsbury." In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Bagnoli mentions "Marga Marichalus That in Turnbull doth keep an ale-house," where Turnbull is a transparent alias for T. Nash, in Pierce G. i. 1, says, "I commend our unclean sisters in T. st. to the protection of your [the devil's] portership." In Davenport's New Trick i. 2, Slightall, wanting a woman, bids Roger "go search Turnball," amongst other places of ill-repute. In iii. 1, the Constable brings along "a bottle of the best wine in Turnball, which they say all Lond. cannot better." In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, the President of the Twiball knights, a company of blackguards, takes the title of "Duke of T., Bloomsbury, and Rotten Row." In Brome's Antipodes v. 7, Lefoy says to Barbara, "Go with thy flesh to T. shambles." In his Damoiselle ii. 1, Amphilus keeps his water-dog with a cobbler in T. st.; and in his Academy ii. 1, Valentine says, "Your husband kennels his water-dog in T. st." In the title of St. Hilary's Tears (1642), "the T.-st. trull" is specified. In Marston's Mountebanks, the Mountebank says, "If any be troubled with the Tentigo, let him travel to Japan, or, because the forest of Turnbolia is . . . at hand, let him hunt there for his recreation."

TURNERY. See TOURNAL.

TURNMILL STREET. See TURNBULL STREET.

TURNSTILE. There were 2 Turnstiles on the S. side of Holborn, Lond., one in a line with the E. side of Lincoln's Inn Fields, called the Gt. T., and the other in a line with the W. side, called the Little T. They were passages leading to Lincoln's Inn Fields, and were closed at their S. ends by revolving barriers to keep out horses and cattle. Glapthorne's Hollander was "Imprinted at Lond. by Tho. Paine for George Hutton, and are to be sold at his shop within T. in Holborne. 1640." The sign of Hutton's shop was the Sun.

TURNULIBULL. See TURNBULL STREET.

TURSOS. See THASOS.

TURWIN, i.e. TERVUEREN, or THEROUANNE. A town in Artois abt. 8 m. S. of St. Omer, on the Lys. It was besieged and captured by Henry VIII in 1513, being then in the Spanish Netherlands. In True Trag. (Haz., p. 127), it is said of Henry VIII: "He won T. and Turney." Hall, in Sat. iv. 3, 17, speaks of "old Ocland's verse, how did they wield The wars in T. or in Turney field." Ocland wrote a Latin Poem, Anglorum Prælia, in 1582. Puttenham, Art of Poesie iii. 22, blames "one that would say . . . that K. Henry the eight made spoils in T., when as in deed he . . . caused it to be defaced and razed flat to the earth."

TURWIN. See TOURNAINE.

TUSCALONIAN (affectedly used for TUSCAN. See TUSCANY). In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. iv. 2, Fustigo describes the man who has cudgelled him as "a pretty, tall, prating fellow with a T. beard," at which Poh exclaims: "T. Very good!"

TUSCANY (Tn.=Tuscan). A dist. in N.W. Italy, between the sea and the Apennines, corresponding roughly to the ancient Etruria. After passing successively under the sway of the Romans, Ostrogoths, Greeks, and Lombards, it became a Frankish Marquesate in A.D. 828. Matilda, the last of this line, bequeathed it to the Ch., and there were long disputes between the Popes and the Emperors, which gave the opportunity to the chief cities to gain independence. They were gradually absorbed by Florence, and the title of Grand Duke of T. was conferred on Cosmo de Medici by Pius V in 1567. The last of the Medici died in 1737, and the country passed to the Dukes of Lorraine (Francis, husband of Maria Theresa), and through them to the Hapsburgs. It is now part of the United Kingdom of Italy. Tuscan is sometimes used in the sense of Etrurian. In Milton's Comus 48, the Spirit tells how "Bacchus, After the Tn. mariners transformed, On Circe's island fell." The story was that certain Etrurian sailors kidnapped Bacchus, but he drove them all mad, and they jumped into the sea, where they were changed into dolphins.

Tuscany in the modern sense. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander allots to Caesar Borgia "In T. within the river Narre And fruitful Arno those sweet provinces." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have ambled through "Tuscania with all her cities, as Pistoia, Valterria, Montepulchena, Arezzo." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 3, 45, calls Ariosto of Ferrara "that famous Tuscan pen." Milton, P. L. i. 288, calls Galileo "the Tn. artist." In Son. to Lawrence, he speaks of "artful voice Warbling immortal notes and Tn. air."

Tn. often means Florentine. In All's i. 2, 14, the K. says, "For our gentlemen that mean to see The Tn. service, freely have they leave." In ii. 3, 290, Bertram declares: "I'll to the Tn. wars," and straightway proceeds to Florence. In Davenant's Favourite i. 1, Oramont says, "Our attempt upon the Tn. camp was bloodily repulsed."

The Great D. of T. is the usual translation of the title of the Medici; the contemporary Great Dukes were Cosmo I, 1569; Francis I, 1574; Ferdinand I, 1587; Cosmo II, 1608; Ferdinand II, 1621. The hero of Massinger's Great Duke, who is also called in v. 1 "T.'s Grand D.," is Cosmo I; but there is nothing historical about the play. In B. & F. Fair Maid i. iii. 2, Mariana addresses the unnamed D. of Florence as "Great D. of T." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Volpone, disguised as a mountebank, boasts of the fees that have been given him by "the Great D. of T." In Day's Travails, Bullen, p. 40, we are told "Sir Thomas is come to Ligorine, then to the D. of Tn." Probably Ferdinand I is intended. An imaginary Lavinio, Great D. of T., is one of the characters in Cockayne's Trapolin. In Shirley's Traitor iii. 3, Alexander, who became D. of Florence in 1530, speaks of himself as "D. of T." In Massinger's Lover i. 2, mention is made of Lorenzo the Tn. D., who reigned from 1469 to 1492.

The Tn. men are spoken of as grave and dignified, though they have the hot blood of the Italians; the women are attractive, but of easy virtue. In Brewer's Lingua i. 1, Lingua speaks of "The Roman eloquent and Tn. grave." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Corvino says, "Should I offer this [his wife's virtue] To some young Frenchman or hot Tn. blood, This were a sin."

In the same scene Volpone will have Celia attired like "a brave Tn. lady or proud Spanish beauty." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 5, Calippo mentions in her list of foreign beauties "the sprightly Tn." In Davenant's Wits iv., young Palatine enumerates amongst other dainties "Your Turin and your Tn. veal." In Dekker's Match me ii., Bilbo cries: "See here rich Tn. hatbands, Venetian ventoyes." In Marlowe's Ed. II. i. 4, Mortimer describes Gaveston with "A jewel of more value than the crown In his Tn. cap." In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, Crispus, talking of the styles of hair-dressing in vogue amongst ladies, says, "I affect not these high gable-ends, these Tn. tops." In Davenant's Italian v. 3, Altamont says, "German viols wake the Tn. lute." In May's Agrippina iv. 330, Petronius scoffs at "Dull satires, such as water or the lees Of Tn. wine beget." The Tn. wines were of inferior quality. See also FLORENCE, ITALY.

TUTTLE, or TUTTLE FIELDS. A large piece of open land in Westminster on the left bank of the Thames, S. of Tothill St. Its exact boundaries are vague, but it extended as far as Vauxhall Bridge Rd., and the actual Tot, or Toot, Hill seems to have been at the point where Horseferry Rd. forms an angle at its junction with Carey St., and it included what is now Vincent Square. Tournaments were held there, and wagers of battle decided; and till the end of the 17th cent. it was a common place for duels. It was also a training ground for troops, and a practising place for archers. A fair was held annually from 1542 till the beginning of the 19th cent. There was an artificial maze which was frequented by pleasure-seekers. In Kirke's Champions iii., the Clown, talking of a monstrous giant whom he claims to have killed, says, "He was just about that stature that T.-f. would fitly make a grave for; 'Tis near to Lond. in England, where men go a-training to get them good stomachs." In Oldcastle iii. 4, the K. gives order: "Let our forces Make speedy rendezvous in T. F." In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Lacy reports: "Suffolk and Essex train in Tothill-f." In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Gossip Mirth says, "My gossip Tattle knew who conjured in T.-f., and how many, when they never came there." In Deloney's Craft ii. 3, Gillian goes "into T. f." to gather herbs. In Randolph's Hey Hon., one says, "I have done him no injury, but once I stroke his shins at foot-ball in T."

In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 2, Luce's father, insisting on fighting a duel, says, "When I was young, I knew the way into St. George's F. twice in a morning. T., Finsbury, I knew them all." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 553, Spendall, arranging for a duel with Staines, fixes the place "beyond the Maze in T." In Shirley's Wedding iv. 3, Lodam says, "I have expected you these 2 hours, which is more than I have done to all the men I have fought withal since I slew the High German in T."

TUTTLE STREET. Westminster, running W. from Broad Sanctuary to Broadway. It is a very old st. and was formerly occupied by mansions with gardens stretching back to St. James's Park. At No. 72 was the old Cock Tavern, one of the oldest inns in Lond. It was pulled down in 1873 to make room for the Aquarium, which has now given place to the Wesleyan Methodist Hall. Much of the S. side of the st. had to go when Victoria St. and the Westminster Palace Hotel were constructed. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Gossip Tattle claims to have all the news "of T.-st., and both the Alm'ries." In Webster's Cuckold iii. 2, Compass says,

"All the law betwixt Blackwall and Tothill st., and there's a pretty deal, shall not keep it from me."

TWEED. A river rising in Peebles-sh. in the S. of Scotland, and flowing into the North Sea at Berwick. During the latter part of its course it is the boundary between England and Scotland. Spenser, F.Q. iv. 11, 36, speaks of "Twede, the limit between Logris land And Albany" i.e. England and Scotland. Milton, Vac. Ex. 92, calls it "utmost T." Drayton, in Idea xxxii. 10, says, "Our northern borders boast of T.'s fair flood." In Fisher's Fuinus iii. 2, Nennius says, "Before he [Cæsar] T. can drink, a life is spent"; in other words, it will take Cæsar a lifetime to reach Scotland. In Brewer's Lovesick iv., Alured tells that the K. of Scots "has passed the T. through Northumberland." In v., Alured grants to the K. of Scots "all those our northern borders Bounding on Cumberland from Tine to T." In Greene's James IV v. 3, 2132, Nano says, "The English K. . . hath slain 7000 Scottish lads not far from T." The reference is to the battle of Flodden, which was fought a few miles S. of the T. in 1513. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii. 2, the Clown says, "Mine eyes are plain Severn; the Thames, nor the river of T., are nothing to them." In Trag. Rich. II iv. 1, 216, the K. assigns the N. counties of England to Scroope, and says, "From Trent to T. thy lot is parted thus." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 4, K. James says to the Bp. of Durham, "Surrender up this castle [Norham] . . . else T. Shall overflow his banks with English blood."

TWITNAM, or TWICKENHAM. A town in Middlesex on the left bank of the Thames, opposite to Richmond, with which it is connected by a ferry and a handsome stone bridge. It is abt. 12 m. in a direct line from St. Paul's. In Armin's Moreclacke C. 4, the Lady asks: "Is this the tinker?" and is answered: "Ay, madam, of Twitnam." Twickenham Park was once the home of Francis Bacon, but in 1608 was acquired by Lady Bedford, to whom Donne writes in one of his Verse-letters: "The store of beauty in Twickenham is and you."

TWOPENNY WARD. In the Counters and the Fleet Prison in Lond. there were various degrees of accommodation, according to the amount which the prisoners were prepared to pay. The most expensive was the Master's Side, then came the Knights' Ward, the T. W., and, worst of all, the Hole for those who could not pay anything. In Eastward v. 2, Wolf says of his prisoners in the Counter: "The knight will be in the knights' w., and Mr. Quicksilver would lie in the Hole, if we would let him; only Security lies in the t. w., far off." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 11, Macilente says to Brisk, who is in the Counter, "Remove yourself to the T. w. quickly, to save charges." See also under COUNTER, KNIGHTS' WARD, HOLE.

TYBER. See TIBER.

TYBERIUS. See TIBERIAS.

TYBURN (To. = Tyborne). Properly the name of a brook which rose in Hampstead and flowed across Oxford St. near Stratford Place into the Green Park, and so into the Thames in 2 main streams; hence, perhaps, the name of the Twy-burn. From this brook the place of execution for Middlesex criminals took its name. There are records of executions as early as the reign of Edward III at the Elms at T. These trees grew along the side of the brook, and Elm Lane, Bayswater, long preserved their memory. Some time in the later half of the 14th cent. the place of execution was removed to a point near the junction of Oxford St. and Edgware Rd.; the exact spot where the gallows stood is said to have been No. 49 Connaught Sq., in the angle between Edgware Rd. and Bayswater Rd. Condemned criminals were taken in a cart, or, in the case of traitors, dragged on a hurdle, from Newgate to Holborn Hill and along Oxford St., often called T. Rd., to the place of execution. The gallows seems to have been a permanent structure, and consisted of a horizontal triangle of beams, supported by 3 legs. The prisoner was strangled by a rope hanging from one of the beams, the cart being driven from under him. Hogarth's picture of the Execution of the Idle Apprentice shows the gallows and a sort of grandstand for the accommodation of spectators. The earliest hangman whose name has been preserved was one Bull, who was succeeded by Derrick. This latter person held office in the early part of the 17th cent., and his memory is perpetuated in the name given to the gallows-like structure used for hoisting up goods. Gregory Brandon followed him, and left his office to his son Richd., who is supposed to have executed Charles I. Next came Dun, and then Jack Ketch, whose name has become a generic term for all of his profession.

In the C. text of Piers, but not in the earlier versions, we find "the hangman of To." among the company of Glutton at the Boar's Head; and in xv. 130, Imaginatif says, "Dominus pars hereditatis mee is a murye verset; Hit hath y-take fro To. 20 stronge theeves." The allusion is to the neck-verse by reading which a criminal could claim benefit of clergy and so escape hanging. In Hycke, 104, Frewyll says, "That rock Of to. is so perillous a place, Young gallants dare not venture into Kent"; i.e. to commit highway robbery on Gad's Hill and elsewhere. Later, Imagination swears "by saynt tyburne of Kent"; possibly he means St. Thomas a Waterings, which was the place of execution for Surrey and places S. of the Thames. Again, Imagination says, "At tyburne there standeth the great frame And some take a fall that maketh their neck lame." In Poverty, 329, Envy says to Conscience "They will hang you up at the Tyborn if they find you in this place." In Youth ii. 100, Riot says, "The Mayor of Lond. sent for me forth of Newgate for to come for to preach at T." In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xi., Courtly Abusion says of his dupe: "A to. check Shall break his neck." In John Evangel., Courage says to Cutpurse, "At To. I may chance clap thee on the breast." In Three Lords, Dods., vi. 499, Simplicity says of Fraud: "My Lords, I beseech ye, that at T. he may totter." In Fulwell's Like, Dods., iii. 324, Newfangle promises to Tossplot and Roister a piece of land called "St. Thomas a Waterings or else T. Hill." Gascoigne, in Steel Glass 203, says, "Soldiers sterve or preach at To. Cross." In Middleton's No Wit Epilogue, Weatherwise says, "T. cracks the pipe and spoils the music," sc. of a whistling thief. In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, Monopoly says, "I would make them scud so fast from me, that they should think it a shorter way between this [i.e. Shoreditch] and Ludgate than a condemned cut-purse thinks it between Newgate and T." Cf. As iii. 2, 347, where Rosalind says that Time gallops "with a thief to the gallows." In Shirley's Pleasure iii. 2, Celestina says, "They cannot satisfy for wrongs enough Though they should steal out of the world at T." In Eastward iv. Touchstone predicts to Quick-silver, "They'll look out at a window as thou rid'st in triumph to T." In v., Quicksilver gives advice to his friends how they may escape "T., Compters, and the Spittle." In Randolph's Muses iii. 2, Colax expresses the hope that Banauus will "repair old T. and make it cedar." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 2, Bubble says, "If we be taken, we'll be hanged together at T.; that's the warmer gallows of the two"; the other being at Wapping, where the criminal was hung in chains at low-water mark, and left to be drowned by the rising tide. In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Satan informs Pug: "This morning there is a handsome cutpurse hanged at T." In v. 4, Iniquity speaks of "Damn me! Renounce me! and all the fine phrases That bring unto T. the plentiful gazes." In his New Inn i. 1, the Host predicts that if Frank applies himself to Lovel's course of life "he may perhaps take a degree at T."

In Shirley's Wedding iv. 3, Rawbone describes the whole course of a thief's trial and execution: "I do imagine myself apprehended already; now the constable is carrying me to Newgate; now I'm at the Sessions House in the dock; now I'm called—'Not guilty, my Lord.' The jury has found the indictment billa vera. Now, now comes my sentence. Now I'm in a cart riding up Holborn in a two-wheeled chariot with a guard of halberdiers. 'There goes a proper fellow,' says one; 'Good people, pray for me!' Now I'm at the three wooden stilts. Hey! Now I feel my toes hang in the cart; now 'tis drawn away—now, now, now, I am gone!" More briefly, in B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Witty-pate says, "Sessions a Thursday, jury culled out a Friday, judgment a Saturday, dungeon a Sunday, T. a Monday." Taylor, in Praise of a Jail (1623), says, "But if a man note T., 'twill appear That that's a tree that bears 12 times a year." In Killigrew's Parson i. 1, the Capt. asks, "His fortune? the advowson of T. deanery!" In Oldcastle ii. 2, Murley mutters, "Newgate, up Holborne, S. Giles in the field, and to To.; an old saw." In Selinus 2082, Bullithrubble says, "Marry, that had been the way to preferment; down Holborne, up Tiburne." In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Fortress prescribes the keeping of the rules of the Twiball knights "under penalty of being carried up Holborn in a cart, and at Tiburne executed." In Dekker's Edmonton v. 1, Cuddy says to his dog, "If thou goest to Lond. I'll make thee go about by T., stealing in by Thieving Lane."

In L. L. L. iv. 3, 54, Biron says, "Thou makest the triumph, the corner-cap of society, The shape of Love's T. that hangs up simplicity." Lyly, in Pappe, p. 58, says, "There's one with a lame wit, which will not wear a four-cornered cap. Then let him put on T. that hath but 3 corners." In one of Tarlton's Jests, we read: "It was made like the shape of To., three-square." Gilpin, in Skiaethia (1598), speaks of "the three-square To. of impieties." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "He rides his circuit with the devil and Derrick must be his host and Tiburne the land at which he will light." In Puritan iv. 1, Pennydub says, "Pox o' the fortune-teller! Would Derecke had been his fortune 7 year ago!" In Wise Men v. 4, Proberio says, "Sir, this Tiburnist or hangman is the devil." In Ret. Pernass i. 2, Judicio says, "Here is a book, why, to condemn it to clear the usual Tiburne of all mislaving papers were too fair a death for so foul an offender." In Dekker's Satiro iii. 1, 150, Tucca says of Mrs. Miniver: "She looks like the sign of Capricorne, or like To. when it is covered with snow." Latimer, in one of his Sermons, says, "The Bp. of Rome sent him a Cardinal's hat. He should have had a Tiburne tippet, a half-penny halter." In Jonson's Devil v. 1, Ambler says, "I got the gentlewoman to carry her bedding to a conduit-head, hard by the place toward T., which they call my Lord Mayor's Banqueting House," q.v.

TYGERS HEAD. The sign of a bookseller's shop in Lond. Dekker's Fortunatus was "Printed by S. S. for William Apsley dwelling in Paules church-yard at the sign of the T. H. 1600." Dekker's Match Me was "Printed by B. Alsop and T. Fawcet for H. Seile at the T.-h. in St. Pauls Churchyard. 1631." Massinger's New Way was "Printed by E. P. for Henry Seyle dwelling in S. Pauls Churchyard at the sign of the T. h. M.DC.XXXIII."

TYGRES. See TYGRIS.

TYLOS. An island in the Persian Gulf off the coast of Arabia, now Bahrein. It has been from ancient times the centre of the pearl fisheries of the Gulf. In Lyly's Gallathea iii. 2, Gallathea says, "There is a tree in Tylos whose nuts have shells like fire, and being cracked the kernel is but water."

TYMBRIA. The second of the 6 gates of Troy, as given in Caxton's Recuyel. In Troil. prol. 16, we have "Priam's six-gated city, Dardan, and Tymbria, Helias, Chetas, Troien, and Antenorides."

TYNDIS. Now the Godavery, a river in India, flowing into the Bay of Bengal abt. 250 m. N. of Madras. Others identify it with the Mahanuddy, the mouth of which is some 350 m. further N. In Bacchus, the 17th guest was "born in India at a fair city called Tyndis." There was no city of this name, but it was suggested by the name of the river.

TYNE. A river in the N.E. of England, formed of 2 branches, one rising in Scotland in the Cheviots, and the other in the S. of Cumberland. They unite at Haydon Bridge, and after 30 m. reach the North Sea at Tynemouth. From T. to Thames or Trent is used to mean all England. In Gurton iii. 4, Hodge says, "There's not within this land a murrainer cat than Gyb is, between the tems and T." In Brewer's Lovesick King ii. 1, Thornton, the Mayor of Newcastle-on-T., says, "I will write a note on it to keep it in mind as long as the river of T. runs under it." In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xii., Fancy says, "Her eyen glent From T. to Trent, From Stroude to Kent." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 36, says, "Next these came T. along whose stony banks That Roman monarch built a brasen wall." The reference is to Hadrian's Wall between the T. and Solway Firth; but it was not brasen.

TYNEMOUTH. A town in Northumberland on the N. shore of the mouth of the Tyne, 8 m. from Newcastle. It was an ancient Saxon fortress. In 1312 Edward II fled from the Barons to T., where he was joined by Gaveston. In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Edward addresses Gaveston: "My Gaveston, Welcome to Tynmouth!" In Brewer's Lovesick King ii. 1, Goodgift, at Newcastle, says, "At the next ebb I and the ship fall down to Tynmouth." This spelling represents the usual pronunciation of the word.

TYRAS. The Dniester, a river in S.E. Europe, rising in Galicia to the N. of the Carpathians, and flowing in a S.E. direction into the Black Sea, a few m. S.W. of Odessa. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Theridamas reports: "I made a voyage into Europe, Where by the river Tyras I subdued Stoka, Podolia, and Codemia."

TYRE, or TYRUS (Tn.=Tyrian). The greatest of the Phœnician cities, lying on an island on the coast of Syria, about half-way between Acre and Sidon. It was originally a colony from Sidon, but speedily rose to be the chief of the Phœnician centres of trade, and it imposed its name, Tzor, on the whole country of Soria, or Syria. It carried on active commerce with the countries of the Mediterranean, and its mariners reached the Canaries and the Scilly Isles. It never aimed at the founding of an Empire, but was content to control the commerce and gather the wealth of the world. Its colonies, amongst which was Carthage, were found on all the coasts of the Mediterranean. Its insular position enabled it to defy the long sieges to which it was subjected by the Assyrian Sennacherib and the Babylonian Nebuchadrezzar; but it was taken by Alexander the Gt., 332 B.C., after he had made a mole connecting it with the mainland, which has now silted up to a width of half a mile. During the 3rd cent. B.C. it was under Egyptian control, but in 198 it came into the hands of the Syrian kings, and so remained until the coming of the Romans. With the rest of Syria it was conquered from the Romans by the Arabs (in the reign of Omar) 633-639; and eventually passed into the hands of the Turks (until 1919); it is now an unimportant fishing vill. It was famous in old times for the scarlet or purple dye which was extracted from the shell-fish Murex Trunculus and Murex Brandaris, though it was not really as brilliant as the modern aniline dyes.

In Marlowe's Dido i., Venus appears to Aeneas in the guise of a maiden of Carthage and says, "It is the use for Turen maids to wear Their bow and quiver in this modest sort And suit themselves in purple." Pericles is based on an old Greek story and is supposed to take place in the early part of the 2nd cent. B.C. in the reign of Antiochus the Gt. of Syria. The scene of i. 2 and 3, and ii. 4, is laid at T., which is frequently mentioned in the play both as T. and as Tyrus. There is little or nothing historical in the story. In Shirley's Arcadia i. 2, Dametas says, "Keep your tires to yourself; nor am I Pericles, Prince of T." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Antony says of his Genius: "He comes to warn me leave The charming pleasures of the Tn. court." Antony was in Syria in 57-55 B.C. In Mariam iii. 2, Pheroras says, "What's the condition? Let me quickly know That I as quickly your command may act, Were it that lofty Tyrus might be sacked." In Wilson's Pedler 785, the Pedler, referring to the sack of T. by Alexander, says, "That shall fall upon you that did upon T." Milton, Nat. Ode 204, says, "In vain the Tn. maids their wounded Thammuz mourn." Thammuz was the object of annual worship by the Phœnicians. In Trans. Psalm lxxxiii. 27, "The Philistines and they of T. Whose bounds the sea doth check" are among the enemies of Israel. In lxxxvii. 15, he says, "I mention Babel to my friends . . . And T. with Ethiop's utmost ends; Lo! this man there was born." The luxury and wealth of T. became proverbial from the description of them in Ezekiel xxvi.-xxviii. Greene, in Quip, p. 246, says that the milliners have "almost made England as full of proud fopperies as T. and Sidon were."

In Milton's Comus 342, the Elder Brother says, "Thou shalt be our star of Arcady Or Tn. Cynosure." The Tn. sailors steered by the constellation of the Little Bear, or Cynosura, in which the Pole Star lies. Arcas, the son of Callisto of Arcadia, was said to have been turned into this constellation. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, 102, Rasni boasts: "I'll strip the Indies of their diamonds And T. shall yield me tribute of her gold." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Maharball speaks of being "clothed in silks of Tn. dye." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iv. 3461, Timon says, "This threadbare cloak by me is prized more high Than the best robe dipped in the Tn. dye." In Noble Ladies, Cyprian says, "We'll sport us under a pavilion of Tn. scarlet." In Glapthorne's Argalus i. 1, Philarchus says, "Mars wrapt his battered limbs In Persian silks or costly Tn. purples To win her tempting beauty." In Massinger's Actor ii. 1, Parthenius reproaches his father with his miserliness, and says, "Your superfluous means could clothe you every day in fresh change of Tn. purple." In his Believe i. 2, Berecinthus says of the Asian merchants: "The Tn. fish, Whose blood dyes your proud purple, their nets catch." In B. & F. Friends iii. 1, Rufinus says, "The god of wrath sits on my bended brow Triumphantly attired in Tn. scarlet." In their Malta iii. 2, Gomera gives Oriana "a piece of purple velvet Of the right Tn. dye." In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, Luke reproaches Lady Frugal with furnishing one of her rooms with "scarlet of the rich Tn. dye." In Shrew ii. 1, Gremio boasts that his hangings "are all of Tn. tapestry." In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline inveighs against the Roman nobles for buying "rare Attic statues, Tn. hangings." In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 2, Lorece says, "Both thy roseal cheeks let us espy Beautified with a natural Tn. dye." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 8, Gaselles talks of "Persian silks or costly Tn. purples." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass ii. 1, 429, Remilia talks of "Costly paintings fetched from curious T." In Bale's Johan 2088, Dissimulation says that his wine "passeth malmsey, capric, t., or hippocras." I cannot find that T. was famous for wine; indeed, Ezekiel (xxvii. 18) says that she imported it from Damascus.

TYRILL, probably a misprint for ARZILL, q.v. In Studey 2300, the chorus informs us that "in Tyrill A town in Barbary, they [i.e. Sebastian and his forces] all are landed."

TYRONE. An inland county of the old province of Ulster in the N. of Ireland. The O'Neills were the chiefs of the clans in T., and Henry VIII made Con Bacagh O'Neill Earl of T. His son Shan, however, drove him into the English Pale, and maintained a rebellion against the English till his defeat in 1567. The Earl of T. headed another rebellion towards the close of the reign of Elizabeth, and the Earl of Essex was sent to suppress it in 1599 and lost his life in consequence of his failure. Tyrone ultimately surrendered in 1602; but he still remained an object of suspicion to the government. In B. & F. Prize i. 3, Moroso says, "These are the most authentic rebels, next T., I ever read of." In Penn. Parl. 25, it is enacted "that wine shall make some so venturous as they will destroy T."

TYRRELL, or TYROL. The most W. province of the Austrian Empire, lying S. of Bavaria on the upper course of the Inn. Its chief town is Innsbruck. It was governed by its own Dukes till 1363, when it was handed over by Margaret Maultasche (muckle-mouthed Meg!) to the house of Hapsburg, and it remained part of the Austrian Empire, except for a few years in the beginning of the 19th cent., when Napoleon transferred it to Bavaria, until 1919. It is now part of the Austrian Republic. In S. Rowley's When you, Charles V is hailed as "Duke of Tyrrell and Flaunders."

TYRRHENE SEA. The Greek name for the part of the Mediterranean lying between the W. coast of Italy and the islands of Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily. It was derived from the Greek name for Etruria. The Romans called it Mare Inferum. In Richards' Messalina iii. 1643, Mela says, "Make for the isle of Corce; there on the Tyrhen shore we'll practise Man's sole perfection to be heavenly wise." In Marlowe's Dido iv. 2, Dido, on hearing of the intended departure of Aeneas from Carthage to Italy, cries "O that the T. sea were in my arms That he might suffer shipwreck on my breast!" In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline vows that he "Will lave the T. waters into clouds" rather than forego his vengeance on Rome. In Nero iii. 4, Nero, when Rome is in flames, says, "The T. seas are bright with Roman fires." In May's Heir iv., Alphonso speaks of "The T. shore whose sea divides this isle [Sicily] from Italy." In Milton's Comus 49, the Spirit tells how "Bacchus, Coasting the T. shore . . . On Circe's island fell." In Greene's Orlando iv. 1, 993, Ogier and the Peers of France "have furrowed through those wandring tides Of T. seas." In Tiberius 775, Tiberius talks of Hector chasing the Greeks "from the Terrhene shore." Either the author included the Aegean in the T. sea or we must read Terrhene in the sense of Mediterranean.

UBIUM. Assumed by May to be the name of the town to which Agrippina transferred the Ubii A.D. 51. Their original home was on the E. bank of the Rhine, but they were brought over to the W. bank to strengthen the Rhine frontier. They were settled at Colonia Agrippina—now Köln, or Cologne. In May's Agrippina i. 358, Agrippina says, "That German colony Which I of late deducted o'er the Rhine To Ubiom, for evermore the name Of Agrippina's colony shall bear."

ULSTER. One of the old 4 provinces of Ireland in the N.E. of the country. The O'Neils had their seat in U.; but after the Anglo-Norman invasion John de Courcy was made Earl of U., and on his death the title was transferred to Hugh de Lacy in 1243. Through the Mortimers the earldom came to the Dukes of York, and thus at the accession of Edward IV became merged in the English Crown. In 1611 James I planted U. with numbers of English and Scotch settlers, Lond. receiving large grants in Co. Derry, and imposing its name on London-Derry. Sidney, in Astrophel xxx. 9, asks, "How U. likes of that same golden bit Wherewith my father once made it half tame?" Sir Henry Sidney, the father of the poet, was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland from the beginning of Elizabeth's reign until 1584. In Oldcastle v. 9, the Irishman says, "Me be no servant of the Lord Cobham's; me be Mack Shane of U." The name was suggested by that of Shane O'Neil, the leader of the rebellion of 1597; he is one of the characters in Stucley, and in line 992 of that play Gainsford says of the rebels: "They have gallant horse; The best in Ireland are of U.'s breed." In Jonson's Irish, the Irish footmen are said to be "of Connough, Leymster, U., Munster."

ULUBRAE. A small town in Latium, the exact site of which is uncertain. It was probably abt. 35 m. S.E. of Rome on the border of the Pontine Marshes. It was a poor, wretched place, though it still retained under the Empire its municipal rights and officers. In Nero iv. 1, the Emperor says, "Would I had rather in poor Gabii Or U. a ragged magistrate, Sat as a judge of measures and of corn, Than the adored monarch of the world." The passage is imitated from Juvenal, Sat. x. 99.

UNITED PROVINCES. The 17 Provinces of the Netherlands which federated in 1579 under William of Nassau. The list will be found under BELGIA.

UNITED STATES. Not used, as we use the U.S. of America, as a territorial name; it means always the supreme assembly of the United Provinces of the Netherlands. See also STATES. In Barnavel v. 3, the Capt. asks, "Do you hold the U. S. so tame to fear him?" Fynes Moryson, Itinerary iii. 2, 4, says, "The Hage . . . is now the seat of the u. S."

UNIVERSITY (Us. = Universities). The two Universities in England were at Oxford and Cambridge respectively. See for details under OXFORD, CAMBRIDGE, and the names of the various COLLEGES. The Inns of Court in Lond. were sometimes spoken of as a U. There are many references to the Us. on the continent of Europe, such as Paris, Padua, Florence, Bologna, etc. Jonson dedicates Volpone "To the most noble and most equal sisters, the 2 famous Us." On the title page of the 1603 quarto of Hamlet it is said to have been acted "in the 2 Us. of Cambridge and Oxford, and elsewhere." In Greene's Friar vii., Ralph undertakes to "make a ship that shall hold all your Colleges and so carry away the Niniversity with a fair wind to the Bankside in Southwark"; Niniversity being an obvious and intentional mis-spelling. In Shrew v. 1, 72, Vincentio complains, "While I play the good husband at home, my son and my servant spend all at the U." sc. of Padua; though Vincentio's experience would appeal to many English fathers. In Two Gent. i. 3, 10, Panthino, enumerating the various employments of young men, says, "Some [go] to the studious Us." The English Us. played an important part in the history of the Drama, and plays, at first in Latin and later in English, were performed in the various Colleges from the latter part of the 15th cent. onwards. Details will be found under CAMBRIDGE and OXFORD. In Ham. iii. 2, 104, Hamlet asks Polonius, "You played once i' the U., you say?" and Polonius avers, "I did enact Julius Cæsar; I was killed i' the Capitol; Brutus killed me." A Latin Julius Cæsar by Geddes was acted at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1582. In Jonson's Volpone i. 2, Nano sings, "Now room for fresh gamesters, who do will you to know They do bring you neither Play nor U. show."

UNTHRIFT'S RENT. A nickname for some quarter where debtors found lodging. Rent, or Rents, is often used to mean a tenement rented from someone; as in Ely Rents, Nasynges Rents, etc. In John Evangel. 361, Evil Counsel says, "I have been in U. R."

UR OF CHALDAEA. The original home of Abraham (Gen. xi. 27-32). It is usually identified with Mughier, formerly Uru, in S. C., lying on the Euphrates, 125 m. N.W. of the head of the Persian Gulf; though it was formerly at the head of the Gulf itself, and an important maritime city. The silting up of the mouth of the Euphrates has removed it inland. The ruins cover something over half a square mile, and include the lower part of the temple of Sin, the Moon-God, the tutelary deity of the place. . . . The inscriptions show that from about 3000 B.C. U. was the leading city of C. for upwards of 1000 years. Milton, P.L. xii. 130, says of Abraham: "He leaves his gods, his friends, and native soil, U. of C., passing now the ford To Haran."

URBINO, or URBIN. A city in Italy which grew up round the castle of the Montefeltro family in the 14th cent. It stands on a hill amongst the Apennines, 45 m. N.W. of Ancona. The 1st D., who was granted the title by the Pope in 1474, was Federigo de Montefeltro. His son, Guidobaldo, kept up a magnificent court, which was celebrated in Castiglione's Cortegiano, a book well known in England in the 16th cent. He was expelled for a time by Cæsar Borgia, but regained his Dukedom in 1503. At his death in 1508 the Dukedom passed to the Della Rovere family, who held it till 1626, when the last D., Francesco, bequeathed it to the Papal States. The Ducal Palace built in the 15th cent. was then the finest in Italy. The Theatre was one of the earliest in Italy, and Bibiena's Calandria, the first Italian comedy, was played there. Its chief distinction is that it was the birthplace of Raphael Sanzio, the great painter. In Marston's Parasitaster i. 1, Hercules says, "See, yonder's U. ! Those far-appearing spires Rise from the city." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "true U.," probably on account of its fidelity to its expelled D., Guidobaldo. In Massinger's Great Duke, the daughter and heir of "the deceased D. of U." is one of the characters, and in his Maid Hon., Ferdinand, D.

of U., appears. Neither is historical. Killigrew wrote a play, The Siege of Urbin, and the scenes of Marston's Fawn and Shirley's Opportunity are laid there.

URCAS. Possibly Arcos de la Frontera is meant, a city in Spain, 30 m. E. of Cadiz on the Guadelete. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 335, Ricaldus mentions that "the ships of Urcas" will take part in the Spanish Armada.

URCHINFIELD, or, as it is spelt in Talbot's epitaph, Vrchengfield. A dist. in S.E. Herefordsh. which gave one of his titles to Lord Talbot. In H6 A. iv. 7, 64, Talbot is styled "Lord Talbot of Goodrig and U."

USIPITES, or USIPETES. A German tribe, living N. of the Lippe, who were conquered by Germanicus in A.D. 16. In Tiberius 1092, Germanicus says, "The U. kept the plain Impalled in a wilderness of wood." In line 1115, he calls them Usipetes.

UTICA. An ancient Phœnician colony in N. Africa, near the mouth of the Bagradas, 20 m. N.W. of Carthage. It was said to be 3 cents. older than Carthage. After the 3rd Punic War it made a separate peace with Rome, and reaped much advantage from the destruction of Carthage by the Romans. In the Civil War of 46 B.C. U. was the last city in Africa to submit to Cæsar. The younger Cato, who was at U., tried to persuade the people to resist to the last; but failing to induce them to oppose Cæsar, he committed suicide rather than betray what seemed to him the cause of republican liberty. In later times his death afforded the theme for many discussions on the lawfulness of suicide. In Marston's Sophonisba i. 2, Carthalo says, "We make amain For Carthage some, and some for U." In his What you v. 1, Quadratus says, "I'll present The honoured end of Cato Utican." In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 4, 70, Cato says, "My chief pass still resolves for U.," and iv. 5 and v. 2 take place there. The scene of Act iii. of Nabbes' Hannibal is laid at U.

UTOPIA. The Land of Nowhere, a name adopted by Sir Thomas More for his imaginary commonwealth. Hence Utopian is used in the sense of extravagantly hopeful, absurdly optimistic, impossible. The scene of Lyly's Woman in Moon is laid "in the bounds of fair U." In Brome's M. Beggars iv. 2, the poet says, "I would present a Commonwealth: U., With all her branches and consistencies"; and Rachel volunteers to act the part: "I'll be U." In Brewer's Lingua ii. 6, Memory says, "I remember, in the country of U., they use no other kind of artillery" than cannons of hollow canes, with rape seed for powder, and turnips for shot. Jonson, in Case ii. 4, uses U. as a pseudonym for England. Milton, in Areopagitica, p. 25 (Hales), says, "To sequester out of the world into Atlantick and Eutopian politics . . . will not mend our condition." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. v. 1, Alexander says that Moll has "2 chests of silver and 2 Utopian trunks full of gold and jewels"; where doubtless the suggestion is that these trunks are "nowhere."

UTRECHT. A town in Holland at the junction of the Old Rhine and the Vecht, 21 m. S. of Amsterdam. It was here that the first confederacy of the United Provinces was agreed upon in 1579. In Barnavelt i. 2, Barnavelt says, "Enroll new companies against the insolence of the old soldiers garrisoned at U." In v. 2, the executioners of Harlem, Leyden, and U. throw dice to decide which of them shall behead Barnavelt. Dekker, in Seven Sins, speaking of eccentric English fashions, says, "The short waist hangs over a Dutch botcher's stall in Utrich."

UXBRIDGE. A town in Middlesex on the Coln, 15 m. W. of Lond. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift professes in his bill to teach the art of taking tobacco; "as also the rare corollary and practice of the Cuban ebullition, Euripus, and Whiff; which he shall receive or take in here at Lond., and evaporate at U., or farther, if it please him." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 4, Waspe has been to see a bull with five legs: "he was a calf at U. Fair, two years ago." Fairs were held there on March 25th and Sept. 29th.

UZ. A dist. of indeterminate boundaries lying on the edge of the Arabian desert E. of Palestine. The most probable position is in the neighbourhood of Palmyra, stretching S. towards Edom. It was the home of the patriarch Job. In Marlowe's Jew i. 1, Barabas talks of "those Sabans and the men of Uz, That bought my Spanish oils and wines of Greece." The mention of the Sabans in conjunction with the men of Uz was doubtless suggested by Job i. 14, where the Sabeans are represented as attacking Job's oxen and asses. In Milton, P.R. i. 369, Satan says, "I came among the Sons of God, when He Gave up into my hands Uzzean Job."

VAGNE, or VANGNE. One of the provinces of Aethiopia Superior, or Abyssinia. Heylyn mentions it amongst the dominions of the Emperor of Abyssinia, and says that it contained the fountain of the river Vangucum. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, Vagne is mentioned as one of the kingdoms subject to the Emperor of Abyssinia.

VALDARNO (the valley of the ARNO, q.v.). Milton, P.L. i. 290, describes Galileo as studying the moon "from the top of Fesole Or in Valdarno." Galileo was a Tuscan by birth, and spent the latter part of his life, after 1610, in or near Florence, where Milton saw him in 1638-9.

VALENCE. A town in France on the left bank of the Rhone, 60 m. S. of Lyons. In H6 A. iv. 7, 63, the Earl of Talbot is styled "great Earl of Washford, Waterford, and V." Talbot held this title by virtue of his descent from Joan, daughter and co-heir of William de V., Earl of Pembroke. In Sampson's Vow iii. 3, 1, "Monlucke, Bp. of Valens" is one of the French Commissioners at Leith in 1560. It gave its name to a kind of thin fabric. Chaucer, in Parl. of Foules 272, speaks of "a covercheif of v." Lydgate, in Minor Poems 47, gives a lady for a head-covering "a kerche of V."

VALENCIA, or VALENTIA. A city in Spain, the capital of the province of the same name on the E. coast. It lies on the right bank of the Guadalaviar, 3 m. from its mouth. It was taken by the Moors in 714, recaptured by the Cid in 1094, recovered by the Moors in 1101, and finally added to the kingdom of Arragon by Jayme I in 1238. It is the seat of a Bp., and its cathedral dates from the 13th cent. Its swords, like those of Toledo, were highly valued, and its Spanish leather gloves had some reputation. The hero of the comedy of Mucedorus is "the k.'s son of V.," an entirely imaginary person; and some of the scenes take place at his court. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Alexander calls for "my 2 sons, the D. of Candy and the Cardinal of Valence"; the latter being Caesar Borgia, who while still a child was raised to the purple by his father. In Gascoigne's Government i. 5, Lamia says, "My mother is a good old lady in V." In Shirley's Doubtful v. 2, Leandro says to Ferdinand, "'Twas I that saved you from your uncle's fury And sent you to V." In Middleton's Changeling i. 1, Jasperino says, "This will be better news at V. than if he had ransomed half Greece from the Turk." In B. & F. Maid in Mill iii. 2, Terzo brings word that the K. "keeps his way on to V.; there ends his progress." In Thomas i. 1, Valentine tells his sister that he found Thomas "at V., poor and needy." In Barnes' Charter v. 1, Baglioni has "a V. blade, powder of Rhemes, and bullets." Rabelais, in Gargantua i. 8, says of Gargantua: "His sword was not of V. nor his dagger of Saragossa," but was "a fair sword made of wood and the dagger of boiled leather." In Ital. Gent. iv. 4, Medusa has for sale "Vallentia gloves And Venice rolles to rub the teeth withal."

VALETTA. The capital of Malta, on one of the finest harbours in the world, on the E. coast of the island. It was strongly fortified by the Knights of St. John, to whom the island was granted by the Emperor Charles in 1530. Most of the scenes of B. & F. Malta are laid in Valetta.

VALLACHIA. See WALACHIA.

VALLADOLID. A city in Spain, capital of the province of the same name, at the junction of the Pisuegra and Esgueva, 150 m. N.W. of Madrid. It had considerable manufactures of textiles. Here Columbus died and Philip II was born. He built a College for English Romanists here in 1589, where Sir Francis Inglefield was afterwards buried. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "Is Seville close-fisted? Valladoly is open; so Cordova, so Toledo." In Quiet Life i. 1, Lady Cressingham will have "agents at Paris and at Venice and at V. in Spain for intelligence of new fashions." Leigh, in Hints for Travellers, speaks of V. as the best place to learn Spanish in its purity.

VALLOMBROSA. A beautiful valley abt. 18 m. E. of Florence. Milton is said to have spent some days there when he visited Italy in 1638. Milton, P.L. i. 303, says that the fallen angels "lay entranced Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks In Vallombrosa."

VALOIS. An ancient county in Picardy in N. France. Its capital was Cr py, near Beauvais, between 30 and 40 m. N. of Paris. In 1285 it was granted as an appanage to Charles by his father Philip III. The eldest son of Charles came to the throne in 1329 as Philip of V. (Philip VI), and successive members of that house were Kings of France until the murder of Henri III in 1589. The characteristic nose of the house of V. was as famous as the Austrian under-lip. In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Lancaster says to the K., "Thy gentle Q., sole sister to V., Complains that thou hast left her all forlorn." This was Isabelle, daughter of Philip IV, and niece, not sister, to Charles of V. In Ed. III i. 1, Artoys speaks of "John of the house of V., now their k." This was John II, who succeeded his father Philip VI in 1350. In Smith's Hector iv. 2, 972, Artois says, "I betrayed V., My sovereign lord, in England to get grace." Puttenham, in Art of Poesie iii. 16, gives as an example of autonomasia the calling of "the French K. the great Vallois, because so is the name of his house." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 7, Volpone says, "At recitation of our Comedy For entertainment of the great V., I acted young Antinous." This was when Henri III visited Venice on his way from Poland to assume the French crown in 1574. In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Mammon says of Doll: "The house of V. just had such a nose."

VALTELLINA. A narrow valley running due E. from the N. end of Lake Como in N. Italy, and drained by the Adda. It is between 40 and 50 m. long. The principal towns are Sondrio and Chiavenna. It belonged to the Grisons Confederation but was much coveted by Spain, then in possession of the adjacent Milanese. The French, as rivals of Spain, defended the Grisons, and in the Thirty Years' War, to which both Jonson and Davenant allude, it was a bone of contention between France and Spain. In Davenant's Cr. Brother iii. 2, Lucio refers to "the new troops sent to the Valtaline." Jonson, in Underwoods lxx., says, "What is't to me whether the French design Be, or be not, to get the Valteline?"

VALTERIA, or VOLTERRA. A town of Tuscany, 30 m. S.E. of Leghorn. It is on the site of Volaterrae, one of the most ancient of the Etruscan cities. In Middleton's R.G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have visited Valteria amongst other places in Italy.

VANDALS (VI.=Vandal). A Teutonic tribe, found in the 1st cent. in Brandenburg and Pomerania. In the 2nd cent. they migrated southward into Bohemia, and after a hundred years of conflict with Rome made peace with her and settled in Pannonia, where they became Christianized, adopting the Arian form of the Faith. In 406 they crossed the Rhine into Gaul, but, being defeated by the Franks, went over the Pyrenees into Spain and took up their abode in Andalusia. Thence in 428 they went in a body to Africa under the leadership of Genseric and in 10 years conquered the whole Province and set up their Court at Carthage. In 455 Genseric, at the invitation of Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, attacked and took Rome, which he systematically sacked. From that time the name VI. has been synonymous with a ruthless destroyer of buildings and other objects of Art and Culture. In this sense it is often associated with Goth. Huneric, the son of Genseric, married Eudocia, the daughter of Eudoxia; but in spite of her influence he continued the bitter persecution of the Catholics in Africa which his father had begun. Finally, Justinian sent Belisarius to avenge the wrongs of the Catholics, and in 533 the V. were expelled and Africa restored to the Empire. From this point they disappear from history. Heylyn (s.v. SPAIN) says, "In Africa the glory of them [the V.] was most eminent, and they ended, like a candle, in a stink."

In H. Shirley's Mart Soldier, Genseric, King of the V., is one of the principal characters. The play deals with the persecution of the African Catholics and the death of the K. In i. 1, Henrick (Huneric) is hailed on the death of Genseric as "K. of the V. and Goths." He is represented as a heathen, whereas he was an Arian Christian. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker i. 1, 294, Dioclesian says, "The Gothes and V. have out past all bounds And o'er the Rhine past into Burgundy." In iii. 3, the K. of the V. is called Rodrick. Rowley himself has "past all bounds" in this: the V. did not come into France for more than a century after the reign of Dioclesian; and Roderick was the last K. of the Visigoths and was killed in 712, four cents. later. In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 1, Mattemores says, "Would Goths and V. once again would come into Italy!" In Davenant's Siege iii. 1, Ariotto says, "The V. were not so ravenous when they sacked Rome." Donne, in Valedictio to Songs and Sonnets (1633), says, "When this book is made thus, Should again the ravenous V. and the Goths invade us, Learning were safe." "Goth and VI." language means a vulgar and unintelligible dialect. In Shirley's Courtier ii. 2, when Volterre says, "Yo soy el vestro servidor," Depazzi asks, "What's this?" and Giotto answers, "Between Goth and VI., Spanish." In Honorio i. 1, Mammon says, "Scholars think themselves brave fellows when they talk Greek to a lady; next to the Goths and V., you shall carry the babble from mankind." In his Pleasure ii. 1, the Steward tells Frederic, who has just come from the University, that his aunt intends "to make you a fine gentleman, and translate you out of your learned language into the present Goth and VI., which is French." In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 4, Lance says, "[There shall be] no more sense spoken, all things Goth and VI."

VANDEN. A humorous name for a Dutchman, derived from the common prefix to their names, van den. In Ford's Triad i. 1, Fulgoso speaks of "Gulls or Moguls, Tag, rag, or other, hogen-mogen vanden, Skipjacks or chouses."

VANHOLT. See ANHALT.

VAPIANS. An imaginary people mentioned by Sir Andrew in Tw. N. ii. 3, 23, "Thou spak'st of Pigrogromitus, of the Vapians passing the equinoctial of Queubus." The passage was probably suggested by Rabelais ii. 11.

VARICA. Possibly a misprint or mistake for Varia, a town in N. Spain on the Iberus, at the point where the river begins to be navigable. In Bacchus, the 10th guest was "One Philip Filpot, brought up in Varica, a city of Iberia."

VARLOME. See VERULAM.

VARNA. A spt. of Bulgaria on the Black Sea, about midway between the Bosphorus and the mouth of the Danube. Here in 1444 Murad II defeated and slew the Bulgarian K. Ladislaus. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, Frederic says, "Through the midst of Varna and Bulgaria They [the Turks] have not long since massacred our camp." This is an anticipation of the fact by 50 years.

VATICAN.—The Mons Vaticanus at first included the whole range of hills W. of the Tiber at Rome, but the name was later confined to the hill on the N.W. of the city across the Tiber, on which the ch. of St. Peter was afterwards built. There was doubtless a palace attached to the ch. from an early date; but it was not till 1377, on the return of the Popes from Avignon, that Gregory XI made it the official residence of the Popes, who had previously lived in the Lateran (until 1309). Successive Pontiffs enlarged and adorned it until it became the finest Palace in Christendom. It stands on the N. of St. Peter's, and covers an area of 1151 ft. by 767. Its chief glories are the Sistine Chapel, the Scala Regia, the Chapel of San Lorenzo, the Pauline Chapel, the Museum and Picture-gallery, and the Library founded by Nicholas V about 1450 and transferred to the present building by Sixtus V in 1588. It is specially rich in MSS., the most important being the famous Codex Vaticanus of the Bible in Greek; it contains about 250,000 volumes. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, Guicciardine, as Chorus, says, "Here leave we Charles with pompous ceremonies Feasting within the Vaticane at Rome." Habington, in Castara (1640), Arber, p. 109, says, "Boast not the rev'rend V., nor all The cunning pomp of the Escuriell." In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, when Banausus proposes to found a library of fashion-books for young gallants, Colax exclaims, "'Twill put down Bodly's and the V." In Davenant's Platonic iii. 4, Sciolto says, "I'll show a manuscript now kept in the V." In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Tristram says, "You have already enough [books] to furnish a new V."

VECCHIA. See CIVITA VECCHIA.

VEII. An ancient Etruscan city, 12 m. N. of Rome, on the site of the present Isola Farnese. V. maintained for a long time a contest with Rome, but was finally taken by Furius Camillus in 396 B.C. After the capture of Rome by the Gauls in 390 B.C. it was proposed by some to transfer the whole population to V.; but the proposal was over-ruled by Camillus. Thenceforward it sank into complete ruin and desertion. When Nero built his great Golden House in Rome it was again sarcastically suggested that the Romans should migrate to V., unless indeed Nero's palace absorbed that city too. In Nero ii. 3, Piso says, "Romans, get you gone And dwell at V., if that V. too This house o'errun not." See Suetonius, Vit. Neronis 39.

VENDLOE, or VENLOO. A fortified town in N. Brabant, close to the boundary between Holland and the Rhine Provinces, on the Maas, 90 m. S.E. of Amsterdam. In Barnavelt iv. 5, Barnavelt asks, "When Graves and Vendloe were held by the Spaniard, who durst step in before me to do these countries service?"

VENETIAN GULF. The N. portion of the Adriatic Sea, between Venice and Istria. In Marston's Mellida iii. 2, Piero writes: "The just overthrow Andrugio took in the V. G. hath assured the Genowaises of the justice of his cause." In Shirley's Imposture v. 1, Bertoldi says, "I'll pledge it, and it were the G. of Venice."

VENICE—It., VENEZIA (Vn.=Venetian). The famous city on the W. coast of the Gulf of V. near the head of the Adriatic Sea. The Veneti were originally settled on the neighbouring mainland, the seat of government being at Heraclea, where the 1st Doge was elected in A.D. 697; but in 810 they transferred their capital to the Rivo Alto, or Rialto, and in the same year the cathedral of San Marco was founded. The city extended by degrees until it covered the 72 islands which it now occupies. The water-ways which separate them take the place of streets, though the numerous bldgs. make it possible to get to any part of V. on foot. There is no room, however, for any vehicles in the narrow lanes, and the gondolas on the canals take the place of the cabs and motor-cars of ordinary towns. The chief water-way is the Grand Canal, which takes an S-shaped course from the Piazza di San Marco through the heart of the city, and past the Rialto. V. rapidly grew to be a maritime power in the Adriatic, and in the 10th cent. cleared the sea of the Dalmatian pirates who infested it; and, to commemorate this, the ceremony of wedding the Adriatic was instituted on Ascension Day, 998, and was annually repeated. During the next 2 cents. V. took a leading part in the commerce and politics of the East, and grew to be the greatest maritime and commercial city in Europe. In 1204 she was the chief agent in the capture of Constantinople and had dreams of founding a new Latin Empire; but they were rendered nugatory by the jealousy of her rival, Genoa. War was inevitable between these 2 States and lasted almost unintermittedly throughout the 14th cent., until the dramatic reversal of the defeat of Pola by the victory of Chioggia in 1379 finally established the supremacy of V. She proceeded during the next cent. to secure her position on land, and added to her dominions Vicenza, Padua, Verona, Brescia, Bergamo, Crema, and Cremona. This involved her in a life-and-death contest against the League of Cambrai, which included the K. of France, the Pope, and the Emperor; but she emerged victorious, and the triumphs of Ravenna (1512) and Marignano (1515) restored to her all her territories on the mainland. During the 16th cent. the rise of the Ottoman power gave her a new and formidable enemy, with whom she was left to contend almost single-handed. She lost by degrees almost all her islands in the E. Mediterranean; and the famous victory of Lepanto in 1571 only stemmed for a short time the tide of Turkish aggression. Cyprus was lost in 1573, and Candia (Crete) fell in 1669 after a siege of 22 years. The government was a close oligarchy, all political rights being confined to the members of the great families. At the head was the Doge, who was elected annually; there were 2 assemblies, the Great Council of 480, and the executive, called La Signoria; but the chief power came to reside in the famous Council of Ten.

V. remained as a Sovereign Republic until the end of the 18th cent., but was nefariously handed over to Austria by Napoleon at the Treaty of Campo Formio (1796). After the battle of Sadowa (1866) Austria was compelled to disgorge her, and she has since formed part of United Italy.

The chief buildings of V. are the Duomo of San Marco, built on the site of the chapel to which the body of St. Mark was brought from Alexandria in 828; the present Cathedral was consecrated in 1085, but it has been constantly enlarged and embellished with new splendours; the Doge's Palace adjoining San Marco, begun in 1300 on the site of an older building, and completed during the 15th cent.; the Campanile, finished about 1131—it fell in the latter part of the 19th cent., but has been conscientiously restored. The pillars in the Piazzetta were brought from the East in 1126 and erected in 1180.

The chief manufactures were metal-work, textiles, glass, and various articles of fashion and luxury, such as fans, soap, brooches, gloves, etc. V. was one of the leaders of fashion in dress in the 16th and 17th cents., and gave the name "Vn." to a special type of breeches, which fitted tightly to the leg and were richly embroidered. The men were reputed to be politic, prudent, and valiant; but the courtezans of V. were infamous throughout Europe, and her women were supposed to be beautiful and vicious in an equal degree. V. was already a resort of travellers and no one could boast of extensive foreign experience who had not "swum in a gondola." The Vn. School of Painting flourished in the 15th and 16th cents. and was adorned by the names of the Bellinis, Carpaccio, Palma Vecchio, Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, and Paul Veronese. None of our dramatists show any personal knowledge of the city, and the local references to it are of the most general character. Ben Jonson, in Volpone, mentions more details than any other of them, but even they are meagre and derived from hearsay.

The scene of many of the plays is laid in V. Othello, Act I, takes place at V.; the background of the play is a war between V. and the Turks, probably the one which began in 1570 and ended with the destruction of the Turkish fleet at Lepanto in 1571. Merch. has its scene partly in V., partly in the imaginary Belmont; the date is indeterminate. In neither play does Shakespeare show any knowledge of the topography of the city except of the most general kind; but his descriptions of the government and manners of the place are wonderfully accurate. Day's Humour is laid partly at V., partly at Mantua. The D. of V. is an imaginary Octavio, who is also the usurping D. of Mantua. Other plays whose scene is laid at V. are Jonson's Volpone, Chapman's May Day, Marston's Mellida, B. & F. Captain, Middleton's Blurt, Marston's What you and I, Insiatiate, Shirley's Gent. Ven., Brome's Novella, K. K. Hon. Man, Knave, and Day's Travails (one Act). There is an imaginary D. of V. in Mason's Mulleasses who is the rival of the D. of Ferrara for the hand of Julia, the daughter of Borgias of Florence.

General references. In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Monticelso says to Vittoria: "You were born in V., honourably descended from the Vittelli." In Chapman's May Day iv. 2, Lucretia says, "You show your virtues perfectly derived from the Vn. noblesse." The title of Magnifico was given to the magnates of the city. Spenser, in Mother Hubbard 665, says, "The fond ape . . . stalketh stately by As if he were some great Magnifico." In Merch. iii. 2, 282, Solanio says, "The D. himself and the magnificoes Of greatest port have all persuaded with him." In Oth. i. 2, 12, Iago calls Brabantio "the magnifico." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1641), says, "The greatest magnifico in V. will think it no disgrace to his magnificenza to go to market." In Horestes D. 3, the Vice says to Fame: "Whither dost thou think for to go? To purgatory or Spayne? to Venys, To portugaul or to the isles Canary?" In Mason's Mulleasses the banner of V. is quite wrongly described as being white with golden stars.

Historical allusions. In B. & F. Candy i. 1, Gaspero mentions "a massacre performed at sea By the Admiral of V. on a merchant of Candy"; and adds that at the time "Candy and V. were at peace." Hence a war has arisen and "all the Vn. forces are defeated." Ultimately, in v. 1, "All contentions Are happily accorded, Candy's peace secured, and V. vowed a worthy friend." Probably the reference is to the selling of Candia to the Vns. by the Marquis of Montferrat in 1204. In R2 iv. 1, 97, Carlisle tells how Norfolk "at V. gave His body to that pleasant country's earth." He died there of a broken heart on Sept. 29th, 1399; as Richd.'s deposition took place the next day, Carlisle could not have been known of Norfolk's death. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine says, "The galleys and the pilling brigandines That yearly sail to the Vn. Gulf And hover in the Straits for Christians' wreck Shall lie at anchor in the isle Asant." The Turkish galleys are meant, which carried on continuous warfare against the commerce of V. In his Jew i. 1, Barabas suggests that the Turkish galleys reported mean "to pass along Toward V. by the Adriatic Sea; With whom they have attempted many times." In Shrew iv. 2, 83, Tranio tells the Pedant "Tis death for any one in Mantua To come to Padua . . . Your ships are stayed at V. and the D. For private quarrel 'twixt your D. and him Hath published and proclaimed it openly." From 1405 Padua was under the rule of V. In Oth. v. 2, 354, Othello tells how he killed a Turk in Aleppo who "beat a Vn. and traduced the state." In Jonson's Cynthia iv. 1, Philautia says of Amorphus: "He looks like a Vn. trumpeter in the battle of Lepanto in the gallery yonder"; i.e. in a picture or tapestry representation of the battle. In his Volpone v. 2, Sir Politick is accused of having "a plot To sell the State of V. to the Turk." In Shirley's Genl. Ven. iii. 1, Malipiero says, "V. is a jewel; a rich pendant would hang rarely at the Great Turk's ear." In his Bird iv. 1, Bonamico exhibits in his collection of birds "The D. of V. his own bulfinch, and taken by the Turks." In Webster's White Devil v. 1, Flamineo speaks of the Moor who has recently come to Court as having "Served the Vn. in Candy these twice seven years." In Glapthorne's Privilege i. 1, Vitelli says, "Doria's force overthrew the power of V. in a fight." Andrea Doria was a great Genoese admiral in the first half of the 16th cent. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor in his mythical account of his adventures says, "Retiring home, the Vn. galleys took us prisoners."

The Marriage of the Adriatic. In K. K. Hon. Man C. 4, Sempronio says, "This is the festival of holy Mark. This day our Lords of V. wanted be To sacrifice in triumph to the sea." In Dekker's Wonder iii. 1, the Brother says, "The awed Vns. on St. Mark's proud day Never went forth to marry the rich seas In greater bravery." In Webster's Monuments, Thetissays, "Sure, this is V. and the day St. Mark In which the D. and Senates their course hold To wed our empire with a ring of gold." It was a natural mistake on the part of the dramatists to make the wedding of the Adriatic take place on St. Mark's Day, April 25th, as he was the patron saint of the city; but the actual day was Ascension Day, which can never fall on St. Mark's Day, though when Easter is early it might be within a few days of it.

The Laws of Venice. In Merch. iv. 1, 102, Shylock demands the forfeit on the ground "If you deny me, fie upon your law! There is no force in the decrees of V."; and in 178 Portia admits "The Vn. law Cannot impugn you as you do proceed." But in 311 she points out: "In the cutting it, if thou dost shed One drop of Christian blood, thy lands and goods Are by the laws of V. confiscated Unto the State of V."; and further, in 348 "It is enacted in the laws of V. If it be proved against an alien That by direct or indirect attempts He seek the life of any citizen, The party . . . Shall seize one half his goods; the other half Goes to the privy coffers of the State And the offender's life lies in the mercy Of the D. only."

The Gondola, the well-known type of boat used on the canals, is first mentioned in the 14th cent. In the 16th it was decreed that the gondolas were to be entirely black and without decorations; this was because of the extravagance of adornment lavished on them by the nobles. In As iv. 1, 38, Rosalind advises Jacques to disable all the benefits of his own country: "Or I will scarce think you have swam in a gondola," i.e. been to V. In Merch. ii. 8, 8, Salario tells how Lorenzo and Jessica "in a gondola were seen together." In Oth. i. 1, 126, Roderigo informs Brabantio that Desdemona was transported to Othello's embraces "with a knave of common hire, a gondolier." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 2, Mosca tells Lady Politick that her husband is "rowing in a gondole With the most cunning courtesan of V." Marston, in Mellida iii., uses the form "gundelet"; and the same form is found in Dekker's Babylon. Montaigne (Florio's Trans., 1603), iii. 5, says that in Calicut "the ignoble are bound to cry as they walk along, like the gondoliers or water-men of V., along the streets, lest they should jostle with them," i.e. the nobles. In Rabelais' Pantagruel ii. 30, Epistemon, who has been to hell, reports that the Knights of the Round Table are employed "to row over the rivers [of Hell] as are hired the boatmen at Lyons, the gondoliers of V., and the oars of London."

The buildings. In Marlowe's Faustus vii. 16, Faust proposes to visit "V., Padua, and the rest, In one of which [or, according to the edition of 1604, "in midst of which"] a sumptuous temple stands That threatens the stars with her aspiring top." Some take the reference to be to San Marco; but it does not threaten the stars, whereas St. Anthony's at Padua has a very lofty tower, and is I think the ch. intended.

The unique charm and beauty of Venice and the resort of travellers thereto. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge xxiv., says, "Whosoever that hath not seen the noble city of V., he hath not seen the beauty and riches of this world. There be rich marchavence and merchants. Through the streets of V. runneth the water; and every merchant hath a fair little barge standing at his stairs to row through and about the city." In L. L. L. iv. 2, 98, Holofernes quotes from Mantuan "Venetia, Venetia, chi non to vede non ti pretia." In Jonson's Case i. 1, Juniper mentions V. as one of the famous places he has seen in his travels. In his Cynthia i. 1, Amorphus proposes to pretend that he has met Asotus "in V. or Padua." In Shirley's Ball i. 1, Winfield says, "A gentleman was persuaded to put the money out most wisely, to have 5 for 1 at his return from V."

Trade and commerce. In Cromwell ii. 1, we are told of certain English merchants on their way from Antwerp "bound for V." In Marlowe's Faustus i. 128, Valdes promises Faust "From V. shall they [the spirits] drag huge argosies." In his Jew iii. 1, Bellamira says, "From V. merchants, and from Padua Were wont to come rarewitted gentlemen." In iv. 1, Barabas talks of the debts he has owing "in V., Florence, Antwerp," and other places. In Merch. i. 1, 11, Salario describes "the argosies with portly sail" of Antonio, "The Merchant of V." In Marston's What you i. 1, Jacomo speaks of "V. state Where merchants guilt the top." In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, Palatine says, "You have no factors, Sir, In Delph, Leghorn, Aleppo, or the Vn. isles That by their traffic can advance you thus."

Venice as the emporium for rich textiles, jewellery, toilet articles, etc. In Shrew ii. 1, 316, Petruchio, who is at Padua, says, "I will to V.; We will have rings and things and fine array." In ii. 1, 356, Gremio boasts of having in his house "Valance of V. gold in needlework." In Middleton's Mad World ii. 2, Sir Bounteous says, "The curtains indeed were wrought in V. with the story of the Prodigal Child in silk and gold." The author of "A brief conceit of English Policy" (1581) says, "There is no man that can be contented now with ouche, brooch, or aglet but of V. making, or Millen." In Ital. Gent. iv. 4, Medusa has for sale "Vallencia gloves And V. rolles to rub the teeth withal." In Davenant's U. Lovers iii. 4, Altophil speaks of "Vn. tapers gilt" amongst other luxurious furnishings. In Ford's Fancies v. 2, Secco, the barber, uses "pure soap of V." as an ingredient in his shaving soap. In Dekker's Match me ii. Bilbo cries: "See here rich Tuscan hatbands, Vn. ventoyes," i.e. fans. Hall, in Satires vi. 1, says of Catilla: "[Her] wrinkled furrows, which her age doth breed, Are daubed full of V. chalk for need."

Vn. glass was made at Murano from the 14th cent. onward, and had, and still has, a world-wide reputation. V. glasses were supposed to break if poison were poured into them; they were very delicate and brittle, and so a cracked V. glass came to be used in the sense of a woman who has lost her character. In Barry's Ram iv. 2, Beard boasts: "We'll quaff in V. glasses." In Massinger's Old Law iii. 2, Sim says, "Venues in V. glasses! Let them come!" In Shirley's Ball iii. 3, Freshwater says, "He can present you with V. glasses, Parmesan sugars, all from Antwerp." Coryat, in Crudities ii. 18, speaks of "the delicate V. glasses, so famous over all Christendom." Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 5, 3, says, "This beauty is a mere flash, a V. glass, quickly broken." In Dekker's Match me i., the Lady says, "Women are V. glasses, one knock spoils 'em." In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Romelio thinks that Julio has spent "a hundred ducats a month in breaking V. glasses." In Dekker's Satiro iv. 3, 207, Tucca calls: "A blanket! these cracked V. glasses shall fill him out, they shall toss him." Browne, in Pseudodoxia, says, "Though it be said that poison will break a V. glass, yet have we not met with any of that nature."

Venice treacle, or Treacle of Andromachus, was supposed to be a sovereign remedy against various diseases. In B. & F. Elder B. ii. 1, Miramont speaks of a young courtier bringing home from his travels "a box of V. treacle To cure young wenches that have eaten ashes." In Taylor's Life of Thomas Parr (1635), it is said: "Garlick he esteemed above the rate Of V. treacle or best Mithridate."

Vn. oysters and Paté de foie gras. In Davenant's Wits ii., Meager says of a lady's throat which he proposes to cut: "It should open wide as the widest oyster in the V. lake." In iv., Engine mentions among table-dainties "Your broad liver o' the Vn. goose, fattened by a Jew."

Manners, customs, and character. In Jonson's Cynthia v. 2, when Amorphus with an Italian compliment kisses the lady's hand, Crites comments: "The Vn. dop this"; dop meaning a short, quick curtsey. In Three Ladies ii. Lucre says, "V. is a city where Usury by Lucre may live in great glory." In Shirley's Ball vi. 2, Freshwater says, "The Vns. are the valiantest gentlemen under the sun." In Davenant's Italian iii. 2, Altaza says of Florello: "He should be a Vn. by the wit and policy of his courage." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of "V. rich, commanding, politic." In B. & F. French Law i. 1, Cleremont, speaking of duels, says there have been "scarce three in V. in as many years."

The Vn. women are represented as especially frail and immoral. In Oth. i. 3, 363, Iago speaks of Othello's marriage as "a frail vow between an erring barbarian and a super-subtle Vn." In Ado i. 1, 274, Don Pedro says, "If Cupid have not spent all his quiver in V., Thou wilt quake for this shortly." In Day's Humour ii. 1, the Boy calls V. "the best flesh-shambles in Italy." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 3, Knowell says, "I never yet was he that travelled with my son, before 16, to show him the Vn. courtézans!" In his Volpone ii. 1, Peregrine says, "Your lady lies here in V., for intelligence of tires and fashions and behaviour among the courtézans." In Ford's Trial iii. 1, Benatzí cries: "Vn. wanton—ravishing!" In Massinger's Guardian ii. 5, Calipso talks of "the Vn. courtézan." In B. & F. Wild Goose i. 2, Mirabel says, "Give me the plump Vn., fat and lusty, That meets me soft and supple." In Massinger's Renegado i. 1, Gazet says that the women he has with him are "bawds and common courtézans in V." In Costly Wh. ii. 1, the D. says of Valentia: "Courtézans are rare with us in Germany; except herself, being a Vn. born and privileged, the State allows none." In Brome's Covert G. i. 1, Dorcas appears upon a balcony "habited like a courtézan of V." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 1, the hero says, "I'll to V. and turn pimp." In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 2, the Bawd says, "The Marshall and the Constable vex us more than the Vns. do the whole corporation of Courtézans." Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 2, 2, says, "Our Vn. ladies at this day . . . counterfeit yellow hair;" probably what is now known as the peroxide tint. In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, Colax hopes to see Micropepes "build a stew Shall out-brave V."

Vn. Dress. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge xxiv., says, "The merchants of Venys goeth in long gowns like priests, with close sleeves . . . The people do poll their heads and do let their beards grow." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny, says, "The Vns. are bound by the laws of their Commonwealth that their upper garment, worn within the city, should ever be of plain black." In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Lady Cressingham "will have agents at V. for intelligence of all new fashions." In M. W. W. iii. 3, 61, Falstaff says, "Thou hast the right-arched beauty of the brow that becomes the ship-tire, the tire-valiant, or any tire of Vn. admittance." In Ret. Parnass. iv. 2, Ingenioso says, "The poor Aristotelians walk in a short cloak and a close Vn. hose." Lancham, in Letter (1575), speaks of "a long garment with a side and wide sleeves Vn.-wise." Stubbes, in Anat. of Abuses, p. 56, says, "The Vn. hosen, they reach beneath the knee to the gartering place of the leg, where they are tied finely with silk points, or some such-like, and laid on also with rows of lace or guards." But in Three Ladies ii., Simony says, "The Vns. came nothing near the knee." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The Spaniard loves his ancient slop, The Lombard his Vn." In Ev. Wom. In. i. 1, the citizen's wife speaks of "the party in the yellow scarf and the round Vn." Greene, in Cony-Catching (1592) ix. 95, says, "The vn. and the gallogascaine is stale, and trunk slop out of use."

VENICE. The name of a house of ill-fame in Whitefriars, Lond. It may have been named so because of the reputation of V. as an immoral city. In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Madge says, "I lay not long ago at the V. by Whitefryers Dock."

VENISE, HOTEL DE. An hotel in Paris, apparently frequented by Englishmen. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 227, the Londoner says, "I am retiring to my countrymen at the good H. de V."

VENTA CRUZ. A little town on the river Chagres in the isthmus of Panama. Drake describes it as being 3 days' row up the river, but a day and a night's only coming down; he also says it is 6 leagues from Panama. In Davenant's Playhouse iii., Drake says, "Secure the fort Whilst we to V. C. enforce our way."

VENUS STREET. La Rue de Venus, in the N. quarter of Antwerp, running N. from the junction of the Rue des Aveugles and the Rue des Princes to the Marche aux Chevaux. In Larum, Alva says, "The N. part of the city, Venus st., Remains the subject of desired spoil."

VENUSIA, now VENOSA. An ancient city on the borders of Lucania and Apulia in Italy, on the Appian Way, 190 m. S.E. of Rome. It was a flourishing place all through the later years of the Roman Republic, and is still an episcopal city of some importance. Its chief glory is that it was the birthplace of Horace. Dekker, Satiro. (Prol.), says, "I thank thee, thou true Venusian Horace, for these good words thou giv'st me: Populus me sibylat at mihi plaudo." See Horace, Sat. i. 1, 66. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 2, Horace says, "Lucanian or Apulian, I not [i.e. know not] whether, For the Venusian colony ploughs either"—a translation of Horace, Sat. ii. 1, 35. Horace means that he does not know whether he is an Apulian or a Lucanian, as Venusium is on the borders of both. Hall, in Satires iv. 1, 2, says, "Who dares upbraid these open rhymes of mine With blindfold Aquines, or dark Venusine?" i.e. the obscure satiric allusions of Juvenal or Horace. Jonson, in Underwoods lxi. 89, says of his own poetry: "All the old Venusine could spy, Was there made English."

VERDEA. Probably Monte Verdo in S. Tuscany is intended. It is in a celebrated wine-producing dist. In B. & F. Elder B. ii. 1, Miramont describes an Italian traveller as "having been at Rome and seen the relics, drunk your Verdea wine, and rid at Naples."

VERE, or VEERE. A town in the island of Walcheren, off the coast of Holland, abt. 12 m. S.E. of Zirick-see and 8 m. N.E. of Flushing. In Ford's Trial i. 2, Futella speaks of one Dame Fustibunga, "who, troubled long time with a strangury, vented at last salt water so abundantly as drowned the land between Zirick-see and Vere, where steeple-tops are only seen." For these floods see under ZIRICK-SEE.

VERE STREET. Lond., running from the W. corner of Clare Market to Duke St. It was named after Elizabeth V., daughter of Lord V. of Tilbury, who died 1683. Gibbon's Tennis Court was in V. St. and was converted into a theatre by Thomas Killigrew and so used from 1660 to 1669. In Davenant's Playhouse i., the Musician says, "There is another playhouse to let in V.-st."

VERGE, or, more fully, The V. of the Court. The dist. around the palaces of Whitehall and St. James's in Lond. within which arrests could not be effected. It extended from Charing Cross down Whitehall to the river, and included also Hyde Park, St. James's Park, and the Green Park. Its privilege from arrests made it a favourite resort of insolvent debtors and members of the criminal classes. In Jonson's Cynthia iv. 1, Moria says, "There should not a nymph or a widow be got with child in the V. but I would guess within one or two who was the right father." In Randolph's Muses iv. 4, Colax says, "Flattery, that was wont To be confined within the V. is now Grown epidemical."

VERLAME. See VERULAM.

VERONA. A city in N. Italy, picturesquely situated in a sharp bend of the Adige, abt. 65 m. W. of Venice, 40 W. of Padua, 25 N. of Mantua, and 90 E. of Milan. It was a Roman Colonia, and the great Amphitheatre and some parts of the walls date from Roman times. Here the poet Catullus was born in 87 B.C. It was one of the chief residences of the Lombard Kings in the 6th, 7th, and 8th cents. It reached its greatest splendour under the rule of the Della Scala family, 1260 to 1387. It was then annexed to the territories of Milan by the Visconti, but in 1405 it was conquered by the Venetians, who held it till the end of the 18th cent. It contains many fine examples of ecclesiastical and domestic architecture. In Cockayne's Trapolin iii. 3, Horatio describes it as "Worthy V., old Catullus' city." The scene of Davenant's Albion is laid at V., in the Lombard Court, about A.D. 570. The scene of R. & J. is laid mostly at V. in the early part of the 14th cent. The rival families of the Montagues and Capulets (Montecchi and Cappelliti) are mentioned by Dante (Purg. vi. 107). The house of the Capulets, now an Inn, is still shown in the Via Capello. The original tomb of Juliet has long since been destroyed; but a modern substitute has been provided for the tourist in the Orfanotrofio. The scene of Two Gent. is laid at first in this city, but afterwards shifts to Milan, where the Court of the D. is held. The date is the beginning of the 15th cent. In ii. 3, 40, Panthino says to Launce: "Away, ass! you'll lose the tide"; a curious error. In Shrew ii. 1, 47, Petruchio says, "I am a gentleman of V.," and his country house, in which some of the later scenes take place, was probably in its neighbourhood. In Jonson's Case i. 2, Ferneze, describing the attack on Vicenza, says, "Happy was that foot that first could press The flowery champain bordering on V." Vicenza is abt. 40 m. E. of V. In Oth. ii. 1, 26, one of the gentlemen describes "a noble ship of Venice" as "a Veronesa," i.e. a ship furnished by V. to the Venetian fleet. The date is about 1570, when V. formed part of the Venetian territory. Other plays the scene of which is laid at V. are Davenant's U. Lovers and Brome's Cunning Lovers, in which Prospero, D. of V., plays a prominent part.

VERULAM. An ancient Roman town in Herts., close to St. Alban's, from which it is separated by the river

Ver. Lord Bacon took his title, Baron V., from this town. See further under ALBAN'S, SAINT. In Fisher's Fuimus i. 2, Cassibelaunus says, "I must to V.'s fenced town repair." Drayton, in Polyolb. viii. 273, tells how "brave Boadicia [i.e. Boadicea] made with her resolved'st men To Virolam, whose siege with fire and sword she plied Till levelled with the earth." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker i. 1, 169, Maximinus says to Albon: "Go to thy barony of Verolam"; and later, iv. 2, 18, calls him "Lord of Varlome"; in line 28, he says, "I will drag them hence in chains to Holmhurst Hill, 3 miles from Verolome," and Albon's martyrdom there is the subject of the latter part of the scene. Spenser, F.Q. iii. 4, 52, tells of a victory won by K. Uther over the Paynims Octa and Oza "Beside Cayr Verolame"; and in his Ruines of Time, he introduces "Verlame" as an example of the passing away of human glory; "Verlame I was; what boots it that I was, Sith now I am but weeds and wasteful grass?"

VERVINS. A town in N. France, abt. 100 m. N.E. of Paris. It was taken by Henry VIII in 1544; and a treaty between France and Spain was made there on May 2nd, 1598. In Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, Janin speaks of "The discontent the Spaniard entertained, With such a threatening fury, when he heard The prejudicial conditions Proposed him in the treaty held at V."

VERSAEVUS. See VESUVIUS.

VESTA, TEMPLE OF. At Rome, in the S.W. corner of the Forum Romanum, just S. of the present ch. of San Maria Liberatrice. It was circular in shape, and in its neighbourhood the Vestal Virgins had their lodging. The circular building now shown as the T. of V. in the Piazza della Boccadella Verita was not the T. of V., but was probably the Aemilian Temple of Hercules. In Richards' Messalina iv. 1980, Lepida says, "A vault I have Which near adjoins the Vestals' T." In Tiberius 714, Nero says, "Did we not both, at Vesta's sacred shrine, Pray for the safety of his Majesty?" Some of the scenes in B. & F. Corinth take place in an imaginary temple of V. in that city.

VESUVIUS. A volcano on the E. side of the Bay of Naples, abt. 4000 ft. high. The first record of an eruption in historic times is that of August 24th, A.D. 79, when Pompeii and Herculaneum were overwhelmed. For the next 15 cents. it remained quiescent, which accounts for the very few references to it in our dramatic literature, in which Aetna (q.v.) is the typical volcano. In 1631 there was another outburst, and since then the mtn. has been more or less active. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 2, Eulinius says, "His ruddy flesh boiled in flame like an Aetnaean or Vesuvian salamander." In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 1, the Messenger pictures Nature's Archeus seeking "an Aetna or Vesaevus out Where he might dry himself." Chaucer spells it "Vesevus." Barnes, in Parthenophil lxxv. 11, asks of Cupid who his father was, that he is so cruel: "V. else? or was it Etna rather?"

VIANO. An ancient city of Navarre, lying a little N. of the Ebro, 160 m. N.E. of Madrid. In Barnes' Charter v. 5, Guicchiardine says, "Cæsar Escaped into the kingdom of Navarre Where in an ambush at Viano slain Just Nemesis repaid his treachery."

VIA SACRA. A street in ancient Rome, beginning on the Esquiline Hill near the Coliseum and running under the arch of Titus through the Forum up to the Capitol.

It was the road along which the Roman generals went in triumph to the Capitol. In Jonson's Poetaster, the scene of iii. 1, which is a free imitation of Horace, Sat. i. 9, is given as "The Via Sacra (or Holy Street)."

VICENZA. A city in N. Italy on the Bacchiglione, 40 m. W. of Venice. It has a fine Gothic cathedral, and is specially celebrated for its palaces, many of which were the work of Palladio, who was a native of the city. At first a free city, it fell successively under the power of Ezzelino di Romano and of Verona; then it became subject to Gian Galeazzo Visconti, of Milan, and so remained till 1404, when the citizens called in the aid of Venice and accepted her lordship. It continued to be part of the Venetian dominions till 1797. It had a considerable trade in silk and wine. In Jonson's Case, there is a war between the French and the Milanese; the supposed date is fixed by certain allusions in the play to 1460 (see under MILAN); but the war was probably suggested by the attack of Francis I on Milan in 1515. In i. 1, we are told that Maximilian of V. is leader of the Milanese troops. In i. 2, Count Ferneze describes the surprise and storming of V. by Chamont, the French general; and in iii. 1, he says, "First in V. lost I my first son." Jonson calls it indifferently V. and Vincenza. Another form, perhaps due to a misprint, is found in Cockayne's Trapolin v. 1, where the hero says, "Vienca wine and Padua bread are the best." Coryat, in Crudities 305, quotes the proverb: "The wine of V., the bread of Padua, the tripes of Trevisa, the courtesans of Venice."

VIENCA. See VICENZA.

VIENNA. The capital of the Austrian Republic on the right bank of the Danube at its confluence with the Wien. Originally a Celtic town, it was seized and fortified by the Romans under the name of Vindobona. It was long the outpost of European civilisation against the Turks and Slavs. In 1276 it became the capital of the Hapsburgs, and, whilst they held the title of Holy Roman Emperor, it was the capital of the Empire. In 1477 it was besieged by the Hungarians, and in 1485 was taken by Matthew Corvinus. In 1529 the Turks besieged it, but were repelled by the valour of Nicholas von Salm. A later siege in 1683 was equally unsuccessful. V. is the scene of Measure for Measure, in which it is represented as under the rule of a Duke. In its source, Whetstone's Promos, the scene is in Julio (q.v.). In Ham. iii. 2, 248, Hamlet says of the play which is to be presented before the K.: "The play is the image of a murder done in V.; Gonzago is the D.'s name." He is afterwards called the K. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes says to Sigismund: "I am he That with the cannon shook V. walls." Sigismund replies, "V. was besieged and I was there, Then County Palatine, but now a K." This is quite unhistorical; Orcanes (Orkhan) was never near V. In Barnes' Charter iii. 2, Frescobaldi boasts: "At V. I did unhorse 3 Turkie Janizaries." This was at the siege of 1529. In Jonson's Ev. Man. I. ii. 2, Brainworm claims to have been shot "at the relief of V." He is thinking of the same siege. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein v. 2, Leslie says, "V. is the capital city, which does hold The true and lawful Cæsar."

VIMIE. Probably a misprint for VIENNE, an ancient city in France in the department of Isère, on the left bank of the Rhône, some 20 miles south of Lyons. It was taken by Montmorency in conjunction with the D.

of Lorraine in 1594; Biron was acting with Montmorency in this campaign, and it is most likely that the gift of a horse to him by the D. was made at this time. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, the Capt. reminds Byron of the death of "the horse the D. of Lorraine sent you at Vinnie."

VIMINAL. One of the hills upon which ancient Rome was built. It lies E. of the city between the Quirinal and the Esquiline. Spenser, in Ruines of Rome iv., describes Rome as lying buried under her 7 hills, and says, "Both her feet Mt. V. and Aventine do meet."

VINCENT, CAPE ST. The extreme S.W. point of Portugal. In Hycke, p. 88, the hero says, "I have been at Cape saynt Vincent, and in the New found iland."

VINCENT'S (SAINT) STREET. Seville. In Tuke's Five Hours ii. 1, Ernesto says, "Here's a key of the apartment that opens on St. Vincent's st."

VINCENZA. See VICENZA.

VINE. A tavern sign in Lond. Taylor, in Carriers Cosmography, mentions a Vine Inn in Bishopsgate St. In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The drunkard [goes] to the Vine."

VINE COURT. A range of buildings in the Middle Temple, London. Storde's Floot. Isl. was "Printed by T. C. for H. Twyford in Vine-Court Middle Temple. 1655."

VINTNERS' HALL. The Hall of the Vintners' Company in Lond., at No. 68 on the S. side of Upper Thames St. The Company received its 1st charter from Edward III and the Hall was built on a site presented to them by John de Stody, who was Lord Mayor in 1357. It was burnt down in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren; but of this second Hall only the Council Chamber remains, the rest having been rebuilt in 1820. Dekker, in Jests, says, "Serjeants are good benefactors to V.-H." In Massinger's Virgin ii. 1, Spungius speaks of Bacchus as "head-warden of V.-H." In Nabbes' Bride i. 4, Rhenish says, "There's that will make the crookedest horner in the lane speak Latin with the Beadle of Vintners-H." To speak Latin means to gabble unintelligibly, like a drunken man.

VINTRY. A wharf on the N. bank of the Thames just above the present Southwark Bdge., between Queen Hythe and the Stillyard. It was set apart in the reign of Edward I for the use of the Bourdeaux wine-merchants and was furnished with 3 cranes for the unloading of their vessels; from them the famous tavern "The Three Cranes" (q.v.) derived its name. The heading of one of Scogan's Ballads (circ. 1450) is "At a supper of feorthe merchanche in the vintre in Lond." Skelton, Works I 208 (1529), says, "They judge themselves able to be doctors of the chair in the Vyntre at the Three Cranes." In Edwardes' Damon xv., Aristippus says, "In him there is as much virtue, truth, and honesty, As there are true feathers in the three cranes of the v." In the list of taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we find "three Cranes in the Vintree." The name is still preserved in the Ch. of St. Martin V. See also THREE CRANES.

VIRGINIA (Vn.=Virginian). A name given to the dist. on the E. coast of N. America the colonisation of which was commenced by Raleigh in 1584. It included the present States of Florida, Georgia, S. and N. Carolina, and V. The name was bestowed on it in honour of the Virgin Q., Elizabeth. In 1606 James I granted V. by patent to the Lond. Company; and in May 1607 a body of 105 colonists founded Jamestown on the James river. Capt. John Smith assumed the management of the infant colony; he was captured by the Indians, but saved by the intercession of Pocahontas, the daughter of the chief Powhatan. Two years later she again saved the town from an Indian plot; and in 1611 she was married to an Englishman, John Rolfe, and later visited England, where she was the object of much curiosity and admiration. The dramatists represent it as an almost unknown land, the refuge of desperate adventurers, and inhabited by savages who worshipped the devil. Its chief products are swine and tobacco. The quotations that follow are arranged in chronological order and show the growth in the knowledge of the country during the 1st half of the 17th cent. Spenser, F.Q. ii. prol. 2 (1590), asks, "Fruitfullest V. who did ever view?" Hall, in Satires (1597) v. 1, says that Furius would "dislodge whole colonies of poor . . . And ship them to the new-named Virgin-lond." In Middleton's Blurt (1602) iii. 3, Lazarillo speaks of "any new-found land, as V., or so." In Jonson's Eastward (1605), Sir Petronel Flash bestows all he has "on a ship now bound for V.;" Seagull describes it in iii. 3: "A whole country of English is there, bred of those that were left there in '79. They have married with she-Indians and make 'em bring forth as beautiful faces as any we have in England." He goes on to speak of the wealth of the country in gold, diamonds, and rubies; its delightful climate, and its freedom from sergeants, lawyers, courtiers, and intelligencers; "only a few industrious Scots, who indeed are dispersed over the face of the whole earth." It is 6 weeks' voyage thither; but the expedition gets no further than Cuckolds Haven in the Thames, where the whole party is shipwrecked. Drayton, in Ode to the Virginian Voyage (1606), calls it "V., Earth's only Paradise." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque (1609) i. 2, Staines says, "I dare not walk abroad to see my friends, for fear the serjeants should take acquaintance of me. My refuge is Ireland or V." In Jonson's Epicoene (1609) ii. 3, Morose says of his nephew's fortune: "It shall not have hope to repair itself by Constantinople, Ireland, or V." In the early part of the 17th cent. a Virginian chief, called Nomentack, was brought over to England. In Jonson's Epicoene (1609) v. 1, La-Foole says that Daw drew maps (i.e. portraits) of "Nomentack, when he was here, and of the Prince of Moldavia." William Crawshaw, in a sermon preached in 1610, says that V. has been ridiculed on the stage; for the reason that no players or other idle persons are tolerated there. Donne, in Verses Letter to Countess of Bedford (1610), says, "We've added to the world V." In Middleton's R. G. (1610) ii. 2, Moll advises Sebastian not to marry in a hurry; "take deliberation, sir; never choose a wife as if you were going to V.;" the idea being that those who go there go on a sudden impulse to escape the law. In Dekker's Match Me (1611) ii., Bilbo says, "The beard-brush is flexible as you will; the very bristles of the same swine that are fattened in V." In Field's Weathercock (1612) ii. 1, Scudmore says that Worldly can have no conscience unless "wild V., black Afric, or the shaggy Scythia" send him one over. In Tailor's Hog hath lost (1613) iii., Haddit says of his scheme: "This goes better forward than the plantation in V." In Chapman's Anti-masque at the wedding of the princess Elizabeth (1613), the masquers are Vn. priests, called Phœbades, and the scene is a refulgent mine of gold. In Jonson's Barthol. (1614) Ind., the Stage-keeper sarcastically says of the play: "When it comes to the Fair once, you were e'en as good go to V., for anything there is of Smithfield." Chapman, in Inns of Court Masque (1614), describes some of the actors as "having on their heads high-sprigged feathers, compassed in coronets, like the Vn. princes they presented." In Trades Increase (1615), the author says, "For V., we know not well what to do with it." In B. & F. Subject (1618) iii. 2, Honora says, "If there be such stirring things among them, such travellers into V. as Fame reports, if they can win me, take me." The meaning is "brave adventurers." Middleton, in Love and Antiquity (1619), Bullen vii. 321, speaks of "that kind savage, the Vn." In Massinger's Madam (1619) v. 1, Sir John Frugal says, "A deep magician appeared to me in V. and commanded I should provide, against the next great sacrifice, 2 Christian virgins." A play entitled "A Tragedy of the Plantation of Virginia" was licensed in 1623, but is entirely lost. In Jonson's Staple (1625) ii. 1, Pennyboy Canter says, "The blessed Pokahontas, as the historian calls her, and great k.'s daughter of V., hath been in womb of tavern." In B. & F. Gentleman (1626) i. 1, Clerimont says of his wife: "Sir, I had rather send her to V. to help to propagate the English nation" than to Court. Drayton, in Ep. to Sandys (1627), says, "I put not thus to sea For 2 months' voyage to V." The author of Discourse on Leather (1627) says, "We can live without the smoke of V." Taylor, in Works (1630), says, "The barbarous Brasilians, Americans, and Vns. do adore the devil." In T. Heywood's Traveller (1633) ii. 2, Reginald says, "I'll make this supposed gaol to you as safe as you were i' the Low Countries, V., or i' the Indies." In Shirley's C. Maid (1637) ii. 1, Close says, "V. tobacco grows here," i.e. in Lond. In Cockayne's Obstinate (1638) i. 3, Lorice says, "I came at last to V., where I saw nothing more worthy mention than an honest woman who cast herself into the sea because nobody would lie with her."

VIROLAM. See VERULAM.

VISION, LAND OF. Mt. Moriah, the hill E. of Jerusalem on which tradition said that Abraham went to sacrifice Isaac, and where afterwards the Temple of Solomon, and later still the Mosque of Omar, were built. Mori-jah means Revelation of Jehovah; and in Gen. xxii. 2, the Vulgate translates it "Terra Visionis." In York M. P. x. 71, the Angel says to Abraham, "To the land of Vyssyon wend in fear And there of him make thou offering."

VITERBYE (i.e. VITERBO). A city of Italy, at the base of Monte Cimino, 40 m. N.W. of Rome. It was a favourite Papal residence in the Middle Ages, and the conclaves for the election of the Popes were often held there. It possesses a fine cathedral and episcopal palace of the 13th cent. In Bale's Laws iii., Ambition says, "The Pope for whoredom hath in Rome and V. Of gold and silver a wonderful substance yearly."

VOLGA. The longest river in Europe. It rises in Lake Seligher, abt. 200 m. S. of Petrograd, and flows through Russia, first in an E., then in a S. direction, until, after a course of 2225 m., it falls through a huge delta into the Caspian Sea at Astrakhan, by some 200 mouths. With its tributaries it forms a waterway of over 14,000 m.; and being connected by canals with the Neva, it forms a continuous line of traffic from the Caspian to the Baltic. For about a third of the year, however, it is blocked by ice, and so closed to navigation. Heylyn, Microcos., says, "Vulga, which with no less than 70 mouths dischargeth it self into the Mare Caspium." Greene, in Never too Late (Works viii. 45), speaks of "the V., a bright stream, but without fish." In his Friar ix., Bacon says, "Persia down her V. by canoes [shall] Send down the secrets of her spicery." In his Orpharion (Works xii. 34), he calls it "the swift-running V. that leadeth into Persia." The V. is not a Persian river; but much of her merchandise came into Russia by way of the V.; so that Mr. Lettsom, in a note on this passage, is hardly justified in saying: "This is much as if France were to send Claret and Burgundy down her Thames." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, Madrecarde says, "I, Leaving fair Voya, crossed up Danuby As high as Saba." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 2, Tamburlaine says, "My martial prizes, Won on the fifty-headed V.'s waves, Shall we all offer to Zenocrate." In Tamb. B. iv. 1, the Soldan of Egypt calls Tamburlaine "the rogue of V."—not quite accurately, for he came from Turkestan, on the shore of the Caspian opposite to the mouth of the V. In Dekker's London's Tempe, Oceanus says, "I could swift V. call, whose curled head lies On 7 rich pillows, but in merchandise The Russian him employs." In his Seven Sins, Dekker says, "V. that hath fifty streams falling one into another never ran with so swift and irresistible a current." In B. & F. Subject i. 3, Archas, the Russian General, says, "I yet remember when the V. curled, The aged V., when he heaved his head up And raised his waters high to see the ruins, The ruins our swords made." In iv. 5, he tells how, at the coming of the Tartar chief, Olim, "The V. trembled at his terror And hid his 7 curled heads." In their Shepherdess i. 3, Alexis speaks of the icy wind "That, as he passeth by, shuts up the stream Of Rhine or V." In Valentin. v. 2, Valentinian, after being poisoned, cries: "Danubius I'll have brought through my body . . . And V., on whose face the N. wind freezes." In their Lover's Prog. iv. 4, Lisander says, "Can all the winds of mischief from all quarters, Euphrates, Ganges, Tigris, V., Po, Make it swell higher?" The sturgeon is common in the V. Giles Fletcher, in Russe Commonwealth (1591), p. 41, mentions 4 varieties of the sturgeon, and says, "These 4 kinds of fish breed in the Wolgha and are caught in great plenty . . . Of the roes of these 4 kinds they make very great store of scary or caveary."

VOLQUESSIN. A dist. in Normandy, lying round Gisors, N.W. of Paris. Originally known as Pagus Velocassinus, the name was gradually shortened to V., Vulxin, and finally Vexin, by which it is now known. There are 2 Vexins: Le Vexin François round Pontoise, and Le Vexin Normand, which is the one intended in the passages quoted. In Trouble, Reign, Haz., p. 250, Philip demands of John "V., Torain, Main, &c." In K. J. ii. 1, 527, John says to Philip: "Then do I give V., Touraine, Maine, Poitiers, and Anjou."

VOLSCIANS. A tribe of Central Italy, in the S. of Latium, in the valley of the Liris. Their chief city was Antium. Vergil represents Camilla, the Princess of the V., as taking the side of Turnus in his war against Aeneas. For 200 years, from 500 to 300 B.C., the V. were constantly at war with the Romans, but were finally absorbed in her growing dominions. The date of the war in which legend made Coriolanus the principal figure was 490 B.C. Jonson introduces Camilla in his Queens: "Swift-foot Camilla, q. of Volscia" (see Vergil's description of her in Aen. vii. 803). The background of Cor. is the war between the V. and Romans, under the leadership of Tullus Aufidius and Coriolanus respectively. The story is purely legendary, but doubtless reflects the fact that the V. were too strong for the Romans in those early days, for which the Roman historians endeavoured to account by pretending that an exiled Roman was their leader. Shakespeare uses the forms Volce and Volcian, which the modern editors change to Volsce and Volscian.

VOYA, VULGA. See VOLGA.

VUTHEK (i.e. ST. BUDOCK). A vill. in S. Cornwall, abt. 1 m. S. of Falmouth. In Cornish M.P. i. 2463, K. Solomon says to the mason, "Ha rag bos agas wheyl tek My a re thyugh plu V."; i.e. "And because your work is fair, I will give you the parish of V."

VYSSYON, LAND OF. See VISION, LAND OF.

WADE'S MILL. A vill. in Herts. on the Ribb, 2 m. N. of Ware on the North Road. In Hester (Anon. Plays ii. 268), Pride says, "Now by W. M. every man's will is wondrously well." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Mayberry is informed by Bellamont: "he imagines that your wife is rode to Puckeridge; 5 m. further [i.e. from Ware]; either at Puckeridge or W. M., saith he, you shall find them"; later on in the scene Doll says, "I will be as true to thee as Ware and W. M. are one to another."

WAKEFIELD. A town in the West Riding, Yorks., on the Calder, 9 m. S. of Leeds and 175 N. of Lond. It was the most important town in the Riding during our period, and was twice the size of Leeds or Bradford. It was famous, according to Camden, "for its cloth trade, largeness, neat buildings, and great markets." The most notable buildings were the Parish Ch. with its fine spire, erected in the 14th cent.; the chantry of St. Mary on the bridge over the Calder, built about 1360, but restored and endowed by Edward IV in memory of his father, Richd. of York, who was killed in the battle of W. in 1460; and the Grammar School, founded in 1592. W. is famous in the history of the Drama as being the place where the Towneley M. P. were performed; the whole cycle of 32 has happily been preserved. It was also the home of George (or John) a Greene, the Pinner of W., whose fight with Robin Hood is commemorated in the old Ballad. He was the keeper of the Town Pound, and gives his name to the anonymous play George a Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield, in which the story of the fight is related.

In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report claims to have been at W. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii., the Butler informs Katharine that she must go "Toward W., where my master's living lies." In H6 C. ii. 1, 107, Warwick brings word of "the bloody fray at W. fought"; it is the subject of the last 2 scenes of Act I. In True Trag., prol., p. 52, Truth says, "At W. in a battle pitcht Outrageous Richd. breathed his latest breath"; i.e. Richd. of York. On p. 13, York says, "I'll to W. to my castle." The reference is to Sandal Castle, near W., q.v. In George a Greene i. 2, the Earl of Kendall, who is in rebellion against K. Edward, sends to W. for provisions; but George, "right pinner of W. town," tears up his commission and thus highly honours "W. town"; later on in the play his fight with Robin Hood takes place and Robin asks him: "Wilt thou forsake W. and go with me?" Drayton, Polyolb. xxviii., speaks of Robin Hood's "merry man, the Pindar of the town Of W., George a Greene, whose fames so far are blown For their so valiant fight." Braithwaite, in Strappado for Devil (1615), commemorates "merry W., and her Pindar too"; and his May-games "Yearly presented upon W. Green." In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Robin Hood says, "Wanton W.'s Pinner loved us well." In Swetnam iii. 1, Valentine says, "Robin Hood and the Pinder of W. had not a stiffer bout." There was a tavern in Gray's Inn Road, Lond., named "The Pinder of W." (q.v.).

WALACHIA. The southern of the 2 provinces of Roumania, lying on the N. bank of the Danube, between Hungary and Bulgaria. The name Vlachs, or Wallacks (i.e. foreigners, Welsh) was originally applied to all the Slavonic peoples of the Balkan dist. W., lying between the Turkish and the Hungarian kingdoms, was constantly involved in their wars; taking sometimes one, sometimes the other, side according to circumstances. It reached the highest point of its fame in the reign of Michael the Brave (1593-1601), who drove out the Turks and made himself Prince of Roumania and Transylvania. In Chaucer's Death of Duchess 1024, the poet praises the Duchess because she did not impose such tests upon her admirers as sending "men into Walakye, To Pruyse and into Tartarye" to win fame in the wars there against the heathen and other enemies of the Faith. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have served "in Hungary against the Turk at the siege of Belgrade" in company with "many Hungarians, Moldavians, Vallachians, and Transylvanians."

WALBROOK. A street in Lond., running from the Poultry into Cannon St. It was named from the W., a stream that ran down from Finsbury into the Thames. Originally a fresh stream, it became in course of time nothing but an open sewer, and before the end of Elizabeth's reign had been entirely vaulted over. The st. was chiefly occupied by furriers. Immediately behind the Mansion House is the Ch. of St. Stephen's W., rebuilt by Wren after the Gt. Fire, and one of the best of his churches. Stow, in Survey of London, says, "Walbrooke . . . is now in most places built upon, that no man may by the eye discern it, and, therefore, the trace thereof is hardly known to the common people."

WALES (Wh.=Welsh, Wen.=Welshmen, Wan.=Welshman). The country to the west of England, between the estuaries of the Severn and the Dee. The inhabitants are the descendants of the Britons who were driven West by the Angles and Saxons, at the time of the English conquest of Britain. They maintained constant conflicts against the English, and succeeded in keeping their independence under their native princes until conquered and united with England by Edward I in 1277. His son, Edward II, was born at Carnarvon, and made Prince of W.; and the title has since been conferred on the eldest son of the English kings. The country is very mountainous, the highest peak being Snowdon. The language is a branch of the Celtic group, but English is largely, in the Eastern parts often solely, spoken.

General References. In H4 A. i. 1, 37, Westminster announces: "There came a post from W. Laden with heavy news." In iii. 1, 45, Glendower asks, "Where is he living, clipped in with the sea That chides the banks of England, Scotland, W., Which calls me pupil?" In iii. 1, 76, "All westward, W. beyond the Severn shore" is assigned to Glendower. In iv. 3, 95, Hotspur blames the K. for allowing Mortimer "to be engaged in W." In v. 5, 39, the K. declares that he will march "towards W." To fight with Glendower and the Earl of March. In H4 B. i. 2, 119, Falstaff says, "I hear his Majesty is returned with some discomfort from W." In ii. 1, 189, he asks, "Comes the K. back from W.?" In ii. 4, 318, the Hostess asks Prince Henry, "O Jesu, are you come from W.?" In R3 iv. 5, 7, Urswick brings word that Richmond is "At Pembroke or at Ha'rford-west in W." In Cym. iii. 2, 62, Imogen says, "Tell me how W. was made so happy as To inherit such a haven" as Milford. In Ford's Warbeck ii. 3, K. James speaks of Henry VII as "this Wh. Harry"; Henry was born at Pembroke Castle.

The Mountainous character of the country. In B. & F. Wild Goose v. 6, Belleur says, "I'll travel into W., amongst the mtns., In hope they cannot find me." In Jonson's Wales, the Wh. mountains are styled "the British Aulpes," and the names of the chief of them are enumerated. In Pilg. Pernass. i. 1, Logic-land is described as "much like W., full of craggy mountains and thorny vallies."

Historical references. In H4 B. i. 3, 79, the Wh. are said to be in league with the rebel lords. In R2 iii. 2, 73, Salisbury reports the departure of Richd.'s Wh. adherents to Bolingbroke; and in iii. 3, 2, Bolingbroke says, "We learn the Wen. are dispersed." In H6 C. ii. 1, 180, Warwick speaks of the help the Earl of March can secure "amongst the loving Wen.," to fight against the Lancastrians. In R3 iv. 3, 47, Catesby brings word "Buckingham, backed with the hardy Wen., Is in the field."

The title Prince of W. was first given to the native chiefs of W. before the English conquest. It was conferred upon the infant Edward II by his father, in pursuance of his promise to give the Wh. a native-born prince who could not speak a word of English. The young Prince was born in Carnarvon in 1284. Edward III never received the title, but he conferred it on the Black Prince, and since then it has always been the title of the heir apparent to the British throne. It is not, however, hereditary, but is conferred by patent and investiture. In Peele's Ed. I. Lluellen is called "Prince of W." in the earlier part of the play; but later the birth of Edward II is described, and the Bp. presents him to the K. as "your young son, Edward of Carnarvon, Prince of W." In Greene's Friar viii., Prince Edward, son of Henry III, soliloquizes: "Edward, art thou that famous Prince of W. Who at Damasco beat the Saracens?" This is an anticipation of later usage, as Edward I was never Prince of W. By the same anticipation, in Chapman's Alphonsus i. 2, 156, Bohemia calls prince Edward "Edward the Prince of W." His marriage to Hedewick, the Saxon princess, is pure fiction. In H5 ii. 4, 56, the French K. speaks of "That black name, Edward, black prince of W." In iv. 7, 97, Fluellen reminds the K. of "your great-uncle Edward, the Black Prince of W." In H6 B. ii. 2, 11, York says, "Edward the Third had 7 sons; the first, Edward the Black Prince, Prince of W." In R2 ii. 1, 172, York says to the K.: "I am the last of noble Edward's sons Of whom thy father, Prince of W., was first"; i.e. the Black Prince. In H4 A. i. 3, 230, Hotspur calls Henry "that same sword-and-buckler Prince of W." In ii. 4, 11, Henry says, "Though I be but Prince of W., yet am I the k. of courtesy." In iv. 1, 95, Hotspur calls him "The nimble-footed madcap Prince of W." In H4 B. ii. 1, 146, Gower calls him "Harry, Prince of W." In R3 i. 3, 199, Q. Margaret says to Q. Elizabeth: "Edward thy son, which now is Prince of W. For Edward my son, which was Prince of W., Die in his youth by like untimely violence!" In Ford's Warbeck iii. 3, Urley speaks of the "marriage 'twixt the Lady Katharine . . . and the Prince of W., your son." This was Arthur, eldest son of Henry VII. In S. Rowley's When you B. 1, the K., Henry VIII, says to Jane Seymour: "Be but a mother to a Prince of W. . . . And thou mak'st full my hopes." In Jonson's Wales, there are several references to Charles as "Prince of W."

The patron Saint of W. is St. David; not, of course, the K. of Israel, but the Bp. of Menevia who died about A.D. 600. St. David's Day is on 1st March, when all good Wen. wear the leek, in memory of the W. victory over the Saxons in 640, when they wore a leek in their caps (see H5 v. 1, passim). In Jonson's Wales, Evan sings, "Sing the deeds of old Sir Davy, The 'ursip of which would fill a navy." In Kirke's Champions i. 1, David appears and says, "David will the Britain's name defend"; and again "David of W. from Brute descended is." In Club Law iv. 4, Davie says, "Saint Tavy is a Wh. man born." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, the Capt. swears "by all the leeks that are worn on St. Davy's day." In Sampson's Vow i. 4, 6, Ursula says of old German: "His head's like a Welchman's crest on St. Davie's day"; i.e. as white as a leek. In B. & F. Thierry v. 1, the 4th soldier, pretending to be a Wan., says, "St. Tavy be her patron . . . may she never want the green of the leek!" In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 2, Randall, the Wan., apparently mistakes the national saint for K. David, the sweet Psalmist of Israel; for he says the hills near Kingston "are no more near mtns. in W. than Clim o' the Clough's bow to hur cozen David's harp."

Welsh men and women in the plays. In M. W. W. ii. 1, 209, Sir Hugh Evans is called "Sir Hugh the Wh. priest." In iii. 1, 100, the Host addresses him and Caius as "Gallia and Gaul, French and Wh." In v. 3, 13, Mrs. Ford calls him "the Wh. devil, Hugh." In H4 A. iii. 1, Mortimer's wife is represented as a Welshwoman, unable to speak English. She was the daughter of Glendower, who was the great-grandson of Llewellyn, the last of the native princes of W. Glendower, in H4 A., is "that Wan." In R2 ii. 4, 5, the Capt. is addressed as "Thou trusty Wan." In H5 Fluellen is a Wan.: "There is much care and valour in this Wan." says Henry in iv. 1, 36. In iv. 1, 51, K. Henry says, "I am a Wan." He was born at Monmouth; and in iv. 7, 112, Fluellen rejoices that "all the water in the Wye cannot wash your Majesty's Wh. blood out of your body." In R3 iv. 2, 477, Richd. calls Richmond "the Wan."—referring to his descent from Owen Tudor and his birth at Pembroke. Randall, in W. Rowley's Match Mid., is a Wan.; his full name being "Randal William ap Thomas ap Tavy ap Robert ap Rice ap Sheffery Crack." A Welshwoman of loose character is introduced in Middleton's Chaste Maid and is married to Tim. Other Welshmen are found in B. & F. Nightwalker, Jonson's Wales, Shirley's Love Tricks, Dekker's Northward, Armin's Moreclacke, Chettle's Grissil and Club Law.

Welsh National Characteristics. Heylyn (s.v. W.) says, "The men are of a faithful carriage, one especially towards another in a strange country; and to strangers in their own. They are questionless of a temper much inclining to choler; quickly moved and soon appeased; of all angers the best and noblest." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge ii., describes the Wh. as lovers of thieving; they are "gentlemen and come of Brute's blood"; they go bare-legged and wear grey coats; they "love cawse boby, good roasted cheese" and drink metheglin; they play the harp, which is made of mares' skin and horse-hair, and they sing like humble-bees; they have store of prophecies in rhyme. They are poor and badly lodged; and they constantly swear by the Devil. Several specimens of their language are given. In Barry's Ram iv. 1, Sir Oliver says, "English love Scots, Wen. love each other." Drayton, in Polyolb. vi. 243, says of the Wen.: "In all the world no nation is so dear As they unto their own; that here within this isle . . . The noble Briton still his countryman relieves." The Wh. prided themselves on being the descendants of the ancient Britons, and Briton is often used in the sense of a Wan. In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says,

"Welchmen love to be called Britons." In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, when Compass bids the boy not to put metheglin into his alicant, he replies, "Not a drop, as I am true Briton." The Wh. all claimed to be gentlemen by descent and took great interest in heraldry. In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, the Host calls the Nurse who is vouching for Frank Sylly's good family "an old Wh. herald's widow; she's perfect in most pedigrees, most descents." In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bilioso says, "Your Lordship Shall ever find amongst an hundred Welchmen Fourscore and nineteen gentlemen." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, the Clown says, "All the devils' names he calls upon are but fustian names, gathered out of Wh. heraldry." In Davenant's Cr. Brother iii. 5, Castruchio says, "A synagogue of Wh. Rabbies could not express more skill in genealogies." In Tomkis' Albumazar ii. 4, Trincalo proposes to "buy a bouncing pedigree of a Welch herald." Earle, in Microcos xlvii., says of the Herald: "He is an art in England but in W. nature, where they are born with heraldry in their mouths, and each name is a pedigree." In Noble Soldier iii. 3, Baltasar says, "I can be a chimney-sweeper with the Irish, a gentleman with the Wh." In Val. Welsh iii. 1, Morgion asks, "When did you hear a gentleman of W. tell lies?" In Armin's Moreclacke F. 1, Tutch, disguised as a Wh. knight, says, "Was a knight, marg you, of Englist in W., Walse blood, and 'tis no mock in en to marry in Welse blood, is it?" In Dekker's Match me iii., Gazetto says, "If I should brag gentility, I'd gabble Welch." In his Raven's, he says, "He was no Wan. to faint at sight of his own blood"; i.e. because it was gentle, or royal, blood. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iii. 1, Randall says, "Was all shentlemen in W." In his Shoemaker iii. 2, 194, when Hugh says, "I am a Welchman, sir," Barnaby replies "Nay then, thou canst not choose but be a gentleman."

The Wh. were reputed to be thieves—as in the rhyme "Taffy was a Wan., Taffy was a thief." In Marston's Malcontent i. 7, Passarello says, "The Wen. stole rushes, when there was nothing else to filch; only to keep begging in fashion." In Middleton's Gypsy ii. 1, Alvarez says that his gipsies do not "lie in ambuscado for a rope of onions as if they were Wh. freebooters." In B. & F. Thierry v. 1, the 4th soldier says, "Did you doubt but we could steal as well as yourself?—did I not speak Wh.?"

The Wh. were supposed to be especially fond of cheese; cf. the phrase "a Wh. rabbit," which means toasted cheese on bread. In M. W. W. ii. 2, 317, Ford says, "I will rather trust Parson Hugh the Wan. with my cheese than my wife with herself." In Day's Humour iii. 1, Florimel says she loves Aspero "as a Wan. doth toasted cheese; I cannot dine without him." In Middleton's Changeling i. 2, Lollo says, "There's no hope of recovery of that Wh. madman; was undone by a mouse that spoiled him a parmasant; lost his wits for it." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Jenkins says, "There is toasted seese and buttermilk in N. W., Diggon, besides harps and Wh. frieze and goats and cow-heels and metheglin." In iii. 1, Doll says, "If you should but get 3 or 4 Cheshire cheeses and set them a running down Highgate Hill," the Wh. Captain would make haste after them. In Chaunticleers iv., Heath says, "The moon would willingly be that the Wen. wish it, so thou wouldst give it room among thy cheeses." In Jonson's Gipsies, Jacman introduces a boy who was born in Flintshire and "rocked in a cradle of Wh. cheese like a maggot." In his Barthol. iv. 4, Waspe calls

Bristle "a Wh. cuckold," and adds "You stink of leek, metheglin, and cheese, you rogue!" In Webster's Law Case v. 4, Julio tells of a Wan. whose fencing-master could only make him fight by putting a button of cheese on the end of his own foil; "that made him come on the liveliest!" In B. & F. Pilgrim iv. 3, the Wh. madman cries, "Give me some ceese and onions"; and the Master says of him: "He run mad because a rat eat up his cheese."

The national drink of W. was metheglin, a sort of mead flavoured with herbs. In Massinger's Great Duke ii. 2, Petruchio speaks contemptuously of "Wh. metheglin, a drench to kill a horse." In Jonson's Wales, Evan sings of "our Welse drink . . . a cup of Bragat . . . as well as Metheglin." Bragat is a sort of spiced ale mixed with honey. In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Water-Camlet says, "I was got foxed with foolish metheglin in the company of certain Wh. chapmen." In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Compass bids the boy who is bringing wine, "Do not make it speak Wh., boy"; and explains: "Put no metheglin in it, ye rogue!" In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii., Randall calls for "some metheglin, the wine of W." In M. W. W. v. 5, 167, Evans charges Falstaff with being given to "sack and wine and metheglins."

In Dekker's Satiro iv. 3, 184, Sir Vaughan says that Tucca's sword is "as blunt as a Wh. bag-pudding." In H4 i. 1, 45, Westmoreland tells of the beastly shameless transformation done on the corpses of their enemies "by those Welshwomen." In Dekker's Honest Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico says, "There's a saying when they commend nations; it goes, the Irishman for his hand, the Wan. for a leg, the Englishman for a face, the Dutchman for a beard."

Welsh dress. Wh. hose were baggy breeches which would fit any leg. Skelton, in Colin Clout 773, says, that the Friars "Make a Wan's hose Of the text and of the glose." Sackville, in Mirror for Magistrates, Fall of Tressillian 88, says, "The laws we turned by construction to a Wan's hose." The Monmouth cap was a brimless cap, like a Scotch bonnet. In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The Wh. his Monmouth loves to wear And of the same will brag too."

The national instrument was the Harp. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv. 1, Sim reads from Randall the Wan.'s letter: "She shall go to church a Sunday with a whole dozen of Wh. harps before her." In Jonson's Wales, Evan says, "You s'all hear the true Britan strains now, the ancient Welse harp." In Shirley's Love Tricks ii. 2, Jenkins says, "Was make joys and gratulations for her good fortune upon her Wh. harps." In Dekker's If it be, Brisco speaks of "whole swarms of Wh. harps, Irish bagpipes." In Kirke's Champions iv. 1, Denis reads a prophecy: "The Fleur de Lys and Harp must join Before the riddle you untwine"; i.e. the champions of France and W. must unite.

There is a Wh. dance in Jonson's Wales. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iii., Alexander says to Moll: "Go thy ways and lead a Wh. morris with the apes in hell amongst the little devils," i.e. be an old maid. Wh. Carriers came regularly to Lond., where they had their head-quarters at Bosom's Inn, in Laurence Lane. In Middleton's Family iv. 2, Dryfat asks, "Art thou a Wh. carrier, thou'rt so saucy?"

There was a tradition in W. that Merlin was conceived by miracle without any father; and certain Wen. claimed the gift of prophecy on the same ground. In H4 B. iv. 4, 122, Gloucester refers to these "unfathered heirs." In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Lazaro says, "These courtiers' horses are a kind of Wh. prophets: nothing can be hid from 'em."

The Wh. benefices were poor, and the clergy mostly ignorant. In Barry's Ram iii. 2, Smallshanks says, "He swears that few be free from Simony, but only Wen. and those he says too are but mtn. priests."

The Wh. language is a branch of the Celtic family of the Indo-Germanic group. It was unintelligible to English people, and sounded harsh to their ears. Heylyn (s.v. WALES) says, "The Wh. language hath the least com-mixture with foreign words of any used in Europe, and by reason of its many consonants is less pleasing." In H4 A. iii. 1, Lady Mortimer speaks Wh. and sings a Wh. song; but the words are not given. In line 232, when Glendower invokes the spirits of music from the air, Hotspur exclaims: "Now I perceive the devil understands Wh." In Jonson's Wales, several sentences in Wh. are put into the mouths of the actors. In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 1, the Welshwoman uses an alleged Wh. sentence: "Avederra whee comrage, der due cog foginis." In B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, Thomas says, "Let thy fiddle speak Wh. or any thing that's out of tune." In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, after Vittoria has protested against the use of Latin in her trial, the lawyer says, "Exorbitant sins must have exulceration"; and Vittoria mockingly comments, "Why, this is Wh. to Latin," i.e. more unintelligible still. In Heywood's King's and Queen's Entertainment, one of the stage directions says, "Welch, which they say is the old British language." In Dekker's Lanthorn, he says that, before the confusion of languages, there was "no voluble, significant Wh." In Wilson's Inconstant ii. 1, Pantarbo, who is pretending to be mad, says, "I would I could speak Welch, that's a mad language." In Marston's What you will iii. 1, Holofernes says, "I think your Majesty's a Welchman; you have a horrible long name." The length of Wh. names is still a matter for jokes.

The Wh. pronunciation of English is often introduced for the fun of it. It is chiefly characterised by the sharpening of all the flat mutes and the sibilants, and the addition of "s" to many words; "she" and "hur" are used for the 1st personal pronoun. Examples may be found in the speeches of Evans in M. W. W. and Fluellen in H5, as well as in the plays mentioned above in which Wh. folk are introduced; e.g. Evans says, "It is petter that friends is the sword and end it. There is also another device in my prain which peradventure prings goot discretions with it."

The mtns. of W. afford pasturage to numerous goats. In M. W. W. v. 5, 145, Falstaff, referring to Evans, says, "Am I ridden with a Wh. goat too?" In Jonson's Wales, there is a dance by men dressed as goats, and Jenkin says, "The Welse goat is an excellent dancer by birth." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Capt. Jenkins says, "This 'oman hunts at his tail, like your little goats in W. follow their mother." In H5 v. 1, 30, Pistol swears that he will not eat the leek offered him by Fluellen, "Not for Cadwallader and all his goats!"

Wh. mutton was, and is, particularly good. In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 1, Tim says, "There's nothing tastes so sweet as your Wh. mutton." In Jonson's Wales, Rheese sings, "Once but taste of the Welse mutton, Your English seep's not worth a button."

Wh. flannels and friezes were famous. In M. W. W. v. 5, 145, Falstaff, referring to Evans, says, "Shall I have a coxcomb of Frieze?" and in 172, he admits "I am not able to answer the Wh. flannel." In B. & F.

Nightwalker iii. 6, Maria, pretending to be a Welshwoman, says, "Her was milk the cows, make seese and butters, and spin very well the Wh. freeze." In Jonson's Wales, Howell sings the praise of Wh. Frieze. In Sweetnam iii. 1, Curfew says, "Th'are but wh. freizes, they would shrink at the sense of iron." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 5, the fantastical gull's apparel includes "a Wh. frieze jerkin." In Cuckqueans v. 9, Pigot deprecates the demand for poetical language in a comedy as equivalent to desiring to "add gold lace to a Welchman's frieze." In Peele's Ed. I x., the Wh. barons present the new-born Prince of W. with "a mantle of Frieze," to the great indignation of the proud Spanish Q. Elinor.

Various things called Welsh. WELSH BRIEF: In Jonson's Staple v. 1, Picklock says of the deed: "It is a thing of greater consequence than to be borne about in a black box like a Low-Country vorloffo or Wh. brief." WELSH HOOK: A kind of bill-hook with a cross-piece below the blade. In H4 A. ii. 4, 372, Falstaff describes Glendower as "he of W. that swore the devil his true liegeman upon the cross of a Wh. hook." In Jonson's Wales, Rheese sings of "As tall men as ever swagger With Welse hook or long dagger." In Shirley's Love Tricks v. 3, Jenkin says he could "fight with any podies in the world, awl weapons, from the long pikes to the Wh. hooks." In Oldcastle i. 1, it is proclaimed at Hereford "that no man presume to wear any weapon; especially Welch hooks and forest bills." In Peele's Ed. I ii., Lluellen orders his men "Scour the marches with your Wh.'s hooks." WELSH AMBASSADOR (=the cuckoo): In Middleton's Trick to Catch iv. 5, Dampit says, "The sound is like the cuckoo, the Wh. ambassador." In Chapman's Consp. Byron iii. 1, Savoy speaks contemptuously of a Wh. colonel, "Which the Wh. herald of their praise, the cuckoo, Would scarce have put in his monology In jest." In Middleton's Five Gallants v. 1, Frippery calls the cuckoo "a Wh. lieger." WELSH CRICKET (=a louse): In Greene's Quip, p. 227, Cloth-breeches says that the original cognizance of Velvet-breeches, when he was a tailor, was "a plain Spanish needle with a Wh. cricket on the top." WELSH FALCONER (apparently a name for the owl): In B. & F. Lover's Prog. iii. 2, Lancelot says, "I hear by the owls; there are many of your Wh. falconers about it" i.e. the house. WELSH PARSLEY: A slang term for hemp, of which the hangman's ropes were made. In B. & F. Elder B. i. 2, Andrew predicts that Eustace shall reveal it "in tough Wh. parsley, which in our vulgar tongue is strong hempen halters." WELSH WALLET: Dekker in Hornbook i., describes the Danish sleeve as "sagging down like a Wh. wallet."

WALFLEET (more fully, W. ISLAND). A peninsula between Paglesham and the river Crouch, near Rochford in Essex. It was famous, like Colchester, for its oysters. In W. Rowley's New Wonder iii., Stephen cries "Oysters, new W. oysters!" Drayton, in Polyolb. xix. 126, speaks of "Pure W., which do still the daintiest palates please"; and in a note explains that he means "W. oysters."

WALKER (i.e. WALCHEREN). An island in Zealand the chief towns of which are Flushing and Middleburg. Gascoigne, in Dulce Bellum 133, says of the Gueux: "All Walker's theirs." He is referring to the campaign against Alva in 1574-5.

WALKINGTON. A small parish in Yorksh. In 1576 a certain Robert Greene was presented to the rectory of Walkington; he may have been the dramatist of that name, though it is far from certain.

WALL

WALL. See LONDON WALL.

WALLES. See WALES.

WALLINGFORD. A mkt. town in Berksh., 15 m. N.-West of Reading. It possesses a strong castle, built by Robert D'Oyley in 1067. It was near W. that the peace of 1153 was concluded between Stephen and Henry, son of the Countess Maud, afterwards Henry II. Hardly anything remains of the castle. W. is in the list of places visited by Merry Report in J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100.

WALLOONS. The inhabitants of S.E. Belgium, in the basin of the Meuse. They are the descendants of the ancient Belgae, and speak a Romance dialect closely akin to the Languedoc of N. France. They constitute about half the population of Belgium, the other half being Flemings. In H6 A. i. 1, 137, the Messenger describes the wounding of Talbot thus: "A base Walloon, to win the Dauphin's grace, Thrust Talbot with a spear into the back." In ii. 1, 10, Talbot says, "Redoubted Burgundy, by whose approach The regions of Artois, Walloon, and Picardy Are friends to us." In Day's B. Beggar i., Momford speaks of Hance Beamtart: "the Walloon captain, that betrayed The fort of Guynes." In Noble Soldier iii. 3, Baltasar says, "I can be treacherous with the Wallowne, a chimney sweeper with the Irish, a gentleman with the Welsh." In Larum F. i., Stumpe says, "If any man hate a man, call him but Wallon, the Spaniards cut his throat." In Middleton's Mad World ii. 1, Sir Bounteous says his organ music cannot but be good, for "a Walloon plays upon them." The Belgian school of organ-music led the world in the 16th cent.

WALL'S, MOTHER. A famous pie-shop in Abchurch St., London (q.v.).

WALSINGHAM. The name of 2 adjoining villages in Norfolk on the Stiffkey, 28 m. N.West of Norwich; they are distinguished as Old (or Great) and New (or Little) W. At Old W. was the famous shrine of the Virgin Mary, which was more frequented by pilgrims than any other in England, or perhaps in Europe. The original chapel was erected in 1061 by the widow of Ricoldie de Faverches, and was an exact copy of the Santa Casa of Nazareth, which was said to have been transported to Loretto. A Priory of Augustinians was shortly afterwards founded by Geoffroi de Faverches. Some ruins still remain of the Abbey Ch.; and the two Wishing Wells are where they were in the old times. The shrine was greatly enriched by the Plantagenet Kings; and Henry VIII walked barefoot thither from Barsham and presented a costly necklace to the image of the Virgin; but this did not prevent him from dissolving the monastery, appropriating the treasures of the Chapel, and burning the image of the Virgin in 1538. A full account of the shrine and its wonders may be found in Erasmus, Peregrinatio Religionis Ergo. A popular ballad beginning "As ye came from the Holy Land Of blessed W." is contained in Percy's Reliques ii. 1. The tune to which it was set was sung and whistled everywhere. Brooches and leaden rings were brought away by the pilgrims and were held to be efficacious against diseases of various kinds. Our Lady of W. was frequently the subject of adjuration; hence the phrase "to swear W." came to mean to swear violently and earnestly. The Milky Way was popularly called W. Way, and was supposed to point towards the shrine, though more probably it was named from the crowd of stars resembling the throngs of pilgrims.

WALTHAM, or WALTHAM CROSS

In Piers C. i. 32, we read: "Eremytes on an hep with hokede staves Wenten to Walsyngham and hure wenchas after." In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, W. is one of the places visited by Merry Report. In his Four PP i. 1, the Palmer says he has made a pilgrimage "to W." In T. Heywood's Dialogues i. 394, Adolphos says, "If I can but get to land safe, pilgrimage I'll frame Unto the blessed Maid of W." In Richards' Misogonus iii. 1, Alison prays "Our sweet Lady of W. be with her sweetly sweet soul." In Fulwell's Like, Haz. iii. 311, Newfangle says, "If our Lady of W. had no fairer nose and visage, They were fools that would go to her on pilgrimage." In Day's B. Beggar i., Canby says to the Bp. of Winchester: "And ye were able to give him as much land as would lie between Winchester and W., he would be your prigger." Drayton, in Odes (1619), says of his lady's house: "Had she been born the former age, That house had been a pilgrimage; And reputed more divine Than W., or Beckett's shrine."

In Webster's Weakest i. 2, Bunch sings a Ballad beginning "K. Richd.'s gone to W., To the Holy Land." In B. & F. Pestle ii. 8, Merrythought sings the same Ballad. In a satire quoted in Secret Hist. of James I i. 236, the Earl of Salisbury is represented as sweetly singing "W. to his Amaryliss." In Mankind 20, Nought says, "I can pipe on a W. whistle." In B. & F. Hon. Man. v. 3, the servant says, "I'll renounce my five mark a year to teach young birds to whistle W." Scene I of Mr. Attowel's Jigge is sung "to the tune of W." The tune is given in Grove's Dict. of Music (s.v. W.); and the 1st number in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book is a set of 29 variations on it by Dr. John Bull. In J. Heywood's Witless, John says, "By joy of a jewel scarce worth a mite The sot oft sleepeth no wink in a whole night; And for ensample, with a W. ring." And James says, a little later, "For cause considered and weighed as light as your W. ring aforesaid." In Abington iv. 3, Nicholas says, "I warrant, when he was in [the dirt] he swore W. and chafed terrible for the time." In Jonson's Tub iii. 1, Turfe says, "Now, by our Lady of W., I had rather be marked out for scavenger than have this office."

WALTHAM, or WALTHAM CROSS. A vill. in Herts., 12 m. N. of Lond., where Edward I erected one of the Elinor Crosses, which still happily remains. Just across the border of the county is W. Abbey or W. Holy C.—so called from the black flint cross discovered miraculously on the top of the hill near by in the reign of Canute and deposited in the Abbey, where it attracted hosts of pilgrims. Harold was buried in the Abbey Ch., where his tomb remained until it was destroyed in 1540. The nave of the Abbey has survived and is used as the parish ch. Around W. stretched W. Forest, of which Epping Forest is a relic.

The Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP i. 1 had made a pilgrimage to "Waltam." In Ret. Pernass. iii. 1, Sir Raderick asks Immerito: "How many miles from W. to Lond.?" and is answered, "twelve, Sir." In Merry Devil i. 2, Clare says, "There are crosses, wife; here's one in W., another at the Abbey, and a 3rd at Cheston." In the next scene Fabel threatens that by bringing about a huge flood he "Will drive the deer from W. in their walks." Banks of W. is one of the characters in the play, and there are many references to the Abbey and the Forest. In Dekker's Edmonton i. 1, Frank says to Winifred: "Thou shalt live near W. Abbey with thy uncle." Curiously, there is a Banks in this play too; which seems to indicate that he was a study from the life. In B. & F. Pestle i. 2, Luce says, "Our course must lie through W. Forest where I have a friend will entertain us." The scene of ii. 2, 3, 4, and 5 is laid in W. Forest; ii. 6 is before the Bell Inn, W.; Tim says, "Why, we are at W.-Town's end and that's the Bell Inn." Act 3 takes place partly in the Forest and partly in the town of W. In Jonson's Magnetic v. 6, Sir Moth tells of a man who would walk in his sleep "to St. John's Wood and W. Forest, escape by all the ponds and pits in the way." In Brome's Crew ii., there is a ballad beginning "There was an old fellow at W.-Cross Who merrily sung when he lived by the loss." Evidently he was the original of Merrythought in B. & F. Pestle. The refrain of this song—"With a hem, boys, hem, and a cup of old sack"—is probably referred to by Shallow in H4 B. iii. 2, 231: "Our watchword was 'Hem, boys.'" In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Sad says, "I confess I cannot ride like St. George at W." There was no doubt a George Inn at W.; indeed the vill. was mostly made up of Inns for the accommodation of the pilgrims to the Abbey. See also WANSTEAD.

WALTHAMSTOWE. A vill. in Essex on the Lea near the border of Epping Forest, 6 m. N.E. of Lond., of which it is now practically a suburb. It is one of the places visited by Merry Report in J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100.

WALTON. A vill. in Norfolk, 30 m. West of Norwich, and 2 m. S. of Gayton. In Mankind 23, Now-a-days says, "I shall go to William Baker of W., to Richard Bollman of Gayton."

WANDSWORTH. A vill. in Surrey on the Wandale at its junction with the Thames; now a suburb of Lond., abt. 5 m. in a direct line S.West of St. Paul's. There was a fair there in Whitsun week. In a note to Bacchus, it is said: "Whoever observes the rioting of the Lond. youth at Whitsontide at Greenwich, Wandsworth, etc., will be soon convinced that Bacchus still keeps his Pentecost at Lond."

WANSTEAD. A vill. in Essex, near the Roding, 3 m. N.E. of Lond. Here the Earl of Leicester had a country-house; and on a visit to him there Sidney's Lady of the May was presented before the Q. as she was walking in Wansted Garden in Waltham Forest in 1578.

WANTIGE (i.e. WANTAGE). A town in Berks., 60 m. West of Lond. It has considerable manufactures of woollen cloth and sacking, and gave its name to a kind of woollen cap. In W. Rowley's Search 31, the felt-makers complain that their trade is being ruined by the popularity of caps—"That was, Monmouth caps, Wantige caps, round caps, etc."

WAPPING. A dist. in Lond., lying on the N. bank of the Thames, S. of Lond. Docks, and extending from St. Katherine's to New Crane. The first erection at W. was a gallows at Execution Dock (q.v.), where pirates and others were hung up at low water and left for the rising tide to drown. Stow tells us that within 40 years from his own time there was no other building there; but the gallows having been further removed, "a continual street or filthy strait passage, with alleys of small tenements or cottages [has been] built, inhabited by sailors' victuallers, along by the river of Thames almost to Radcliff, a good mile from the Tower." This is now the W. High St.; but the cottages have been mostly replaced by warehouses. In the early part of the 17th cent. an alum factory and a number of brewhouses were erected; but in 1628 the inhabitants petitioned against them as nuisances and they were removed. W. Old Stairs, immortalised by Dibdin, are just to the E. of the W. entrance to Lond. Docks. In Jonson's Augurs, Urson sings, "The wives of W., They trudge to our tapping, And there our ale desire." In Nash's Wilton B. 4, we find the phrase "God send him good shipping to W.!" i.e. good luck to him! In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Hornet says, "Come, Master Belch, I will bring you to the water-side, perhaps to W.," where Belch's ship was lying. In Launching, it is said of the new East India Company: "Lyme House speaks their liberality; Ratcliff cannot complain nor W. weep nor Shadwell cry out against their niggardliness." In Davenant's Rhodes B., the Prologue says, "Skippers with wet beards at W. woo." In his Rutland, p. 217, the Parisian says sarcastically, "I will forbear to visit your courtly neighbours at W." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 5, Jolly says of Crop the Brownist: "He's married again to a rich widow at W." In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Jolly chaffs Cutter and Worm on their constant change of abode: "To-day at W., and to-morrow you appear again at Mill-bank, like a duck that dives at this end of the pool and rises unexpectedly at the other."

Allusions to the execution of pirates at W. are common. Taylor, in Works ii. 21, calls it "W. whereas hanged drowned pirates die." Stow says that the wretches were hung in chains at low water mark and left "till three tides had overflowed them." In Temp. i. 1, 62, Antonio curses the Boatswain: "This wide-chopped rascal, would thou might'st lie drowning The washing of 10 tides!" Dekker, in News from Hell, says of a rich miser: "He built a pharos, or rather a block-house, beyond the gallows at W., to which the coal-carriers from Newcastle were brought a-bed, and discharged their bellies." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 13, refers to a criminal "new cut down, like one at W., with his cruel garters about his neck." (Note the pun on cruel and crewel.) In Eastward iv. 1, Slitgut says, "I hold my life there's some other a-taking up at W. now. Look what a sort of people cluster about the gallows there." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 2, Bubble, when Staines threatens to turn pirate, says, "O Master, have the grace of W. before your eyes, remember a high tide; give not your friends cause to wet their handkerchiefs." In T. Heywood's Fortune v. 1, the Purser says, "W. is our harbour, a quicksand that shall swallow many a brave marine soldier." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 2, the Clown says, "We shall never reach Lond., I fear; my mind runs so much of hanging, landing at W." In Eastward iv. 3, Quicksilver says, "Would it had been my fortune to have been trussed up at W., rather than ever to ha' come here." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, when Hans proposes to take the party to W., Hornet says, "He says, Doll, he would have thee to W. and hang thee." Taylor, in Description of Tyburn, says, "And there's a waterish tree at W., Whereas sea-thieves or pirates are caught napping."

WAPPINGTON. Probably an imaginary place, introduced for the sake of the rhyme. There may possibly be a reference to Wapping (q.v.). In Jonson's Gipsies, the Patrico describes a tribe of gipsies as "Born first at Niglington, Bred up at Filchington, Boarded at Tappington, Bedded at Wappington."

WARDEN. A vill. in Bedfordsh., S.E. of Bedford, where De Sartis Abbey was founded for the Cistercian monks by Walter Espec in 1135. It was famous for its pears and apples, which were specially suitable for stewing and for making pies. In W. T. v. 3, 49, the Clown says, "I must have saffron to colour the w. pies." Boorde, in his Dyetary, recommends "W. apples roasted, stewed, or baken."

WARDROBE. A building in the Blackfriars, Lond., near Puddle-dock, erected by Sir John Beauchamp in the 14th cent. It was bought by Edward III and used as a repository for the royal robes; and, what is much more important, for the offices concerned with the administration of the King's Household, and even with "the general administration of the Realm" (see Tout, Place of Edward II in English History, p. 64, and other references in Index under WARDROBE). It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and the offices of the Master of the Wardrobe were removed, first to the Savoy, and then to Buckingham St. Shakespeare, in his Will, says, "I give, will, bequeath, and devise unto my daughter Susannah Hall all that Messuage or tenement, wherein one John Robinson dwelleth, situat, lying, and being in the Blackfriars in Lond., near the Wardrobe."

WARE. A town in Herts. on the Lea, 20 m. N. of Lond., on the North Road. A jaunt out to W. was a favourite day's pleasure for the Londoners. Hence there were several Inns in the long main street of the town, amongst them the Saracen's Head, where the great bed of W., 10 ft. 9 square and 7 ft. 6 high, was to be seen. It was said to be able to accommodate a dozen sleepers. It is still preserved at the Rye-House.

Chaucer, C. T. A. 694, uses the phrase "fro Berwick unto W." to indicate the whole of England; and his Cook is called "Hogge of W." In Three Ladies ii. 1, Simplicity says to Fraud: "Thou didst go into Hertfordshire to a place called W., and thou didst grease the horses' teeth that they should not eat hay." Dekker's Northward opens in an Inn at W.; and in iii. 2, Featherstone says, "We'll lie at W. all night and the next morning to Lond." In Jonson's Barthol. iv. 3, Whit promises Mrs. Littlewit that she shall "ride to W. and Rumford in dy coach, shée de players, be in love vit 'em." In his Epicœne iii. 1, Mrs. Otter tells how her new dress was splashed all over by a brewer's horse "as I was taking coach to go to W. to meet a friend." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iii. 3, Sir Oliver says, "Saddle the white mare; I'll take a whore along and ride to W." In his R. G. ii. 1, Laxton asks Moll to go out of town with him; "I mean honestly to Brainford, Staines, or W." In iii. 1, the coachman says that his horses "are the same that have drawn all your famous whores to W." In Merry Devil i. 3, Fabel boasts "I'll make the brinish sea to rise at W. And drown the marshes unto Stratford-bridge." In Jonson's Devil v. 3, Shackles says that the stink of the explosion at Newgate could be smelled "as far as W., as the wind lies." In Webster's Weakest iii. 4, when Jacob says, "Niet for w.," i.e. "No, in truth," Bunch replies, "For W., drunkard? Thou saidst for Lond. even now." In Tw. N. iii. 2, 51, Sir Toby bids Sir Andrew "As many lies as will lie in thy sheet of paper, although the sheet were big enough for the bed of W. in England, set 'em down." In Jonson's Epicœne v. 1, La Foole says to Daw: "[We have been] in the great bed at W. together in our time." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Mayberry concludes the play: "Come, we'll dare Our wives to combat i' th' great bed in W."

WARICKSHERE. See WARWICKSHIRE.

WARKWORTH. A vill. in Northumberland, near the mouth of the Coquet, 28 m. N. of Newcastle. On a height close to the vill. is the ancient stronghold of W. Castle, with an octagonal keep and a lofty observation tower in the centre of it. It belonged to the Percy family. It is the scene of H4 B. i. 1; Rumour, in the Induction 35, describes it as "This worm-eaten hold of ragged stone." Act ii. sc. 3 is placed "at W.; Before the Castle."

WARWICK. The county town of Warwicksh., on the Avon, 108 m. N.West of Lond. and 8 m. N.E. of Stratford-on-Avon. The magnificent castle dates from the 14th cent., and is still the residence of the Earl of W. The collegiate Ch. of St. Mary contains the unique Beauchamp Chapel, completed in 1464. The tomb of its founder, Richd. Beauchamp, Earl of W., occupies the central position therein. The fine half-timbered Almshouses, called the Leicester Hospital, were founded by Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, in 1571. The town dates back to Roman times. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report claims to have been at W. In Pappe, Lyly charges Martin Marprelate with ribaldry, and refers for proof to "my old hostess of the Swan in W." In Jonson's Owls, performed at Kenilworth, Capt. Cox says of his hobby-horse: "He is the Pegasus that uses To wait on W. muses"; referring to the part played by Cox in the festivities at Kenilworth, 4 m. from W., in 1575. In H6 C. v. 1, 13, Somerset says to W., who is on the walls of Coventry: "The drum your Honour hears marcheth from W." The road from W. enters Coventry at the S.West of the town.

The 1st Earl of W. known in record is the legendary Guy of W. He performed mighty deeds against the Saracens, and in England he slew the Danish giant Colbrand, the dun cow of Dunsmore, and a dragon in Northumberland. He then became a hermit and lived in the cave still shown at Guy's Cliffe, near W. His helmet, pot, and fork are to be seen in the Castle. In Glaphorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood speaks of "Sir Guy of W.'s history." Taylor, in Works i. 240, says, "I stole back again to Islington to the sign of the Maiden-head; after supper we had a play of Guy of W. played by the Earl of Darbie his men." This play was by Day and Dekker; it is probably the one referred to by Nabbes in C. Garden i. 1, where Dobson tells of the players who "had the great pot-lid for Guy of W.'s buckler." Another play by B. J. was produced in 1639 under the title of The Tragical History of Guy Earl of W. The 1st historical Earl of W. was Henry de Newburgh, who was created Earl by William Rufus. The Earldom passed in 1268 to the Beauchamp family. Guy, Earl of W., appears in Marlowe's Ed. II as one of the bitter enemies of Gaveston. He was Earl from 1298 to 1315. Gaveston nicknamed him "The Black Hound of Arden," and he was the chief actor in the arrest and execution of the favourite on Blacklow Hill, near W. The W. of Ed. III, the father of the Countess of Salisbury, was Thomas de Beauchamp, son of the foregoing, one of the founders of the Order of the Garter; he died of the pestilence in 1369. The W. of H4 and H5 was Richd. de Beauchamp, Earl from 1401 to 1439. He is wrongly addressed as Nevill in H4 B. iii. 1, 66. He fought at Shrewsbury and at Agincourt. He is the W. of H6 A. i. 1 mentioned as present at the funeral of Henry V. As Part I of H6 ends in 1444, this Richd. should be the W. of the scenes in the Temple Garden and at the coronation of the young K. in Paris ; but it is probable that Shakespeare confused him with his more famous son-in-law, Richd. Nevil, who became Earl through his marriage with Richd.'s daughter in 1449. He at all events is the W. of H6 B. and C. who was killed at Barnet in 1471 and is known as the King-maker. He first threw in his lot with the House of York, but in 1457 took the oath of allegiance to Henry VI. But in 1459 he took up arms for the D. of York, captured the K. in 1460, and, after being defeated by the Q. at St. Alban's, won the decisive battle of Towton in 1461, which secured the crown for Edward IV. In 1468 he again changed sides and took Edward prisoner at Edgecote in 1469. In 1470 he marched on Lond. and replaced Henry on the throne, Edward having fled to Flanders. But in the next year Edward returned and finally defeated W. at Barnet, where he was slain. Richd. of Gloucester married his daughter Anne, and he is often referred to in R3. He appears also in T. Heywood's Ed. IV., where Buckingham introduces Anne to Richd. of Gloucester as "this princely lady, The Lady Anne of W." On the death of the King-maker the Earldom was conferred on the K.'s brother Clarence, and then passed to his son Edward, who was beheaded for complicity in Warbeck's conspiracy in 1499. This "young Edward Earl of W., son to Clarence" is spoken of in Ford's Warbeck v. 3. The Earldom passed later to the Dudleys, then to the Riches, and finally came in 1759 to the Grevilles, its present holders, who were descended from a branch of the original Beauchamps.

WARWICK LANE. A narrow street in Lond., running from Newgate St. to Paternoster Row. It was originally Old Dean's Lane, but got its new name from a house built there by one of the Earls of W. Stow tells how W., the King-maker, lodged there in 1457 "with 600 men, all in red jackets."

WARWICKSHIRE. One of the midland counties of England. It measures about 50 by 33 m. It is chiefly noteworthy as the native county of Shakespeare.

In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 232, the K. grants "Warickshe" to his favourite Greene. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Warwick says of Mortimer : "All W. will love him for my sake." Falstaff on his way from Lond. to Shrewsbury passes through W. In H4 A. iv. 2, 56, he says to the Prince : "What, Hal ! How now, mad wag ! What a devil dost thou in W. ?" In H6 C. iv. 8, 9, Warwick says, "In W. I have true-hearted friends." In H6 B. iii. 2, 201, Suffolk addresses Warwick as "proud lord of W." In Respublica v. 6, Avarice says, "Then would I have stretched the county of Warwick upon tenter-hooks and made it reach to Berwick." In Greene's Friar i. 1, Ralph says there is a better girl than Margaret of Fressingfield "in W." because the Abbot's lady-love lives there.

WASH. A bay on the E. coast of England between Norfolk and Lincolnshire. It is about 25 m. long by 15 broad. Here K. John lost all his baggage and treasure in 1216. In Trouble. Reign, p. 308, Philip tells the K., "Passing the Washes with our carriages, The impartial tide deadly and inexorable Came raging in with billows threatening death And swallowed up the most of all our men." Later on a Messenger brings word to Lewis : "He [John] and his, environed with the tide On Lincoln Washes all were overwhelmed." In K. J. v. 6, 41, The Bastard says of his troops : "These Lincoln Washes have devoured them" ; and in v. 7, 63, he tells the K., "The best part of my power Were in the Washes all unwarily Devoured by the unexpected flood."

WASHFORD. The old name for Wexford, the county in the S.E. of Ireland, on St. George's Channel. In H6 A. iv. 7, 63, the Earl of Shrewsbury is entitled "Great Earl of Washford, and Valence." The Earldom was conferred on him in 1446.

WATERFORD. A county on the S. coast of Ireland, between Wexford and Cork. See under WASHFORD.

WATER GATE. At Ferrara ; probably the Porta del Po on the West of the city leading into the Corso is intended. In Gascoigne's Supposes iii., Erostrato says, "Going to seek Pasiphilo, and hearing that he was at the water-gate, behold I espied my fellow Lito."

WATERWORK. An engine or force-pump erected in the old mansion of the Bigods by Broken Wharf, Lond., to supply water from the river to the middle and W. parts of the city. It was set up in 1594-5 by one Bevis Bulmar, and was notable as the first attempt to have water laid on to individual houses. Hitherto all water had been carried from the various conduits in buckets to the houses. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon proposes to serve the whole city with his Elixir Vitae "each house his dose, and at the rate—" Surly breaks in : "As he that built the W. does with water ?" In iii. 2, we are told that Abel Drugger was "cessed at eighteen pence for the W." There is possibly a reference to the noise made by this machine in B. & F. Prize i. 1, where Tranio says of Petruchio : "The motion of a dial, when he's testy, is the same trouble to him as a water-work."

WATLING STREET. The famous Roman Road which ran from Dover through Lond. to Chester, with an offshoot northwards (by Cannock, Stockport, Manchester, and Lancaster) to Carlisle and Glasgow. In Lond. a part of it still retains the old name. It runs E. from the S.E. corner of St. Paul's Churchyard to the junction of Queen and Queen Victoria Sts. It was and is inconveniently narrow ; Stow says, "The inhabitants thereof are wealthy drapers, retailers of Woollen cloths, both broad and narrow, of all sorts, more than in any one st. of this city." It contained 4 churches, viz. St. Augustin's, Allhallows, St. Mary's, and St. Antholin's. Allhallows and St. Antholin's have now disappeared, and the E. end of the st. has been much altered through the construction of Q. Victoria St.

Drayton, Polyolb. xiii. 312, says that W. St. "doth hold her way From Dover to the farth'st of fruitful Anglesey." In Chaucer's House of Fame ii. 939, the eagle says to the poet : "See yonder, lo, the Galaxye the which Men clepe the Milky Wey, for it is white ; And somme parfeie callen hit Watlynge strete." This is a very primitive, perhaps a mythological, reference. The same name is found in Gavin Douglas, Aen. v. 316 (see Skeat's note on the passage in the House of Fame in his edition of Chaucer's Works). In Cambyses v., Ambidexter says, in reference to the mourning required for the Q.'s death, "I believe all the cloth in W. st. to make gowns would not serve." In Nash's Summers prol., we have : "God give you good night in W. st." In Cooke's Greene's Quoique, p. 548, Staines, commending the life of a serving-man, says, "He wears broad cloth, and yet dares walk W. st. without fear of his draper." Deloney, in Newberie ix., tells the story of "Randoll Pert, a draper, dwelling in W.-streete." In his Reading vi., he tells how the clothiers' wives, visiting Lond., "in W.-st. viewed the great number of drapers." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 3, Ralph is sent "to the sign of the Golden Ball in W. st." for Master Hammon, who is a wealthy citizen of Lond. In the alternative title of The Puritan, Lady Plus is called "The Widow of W.-st."

WAVENEY. A river in England, rising on the N. boundary of Suffolk and flowing between Suffolk and Norfolk till it falls into the Yare a few miles above Yarmouth. It is navigable as far as Bungay. In Look about iv., Gloucester speaks of "my fort of Bungay whose walls are washed with the clear stream of Waveney."

WAYD. Probably St. Nicholas at Wade, a vill. on the western edge of the Isle of Thanet, almost due N. of Dover; the monster would be as long as Kent is wide. In Wilson's Pedler 374, the Pedler tells of a huge monster "from Dover to Wayd we esteem him to be larger in length."

WEAR. There are villages so called in Devonsh. and Somersetsh.; but I am disposed to think that WARE is intended (q.v.). There was an ancient cruciform ch. there, and the reference may be to one of the grotesque gargoyles by which the rain-water was discharged from its roof. In Kirke's Champions v. 1, the Clown sings of his mistress: "Her face bears a front like to Wear water-spout, Which brought was from thence by great cunning."

WEBLEY, or WEOBLEY. A town in Herefordsh., 11 m. N. West of Hereford, and some 10 m. from the Welsh border. It had an old castle, dating from the time of Stephen, which is now entirely demolished. It was famous for its ale. In Jonson's Wales, Evan sings, "And what you say to ale of Webley, Toudge him as well, you'll praise him trebly." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 3, 142, says, "The bread of Lemster and drink of Weably (a neighbour town) are proverbially praised before all others."

WEeping CROSS. There are 3 places known by this name: one in Oxfordsh., a second in Staffs., near to Stafford; a 3rd in Salop, near Shrewsbury. They were doubtless crosses where penitents came on pilgrimage. The phrase "to come home by W. Cross" is proverbial, and means to return sorrowfully from some unsuccessful adventure. Howell, in English Proverbs, quotes it: "He that goes out with often loss At last comes home by W. Cross." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B., Hobson says, "Had you before the law foreseen the loss, You had not now come home by W. Cross." In Abington iii. 2, Nicholas, who is a great quoter of proverbs, says, "'Tis not good to have an oar in another man's boat; so a man might come home by W. Cross." In Eastward iv. 3, Touchstone says, "They have all found the way back again by w. cross; but I'll not see them." Greene, in Quip, p. 228, says, "I hold the tailor for a necessary member to teach young novices the way to w. cross." In Lyly's Euphues England, p. 224, the Hermit says to Callimachus: "The time will come when, coming home by W. Cross, thou shalt confess that it is better to be at home in the cave of a hermit than abroad in the court of an emperor."

WELBECK ABBEY. An old Premonstratensian Abbey in Notts., 22 m. N. of Nottingham in the Sherwood Forest dist., and near the border of Derbyshire. Here the D. of Newcastle entertained Charles I in 1638, and Jonson wrote Love's Welcome to Welbeck for that occasion. W. A. is now the seat of the D. of Portland.

WELCH, WELSH. See WALES.

WERTENBERG. A misprint or mistake for Wittenberg in the 1st edition of Marlowe's Faustus, prol. 18.

WEST CHEAP (i.e. CHEAPSIDE, q.v.). In Deloney's Reading xi., a man comes to Colebrook with a report "that Lond. was all on a fire, and that it had burned down Thomas Becket's house in West cheape." See THOMAS (ST.) of AKERS.

WEST CHESTER (i.e. CHESTER, q.v.). It was first called Legaceaster, then West C., and finally C. In Three Ladies ii., Lucre speaks of West C. as one of the important mercantile cities of England where infinite numbers "great rents upon little room do bestow." In Munday's John Kent i. 1, Griffin says, "Spite of C.'s strong inhabitants, Throw West C. meekly in our hands"; where it seems to mean the west part of C. In Dekker's Northward i. 1, the Chamberlain says, "Your captains were wont to take their leave of their Lond. polecats at Dunstable; the next morning, when they had broken their fast together, the wenches brought them to Hockley-i'-th'-Hole; and so the one for Lond., the other for Westchester." C., owing to its distance from Lond., and its convenience for embarking for Ireland, was a favourite refuge for broken men and fugitives from justice. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 2, Staines says, "My refuge is Ireland or Virginia; necessity cries out, and I will presently to West C." In Jonson's Alchemist v. 3, Face says of the runaway doctor and capt.: "The doctor, he shall hear of him at Westchester; and of the Capt., tell him, at Yarmouth or some good port-town else, lying for a wind." Lyly, in Pappe, p. 53, says, "I know where there is more play [i.e. gambling] in the compass of an Hospital than in the circuit of Westchester." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "Some cities use galleries of arched cloisters towards the street, as Westchester with us." The reference is to "The Rows," still to be seen in C.

WEST COUNTRY (Wn.=Western). Applied to the counties in the S. West of England, particularly Devon, Somerset, and Cornwall. In Jonson's Barthol. iv. 2, we are introduced to Puppy, "a wn. man, that's come to wrestle before my Lord Mayor anon." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "The lob has his lass, the collier his dowdy, the wn. man his pug." In Ford's Warbeck iv. 8, when Warbeck says, "Ye're all resolved for the w. parts of England?" the crowd replies: "Cornwall, Cornwall!" Herrick, in Lachrimae, says in reference to his departure into Devon, "Before I went To banishment Into the loathed W., I could rehearse A lyric verse, And speak it with the best." In Old Meg, p. 1, Wn. men are celebrated "for gambouls," i.e. for wrestling contests. The bargees who brought their barges down from the W. to Lond. were called "Wn. Pugs." In Lyly's Endymion iv. 2, Epiton says he will travel "in a wn. barge, when with a good wind and lusty pugs one may go 10 m. in 2 days." Greene, in Thieves Falling out C. j., says, "I doubt the sandeyed ass will kick like a Wn. pug." Dekker, in Wonderful Year F. iii. b., speaking of the fear of the plague in Lond., says, "Even the Wn. pugs, receiving money there, have tyed it in a bag at the end of their barge, and trailed it through the Thames."

WESTERN ISLES. Apparently the newly-discovered West Indies are meant (see INDIES). In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Meander speaks of "merchants of Persepolis Trading by land unto the W. I." Later, in the same scene, Ortygius crowns Cosroe K. of "East India and the late-discovered isles." In Chivalry, Bourbon says to Bellamira: "I'll not stain that face For all the treasure of the W. Iland."

WEST GATE, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE. The old W. G. of the city, which was formerly surrounded by a massive wall pierced by gates. The W. G. was near St. John's Ch.; the name still remains in Westgate Road, being the chief road (Roman) out of Newcastle to the West, though the G. was pulled down in the early part of the 19th cent. It was built by Roger Thornton in the reign of Henry VI. In Brewer's Lovesick King iv., Thornton says, "Here at this W. G. first came Thornton in." This is a line from an old ballad: "In at the W. G. came Thornton in, With a hap and a halfpenny and a lamb's skin."

WEST HAM. See HAM.

WESTMINSTER. Properly speaking, means the Abbey built on Thorney Island by K. Sebert; but was soon applied to the vill. which gradually sprang up in its neighbourhood. Its boundaries extended in the 16th cent. from Temple Bar to Kensington, and from the Thames to Marylebone. The Abbey lies near the N. bank of the Thames, just over 1½ m. in a direct line from St. Paul's, and a little over 1¼ m. by way of Fleet St., the Strand, and Whitehall. W. became a city when Henry VIII in 1540 appointed Thomas Thirlby Bp. of W. He held that position till 1550, but on his translation to Norwich the bishopric was abolished; and so he was the first and last person to enjoy that dignity. Partly because of the privilege of sanctuary possessed by the Abbey, partly through the presence of the Court, W. became notorious as a haunt of bad characters, both male and female. In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, Frisco says, "This post? Why, 'tis the Maypole on Ivy-bdge, going to W." (see IVY BRIDGE). In Killigrew's Parson i. 1, the Capt. says of the Parson: "he stood at the corners of streets and whispered gentlemen in the ear and so delivered his wants like a message; which being done, the rogue vanished and would drive at W. like a dabchick and rise again at Temple Bar." In Dekker's Edmonton v. 2, one of the country-people avers that Mother Sawyer's sow cast her farrow; "yet were they sent up to Lond., and sold for as good W. dog-pigs at Bartholomew Fair as ever ale-wife longed for." I find no other allusion to the excellence of the Boar-pigs of W. Nash, in Pierce F. 4, exclaims: "W.! W.! much maidenhead hast thou to answer for at the day of judgment!" Greene, in Thieves Intro., says of foysts: "In W., the Strand, . . . they do every day build their nests." The dialogue between the He-foyst and She-foyst opens: "Fair Kate, well met! what news about your W. building, that you look so blythe?" In News from Hell, mention is made of "all the whores and thieves that live in W., etc., etc." In Gamester v. 1, Hazard advises a frail woman: "Let her set up shop i' the Strand or W.; she may have custom." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 1, the Wise woman mentions, amongst other swindlers and fortune-tellers, "one in W. that practiseth the book and the key, and the sieve and the shears"—both methods of telling fortunes.

Long Meg of W. has come down to fame as a "roaring girl" who wore men's clothes, and in that disguise played many merry and daring pranks. She kept a house of ill-fame in Southwark in the reign of Henry VIII. Her life was published in 1582, and she had already, in 1594, been immortalised in a Ballad and a Play. She is the heroine of a story in Deloney's Craft ii. 1. In Dekker's Satiro. iii. 1, 240, Tucca calls Mrs. Miniver "My long Meg a W." In Jonson's Fortun. Isles, Skelton speaks of "W. Meg With her long leg, As long as a crane, And feet like a plane With a pair of heels As broad as 2 wheels." In Dekker's Westward v. 2, Sir Gosling says to Birdlime: "What kin art thou to Long Meg of W.? Th'rt like her." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Jack Dapper says to Moll, "Was it your Meg of W.'s courage that rescued me from the Poultry puttocks?" In Tailor's Hog hath Lost i. 1, Haddit has written a jig or ballad for the player; when the player speaks of it as "that small matter," Haddit rejoins, "A small matter! You'll find it worth Meg of W., altho' it be but a bare jig." The reference is to the play above mentioned. The black marble slab, 11 ft. long, in the S. cloister of the Abbey, which covers the tomb of Gervase de Blois, son of K. Stephen, has long been called "Long Meg." A fair was held in W. on St. James's Day, July 25th. In Deloney's Craft i. 11, it is said of the Green K. of St. Martin's: "St. James his day at last being come, he called up his wife betimes and bad her make ready if she would to the Fair"; but he dragged her all the way to Bristol, where there was also a fair on St. James's Day.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. The ch. of St. Peter at W., said to have been founded by Sebert, K. of the East Saxons, about A.D. 616; his tomb, erected in 1308, is still to be seen in the Choir. Drayton, in Polyolb. xi. 227, says that Sebert "Began the goodly ch. of W. to rear." Edward the Confessor rebuilt it, and it was completed in 1065, a week before his death. His ch. covered the whole space occupied by the present A., and it had a central tower and 2 smaller towers at the West end. Nothing remains of this building except some pillar-bases under the N. side of the Choir. The K. was buried in his new A., in the side of the Choir; but his body was removed to its present resting-place behind the Altar in 1269. In 1245 Henry III decided to remove the tower and the whole of the E. end and rebuild it; it was reopened for service in 1269, but was not completed till about 1285. The mosaic pavement before the High Altar was laid in 1283, and was the gift of Abbot Ware. In the 14th cent. Abbot Litlington built the College Hall, the Jerusalem Chamber, the Abbot's House, now the Deanery, and the tower in Dean's Yard. The West end was rebuilt during the reign of Richd. II. The Chapel of Henry VII at the E. end was built in 1502. The A. by this time presented much the same appearance as it does now, except that it had no towers at the West end; these were added at the beginning of the 18th cent. Opening out of the Ambulatory round the Altar and the Chapel of Edward the Confessor came in order, starting at the S.E. corner, the chapels of St. Benedict, St. Edmund, St. Nicholas, St. Paul, St. John the Baptist, Abbot Iliffe, St. John the Evangelist, St. Michael, and St. Andrew. On the S. side of the Abbey are the Deanery, the Cloisters, St. Faith's chapel, the chapel of the Pyx, and the Chapter House. There was a peal of bells in the N. West tower. The principal tombs in the A. in Shakespeare's time were those of Kings Sebert, Edward the Confessor, Henry III, Edward I and his Q. Elinor, Edward III and his Q. Philippa, Richd. II and his Q., Henry V, Henry VII and his Q. Anne of Cleves, Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth; Mary Q. of Scots; Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke; Chaucer and Spenser (in the S. transept, now called the Poets' Corner). These tombs were already objects of interest to visitors, and in the 17th cent. a charge of a penny was made by the vergers who exhibited them. All the Kings and Queens of England have been crowned in the A., from Edward the Confessor to George V. The Coronation Chair, which, since the time of Edward I, has enclosed the famous stone of Scone on which the old Scottish Kings were crowned, stands at the West end of the Chapel of Edward the Confessor, with a 2nd similar chair made for the coronation of Mary the Q. of William III.

The dramatists of our period buried in the A. are Ben Jonson, Michael Drayton, Beaumont, and Davenant. There is a monument to Shakespeare, but his body lies in the chancel of the ch. of the Holy Trinity at Stratford-on-Avon. The only scene in Shakespeare which takes place in the A. is H6 A. i. 1 (the funeral of Henry V). But H4 B. v. 5 is in the immediate neighbourhood of the A. after the coronation of Henry V; and H8 iv. 1 describes the procession to the coronation of Anne Boleyn in the A. The scene of H4 B. iv. 4 is the Jerusalem Chamber (q.v.). In H6 B. i. 2, 37, the Duchess of Gloucester says, "Methought I sat in seat of majesty In the cathedral ch. of W., and in that chair where kings and queens are crowned." In iv. 4, 31, the Messenger announces that Jack Cade "vows to crown himself in W." In R3 iv. i. 32, Stanley says to Anne, "Come, Madam, you must straight to W. There to be crowned Richd.'s royal q." In H8 iv. 1, 57, the 3rd gentleman tells how he has been "among the crowd i' the A." at the coronation of Q. Anne Boleyn. In S. Rowley's When you F. 1, the K. sends word to Lady Katherine Parr that "she shall be Q. and crowned at W." In Trag. Richd. II i. 2, 50, Greene says, "We must attend his Grace to W., To the high nuptials of fair Anne a Beame," i.e. Anne of Bohemia, 1st q. of Richd. II. In True Trag., p. 126, Richmond says, "Now for our marriage and our nuptial rites, Our pleasure is they be solemnized In our A. of W. according to the ancient custom due." The Abbot of W., who appears in R2 iv. 1, and whom Northumberland in line 152 addresses as "my lord of W.," was almost certainly Richd. Harbunden. He took part in Aumerle's plot, fled for his life, and died suddenly of an apoplectic fit; in v. 6, 19, Percy announces: "The grand conspirator, Abbot of W., Hath yielded up his body to the grave."

In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 1, Mrs. Carol says, "Can they tell what they do in this noise? Pray heaven it do not break into the tombs at W. and wake the dead!" Dekker, in Hornbook vii., speaks of a country gentleman who "brings his wife up to see the tombs at W., the lions in the Tower." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny, says, "For a penny you may hear a most eloquent oration upon our English Kings and Queens, if you will seriously listen to David Owen, who keeps the Monuments at W." In Shirley's Bird iv. 1, Bonamico says, "I talk as glib, methinks, as he that farms the monuments." Donne, in Satires iv. 74, says, "At W. . . the man that keeps the A. tombs And for his price doth with whoever comes Of all our Harrys and our Edwards talk." Earle, in Microcos. lxxv., says of the mere great man: "One of just as much use as his images, only he differs in this, that he can speak himself, and save the fellow of W. a labour." In Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities, Peacham mentions among the sights of Lond. "W.'s monuments." Beaumont has a poem On the Tombs in Westminster Abbey.

WESTMINSTER BRIDGE, also W. STAIRS or FERRY. A landing place for boats at the foot of Old Palace Yard. These bldgs., like Ivy Bldg., Whitehall Bldg., King's Bldg., etc., were not bldgs. over the river—of which there was only one, viz. Lond. Bldg.—but short gangways connecting the landing stages with the shore. The easiest way from the City to W. was by taking a pair of oars up the river; hence the W. bldg. was very busy and constantly in use. Latimer, in Sermon (vi.) before Edward VI (1549) says, "There is never a wherryman at W.-bldg. but he can answer to this." In Foxe's Book of Martyrs, we read of Ralph Morris going from Lambeth "unto W. Bldg. with a sculler." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says, "A number of better things between W. Bldg. and Temple Bar are fallen to decay since Charing fell." In News from Hell, Dekker says, "In hell you are not baited by whole kennels of yelping watermen as you are at W. Bldg." In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Trim thinks that "roaring" will last "as long as the water runs under Lond. Bldg. or watermen ply at W. Stairs." In the title to St. Hilary's Tears (1642), it is said that they are shed "upon all professions from the Tower-stairs to W.-ferry."

WESTMINSTER GATE. The New Palace Yard was entered by 3 gates—the High Gate on the West side, built by Richd. II in 1384; a gate on the S. side, leading to St. Margaret's Ch.; and a water-gate on the E. side, near the Star-Chamber. It is doubtless the first of these that is intended in the following passages (see also GATE-HOUSE). John Lydgate, in Lickpenny, says, after he had visited W. Hall, "Then to W. Gate I presently went; Cooks to me they took good intent And proffered me bread with ale and wine." Hoccleve, in Misrule 178, says, "Who was a greater master eke than I, or bet acquainted at W. gate among the taverners namely and cooks?"

WESTMINSTER HALL. The great Hall of the royal palace of W., founded by William Rufus, and reconstructed in its present form by Richd. II in 1397. The roof, of Irish oak, is one of the finest in the world. The Hall measures 290 by 68 ft., and is one of the largest apartments in existence unsupported by pillars. It was intended as the Banqueting Hall of the Palace, and is still used for the Coronation Banquets. In Trag. Richd. II ii. 2, 213, the K. says, "The H. at W. shall be enlarged And only serve us for a dining room." Greene, in Quip, p. 232, says that K. Stephen "did count W. H. too little to be his dining chamber"; and later, "When lowliness, neighbourhood, and hospitality lived in England, W. H. was a dining chamber, not a den of controversies." From the time of Henry III the courts of Common Law and Chancery were fixed in W. H. The Court of King's Bench sat on the S.E. side, and the Court of Chancery on the S.West, behind a wooden lattice, or cancellus. Towards the end of the 18th cent. the Courts were transferred to a new building on the West side of the H.; and are now removed to the New Law Courts on the N. side of Fleet St. close to Temple Bar. Many of the great State Trials were held in the H., notably those of Sir William Wallace, Sir Thomas More, Q. Anne Boleyn, Protector Somerset, Strafford, Charles I, and Warren Hastings. Hence W. comes to be used as a synonym for the Law.

In Piers, there are many references to W. as the home of the Law. "Here come Fals and Favel to have their deed executed" (B. ii. 160); "they that wonyeth in Westmynster" all worship Mede (B. iii. 12). In C. xi. 239, it is complained: "The sonne for the sykes synners" sholde nat be werse; Westmynster law, ich wot well, worcheth the contrarie." In C. xxiii. 133, we are told that Simony "Bar adoun with meny a bryghte noble Muche of the wit and wisdom of Westmynster H." In C. xxiii. 284, we read of false folk who flee to Westmynster in order to cheat the Law. In Hycke, p. 84, Imagynacyon says, "In W. H. every term I am; an I were dead, the lawyers' thrift were lost." Later on, p. 105, Frewyll, speaking of himself and his fellow-highwaymen, says, "We have a sure canell at W., A thousand ships of thieves therein may ride sure." Lydgate, in Lickpenny, says, "In W. H. I found out one Which went in a long gown of ray. . . . Within this H. neither rich nor yet poor Would do for me aught, although I should die; Which seeing, I got me out of the door Where Flemings began on me to cry, Master, what will ye copen or buy? Fine felt hats or spectacles to read? Lay down your silver and here you may speed." In World Child, p. 180, Folly says, "In Lond. is my chief dwelling. In Holborn was I brought forth and with the courtiers to W. I used to wend, for I am a servant of the Law." In Respublica v. 9, Avarice, being told that Peace is coming to the Earth, says, "W. H. might go play, if that came to pass." In Nature 112, Envy says, "Sir, it happened in W. H., before the judges all." In Three Lords, Dods., vi. 412, Dissimulation says, "Once in a month I stole in o' th' market-day to Leadenhall and about, and sometime to W. H." In Cobler of Canterbury, we read: "When W. H. is quite without benches And Southwark Bankside hath no pretty wenches, Then the cobbler of Rumney shall a cuckold be." In Nobody 1151, Nobody says, "From thence [Charing Cross] I went to see the law Courts, held at W." In Fair Women ii. 1174, Brown is conveyed "to the Justices of the Bench at W." In K. K. Knave, Dods., vi. 538, Coney Catcher says, "I have been a post-knight in W. this 12 year." The post-knight was a fellow who hung round the Courts, ready to be engaged to give false evidence, or do any other dirty work for the litigants. In Underwit iii. 3, Courtwell says, "I am not now in Lond. marching with the puiſnes to W. in our torn gowns embroidered with Strand dirt, to hear the Law." In Dekker's Northward i. 2, Charley asks, "Hast any suits to be tried at W.?" In Shirley's Honour i., Riches says, "I will be racked at W. ere be confined to hear thy learned nonsense." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "Some of these Boothalers are called Termers, and they ply W. H.; Michaelmas Term is their harvest." These Termers, like the post-knights, haunted the Courts to pick up bits of shady business. J. Heywood, in Spider and Fly (1556) xiv. 11, says, "In W. H. I . . . may be a termier all times and hours." In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, Yellow-Hammer says to his wife: "The City cannot hold you, wife, but you must needs fetch words [i.e. legal terms] from W." In Jonson's Staple iv. 1, Picklock says he can cant "in all the languages in W. H., Pleas, Bench, or Chancery." In his Devil i. 1, Iniquity suggests to Pug that he should come to the Strand "Gainst the lawyers come dabbled from W. H." In Epicoene iv. 2, Morose mentions W. H. as one of the noisiest places in Lond. In Dekker's Edmonton v. 1, Cuddy says to his dog: "If thou canst rub thy shoulder against a lawyer's gown, as thou passest by W. H., do." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 561, Staines says of Joice: "She's as dumb as W. H. in the long vacation." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii. 3, Alexander says, "He tramples upon the bosom of a tavern with that dexterity as your lawyers' clerks do to W. -h. upon a dirty day with a pair of white silk stockings." In Puritan i. 1, the Widow tells her son how his father was "up every morning betwixt 4 and 5; so duly at W. H. every term-time with all his cards and writings." In Jonson's Barthol iii. 1, Nightingale sings of pickpockets: "Examples have been Of some that were seen In W. H., yea, the pleaders between." Dekker, in Jests, says of the foyst or pick-pocket: "W. H. is his good soil." Jonson, in Underwoods li., says, "The great H. at W., the scene Where mutual frauds are fought and no side yield." In St. Hilary's Tears (1642), we read: "On both sides of the H. they complain; at Heaven they say there is not a lawyer nor a clerk comes near them; and at Hell they come dropping in but now and then one." Heaven and Hell were popular names for 2 taverns at the end of the H. In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, Whirlpool says, "I have departed thence as hungry as ever came country attorney from W." The country practitioner would have little chance to get a case. Fuller, in Church Hist. ii. 7, 2, says, "A palm-tree served Deborah for her W. H., wherein she judged Israel."

The Irish oak of which the roof was made was supposed to be fatal to vermin of all kinds, including spiders. In Dekker's Westward iv. 1, Lucy says, "W. never breeds cobwebs." To make a W. matter of a thing means to go to law about it. Latimer, in Sermon (i.) before Edward VI (1549), says, "Thus this bargain became a W. matter; the lawyers got twice the value of the horse; and when all came to all, 2 fools made an end of the matter." In Phillips' Grissill, p. 49, Persuasion says, "Through the clouds I had a marvellous fall That I had like to broke my neck on the top of W. H." In J. Heywood's Play of Love, p. 185, the Lover says, "It would be as pleasant as to a covetous man to behold Of his own W. H. full of gold."

There were numerous shops or stalls along the sides of the H., occupied by booksellers, dealers in small wares, seamstresses, etc. Swetnam was "Printed for Richd. Meigher and are to be sold at his shops . . . and at W. H." Glapthorne's Wit was "Printed by Io. Okes for F. C. and are to be sold at his shops in King St. at the sign of the Goat and in W. H."

WESTMINSTER PALACE. The chief Palace of the Kings of England from Edward the Confessor to Henry VIII. It lay between the Abbey and the river on part of the site of the present Houses of Parliament. William the Conqueror added to its strength and splendour, and William Rufus completed it by the building of the Great Hall facing on to the New Palace Yard. Stephen immortalised his name by the famous Chapel of St. Stephen, which, after being rebuilt, first by Edward I and then after its destruction by fire by his 2 successors, was for a long time the meeting place of the Parliament. The P. was so much damaged by fire in 1512 that Henry VIII deserted it and transferred his Court to Whitehall, which he took from Wolsey in 1530. There still remained, however, the Star Chamber, the Painted Chamber, the Chapel, and the Hall, as well as other minor buildings. The fire of 1834 swept everything away except the Hall and the crypt of the Chapel, now the sole survivors of the old P. In the New P. Yard N. of the Hall were a fountain or conduit on the N. West side, a bell-tower with an ancient clock opposite the entrance to the Hall, and the noble portal called the High Gate on the Western side.

In the historical plays of our period it may generally be assumed that scenes located "in the P." are to be supposed to take place at W., unless there is some definite indication to the contrary. Thus, in Shakespeare the following scenes are to be assigned to W. P. : K. J. iv. 2 ; R3 i. 3, ii. 1, 2, 4 ; iv. 2, 3, 4 ; H4 A. i. 1, 3, iii. 2 ; H4 B. iii. 1, iv. 5, v. 2 ; H5 i. 1, 2 ; H6 A. v. 1, 5 ; B. i. 1, 3, iv. 4 ; C. iii. 2, iv. 1, v. 7 ; and H8 v. 4 takes place in the New P. Yard. In Trag. Richd. II ii. 1, 148, York says, "The Peers of England now are all assembled To hold a Parliament at W." In H4 B. ii. 4, 383, Peto says, "The K. your father is at W." In Contention, Part I, Haz., p. 495, Cade says, "Tomorrow I mean to sit in the K.'s seat at W." In Ford's Warbeck i. 1, the K. says, "It is our pleasure to remove our Court From W. to the Tower." In Middleton's Mad World ii. 2, Sir Bounteous says, "I was knighted at W." In i. 1, Follywit says, "I can hire bluecoats for you all by W. Clock." In Oldcastle iii. 4, the K. says, "I'll to W. in this disguise." The Lord Mayor of Lond. on the day after his election paid a state visit to the Court at W., in his state barge with trumpets and drums. In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Morose cries to the musicians : "Out of my doors, ye sons of noise and tumult, begot on an ill May-day, or when the galley-foist is afloat to W." In Shirley's Honour, Clod speaks of "the next day after Simon and Jude, when you go a-feasting to W. with your galley-foist and your popguns, to the very terror of the paper-whales." In his Honoria i. 1, Maslin says, "The next day after Simon and Jude all your liveries go a feasting by water to W." In Sharpham's Fleire iii. 351, Fleire refers to the firing of a salute at Lambeth "when the Mayor and Aldermen land at W."

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL, or ST. PETER'S COLLEGE. There was a school connected with the Abbey as early as the 14th cent., but the present school was founded by Q. Elizabeth in 1560. The original school-room was a dormitory of the Abbey ; and the school-hall was the Abbot's Refectory, built by Abbot Litlington in the reign of Edward III. The boys have the privilege of being present in the Abbey at the coronation and other State ceremonies. Plays were regularly performed by the pupils, and the custom of giving a Latin play annually has survived to the present day. Five performances are recorded between 1568 and 1574, including Appius and Virginia, Paris and Vienna, and Truth, Faith, and Mercy. In the seventies John Taylor and William Elderton organised from the school companies of boy-actors who played at Court and elsewhere. Udall, the author of Roister, was head-master from 1553 to 1556. Amongst the pupils of the school were Ben Jonson, Thomas Randolph, Thomas Goffe, Nathanael Field, Jasper Mayne, and Abraham Cowley. In Shirley's Pleasure ii. 1, Frederick says, "Prithee commend me to the library at W. ; my bones I bequeath thither and to the learned worms that mean to visit them"—where there is also a reference to the tombs of the Abbey. In Jonson's Staple i. 2, Mrs. Mirth says of Jonson : "He kept school upon the stage, could conjure there, above the school of W., and Dr. Lamb too." In the Induction to his Magnetic, the Boy says, "I understand that ; since I learned Terence in the 3rd form at W." Richard Hakluyt, in Epist. Dedicat. to Principal Navigations (1589), tells how he was "one of her Majesty's scholars at W., that fruitful nursery."

WESTMORLAND. A county in the N. West of England, between Yorks., Lancs., and Cumberland. It is very mountainous, and is famous for its fine lake scenery. It gave their title to the great Neville family, Ralph Neville having been created Earl of W. in 1397. He is the W. who appears in H4 as a firm supporter of the K., and is represented in H5 as being at the battle of Agincourt, which was not the case, as he was then in England. He died in 1425 and was succeeded by his grandson Ralph, the son of John Neville who was killed at Towton. This Ralph is the W. of H6 C., who is represented as a supporter of the house of Lancaster. He died in 1523. The title passed to Francis Fane in 1624 by the marriage of his father to Mary Neville, and still continues in the Fane family. In George i. 3, Cuddie speaks of old William Musgrove as "the bravest horseman in all W."

WESTPHALIA (Wn. = Westphalian). A province in West Prussia, lying between Hanover and the Rhine Provinces. Formerly it included the whole dist. between Brunswick and the Netherlands, and stretched from Hesse to the North Sea. Heylyn says, "The soil is wonderfully stored with acorns which feed swine of an exceeding pleasant taste and nourishment ; so that the Wn. gammon of bacon is the chief dish at a banquet." Fynes Moryson, in Itin., says that English bacon and ham "are more savoury than in any other parts, excepting the bacon of W."

In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Leatherhead speaks of "Dunmow-bacon" ; Pythias corrects him, "You lie, it's Westfabian" ; Leatherhead replies, "Wn., you should say." In Marston's Malcontent iv. 3, Malevole describes a Moor as "the buff captain, the sallow Wn., gammon-faced zaza." The reference is to the brown colour of a ham. In Webster's White Devil v. 1, Flammineo says, "Protesting and drinking go together and agree as well as shoemakers and W. bacon." In Alimony i. 3, Baxter says, "Let this body of mine be hung up for a gammon of W. bacon." In B. & F. Captain ii. 2, Clara says, "I would have him buried cross-legged, like one o' the Templars, if his W. gammons will hold crossing." In Davenant's Albion iv. 1, Grimold says, "My thighs are hardened like an old W. flitch." In his Wits iii. 2, Palatine says, "Let me hear thy aunt is stuck with more bay-leaves and rosemary than a W. gammon." Bays and rosemary were used for decking out a corpse ; and also for adorning hams. In Shirley's Pleasure v. 1, Bornwell describes a proposed banquet at the Stillyard, where the wines "shall flow into our room And drown Ws. tongues, and anchovies." In Glaphorne's Wallenstein v. 2, Newman says, "May he die for drought like a W. pig i' th' dog-days." In his Hollander i. 1, Urinal says that Sconce looks "like a smoked W. ham." In Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities, Vadianus says of the author : "Tom's a Bologna sausage lovely fat Stuffed with the flesh of a Wn. sow." Rabelais, in Gargantua iii., tells how Grangousier "was ordinarily well furnished with gammons of bacon, both of W., Mayence, and Bayonne."

Hall, in Satires v. 1, 69, speaks of a tenement "Such as nice Lipsius would grudge to see Above his lodging in wild Westphalie." The scholar Lipsius lived for a time during 1591 in or about W.

WEST SAXONS. The Saxons who settled in the S. counties of England, in the dist. known collectively as Wessex. They first landed in A.D. 495, and in 519 Cedric assumed the title of K. of Wessex. In Brome's Queen's Exch. iii. 1, Anthynus sees "the ghosts of our 6 last West Saxon kings."

WEXFORD. See WASHFORD.

WHIGHTON. See WIGTON.

WHITECHAPEL. A parish in Lond., E. of Aldgate. It derived its name from the chapel of St. Mary Matfelon, which was in existence as early as 1329 and is now the parish ch. The W. Rd., which is often called simply

W., is a broad thoroughfare running from Aldgate to Mile-end. It was the main road from Lond. to Essex and the eastern counties, and, having fallen into disrepair, was newly paved in 1572. A row of butchers' shops ran along one side of the road; and there were also many shoemakers' shops there. The whole dist. had a bad name as a resort of thieves and prostitutes. The local prison for debtors was known as Lord Wentworth's Gaol.

In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Eyre says, "Fight for the gentlemen shoemakers, the flower of St. Martin's, the mad knaves of Bedlam, Fleet st., Tower st., and W." In B. & F. Pestle v. 2, Ralph says, "Ancient, let your colours fly; but have a care of the butchers' hooks at W.; they have been the death of many a fair ancient." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iv. 5, Bobadil tells how he has been assaulted "in divers skirts of the town, as Turn-bull, W., Shoreditch, which were then my quarters." In Devil i. 1, Iniquity says to Pug: "We will survey the suburbs and make forth our sallies Down Petticoat Lane and up the smock alleys To Shoreditch, W., and so to St. Katherns." Kemp, in Nine Days Wonder, tells how he danced through W. on his way to Norwich. Taylor, in Works ii. 131, says, "Lord Wentworth's gaol within W. stands." In ii. 296, he says, "At W. near Lond. how many have been buried weekly, but have merely perished for lack of bread." In Pem. Parl., article 45 runs "We ordain and appoint that, if there be no great store of tempests, two half-penny loaves shall be sold for a penny in W."

WHITECROSS STREET. Lond., running N. from the West end of Fore St. across the E. end of Beech St. to Old St. It was so named from a white cross which stood at its junction with Beech St. The Fortune Theatre (q.v.) stood to the West of Upper Whitecross St., between it and Golden Lane.

WHITEFRIARS. A precinct in the city of Lond. lying on the N. bank of the Thames between the river and Fleet St., bounded on the West by the Inner Temple and on the E. by Water Lane, now re-christened W. St. It was named from the ch. of the White Friars, or Carmelites, built in 1241, towards the N. boundary of the precinct, E. of Bouverie St. and N. of Tudor St. The refectory of the monastery occupied the site of the present offices of the Daily News. At the dissolution of the monasteries the ch. was pulled down and nothing was left of the buildings but the Hall, or Refectory. On the site many fair houses were built; but the privilege of sanctuary, still claimed and allowed, attracted to the neighbourhood a crowd of disreputable characters of all kinds, and these houses were divided up into tenement lodgings and taken possession of by the riff-raff of Lond. A lawless community of fraudulent debtors, refugees from justice, and women of the streets quickly grew up who defied the officers of the Law and governed themselves in a wild sort of fashion. Shadwell's Squire of Alsatia presents a vivid picture of this locality, which assumed the name of Alsatia during the 17th cent., from the no-man's land between the borders of Germany and France. Scott describes it graphically in The Fortunes of Nigel. This state of things continued all through the 17th cent., until the right of sanctuary was abolished in 1697.

In R3 i. 2, 227, Gloucester orders the attendants to convey the body of Henry VI. not to Chertsey, but "to W." Holinshed says the body was taken to Blackfriars; so that Shakespeare's memory seems to have made a slip. Towards the end of his life James Shirley lived in

W., but was driven out by the Gt. Fire of 1666. In *Tarleton's Jest*s, an ordinary in W. is mentioned as a favourite resort of the actor's. Harman, in Caveat C. 11, says, "Anno Domini 1566 there came a counterfeit crank under my lodging at the whyte Fryares within the cloister in a little yard or court, being without the liberties of Lond., whereby he hoped for the greater gain." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "The student has his nun in W." In Middleton's Chess ii. 1, the Black Knight says, "Here's [letters] from Blanche and Bridget from their safe sanctuary in W." In his Black Book, he speaks of "the dice running as false as the drabs in W." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Careless, having got hold of some money, says, "I need no more insconing now in Ram Alley nor in the sanctuary of W." In Glapthorne's Wit iv. 1, Busie says, "A sedan shall carry them unseen through the watch at Ludgate into W.; there you shall find a little Levite" to marry the couple. In Davenport's New Trick i. 2, Slightall, wanting a lady of pleasure, bids Roger go and search several localities of bad reputation, including "White Fryers." In Eastward v. 4, one of the prisoners says of Quicksilver: "He will discourse admirably of running horses, and White Friars, and against bawds and of cocks." In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, when Sir Politick says, "The gentleman is of worth and of our nation," his Lady rejoins, "Ay, your W. nation; Come, I blush for you, Master Would-be." In his Prologue to Epicoene, Jonson says of his play: "Some [of it is fit] for lords, knights, and squires; Some for your men and daughters of W." In his Epigrams xii., he calls Lieut. Shift "meanest among squires That haunt . . . W." Middleton, in Hubbard, p. 79, says, "Our young prodigal steps into W. Nunnery, where he kept his drab."

WHITEFRIARS DOCK. A landing place for boats at the bottom of Water Lane, now W. St., about where the Sion College Library now stands on the Thames Embankment. In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Madge says, "I lay not long ago at the Venice by W. D."

WHITEFRIARS THEATRE. Plays seem to have been performed as early as 1580 in the old Refectory of the Carmelite Monastery, which stood on the E. of Bouverie St. just N. of George Yard, where now are the offices of the Daily News. There is no evidence that any of the regular companies played there before 1607, when the children of the King's Revels are recorded to have acted at W.; they were dispersed in 1609, and their place was taken in 1610 by the Children of the Queen's Revels, who performed Jonson's Epicoene in March of that year, Ben himself taking the part of Morose. Other plays staged there were Taylor's Hog hath lost (1613); Field's Weathercock (1612); Chapman's Bussy D'Ambois, his Revenge and Widow's Tears; Marston's Insatiate; B. & F. Coxcomb, Pestle, and Cupid's Rev. The Hall ceased to be used for plays by 1616; and it was not for 15 years that its place was taken by the new theatre in Salisbury Court (q.v.). In Lady Mother ii. 1, Crackby says, "This boy doth sing as like the boy at the Whitefryers as ever I heard."

WHITE GREYHOUND. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond. Venus and Adonis was "Imprinted by Richd. Field and are to be sold at the sign of the w. G. in Paules Churchyard. 1593." Lucr. was published at the same place in 1594.

WHITEHALL. The palace of the Kings of England from Henry VIII to William III. It lay on the left bank of the Thames, and extended from nearly the point where Westminster Bidge. now crosses the river to Scotland Yard, and from the river back to St. James's Park. Hubert de Burgh had a palace here in the reign of Henry II, and left it in 1240 to the Black Friars; they soon after sold it to the Archbp. of York, and it remained the town house of the Archbps. of York, under the name of York House (or Place), until the time of Cardinal Wolsey. He greatly improved and enlarged it, but on his disgrace it was transferred to the K. in 1530. The Westminster Palace having been recently severely damaged by fire, Henry took York House as his Palace and gave it the name of W. He added to it considerably, and put two gates across the road which led through the grounds from Charing Cross to Westminster, one, nobly designed by Holbein, near the S. Western corner of the present Banqueting Hall, the other, known as the King St. Gate, where Richmond St. debouches into W. Both were removed in the 18th cent. as obstructing the traffic. Elizabeth carried out further improvements, including a Banqueting Hall. This (and much more of the Palace) was destroyed by fire in 1619, and James I planned to have the whole rebuilt on a magnificent scale by Inigo Jones; all that he completed, however, was the Banqueting Hall, the only part of the Palace now remaining. From one of its windows, or from an aperture broken through for the purpose, Charles I was led to execution. The Court of Charles II was located in the Palace, and during his reign it was the centre of fashion. In 1698 a disastrous fire swept away almost the whole of the buildings. It was never rebuilt, and all that is now left is Inigo Jones's Banqueting Hall, which was converted by George I into a Chapel Royal, though it was never consecrated, and is now used as the United Service Museum.

From the dramatic point of view W. is chiefly interesting for the series of Court Masques produced there in the 17th cent. Already plays had been acted there before Q. Elizabeth, e.g. Damon and Pythias in 1564; but in the reign of James masques were performed almost every year, amongst them Jonson's Blackness (1605), Beauty (1608), Queens (1609), and Oberon (1611). The splendid series in connection with the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth in 1613 included Chapman's Masque of the Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn, Beaumont's Inner Temple Masque, and Campion's Lords' Masque. Jonson's Augurs was the first to be played in the Hall rebuilt after the fire by Inigo Jones. In 1634 was produced Shirley's Triumph of Peace, "the most magnificent pageant ever, perhaps, exhibited in England." These plays were usually presented in the Banqueting Hall; but James I began to use the Cockpit in the N.E. corner of the palace for this purpose, and Charles I, about 1632, had it made by Inigo Jones into a small theatre, which was known as the Cockpit and must not be confused with the Cockpit in Drury Lane. It was destroyed in the fire of 1698.

Deloney, in Newberie vi., tells how Wolsey "sent for the clothiers afore him to W., his new-built house by Westminster." In H8 iv. 1, 97, the 1st Gentleman says, "You must no more call it York-Place, that's past; For, since the Cardinal fell, that title's lost; 'Tis now the K.'s and called W." The date of the scene is 1533. In Armin's Moreclacke B. 4, a Messenger brings word: "The Court goes from Richmond to W." Jonson, in Vulcan, commemorates the fire of 1619—"Nay, let W. with revels have to do, Though but in dances, it shall know his power; There was a judgment seen too in an hour." In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, Yellowhammer says, "Honour and Faithful servant! they are compliments for the worthies of W. or Greenwich." In Scot. Presb. ii. 1, Moneyless says, "The K. must not yet see W.; Cromwell won't have it so." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities, Peacham mentions amongst the sights of Lond. "the White Hall whale bones." On the "lucus a non lucendo" principle, coal-ships were dubbed "W. men" because they were black. In Devonshire ii. 1, the Capt. says, "The W. men did good service; 4000 bullets their ordnance and the Hollanders discharged upon the castle." There were 10 of these coal-ships in the attack on Puntal.

WHITE HART. A tavern sign in Lond. The most famous W. H. was in the Borough of Southwark, on the E. side near the S. end of the High St. It had the largest sign in Lond., except that of the Castle in Fleet St. It was Jack Cade's head-quarters in 1450. Fabyan, in his Chronicles, says, "On July 1st, 1450, Jack Cade arrived in Southwark, where he lodged at the H." In the Chronicle of the Grey Friars, it is related, in connection with Cade's rebellion: "At the Whyte H. in Southwarke one Hawaydyne of St. Martin's was beheaded." In H6 B. iv. 3, 25, Cade says, "Hath my sword therefore broke through Lond. gates that you should leave me at the W. H. in Southwark?" The old Inn was burnt down in 1676 and rebuilt; in July 1889 it was pulled down. The later W. H. is chiefly memorable for the discovery there of Sam Weller by Mr. Pickwick. There was another W. H. in Bishopsgate St. Without, next to St. Botolph's Ch. It was pulled down in 1829, but W. H. Court still preserves the name. There was another in the Strand, which has left its name in H. St., Covent Garden. In the list of Taverns in T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, we have "The huntsmen to the W. H. go." It is impossible to say which of them is intended.

WHITE HART. The sign of a printer's shop in Fleet St., Lond., near St. Dunstan's. A quarto of M. N. D. was published "for Thomas Fisher and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the W. H. in Fleet st. 1600."

WHITE HORSE. A common tavern sign in Lond. There was a W. H. in Friday St. much frequented by George Peele; another outside Cripplegate; and a third in Southwark. In Peele's Jests, we are told: "George was invited one night to supper at the W. H. in Friday St." In the opening of Old Wives', Fantastic says, "I had even as lif the chamberlain of the W. H. had called me up to bed." Taylor, in Carriers Cosmography, says, "The Carrier of Lincoln do lodge at the W. H. without Cripplegate." In True and Wonderful (1614), appeal is made for the truth of the story to "the carrier of Horsam who lieth at the W. H. in Southwark."

WHITE HORSE. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond. Merry Devil was "Printed by Henry Ballard for Arthur Johnson dwelling at the sign of the w.-h. in Pauls Churchyard over against the great N. door of Pauls. 1608." Middleton's Phoenix was "Printed by E. A. for A. I. and are to be sold at the sign of the W. H. in Pauls churchyard. 1607."

WHITE LION. Originally a tavern, but converted about 1560 into a prison for the county of Surrey. It stood in the Borough High St., Southwark, at the S. end of St. Margaret's Hill, near St. George's Ch. It became unfit for its purpose towards the end of the 18th cent., and in 1811 the New Marshalsea was built on its site. In Henslowe's Diary 192, the author tells us how he lent 5/- to Francis Henslow "to discharge himself out of the W. L." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B., Jane Shore asks, "Have you bestowed our small benevolence On the poor prisoners in the common gaol Of the W.L. and the King's Bench?" This is an anachronism, as the prison was not in existence in the reign of Edward IV. Taylor, in Works i. 91, says, "The ocean that Suretyship sails in is the spacious Marshalsea; sometimes she anchors at the King's Bench, sometimes at the W.L. creek." In Works ii. 138, he speaks of "the common prison of Surrey called the W.L."

WHITE LION. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's churchyard, Lond. An edition of the Shepherds Kalender (not Spenser's, but a translation of Le Compost et Calendrier des Bergers) was "printed at Lond. by G. Elde for Thomas Adams dwelling in Pauls Church-yard at the sign of the W.L. 1604." B. & F. Maid's Trag. was "printed for Francis Constable and are to be sold at the W.L. in Pauls churchyard. 1622." Nabbes' C. Garden was "printed by Richd. Dalton for Charles Greene and are to be sold at the sign of the W.L. in Paul's Churchyard. 1638."

WHITE LION AND BALL. A bookseller's sign in Paul's Churchyard, Lond. Nabbes' Spring was "printed by J. Dawson and are to be sold at the sign of the W.L. & B. in St. Paul's churchyard. 1639."

WHITTINGTON'S COLLEGE. A set of alms-houses in Lond., built by Sir Richard Whittington, on the N. side of St. Michael's Paternoster Royal, on the E. side of College Hill, which runs S. from Cannon St. to Upper Thames St. to the E. of Queen St. Provision was made for 13 poor men and the necessary officials. In 1808 the Mercers' School was transferred to this site and the College was removed to Archway Road, Highgate. In T. Heywood's I.K.M.B., Nowell says of Sir Richd.: "His executors after him did build Whittington College, 13 almshouses for poor men." In Eastward iv. 4, Touchstone says to Golding: "I hope to see thee one of the monuments of our city, to be remembered when the famous fable of Whittington and his puss shall be forgotten, and thou and thy acts become the posies for Hospitals." In Dekker's Bellman, Whittington's College is used as thieves' slang for Newgate, which had been rebuilt and enlarged by Sir Richd. about 1425.

WIGHT, ISLE OF. A small island in the English Channel off the coast of Hants., of which it now forms a part. It is 23 m. long and 13 broad. From the time of Henry VII its government has been in the hands of a Captain, or Governor; but the office is now purely honorary. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A., there is a stage direction: "Enter the Capt. of the Ile of W. with Faulconbridge bound." This is an anticipation; during the reign of Edward IV the Governor of the island was entitled the Lord of W.; the last holder of the title was Lord Rivers, who was beheaded by Richd. III. In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano gives a wrong explanation of the phrase "Winchester goose" as follows: "The term lying in Winchester and many Frenchwomen coming out of the I. of W. thither (though the I. of W. could not of long time neither endure foxes nor lawyers, yet it could brook the more dreadful cockatrice) there were many punks in the town" (but see under WINCHESTER House). In Brome's Academy v. 1, Hardy says, "I'th' I. of W. he had embarked himself" [for France]. Donne, in Satires ii. 78, says, "He'll compass all the land from Scots to W." Deloney, in Craft ii. 7, "Within short time after, the Frenchmen had landed in the Ile of W. about 2000 men of war." This was in 1545.

WIGMORE. A castle in Herefordsh., 20 m. N. of Hereford, near the Shropshire boundary. It was one of the Castles of the Lords Marchers (the Mortimers, and, through them, the House of York) commanding the valleys of the Lugg and the Teme. It was in the neighbourhood of W. that Owen Glendower took the Earl of March prisoner in 1402. In Mirror for Magistrates 298, Glendower says, "In W.-land through battle rigorous I caught the right heir of the crowned house, The Earl of March, Sir Edmund Mortimer." Drayton, in Barons' Wars iii. 43, says of Mortimer: "He weighs not wealth, nor yet his W. left." In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Young Mortimer says, "W. shall fly, to set my uncle free"; i.e. "I will sell W. to raise troops for freeing my uncle" (the Earl of March).

WIGTON. A maritime county in the S. West of Scotland. In Greene's James IV iv. 3, Slipper asks, "Shall I wed Sisley of the Whighton?"

WILMECOT. The home of Shakespeare's mother, Mary Arden, whose ancestral home is still to be seen there. It is in Warwicksh., 2 or 3 m. N. West of Stratford. By some it has been identified with the Wincot mentioned in Shrew Ind. 2, 23, but without good reason. See under WINCOT.

WILTON. An ancient town in Wilts. on the Willey, 3 m. West of Salisbury. Here is W. House, the country seat of the Earls of Pembroke, where Sir Philip Sidney wrote his Arcadia. In Death Huntingdon i. 2, Salisbury says, "[Her] nurse at W. first thou ravished." Daniel, in Ep. Dedic. to his Cleopatra, addressed to Mary, Countess of Pembroke, says, "By them [i.e. these poems] great Lady, you shall then be known When W. shall lie level with the ground." John, Lord Grey of W., is the leader of the English at the siege of Leith in Sampson's Vow.

WILTSHIRE. A county in the S. West of England. It includes the famous Salisbury Plain with the great Druidical Circle known as Stonehenge. It gave their title to the Earls of W. In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Trim speaks of "the Hanging-Stones of W.," i.e. Stonehenge (see HANGING STONES). In King and Queen's Entertainment at Richmond, Tom says, "Goodman Minstrel, strike up, play us W. Tom's Delight": evidently some popular tune. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Mortimer says, "W. hath men enough to save our heads." In iii. 2, the K. says to Spencer: "I here create thee Earl of W." The patent, however, was never issued, and Spencer never really held the title. The 1st Earl was William le Scrope, created in 1397; beheaded at Bristol in 1399. In R2 ii. 1, 215, Richd. sends Bushy to the Earl of W. to bid him repair to Ely House. In line 256, Ross complains: "The Earl of W. hath the realm in farm." In ii. 2, 136, Green brings word that the Earl is already at Bristol. In iii. 2, 122, Richd. asks after his welfare, and is told of his death; and the gardener gives the Q. the same news in iii. 4, 53. In H6 C. i. 1, 14, Montague boasts, showing his bloody sword, "Brother, here's the Earl of W.'s blood Whom I encountered as the battles joined," i.e. at the 1st battle of St. Alban's. This was James Butler, son of the Earl of Ormond, created Earl of W. in 1449. He fought at St. Alban's, but was not killed there; he was attainted and beheaded in 1461. The title is now merged in the Marquessate of Winchester.

WINCHESTER. One of the oldest cities in England, the county town of Hampshire, on the right bank of the Itchin, 62 m. West of Lond. The British name was Caer Gwent; the Romans called it Belgarum, which in the Saxon times became Wente-ceaster; the legal Latin form is Wintonia. It was the capital of the West Saxon kings and, when Egbert became K. of England, he still retained it as his royal residence. William the Conqueror built 2 castles, one on the E. and the other on the West of the city; and it kept its position as a seat of the Court through the Norman period. Henry II resided there for the most part, and rebuilt the Palace; but after his death its glory declined, and Lond. took its place. The chapel of the Castle is still used as a Court of Assize, and over the Judges' Bench is hung what is alleged to be the Round Table of King Arthur and his Knights; and by many authorities W. is identified with Camelot, the capital of Arthur (see CAMELOT). W. was a centre of trade in wool and textiles during the 13th and 14th cents.; and its 4 annual Fairs were widely famous. W. Gauge or Measure became a synonym for good measure, full and running over. The road between Lond. and W. was much used, and its muddy condition became proverbial.

In Merlin iv. 5, Merlin prophesies of Arthur: "It shall be then the best of knighthood's honour At W. to fill his castle-hall And at his royal table sit and feast." In iii. 6, 134, Aurelius says, "We'll hence to W. and raise more powers To man with strength the castle Camilot." In Eastward v. 1, Syndefy says, "They were knights of the Round Table at W. that sought adventures." In Brewer's Lovesick King i. 1, the K. says, "This city W. is all our strength"; and the scene of the play is mostly laid there. In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano wrongly explains the term "W. Goose" by a story of an alleged incident, "the term then lying at W."; but see under W. HOUSE. In Piers C. vii. 211, Covetousness tells how he went "to Wy and to Winchester to the faire"; and in xiv. 52, we are told of merchants that "wenden on way as to Wynchestre faire." Skelton, in Elynor Rummin, says, "Full W. gauge We had in that age." In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Pettifog says, "She deposes that she gave him true W. measure." In Sharpham's Fleire ii. 39, Fleire promises his customers "Measure by your own yard, you shall have W. measure." Middleton, in Hubburt, says, "His breeches were full as deep as the middle of winter, or the roadway between Lond. and W." In Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities, Holland says of the author: "Whence, a young cockrel, he was sent for knowledge To W., and planted in the College."

The Bp. of W. who appears in Davenport's Matilda was Sir Peter de Rupibus (1205-1238), who was also Chief Justice of England. In Bale's Johan 1359, Wealth says in reference to the Papal Interdict: "the bp. of W. Hath full authority to spread it in Ynglond here." This is a bad guess on Bale's part; the Bp. was on the K.'s side. The Bp. who makes a brief appearance in Marlowe's Ed. II v. 1 and 2 was John de Stratford, Chancellor and Lord Treasurer of England. The W. of H6 A. and B. was Henry Beaufort, Cardinal and Chancellor, 3rd son of John of Gaunt (1406-1447) (see under BEAUFORT). He also appears in Day's B. Beggar; in i. 1, Bedford says of him: "W. hath neither grace nor shame"; and Canby says to him: "And ye were able to give him as much land as would lie between W. and Walsingham, he would be your prigger." In More iii. 2, one Jack Fawknor is introduced who claims to be the servant of "M. Morris, secretary to my Lord of W."; and says that the riot for which he has been arrested was "between the Bps.' men of Eelie and W." This was Bp. Fox, Lord Privy Seal (1500-1528). The W. of H8 iii. iv. and v. was Stephen

Gardiner, who was appointed in 1531 and deprived in 1550; restored in 1553, and died in 1555. He is also one of the characters in Cromwell, and appears in Webster's Wyat, where Wyat says of him: "My Lord of W. still thirsts for blood." Milton wrote an Epitaph on the Marchioness of W., beginning "This rich marble doth inter The honoured wife of W." She was Jane, wife of John Paulett, 5th Marquis of W., and died in 1631.

WINCHESTER HOUSE. The London Palace of the Bps. of W., built in 1107 by Bp. William Giffard and occupied by successive Bps. until the death of Lancelot Andrewes in 1626. After his death it was used for a time as a prison, and was sold in 1647 to one Thomas Walker. It was restored to the Bp. in 1660; but in 1663 it was let in tenements and the park dismantled. It was destroyed by fire in 1814, and its site is now occupied by warehouses and other business premises. It stood immediately West of the ch. of St. Mary Overy on the Bankside, Southwark, and had its chief frontage towards the river, to which access was given by a landing place called W. Stairs. To the S. and West it was surrounded by a park, the name of which survives in Park St. It is a prominent feature in the views of Wyngarde and Vischer, in which last it is shown as a Gothic Hall, running E. and West, with a lantern in the centre. The Bankside with its notorious Stews was in the liberties of the Bp.; hence arose the slang name of W. goose or pigeon for a prostitute, and also for the venereal disease. In the foreword to I. Temple, it is stated that "The Masquers with their attendants set forth from W. H., which was the rendez-vous, towards the Court." Howes, describing the same Masque, says, "These masquers took barge at W. Stairs, and rowed to Whitehall against the tide."

In H6 A. i. 3, 53, Gloucester cries to the Bp.: "W. goose, I cry, a rope, a rope!" In Troil. v. 10, 55, Pandar, addressing the audience, says, "My fear is this, Some galled goose of W. would hiss." Taylor, in Works i. 105, says, "There's a goose that breeds at W. and of all geese my mind is least to her." In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Pettifog says, "This informer comes into Turnbull st. to a victualling house and there falls in a league with a wench and there got a goose; she deposes that she gave him true W. measure." Jonson, in Vulcan, speaks of "the Winchesterian goose Bred on the Bank in time of popery, Where Venus there maintained the mystery." In Chapman's D'Olive iv. 2, D'Olive says, "The Court is the only school of good education, especially for pages and waiting-women; Paris or Padua or the famous school of England called W. (famous I mean for the goose) where scholars wear petticoats so long till their pen and ink-horns knock against their knees; all these are but belfries to the body or school of the Court." There is here an allusion to William of Wykeham's famous school. In Bacchus, we read of a youth who "carried a water-wagtail ready to fly at the fairest goose in W." In Penn. Parl., it is said: "Those who play fast and loose with women's apron-strings may chance make a journey for a W. pigeon." In Nomenclator (1585), we are told: "A sore in the groin . . . if it come by lechery, is called a W. goose, or a botch." See also under WINCHESTER.

WINCOT. A vill. in the N. of Gloucestersh. in the parish of Quinton, some 5 or 6 m. S. of Stratford-on-Avon. All that is now left of it is a single farm-house. In the registers of Quinton Ch. is an entry of the baptism of Sara Hacket, daughter of Robert Hacket, on Nov. 21st, 1591. In Shrew Ind., 2, 23, Sly says, "Ask Marian Hacket, the fat ale-wife of W., if she know me not." On the strength of Sir Aston Cockain's lines (1658) addressed to Mr. Clement Fisher who lived at Wilnecote, spelled W. by Sir Aston, Shakespeare's W. has been identified with Wilnecot. He says, "Shakespeare your W. ale hath much renowned," and goes on to speak of the Sly incident in the Ind. to Shrew. It lies abt. 30 m. N. of Stratford on Watling St., a little S. of Tamworth. Others with still less probability have identified W. with Wilnecot and Woncot (q.v.).

WINDHAM, more often spelled WYNDHAM or WYMONDEHAM. A town in Norfolk, 10 m. S.West of Norwich. It was the starting point of Ket's rebellion in the reign of Edward VI. It had 3 fairs a year: in February, May, and September. In Day's B. Beggar iv., Stroud says, "There were a sort of tumblers at Windham fair last year, and they have made it so stale in Norfolk and Suffolk that every wench is turned tumbler."

WINDMILL. A famous tavern at the corner of Old Jewry and Lothbury, in Lond. Originally a Jewish synagogue, it was transferred to the Frates de Sacca on the expulsion of the Jews from England in 1291. It then passed in succession to Robert Fitzwater (1305); Robert Lange (Lord Mayor in 1439); and Hugh Clopton (Lord Mayor in 1492). It became a tavern at the beginning of the 16th cent., and in 1522 was able to supply 14 feather-beds, and stabling for 20 horses. Fuller, in Church History iii. 13, 33, says of the Jews: "After their expulsion, their synagogue was turned into the Convent of the Friars of the Sack, or De Poenitentia Jesu; and after their suppression it became successively the house, first of a lord, then of a merchant, since of any man for his money; being turned into a tavern with the sign of the W.; a proper sign to express the moveableness of that place, which, with several gales of success, hath been turned about from so many owners and to so many uses." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 282, Tawniecoat, coming from the Stocks market, says, "Sure this is the lane; there's the W." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. i. 1, young Wellbred addresses his letter to young Knowell "from the W."; and begins it: "Why hast thou forsworn all thy friends i' the Old Jewry?" In iv. 6, Formal takes Brainworm "to the W.; there we shall have a cup of neat grist, we call it"; and in v. 3, Brainworm says that the newly-married couple "are ready to bespeak their wedding supper at the W." In the list of Taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we have "The W. in Lothbury." There was also a W. tavern in St. George's Fields (q.v.). In H. B. iii. 2, 208, Shallow says to Falstaff: "O Sir John, do you remember since we lay all night in the W. in St. George's field?"

WINDMILL. The sign of a tavern in Foy. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. i. 4, Spencer says to Bess: "I have a house in Foy, a tavern called the W.; that I freely give thee." Parts of Acts ii. and iii. take place there.

WINDMILLS. Certain windmills erected in the reign of Elizabeth in Finsbury Fields, Lond., on a piece of ground where 1,000 cartloads of bones from the charnel house of St. Paul's had been buried in 1549; it was afterwards used for the interment of criminals who had been hanged. The W. stood somewhere near the N.West corner of the present Finsbury Sq. In Stucley 616, Blurt says of Jack Dudley: "He's in Finsbury gaol for hurting a man behind the w. last Saturday." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 1, Chough says, "I have heard 'em roar from the six w. to Islington." In Shirley's Wedding iv. 3, a man, speaking at Finsbury, says, "I see nothing but 5 or 6 w.!" The road past them was called Windmill Hill. In Middleton's Hubburt, p. 96, the soldier, who has gone to Finsbury Fields to beg, says, "Looking down Windmill Hill I might espy a fine-fashioned dame."

WINDSOR—more exactly, NEW WINDSOR. A town in Berks. on the S. bank of the Thames, 21 m. S.West of Lond. A bidge. connects it with Eton on the other side of the river. Old W. lies abt. 2 m. S.E. of the Castle, and was a favourite residence of the Saxon kings. There was, however, a fortress at New W., where the Round Tower now stands; and William the Conqueror surrounded it with a stone wall. Henry III built the first Round Tower of the Castle, and it was reconstructed by Edward III, and finally raised to its present height by George IV. From the time of Henry I. the Castle, which stands on a hill E. of the town, has been the chief residence of the English sovereigns. Edward III carried out extensive works there under the direction of William of Wykeham; and in the time of Richd. II Chaucer was Clerk of the Works. The Chapel of St. George, founded by Edward III for the Knights of the Garter, was rebuilt, much in its present form, by Edward IV. Henry VII added to the buildings, and Elizabeth began the Terraces which are so striking a feature of the Castle. It was greatly improved and largely rebuilt by Sir Jeffry Wyattville in the reign of George IV. It is surrounded by the Little Park, some 18 m. in circuit; beyond this to the west is W. Forest, connected with the Castle by the famous Long Walk; it contains many magnificent oaks, and is well stocked with deer.

The scene of M. W. W. is laid at W., and Shakespeare shows an intimate knowledge of the locality. There are references to the Garter Inn, Frogmore, Datchett Mead, the Thames, Reading, Maidenhead, Colebrook, Herne's Oak, Eton, and Brentford; for which see under the respective names. In ii. 2, 62, Quickly refers to the time "when the Court lay at W." In iii. 1, 5, Simple says he has looked "the pittie-ward, the park-ward, every way; Old W. way and every way but the town way" (see Pittie Ward). In iii. 3, 230, Page says he would not have Ford's distemper "for the wealth of W. Castle." In iv. 3, 29, Herne is said to have been "sometime a keeper here in W. forest." In v. 5, 1, Falstaff says, "The W. bell hath struck 12," i.e. the Castle clock. In line 14, he says, "I am here, a W. stag." In line 60, Quickly says, "Search W. Castle, elves, within and out." In Middleton's R. G. v. 2, Greene says, "Lambeth joins more mad matches than your six wet towns 'twixt that and W. Bidge"; probably Fulham, Richmond, Kingston, Hampton, Chertsey, and Staines are the towns intended. In Brome's Sparagus iii. 11, Rebecca says, "I do long to go to W. to know if the prophecy be as true there as 'tis reported here, that all old women shall die." In Deloney's Reading xi., Jarman, the murderous innkeeper of Colebrook, "soon after was taken in W. Forest."

In Davenport's Matilda ii. 1, the boy says, "I have heard of W. Castle; my father told me there are brave bows and arrows and drums there"; and the scene of iii. 1 is laid at W. Castle. In Death Huntington iii. 3, the K. says, "You shall stay in W. Castle with Sir Walter Blount." In Greene's Friar vi., Bungay says, "Lacy, the Earl of Lincoln, is late fled from W. Court." The scenes of R. 2 ii. 2 and v. 6 are laid at W. Castle.

In H4 A. i. 1, 104, the K. says, "On Wednesday next our Council will we hold At W." In S. Rowley's When you L. 3, K. Henry VIII says to the Emperor Charles V: "Your Majesty shall take the order [sc. of the Garter] And sit installed therewith in W. Castle." In True Trag., p. 127, it is predicted of Henry VIII that he shall be "buried in W." He was buried in St. George's Chapel by his own wish, next to his Q., Jane Seymour. The only sovereign previously buried there was Edward IV. The iron grille of Edward's tomb still remains, but there is no trace of Henry's. In Mayne's Match iii. 1, Plotwell mentions W. Castle as a popular show-place that attracted large crowds. Amongst the curiosities preserved there was a so-called Unicorn's Horn, brought home by Frobisher after his and voyage; it was 2 yards long, and was probably the horn of a narwhale. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities, Peacham mentions amongst the sights of England "The horn of W. (of a Unicorn very likely)." In Nabbes' Bride iii. 2, Ferret says, "He would gladly part with all that he hath for the Unicorn's horn at W." Jonson's Gipsies was performed at W. Castle in August 1621, and amongst the characters are "all the good wenches of W.: Prue of the Park, Frances of the Castle, Long Meg of Eaton, and Christian of Dorney." One of the scenes in Carew's Coelum Britannicum is "a prospect of W. Castle." In H4 B. ii. 1, 100, the Hostess says to Falstaff: "The Prince broke thy head for liking his father to a singing-man of W."; i.e. one of the singers in the royal chapel of St. George.

In Fair Em. ii. 2, William the Conqueror masquerades as Sir Robert of W. The 6th son of Edward I, who died young, was known as William of W. In H6 B. ii. 2, 17, York says, "William of W. was the 7th and last"; i.e. of Edward's sons. In this Shakespeare follows Holinshed, who mistakenly makes Thomas of Woodstock the 6th and William of W. the 7th son. Henry VI was born at W. In H6 A. iii. 1, 199, Exeter quotes a prophecy "that Henry born at Monmouth should win all, and Henry born at W. lose all." In Puritan ii. 1, the Widow speaks of "the prophecy in the Chronicle . . . Harry of Monmouth won all, and Harry of W. lost all." Hall quotes Henry V as saying "I Henry, born at Monmouth, shall small time reign and much get, and Henry, born at W., shall long reign and all lose." The Lord W. mentioned in Stucley 153 was Edward, 3rd Baron W. of Stanwell; the title has nothing to do with the place W., but was the surname of the 1st Baron.

Pensions and apartments in the Castle were granted to a certain number of military men in necessitous circumstances, who were known as "the poor knights of W." In Middleton's Mad World ii. 2, Sir Bounteous says, "I was knighted at Westminster, but many of these nights will make me a knight of W." In Eastward iv. 2, one of the gentlemen says to Sir Peter: "A poor knight of England! A poor knight of W. are you not?" Middleton, in Hubbard, p. 104, says, "One of the poor knights of Poetry, worse by odds than one of the poor knights of W." In Shirley's C. Maid iii. 1, the servant says, "You'll not look [in those clothes] like a poor knight of W." In his Pleasure v. 1, Borawell says he will go to the wars "and, if the bullets favour me to snatch any superfluous limb, when I return, with good friends I despair not to be enrolled poor knight of W." In Middleton's Chess iii. 1, the Fat Bp. says he has been made "Dean of the poor alms-knights that wear badges." He (Spalato) was made Dean of W. by James I.

WINGFIELD. The name of 2 vills. in Derbysh., distinguished as N. and S. W. S. Wingfield lies on the Amber, 14 m. N. of Derby. It possesses the ruins of a fine castellated manor-house built in the 15th cent. by Ralph Cromwell and resided in for a time by the captive Mary Q. of Scots. In H6 A. iv. 7, 66, one of Lord Talbot's titles is "Lord Cromwell of W."

WINGHAM. A vill. in Kent, 7 m. E. of Canterbury, on the road to Sandwich. It has an ancient ch. and some interesting half-timbered houses. In H6 B. iv. 2, 24, Holland sees among Jack Cade's followers "Best's son, the tanner of W."

WINIFRED'S WELL (SAINT). A spring in the neighbourhood of Holywell in the county of Flint, N. Wales; it lies on the West side of the estuary of the Dee some 6 m. N. West of Flint. It was said to have risen from the blood of St. Winifred, a Christian maiden who was ravished and beheaded here in the 7th century by a certain Prince Cradocus or Caradoc; he was swallowed up alive by the earth, but the virgin's head was re-united to her body, and she lived for 15 years afterwards. The Well was enclosed in a chapel from early times; the present shrine was built by Henry VII. It contained images of the Virgin Mary and the Saint; but both have disappeared. It was a famous place of pilgrimage, and many cures were alleged to have been wrought by its waters.

The story of St. Winifred is told at length in Deloney's Craft. In the preface he says, "Round this well did grow a kind of moss, which is of a most sweet savour, and the colour thereof is as fresh in Winter as in Summer." W. Rowley, in Shoemaker i. 3, tells the story of the origin of the well, and an Angel, appearing from it, declares that it shall have power to cure lepers, and to heal the blind and lame; but he transfers Winifred to the latter part of the 3rd cent., and makes her perish with her lover, Sir Hugh, at St. Alban's in the Dioclesian persecution. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, the Palmer claims to have been "at Saynt Wynefrede's W. in Wales." In Munday's John Kent ii., Cumber says, "They at St. Winifrides fair hallowed spring Went with the Countess." In Brome's M. Beggars ii. 1, Hilliard proposes to the company "a pilgrimage to St. Winifride's W." Taylor, in Works i. 33, says, "St. W. W., the Bath, or the Spaw, are not to be compared with this ship [the Sleeper] for speedy ease and cure." Nash, in Lenten, says that springs can be obtained in Norfolk "as apt and accomodated as St. W. W. so much praised and sought after." Drayton, in Polyolb. iv. 197, calls it "The sacred Virgin's Well," and says that the moss from it was used in pomanders as a precaution against "infectious damps."

WINNO'S, SAINT. Saint Winno, or Winnoc, was a Flemish Abbot and saint of the 8th cent.; I have not been able to find any ch. dedicated to him anywhere in or near Lond.; possibly the ch. is as fictitious as the rest of the butler's story. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iv. 1, the butler says of the supposed robbers: "They took over the lawns and left Winno steeple on the left hand."

WITHAM. An ancient town in Essex on the Brain, 9 m. N.E. of Chelmsford. It is said to have been founded by Edward the Elder on the site of an old Roman station. Half a mile from W. itself is Little W., on Chipping Hill. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, W. is mentioned as one of the places visited by Merry Report. In Wilson's Pedler 481, the Pedler says, "At Little W. 7 years I went to school and there I learnt the science of Morosophie."

WITNEY. An ancient town in Oxfordsh., 11 m. West of Oxford. It had a considerable trade in blankets and woollens; waggon-loads of blankets were sent to Lond. every week to be sold there. The W. singers of the quotation were, I suppose, the itinerant vendors of W. blankets. In Chaunticleers iv., Heath says, "The W. singers are but chattering magpies to this melodious nightingale."

WITTENBERG. A town in Saxony on the Elbe, 55 m. S.West of Berlin. It had a famous University, founded in 1502 and incorporated with the University of Halle in 1817. The buildings are now transformed into a military barracks. The town owes its chief celebrity to its connection with Luther and the Reformation. The Augustinian Monastery in which he lived is still partly preserved and is used as a Luther Museum. The Schloss-kirche, to the doors of which he affixed his 95 theses in 1517, was much damaged by fire in 1760, and has been rebuilt, the old wooden doors being replaced by bronze ones, on which the theses are inscribed. The tombs of Luther and Melancthon are in this ch. Luther was appointed Professor in the University in 1508; and Dr. Faustus was believed to have been a student there.

In Ham. i. 2, 113, the K. says that Hamlet's "intent In going back to school [i.e. to the University] in W." is contrary to his own desire; and in 119, the Q. prays him "Go not to W." From 164 and 168 we learn that Horatio has also been a student at W. All this is extreme anachronism; but such a matter was not even a mote to trouble the mind's eye of the Poet. In Marlowe's Faustus Prol. 13, we are told of Faust: "Of riper years to W. he went," and that he took his Doctor's Degree there in Divinity. In the 1st edition it is printed "Wertenberg"; but this is a mere slip in spelling, as the Faust-Buch shows. In Milkmaids ii. 2, Dorigene says of Bernard: "I hope he did not spend his time so ill in the University of W." In Chettle's Hoffman C. 1, Jerom says, "I am no fool, I have been at W. where wit grows." In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Lincoln says of his nephew Roland: "My jolly coz became a shoemaker in W."

WODSTOCK. See WOODSTOCK.

WOLF. The sign of a house in Cheapside, Lond. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iv. 2, the butler says, "I am now going to their place of residence, situate in the choicest place in the city, and at the sign of the Wolf, just against Goldsmiths-Row."

WOLGHA. See VOLGA.

WOLPIT, or WOOLPIT. A vill. in Suffolk, 3 m. E. of Bury St. Edmund's. An image of the Virgin Mary, which stood there, had some local repute. In Poverty, p. 315, Envy says, "Hence, whoreson! By our Lady of Wolpit I shall rap thee of the pate."

WONCOT, or WOODMANCOTE. A vill. in the N. of Gloucestersh., 3 m. West of Winchcombe. In H4 B. v. 1, 42, Davy says, "I beseech you, Sir, to countenance William Visor of W. against Clement Perkes of the hill." The hill is still the local name for Stinchcombe Hill, which rises above the vill. to the height of 915 ft. A family of Visors, or Vizards, was living there until recent years; and the Perkes, or Purchas, family was there until 1812. Some have identified the Wincot in Shrew Ind. 2, 23 with W., and in some editions it is so spelt; but this is quite wrong. See under WINCOT.

WOODKIRK, or WOODCHURCH. A vill. in West Riding Yorksh., on the road from Leeds to Dewsbury. There was a monastery there, which was a cell of Nostell Priory and was founded about 1100. The Towneley M. P. were acted by the Guilds of Wakefield at the Fair held at Woodkirk by the Canons of Nostell at the feast of the Assumption.

WOOD'S CLOSE, possibly the same as Woon's or Woon GREEN. A vill. abt. 3½ m. N. of Islington, just beyond Hornsey. In T. Heywood's Royal King iv., the Clown says, "Away, betake you to the end of the town; let me find you between Wood's Close and Islington."

WOODSTOCK. An ancient town in Oxfordsh. on the Glyme, 8 m. N.West of Oxford. The old Manor-house was a royal residence as early as the time of Alfred the Great. It was a favourite retreat of Henry I, and it was here that Henry II used to meet Rosamund Clifford, whom he is said to have concealed in the heart of a kind of maze. Thomas, D. of Gloucester, the youngest son of Edward III, was born here. The chief manufacture of the town is gloves. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B., the Q. says, "There was once a k., Henry the second, who did keep his leman Caged up at W. in a labyrinth." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xiv., Crafty Conveyance swears "by the rood of Wodstocke Park." In H6 B. ii. 2, 16, York speaks of "Thomas of W., D. of Gloucester"; he calls him the 6th son of Edward III, following Holinshed; but William of Windsor was really the 6th and Thomas the 7th son. In R2 i. 2, 1, Gaunt says, "Alas, the part I had in W.'s blood Doth more solicit me than your exclams." This is the reading of the Qq; the Ff have "Glouster's." W. plays a prominent part in Trag. Richd. II, where his kidnapping and murder at Calais are fully described. See under GLOUCESTER.

WOOD STREET. Lond., running N. from Cheapside between Cutter Lane and Milk St. Probably it derived its name from the article sold there, like most of the streets running off Cheapside; cf. Bread St., Milk St., etc. At the S.West corner of W. St. and Cheapside was the Ch. of St. Peter in Cheap, on the site of which grew the tree immortalised by Wordsworth. A little higher up on the E. side was the Compter, or Counter (q.v.). At the corner of Hugin Lane is the Ch. of St. Michael; and at the corner of Love Lane on the E. side that of St. Alban. The Cheapside Cross stood opposite the end of W. St.

Taylor, in Works ii. 239, says, "They have set up a cross post in Cheapside on Sundays near W.-st. end, which makes the coaches rattle further from the Ch." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny, p. 1, mentions that the lodging of the Ambassador of the K. of Morocco was in W. St. In Curtain Drawer of the World (1612), it is mentioned that the well-known strong man from High Germany (for whom see under GERMANY) lived in W. St. Gascoigne, in Steel Glass 791, speaks of young roisterers who are sent "To read Arithmetic once every day In W.-st., Bread-st., and in Poultry, Where such schoolmasters keep their counting-house"; i.e. the Counter. In W. Rowley's New Wonder iv., Speedwell says, "I love tobacco, but would be loth to drink in W.-st. pipes." In Dekker's Westward iii. 1, Tenterhook says to his wife: "Buy a link and meet me at the Counter in W.-st." In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 3, Shortyard speaks of "the 2 city hazards, Poultry and Wood-st." In his Phoenix iv. 3, the Officer says, "In London stand 2 most famous Universities, Poultry and W.-st., where some have taken all their degrees from the Master's side down to the Mistress' side, the Hole." In his R. G. iii. 3, Wengrave says, "Sir Davy, send your son to W.-st. College, A gentleman can nowhere get more knowledge." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii. 2, when Alexander says that the Lieutenant was a serjeant first, Tim asks, "Of the Poultry, or of W.-st.?" In Sharpham's Fleire iv. 160, Ruffel tells of a serjeant and a yeoman who have been put out to nurse "at the Counter in W.-st." Liberality was "printed by Simon Stafford for George Vincent and are to be sold at the sign of the Hand-in-Hand in W.-st. over against S. Michael's Ch. 1602." Wilkins' Enforced Marriage was published by Vincent at the same place in 1607.

WOOKEY HOLE. A cavern at Wookey, a vill. in Somersetsh., 2 m. West of Wells. The Axe rises in this cavern; and prehistoric remains have been found in it. In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough speaks of "W. H. in Somersetsh." as one of the places he went through on his way from Cornwall to Lond.

WOOLSACK. A tavern in Lond., without Aldgate, famous for its pies. In Jonson's Alchemist v. 1, Subtle says to Dapper: "Her Grace would have you eat no more W. pies, no Dagger frumety." In his Devil i. 1, Iniquity says, "We will put in at Custom-house key there And see how the factors and prentices play there False with their masters, and geld many a full pack, To spend it in pies at the Dagger and W." There was another W., in Ivy Lane. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 5, Firk says, "A mess of shoemakers meet at the W. in Ivy Lane."

WOOLSTAPLE. The central woolstaple for England was established in Westminster in 1353. All wool sent out from Lond. had to be brought there for registration and to pay duty. The site of the W. was on the N. of New Palace Yard, where Bridge St. now runs. It was divided into 2 parts, the long and the round. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Mrs. Tattle enumerates the places where she seeks for the latest news: "The conduits in Westminster, all the news of Tuttle St., and both the Almshouses, the two Sanctuaries, long and round W., with King's st. and Canon-Row to boot." Taylor, in Works ii. 225, tells of a soldier who "dwelt lately in Westminster, in the round W."

WOOLWICH. A town in Kent on the S. bank of the Thames, 8 m. E. of Lond. and 35 from the Nore Light at the mouth of the river. The importance of the town dates from the foundation of the Royal Dockyard by Henry VIII about 1515. The Royal Arsenal was removed there from Moorfields in 1716 and became of great importance during the Napoleonic wars. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Peregrine tells how a whale was "discovered in the river as high as W." This occurred in January 1605. Act ii. 2 of Fair Women is laid at W. In line 163, Barnes, speaking of Saunders, who is at Lond., says, "I hope at afternoon a pair of oars May bring him down to W." In line 209, Old John says, "I dreamed that I heard the bells of Barking as plain to our town of W. as if I had lain in the steeple." In line 177, Beane says that the reach "between Blackwall and W." is the most dangerous part of the journey to Lond.

WORCESTER. The county town of Worcestersh., on the E. bank of the Severn, 102 m. N.West of Lond. The great glory of the city is the Cathedral, begun by

Bp. Wulfstan soon after the Conquest, and completed in 1216. It was very thoroughly repaired in 1857. It contains the tombs of K. John and of Prince Arthur, elder brother of Henry VIII. The Castle, which stood S. of the Cathedral, has entirely disappeared. There seems to have been a regular play-house at W. as early as the reign of Henry VIII. One of the companies of actors mentioned by Henslowe was the Earl of W.'s. This was Edward Somerset, who died in 1628. Thomas Nabbes, the dramatist, was a W. man. In the Consistory Court of W., under date November 28th, 1582, 2 husbandmen of Stratford, Sandells and Richardson, became sureties to free the Bp. from liability in case of any lawful impediment to the marriage of "William Shagspeare and Anne Hathwey." This probably, though not certainly, refers to the great dramatist's marriage, which took place in 1582.

In K. J. v. 7, 99, Prince Henry says of John: "At W. must his body be interred, For so he willed it." In H4 A. iv. 1, 125, Vernon says of Glendower: "I learned in W., as I rode along, He cannot draw his power this 14 days." The Earl of W. who appears in R2 as breaking his staff of office and joining Bolingbroke, and who subsequently is the leading spirit in the revolt of the Percies against the K. in H4, and is spoken of by Westmoreland, in H4 A. i. 1, 96, as "W., Malevolent to you [the King] in all aspects," was Thomas Percy, younger brother of Henry, Earl of Northumberland; he was created Earl in 1397, taken prisoner and beheaded at Shrewsbury in 1402. He was the first and last of his family to hold the title. Cromwell defeated Charles II and his army of Scots at W. on Sept. 3rd, 1651. Milton, in Sonnet to Cromwell 9, says, "Dunbar field resounds thy praises loud And W.'s laureat wreath." In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Cutter boasts that he has served the K. "everywhere; and the last time at W." In Jonson's Barthol. iii. 1, Nightingale sings a ballad beginning: "At Worcester 'tis known well, and even in the jail, A knight of good worship did there show his face Against the foul sinners, in zeal for to rail, And lost ipso facto his purse in the place."

WORCESTERSHIRE. One of the midland counties of England, lying between Shropsh., Stafford, Hereford, Gloucester, and Warwick. The salt works at Droitwich go back to old Roman times, and were still important in the days of Elizabeth. In a song entitled "The Cries of Rome" appended to T. Heywood's Lucrece, we have "Salt—Salt—white Worstershire salt!" According to Old Meg, p. 1, W. was famous "for Bag-pypes."

WORLD. Another name for the GLOBE THEATRE (q.v.), the sign of which was Hercules carrying the world on his shoulders. Jonson, in Vulcan, describes the burning of the Globe in 1613 and says, "See the World's ruins; nothing but the pales Left, and wit since to cover it with tiles."

WORLD'S END. The sign of a tavern in Spring Gardens, Knightsbridge, Lond. The Gardens lay S. of Knightsbridge, at the N. end of what is now Lowndes Sq., nearly opposite the Albert Gate of Hyde Park. Pepys more than once mentions carouses he had there. There was another W. E. tavern in King's Rd., Chelsea, just West of Battersea Bridge; the sign is still retained at 459 King's Rd. In both cases the name indicated the distance of the tavern from Lond. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius sings in his list of taverns: "The banquerout [goes] to the W. E."

WORMS. The ancient Borbetomagus, a city now in Hesse-Darmstadt, once a sovereign Bishopric; on the Rhine, 28 m. S. of Mainz. It was for a time the residence of Charlemagne, and many Diets of the Holy Roman Empire were held there, the most famous being that of 1521, when Luther appeared before Charles V. In Ham. iv. 3, 20, Hamlet says of the dead Polonius: "A certain convocation of politic worms are e'en at him. Your worm is your only emperor for diet." There can be little doubt that there is a reference to the Diet of 1521.

WORTLEY. A vill. in West Riding Yorks., about 10 m. N. of Sheffield. There is also a W., a suburb of Leeds; but the former is the one intended in the quotation. In Downfall Huntingdon i. 3, Little John says, "At Rowford, Sowtham, W., Hothersfield, Of all your cattle money shall be made, And I at Mansfield will attend your coming."

WOXFORD. I have not been able to find any such place; perhaps the name is invented for the sake of the rhyme. Possibly it may be meant for Wixford, a town 2 m. S. of Alcester in Warwickshire; or Yoxford (q.v.). In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 1, Sir Boniface says, "Natus eram in Woxford; and I proceeded in Oxford."

WREXHAM, WRICKSOM, or RIXAM. A town in Denbighsh., N. Wales, on a tributary of the Dee, 11 m. S.West of Chester. The ch. was built in 1470, and its tower, 135 ft. in height, and reckoned one of the 7 wonders of Wales, was completed in 1500. The first ch. organ in Wales was erected in W. Ch., and was an object of great pride to the Welsh people. It was unfortunately destroyed by the Puritans in the Civil War. Fynes Moryson, in Itin. iii. 3, 143, says that the town W. is "beautified with a most fair tower, called the Holy Tower, and commended for the musical organs in the ch." In T. Heywood's Royal King i., the Welshman says, "It was told us in Wales that you have great pigge organ in Pauls and pigger by a great deal than our organ at Rixam." In Jonson's Wales, Howell sings of "our louder W. organ." In B. & F. Pilgrim iv. 3, a Welsh madman says, "The organs at Rixum were made by revelations; there is a spirit blows and blows the bellows." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iii. 2, 184, Barnaby, with amusing disregard of his supposed date (A.D. 297), speaks of "the great organ at Wricksom."

WROTHAM, or WROOTHAM. A vill. in Kent, 11 m. N.West of Maidstone. It has a fine old ch., and the ruins of the old palace of the Archbps. of Canterbury still remain. In Oldcastle, the parish priest, who has turned highwayman and goes about robbing travellers, accompanied by his Doll, is Sir John of W. In iv. 1, he says, "I have but one parsonage, W.; 'tis better than the Bishoprick of Rochester"; and he goes on: "W. Hill pays me tithe"—through the travellers he waylays there; it was on the road between Lond. and Maidstone. This worthy parson was a real person, and was imprisoned in Newgate in 1418.

WYAN. See GULENNE.

WYE. A river rising on the S. side of Plinlimmon in S. Wales, and flowing through Herefordsh. and between Monmouth and Gloucester shires to fall into the estuary of the Severn just below Chepstow. The scenery of the valley of the W. is specially beautiful. In H4 A. iii. 1, 65, Glendower boasts: "Thrice from the banks of W. And sandy-bottomed Severn have I sent him [K. Henry] Bootless home." In H5 iv. 7, 29, Fluellen says, "There is a river in Macedon; and there is also moreover a river at Monmouth; it is called W. at Monmouth." In line 111, he says to the K.: "All the water in W. cannot wash your Majesty's Welsh plood out of your pody." In Death Huntingdon ii. 2, young Bruce speaks of "the Lord of the March that lies on W., Lug, and the Severn streams." Drayton, in Polyolb. vii. 196, says that the W. "right her name to show, Oft windeth in her way, as back she meant to go."

WYLSHOME, now WILLESSEN. A suburb of Lond., now a well-known railway junction. It was formerly a small vill., lying 7 m. N.West of St. Paul's. There was an image of the Virgin Mary there which was much visited by pilgrims. Along with several other such images, it was brought to Chelsea and burnt in 1538. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, the Palmer claims to have been "at Wylsdome."

WYTHAM. See WITHAM.

X

XANTHUS (another name for the SCAMANDER). One of the rivers of ancient Troy (q.v.). Homer, Iliad xx. 74, says that it was called X. by the Gods and Scamander by men. In Peele's Arraignment ii. 2, Juno says, "X. shall run liquid gold for thee to wash thy hands." In Marlowe's Dido ii. 1, Aeneas says, "That town there should be Troy, yon Ida's hill, There's X. stream, because here's Priamus." In Taming of a Shrew, Haz., p. 513, Ferando says, "More fair and radiant is my bonny Kate Than silver X. when he doth embrace The ruddy Simois at Ida's feet." In Nero iv. 1, the Emperor says of Poppaea: "Such Venus is when on the sandy shore Of X. or on Ida's pleasant green She leads the dance."

In Lochrine iii. 4, 9, the hero says of the God of War: "He drove the Argives over X. streams." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 35, makes the X. and the Scamander separate rivers; the Trojan dames, he says, "Saw the fields of fair Scamander strown With carcasses of noble warriors. . . . And X. sandy banks with blood all overflown."

XERES, pronounced Sheres (see SHERRIS). In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant says, "Our Sherryes merchants, though few of us be here, shall soundly pay to the furnishing of this navy." The trial in the last Act is held at Sherryes.

YARMOUTH. A spt. and fishing station at the mouth of the Yare, just at the boundary of Norfolk and Suffolk; the main part of the town is in the former county, but a small part is in the latter. It is 122 m. N.E. of Lond. It is an ancient town, and part of its old walls still remains. The parish ch. of St. Nicholas, founded in 1101, is one of the largest in England. The Roads afford good anchorage. It is especially famous for its herring fisheries, and Y. bloaters are renowned throughout the world. There was a theatre here in the 16th cent. The alternative title of Nash's Lenten is "Concerning the Description and first Procreation and Increase of the town of Great Y. in Norfolk." In Jonson's Alchemist v. 3, Face says, "You shall hear of the Captain at Y., or some good port-town else, lying for a wind." In Brewer's Lovesick King ii., Randolph says, "Bid them put in at Lyn and Y." Dekker, in News from Hell, says, "More salt water runs out of them [Charon's eyes] than would pickle all the herrings that shall come out of Y."

YGUALADA. A town in N.E. Spain in Catalonia, 36 m. N.W. of Barcelona. In B. & F. Pilgrimage, ii. 4 and iii. 1 and 2 are laid in an inn at Y. and its neighbourhood.

YNGLOND. See ENGLAND.

YORK. The county town of Yorks., lying at the junction of the Ouse and Foss, 188 m. N. of Lond., on the North Road. Originally it was a British town and was called Eborac or Eborac. Under the Romans it was known as Eboracum and was their military centre in the N. Of the original Roman walls some parts remain near Bootham Bar. The Emperor Hadrian held his court here in A.D. 120; here Severus died in 211 and Constantius Chlorus in 306; and here his son Constantine the Gt. was declared Emperor. After the English conquest it was named Eoforwic, and Edwin after his conversion in 627 made it an archbp.'s see, with jurisdiction over the northern province of England and the whole of Scotland. Under Alcuin it became one of the most famous seats of learning in Europe. The first English Parliament was held at Y. in 1175. The walls of the English city are in good preservation, and are entered by 4 fine gates or bars—Micklegate Bar on the S.; Bootham Bar on the N.; Monk Bar, formerly Goodramgate Bar, on the W., on the Scarborough road; and Walmgate Bar on the S.E. The Castle was enclosed by its present wall in 1836, but it includes remains of the structure of William the Conqueror in Clifford's Tower; it is now used as a gaol. The Minster, dedicated to St. Peter, occupies the site of the ch. in which K. Edwin was baptised in 627; the oldest part of the building is the transepts, which belong to the 13th cent.; the nave was completed in 1345; the new choir in 1400. The towers were built during the 15th cent.; and the building as it now is was consecrated in 1472. The ruins of St. Mary's Abbey date back to the 11th cent. The Ouse has been crossed from time immemorial by a bridge at the point where the Ouse Bdge. now stands. From its position Y. was subject to attacks from the Scots in times of border warfare. The phrase "from Lond. to Y." is used to mean the whole length of England. Y. is famous in the history of the Drama for the performance by the craft-guilds of a cycle of Mystery Plays from the middle of the 14th cent. till about 1580. This Cycle has been happily preserved and consists of 48 scenes, extending from the Creation to the Day of Judgment; but there were originally 57 scenes. The performances took place at the festival of Corpus Christi, on the Thursday after Whit-Sunday. In Val. Welsh iv. 5, Caradoc says, "At Y. the noble Prince Menusius dwells." In Brewer's Lovesick King, iv. 1, the K. of Scots says, "Alone the city Y. holds firm again, Whose buildings we will level to the earth Unless they yield up the city." In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Lancaster reports: "Upon the walls of Y. the Scots make road And unresisted draw away rich spoils." In Ed. III i. 2, K. David says, "We will so persist With eager roads beyond their city Y." In R2 v. 5, 73, the Groom tells how "travelling towards Y." he has managed to come to Pontefract to visit the K. In H4 A. v. 5, 36, the K. orders Prince John and Westmoreland to bend "towards Y. to meet Northumberland." In H4 B. iv. 3, 80, Lancaster, after his victory in Gaultree Forest, says, "Send Colville with his confederates To Y. to present execution." In ii. 1, the Chief Justice tells Falstaff: "You should have been well on your way to Y." In H6 C. i. 4, 179, Margaret, having captured Richd. of Y., commands: "Off with his head and set it on Y. gates; So Y. may overlook the town of Y." In ii. 1, 65, the Messenger reports: "They took his head and on the gates of Y. They set the same." The scene of ii. 2 is laid before Y., and Margaret cries to Henry: "Welcome, my Lord, to this brave town of Y." In ii. 6, 53, Warwick commands: "From off the gates of Y. fetch down the head, Your father's head, which Clifford placed there." Act iv. 7 is laid before Y.; the Mayor of Y. and his brethren appear on the walls; and Edward addresses them: "What then remains, we being thus arrived From Ravenspurgh before the gates of Y. But that we enter as into our Dukedom?" In line 79, he decides: "For this night Let's harbour here in Y." In H8 iv. 2, 12, Griffith tells Q. Katharine how "the stout Earl Northumberland Arrested him [Wolsey] at Y." In Preston's Cambises, O.E.D. i. 294, Hob says of a chine of pork: "There is no vatter between this and Y." In Dekker's Northward i. 1, Greenshield quotes an old prophecy: "Lincoln was, Lond. is, and Y. shall be." In Brome's Northern ii. 1, Widgin says, "I have a great many southern songs already; but northern airs nips it dead. Y., Y. for my money!" In Edwards' Damon xiii., Jacke sings, "Here is the trimmest hogs-flesh from Lond. to Y." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii., the Clown, setting out from Lond. to Yorkshire, says, "I will cry, and every town betwixt Shoreditch-ch. and Y.-bidge shall bear me witness." Drayton, in Idea xxxii. 6, says, "Y. many wonders of her Ouse can tell." W. Rowley, in Search Intro., tells of a man who for a wager hopped "from Y. to Lond."

The title of Duke of Y. was first held by Edmund Langley, 5th son of Edward III. He was created D. in 1385 and died in 1402. In Egerton MS. Play ii., he is spoken of as "The counterfeited, relenting D. of Y."; and later on it is said "The D. of Y. is gentle, mild, and gracious." He is an important character in R2, where he is called twice "good old Y.," and again "the good D. of Y." and "kind uncle Y." He is also prominent in Trag. Richd. II; in ii. 1, 126, the K. says, "Y. is gentle, mild, and generous." In Span. Trag. i., Hieronimo says, "The knight that hung his scutcheon up Was Edmund, Earl of Kent in Albion; When English Richd. wore the diadem, He came likewise and razed Lisbon walls; for which He after was created D. of Y." The K. of Portugal, Ferdinand, sought help from Richd. II against John of Castile, and Edmund Langley, Earl of Cambridge (not of Kent), went over to his support in 1381; but Ferdinand proved traitor to the English, and in 1383 they ravaged Portugal and made peace with John. Edmund was not made D. of Y. till 2 years later. The D. of Y. in H5 is the Aumerle of R2. He lost his title through his plot against Henry IV; he was, however, restored to his honours in 1414, and fell at Agincourt in the following year, as described in H5 iv. 6. He was succeeded by his nephew Richd., Earl of Cambridge, the son of Richd. of Cambridge; his marriage with Anne Mortimer, great-grand-daughter to Lionel of Clarence, 3rd son of Edward III, gave their son Richd. of Y. a double claim to the throne as the heir both of Lionel of Clarence and Edmund of Y. This Richd. was executed in 1415. His son, Richd. of Y., appears in H6 A. ii. 4, in the scene in the Temple Gardens where the white and red roses were adopted as the badges of the houses of Y. and Lancaster. During this scene he is called Plantagenet, and it is implied that on account of his father's execution he is not entitled to succeed to the dukedom of Y. Warwick, however, pledges himself to see that the blot is wiped out at the next Parliament; "And if thou be not then created Y., I will not live to be accounted Warwick." In 1425 this was done, and he received the Dukedom. In iii. 1, 171, the K. says to him: "I gird thee with the valiant sword of Y.; Rise, Richd., like a true Plantagenet, And rise created princely D. of Y." He was made Regent of France after the death of Bedford, and retained that office till 1446, when he was recalled. Accordingly he appears in Acts iv. and v. in France. In H6 B. i. 1, he declares: "A day shall come when Y. shall claim his own." In ii. 2, which is laid in his garden, his claim to the throne is discussed; and Warwick and Salisbury acclaim him: "Long live our sovereign Richd., England's K.!" In iii. 1, he is sent as Lord-Lieutenant to Ireland; this was in 1449. He was appointed Protector of England in 1454; and the next year the Wars of the Roses began. In v. 2, he fights at the battle of St. Alban's and kills Clifford and Somerset. In H6 C. i. 4, he is killed at the battle of Wakefield in 1460, and his head is cut off and placed on the gates of Y. (see above). His son Edward, afterwards Edward IV, succeeded to his title, and is the Y. of the rest of the play, though he is always styled K. Edward. His younger son, Richd., was made D. of Y. in 1474. He is the "pretty Y." and "little prating Y." of R3 who is murdered in the Tower by the order of Richd. III. The title then merged in the Crown, but was held for a time by Henry VIII, Charles I, and James II; as well as our present K., George V. The Duchess of Y. who appears in R3 ii. 2 was Cicely Neville, daughter of the Earl of Westmoreland and widow of Richd. of Y. Jonson, in Ev. Man I. Prol., speaks of the Wars of the Roses as "Y. and Lancaster's long jars."

Perkin Warbeck claimed to be Richd. of Y., younger son of Edward IV, who was murdered in the Tower by Richd. III. In Ford's Warbeck ii. 1, he is addressed by James of Scotland as "Cousin of Y."; and in i. 1, when K. Henry hears of his claim, he bitterly complains that he is only a mockery K., ordained "to lavish sweat and blood, in scorn and laughter, to the ghosts of Y."

The Archbp. of Y. is the Primate of England, and stands second only to the Archbp. of Canterbury, who is Primate of All England. Certain Archbps. appear in the historical plays. The Archbp. of H4 A. and B. was Richd. Scrope, appointed 1398, and beheaded for his share in Northumberland's insurrection in 1405. The Archbp. who plays a small part in R3 ii. 4 was Thomas Scott, or Rotherham (1480-1500). In H8, Cardinal Wolsey is called "The Cardinal of Y." and "My Lord of Y." He was archbp. from 1514 to 1530.

One of the Heralds of England has the title of Y. In Jonson's New Inn ii. 6, the Host speaks of "An old Welsh Herald's widow . . . that studies Vincent against Y." The Y. Herald had recently had a dispute with a certain Vincent.

YORK HOUSE, or PLACE. The original name of WHITEHALL PALACE (q.v.). In H8 iv. 1, 94, one gentleman announces that Q. Anne Boleyn after her coronation "paced back again to Y.-P., where the feast is held"; and another corrects him: "Sir, You must no more call it Y.-P., that's past; For, since the Cardinal fell, that title's lost; 'Tis now the k.'s and called Whitehall." The scene of H8 i. 4 is "A Hall in Y. P."; this was during Wolsey's tenancy. In S. Rowley's When You C. i., Summers, the K.'s fool, says of Patch, who was Wolsey's fool: "I come to bid Patch welcome to Court, and when I come to Y. H., he'll do as much for me." This was before Wolsey's fall.

YORK HOUSE, CHARING CROSS. In recompense for her father's appropriation of Whitehall, Q. Mary gave Suffolk House in Southwark to the Archbp. of Y. for his town residence; and in 1557 Archbp. Heath sold Suffolk House and bought instead certain houses near Charing Cross. They were transformed into a palace for the Archbp., and at first received the name of Suffolk Place, but soon became known as Y. H. It stood on the S. side of the Strand, just E. of the present Charing Cross Station, and covered the ground now occupied by Y. St., Buckingham St., and Villiers St. Heath lived there himself, but it was let by his successor to Lord Keeper Bacon, and his famous son, Francis Bacon, was born there; his Novum Organum is dated "Ex Aedibus Eborac." It passed in 1624 to George Villiers, D. of Buckingham, who built the Water-gate still to be seen on the Embankment, after the designs of Inigo Jones. During the Commonwealth it was granted to Fairfax; and after the Restoration was used as the lodging for the Spanish and Russian embassies. In 1672 it passed into private hands, and was pulled down to make room for the streets whose names still recall its tenancy by Buckingham. Davenant's Britannia was "Printed by John Harland for Thomas Walkley and are to be sold at his shop at the flying Horse near Y. H. 1637."

YORK HOUSE. A palace in Battersea by the river side, at the point where Price's candle factory now stands. It was built about 1475 by Lawrence Booth, then Bp. of Durham, but afterwards Archbp. of York. He made it into a town house for himself and his successors. In W. Smith's Hector ii. 3, 456, young Fitzwater says, "Meet me at Y. H." The time is the reign of Edward III—so that whichever Y. H. is meant there is an anachronism; and it may be either this, or the better known Y. H., afterwards Whitehall Palace, that is in the author's mind.

YORKSHIRE. The largest county in England, lying on the coast of the North Sea, and stretching from Durham to Lincs., and from the sea to Lancs. and Westmorland. It is divided into three Ridings—North, East, and West. The people have a reputation for shrewdness and bluff humour. To the Elizabethans it appeared as a somewhat uncivilised dist., far removed from the culture of Lond.

In H4 B. iv. 4, 99, Harcourt reports: "The Earl Northumberland and the Lord Bardolph Are by the Sheriff of Y. overthrown." This sheriff was Sir Thomas Rokeby, who defeated Northumberland at Bramham Moor in 1408. In R3 iv. 4, 521, the messenger reports: "Sir Thomas Lovel and Lord Marquis Dorset 'Tis said, my liege, in Y. are in arms." The scene of George is laid in Y.; George says, "Though we Yorkshiremen be blunt of speech, And little skilled in court or such quaint fashions, Yet nature teacheth us duty to our k." In Cromwell iv. 2, Old Cromwell says, "How? One Cromwell made Lord Keeper since I left Putney and dwelt in Y.?" In Fair Women ii. 1270, the Lord Justice says Browne's brother, who is in Newgate, has done "notorious felonies in Y." In Nobody, the Clown is a Yorkshireman, and threatens Archigallo: "Zounds, if ever I take you in Y. for this!" The soldier in T. Heywood's Witches describes himself as "Y." In Dekker's Northward ii. 2, Kate says of her husband: "He ran away from me, like a base slave as he was, out of Y., and pretended he would go the island voyage"; i.e. the expedition against Hispaniola in 1585. In v. 1, Bellamont says, "His reward is not the rate of a Y. attorney in good contentious practice, some angel." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage, much of the play takes place in Y.; in i. 1, Scarborough says, "Welcome, gentlemen, to Y."; and Ilford asks, "What makest thou here in this barren soil of the N.?" The alternative title of All's One is A Yorkshire Tragedy, and the scene is at Calverley (q.v.). In Brome's Northern, the heroine is a north-country girl, and speaks the Y. dialect.

YOXFORD. A vill. in Suffolk, 23 m. N.E. of Ipswich. It has a fine old parish ch. Thomas Willey, vicar of Yoxford, was the author of a number of polemical Protestant pamphlets; amongst them "A Play against the Pope's Counsellors, Error, called Clogger of Conscience, and Incredulity." As the result of the production of this play in 1537, he was excluded from most of the churches in Suffolk.

ZAHANRA. I suspect that the town now known as ORAN, or WAHRAN, is meant. It is on the N. coast of Algeria, 209 m. W. of Algiers. It was taken for the Spaniards by Peter of Navarre in 1509, and vainly besieged by the Moors in 1562. In Stucley 2461, "Aginer, Z., Seuta, Penon, Melilla" are mentioned as towns in N. Africa still held by the K. of Portugal.

ZABRAS. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B., Ricaldus says that "the ships of Urcas, Z., Naples" will take part in the invasion of England by the Spanish Armada.

ZAMA. A city in Numidia in N. Africa, 300 m. S.W. of Carthage. It is famous only for the defeat there of Hannibal by Scipio 201 B.C. In Nabbes' Hannibal iii. 5, Lelius says of Hannibal: "His camp's already pitched near Z."

ZANCLE (i.e. the SICKLE). A name given to Messina (q.v.), from the shape of the harbour. Barnes, in Parthenophil Elegy ix. 28, says, "Zanclaeon Charbid me devour!" where Charbid is a misprint for Charibd, i.e. Charybdis (q.v.).

ZANTE, or ZANT. The Greek Zacynthos, one of the Ionian Islands lying in the Ionian Sea off the N.W. coast of the Peloponnesus. It is well wooded and fruitful and is particularly noted for its currants. It was occupied by the Venetians in the 15th cent. and held by them till 1797. In Jonson's Volpone v. 2, it is suggested that Sir Politick should be shipped off "to Zant or to Aleppo." In Chapman's Usher v. 4, Medice says, "Of no country I, But born upon the seas, my mother passing 'Twixt Zant and Venice." In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo suggests for supper "a fine piece of kid now, and fresh garlic, with a sardine and Zant oil." In Marston's Mountebanks, Paradox exhibits a buskin which, being dipped into water, "returneth full of wine of Chios, Palermo, or Zaunte." See also ASANT.

ZANTHUS. See XANTHUS.

ZANZIBAR. An island off the E. coast of Africa, 800 m. N.W. of the N. point of Madagascar. The name was extended to the adjacent sea-board from Mombasi to Quiloa. During our period it was under the control of the Portuguese, who took possession of it at the beginning of the 16th cent. In the 17th cent. it was added to the empire of the Imams of Muscat. The last of the Imams was dethroned in 1870 and the dist. was transferred to the Germans. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles claims to have marched from Egypt "to Z., The eastern part of Afric, where I viewed The Ethiopian Sea, rivers, and lakes, But neither man nor child in all the land." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar promises Cleopatra: "Thy rule shall stretch from unknown Z."

ZAUNTE. See ZANTE.

ZEALAND. A province of Holland, lying between S. Holland and Belgium. It includes some 9 islands off the W. coast. A large part of the surface is below sea-level. The principal towns are Middelberg and Flushing. In Larum B. 1, a Burgher says, "The ships be of Z." In Dekker's Northward iv. 2, Capt. Jenkins speaks of "all the Low Countries in Christendom, as Holland and Z. and Netherland and Cleveland too." Gascoigne, in Dulce Bellum 99, says, "I roamed have about In Zealand, Holland, Waterland, and all." This was in the war between the Netherlands and Spain in 1574, when Gascoigne was serving under "the virtuous Prince of Orange." In Davenant's Cr. Brother i. 1, Dorido says of Borachio: "He walks like a Z. stork." The White Stork is common in the Netherlands and is regarded as a bringer of luck and a symbol of conjugal fidelity.

ZIPH, WILDERNESS OF. The dist. round the city of Z., now Tell el Z., 4 m. S.E. of Hebron in the uplands of Judah. David spent some time here whilst he was being pursued by Saul (see I Samuel xxiii). In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 3, David speaks of the blood of Saul and Jonathan "that from Gilboa ran In channels through the wilderness of Z." This is absurd, for Z. is nearly 100 m. from Gilboa.

ZIRICK-SEE, or ZURUCH-SEE. A vill. on the S. coast of the island of Schouwen, on the E. Scheldt, off the coast of N. Brabant. Moryson, in Itin. i. 1, 49, says that this whole dist. was "less than 200 years ago swallowed up of the sea, and, for witness of this calamity, divers towers far distant the one from the other, appear in this sea." In Ford's Trial i. 2, Futelli says that Fulgoso is descended from Dame Fustibunga, "who, troubled long time with a strangury, vented at last salt water so abundantly as drowned the land 'twixt Zirick-see and Vere, where steeple tops are only seen."

ZOGDIANA. See SOGDIANA.

ZONA MUNDI. Probably the Ural, or Oural, Mtns. are intended, which run S. from the Arctic Ocean to the high ground N. of the Sea of Aral and form the boundary between Europe and Asia; or it may be another name for the ranges of Central Asia. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 1, Amyras speaks of "the lofty mts. of Z. M. That fill the midst of farthest Tartary."

ZORA, now SURAN. A town on the N. side of Wady-es-Suran, opposite to Beth-shamesh, 14 m. W. of Jerusalem. It was the birthplace of Samson (Judges xiii. 2). In Milton's S. A. 181, the Chorus says, "We come, thy friends and neighbours not unknown, From Eshtael and Z.'s fruitful vale."

ZULA. Probably GYULA is meant. It was a strongly fortified town in Hungary, on the Koros, 120 m. S.E. of Buda-Pesth and 130 due N. of the Danube. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, Frederick says to Sigismund, "Your Majesty remembers, I am sure, What cruel slaughter of our Christian bloods These heathenish Turks and Pagans lately made Betwixt the city Z. and Danubius."

ZUTPHEN. A town in Holland in the province of Gelderland, on the Yssel, 55 m. E. of Amsterdam. It was before Z. that Sir Philip Sidney was killed in 1586. In Barnavelt iv. 5, a document is produced against Sir John at his trial "signed by the Governor of Gilderland and Z."

ZWITZ. See SWITZERLAND.

ADDENDA

A

ALIZON. In Chapman's Widow's Tears v. 2, 74, Lysander says that there are as many mischiefs in women "as A. of streams receives." The passage is very corrupt; there is no such river known as the A. Possibly the Halys (q.v.) is meant. Parrott suggests as an emendation "Amazon's."

D

DISS. Town in Norfolk, 18 m. S. of Norwich. About 1500 Skelton, the poet, was appointed Rector of D. One of the names of Pluto, the God of Hell, was Dis; hence, according to Milton, Areopagitica (Hales), p. 20, Henry VIII. named Skelton "in merriment his Vicar of hell." There is probably an allusion to this in Chapman's Hum. Day. iv. 125, where Labervele says of Catalian, who has been appointed chaplain to Florilla: "Her chaplain in the devil's name, fit to be vicar of hell!"

G

GHIBILLETTO. Town on the coast of Syria, 40 m. N.E. of Sidon; formerly Byblus, now Djebail. It was captured by Saladin in 1188, and finally evacuated by the Crusaders in 1291. There is no record of any further fighting there; but in the quarto of Jonson's Ev. Man I iii. 1, 103, Bobadilla boasts that he was present at "the beleaguering of G. where 700 resolute gentlemen, as any were in Europe, lost their lives upon the breach." For this imaginary siege the Folio edition substitutes "the beleag'ring of Strigonium," which happened in 1595.

J

JAMES (SAINT). An anglicised form of St. Jacob, a small village in Switzerland, on the Birs, close to Basle, where the French, with 32,000 men, were held in check for 10 hours by 1,600 Swiss. This was in 1444, and laid the foundation of the reputation of the Swiss for valour. A cross outside the gates of Basle still marks the site of the battle. In Chapman's D'Olive iv. 2, 112, D'Olive says that after his famous embassy "Agincourt battle, St. J. his field, the loss of Calais, and the winning of Cales, shall grow out of use; men shall reckon their years . . . from the day of our ambassage."

K

KEDRON. A brook running on the E. of Jerusalem, down the valley between the city and the Mt. of Olives, and falling into the Dead Sea. In T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 101, the Sophy speaks of Jerusalem as "this place where the brook K. runs."

L

LESSINGHAM. There is a small village of this name in Norfolk, but in the passage quoted below it is obviously a mistake for Lusignan, a town in the department of Vienne, in France, 14 m. S.W. of Poitiers, which gave his title to Guy of Lusignan, who was made King of Jerusalem in 1186. In T. Heywood's Prentices, p. 103, Robert proclaims that Guy is to be crowned King of Jerusalem, "and let his name Be through the world call'd Guy of Lessingham." The date is nearly a century too early; but the whole play is quite unhistorical.

LOWGAVE. In B. & F. Pestle ii. 8, Merrythought sings, "She is my Lord of Lowgave's lassie." Motherwell, in his Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern (Glasgow 1827), p. xi., says, ". . . Old Merrythought gives this verse, evidently a portion of a Scottish song, both in subject and style; perhaps it may have belonged to some edition of the popular ballad of 'The Laird of Logie.'"
